THE
Epistle to the Reader.

Enforinus, in his little book, written to Q. Cerellius of ones Birth day; having in hand the Explication of Times Intervals, thought good thus to Preface it. (a) Si Origo Mundi a hominum notitiam venisset, inde exordium sumeremus. If the Origin of the World had been known unto Man, I would thence have taken my beginning. And a little after, speaking of this Time. Sive habuit initium, saies he, (b) Sive semper fuit, et id quot an-orum sit, non potest comprehendere. Whether time had a beginning, or whether it alwaies was, the certain number of years cannot be comprehended. Therefore Ptolemæus, from Astronomical supputations, thus renounces this Epoch of the World, as a thing most remote from the knowledge of Man, (c) Tales mei illi sunt, qui si quid scirent, non moram facerent, sed iam tempore exiret, et ab eis audirent, ut quid scirent, et quid scirent, et quid scirent.

To find Observation upon the Passages of the whole World, or upon the multitude of times, I think much out of their way, that it desire to learn, and know the truth: And Julius Firmius Maternus, from his discourse of Birth-dayes, that Geniture of the World, received from Esculapius and Anubius.

(d) Non fuit ista genitura Mundi, (saies he) Nec enim Mundus certum diem habuit ortus sui, nec aliquid interfuit eo tempore quo Mundus Divina mentis ac providi Numinis ratione formatus est: Nec eo usque, se intentio potius humana a fragilitatis extendere ut Originem Mundi facile possit ratione concipere, aut explicare. That was not the Birth day of the World: Nor, indeed, had the World any certain day of its beginning: Nor was there any thing in Being at that time, when the World was formed by the Wisdom of the Divine Understanding, and Provident Deity; Nor could the intention of Human frailty so far extend itself, that it could conceive or unfold, by any ease account, the Worlds Original.

Nor, truly, is it strange that Heathens, altogether ignorant of holy writ, should thus despair, of ever attaining the knowledge of the Worlds Rise; when as even amongst Christians, that most renowned

The Epistle to the Reader.

Chronographer Dionysius Petavius, being about to declare his Opinion concerning the Creation of the World, and the number of years, from thence down to us, first made (c) this resolution before his discourse. Annorum ab orbe condito ad hæc tempora numerum neque certatione compertum esse, neque citra Divinam significationem posse comperiri. That the number of years from the beginning of the World, to these our days, can by no reasons be certainly concluded, nor any way found out, without Divine Revelation. From whose opinion Philastrius Brizienfis did very much dissent; denoting it heresie (f) to affirm the number of years, from the beginning of the World, uncertain; and that men knew not the spaces of Time. And Lactantius Firmianus, whose assertion in his Divine Institutions, is somewhat more bold. (g) Nos, quo. Divina litera ad scientiam veritatis erudiunt, principium Mundi finemque cognovimus. We whom the Holy Scriptures do train up to the knowledge of Truth, know both the beginning and end of the World. For whatsoever may be done of things past, we are taught that the (h) Father hath reserved the knowledge of things future in his own power; Nor is there any Mortal to whom the whole continuance of time is known: whither that of the Son of Sirac is thought to tend. (i) ἡμεῖς ὡς ἡ θάλασσα καὶ ὡς ὁ οὐρανός, οὐκ ἔσμεν ὅτι ἡμεῖς οὐκ ἔσμεν. The Sands of the Sea, the Drops of Rain, and the Daies of the World, who can number? Which Lyranus thinking to have been spoken of time past, (when as others interpret it here, and in Chap. XVIII. ii. of the dayes of eternity) draws thence this erroneous conclusion, That the dayes from the beginning of the World were never by any man cast up certainly and precisely.

The first Christian Writer, (that I have had the view of) who attempted from Holy Writings to deduce the Age of the World, was Theophilus, Bishop of Antioch; who, (k) concerning this whole account, thus generally declares. Ὅτι οὐδεὶς ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ τῆς Καταγωγῆς οὐδὲν ἄλλοις ἀποκαλύπτει. All times and years are made known to them who are willing to obey the truth. But concerning the exactness of this Calculation, he thus afterwards proceeds. Ἡμεῖς δὲ ἀνεκὲς τὸν ἀπολογισμὸν αὐτοῦ τῶν ἐτῶν τῆς ἀποκαλύψεως, οὐκ ἔσμεν ὅτι ἡμεῖς οὐκ ἔσμεν. And haply we may not be able to give an exact account of every year, because in the Holy Scriptures there is no mention of the months and dayes current.

For when as the Scripture commonly takes notice only of the whole intire years, not regarding the dayes and months either deficient to the making up compleat years, or supernumerary to the intire, there might a doubt arise of the accuratenesse of that sum which shall arise from such years added together. But yet, granting this one thing, (and that most consonant to reason) That Holy Writers, consigning the years of the World, in their several places, with such diligence, had this in designe, That the series of the Years of the World, which could no other way be learned, might be discovered unto us; This (I say) being granted granted, we affirm that the Holy Ghost hath, as much as was necessary, provided against this doubt: when as he hath to the several terminations and turnings of the several Periods, (on which the series of time depends) adjoynd the very moneth and day. As for example, when the Israelites are said to go out of Egypt, the (l) fifteenth day of the first moneth: and Solomon to begin to build the Temple, in the 480 year after their (m) departure, on the second day of the (n) second month, the moneths and dayes which bound each termination of that Period, shew, that 11 moneths and 14 dayes are to be taken away; and not that the whole 480, but only 479 years, and sixteen dayes are to be taken for the space of that Period.

*Tempus Astronomicum, à primo creationis puncto ad principium a Christiana exactum, quise dare nobis possit promittunt, favore mihi digni videntur magis quam laude, quia majus quid ingenio humano molimur. Those who promise to give us an exact Astronomical Table of Time, from the first point of the Creation unto Christ, seem to me more worthy of encouragement than praise, in that they attempt a thing above human capacity, saies David Paræus, who, among the latest of our Writers, took upon him to number the years, even to Christs time, out of the Holy Scriptures. Therefore he saies, leaving the Astronomical, he betook himself to the Politick time of the Hebrews, Egyptians, and Persians, as to a ἑκαστοῦ καὶ or, another Course.*

But if I have any insight in this business, it is of no great concernment, what rule we make use of in measuring the course of time, so it be known and terminated with a certain number of dayes. And if any one could with D. Paræus, by some equal measure of years, define the distance between the foundation of the World, and Christs time; It were also most easie, without the help of any Astronomical Table, to set down how many Equinoctials in number happened, during that Interval. And the noted revolution of time in any Political year, from an Equinoctial to the same point again, what is it but a year natural and truly Astronomical?

But if any one, well seen in the knowledge, not onely of Sacred and exotic History, but of Astronomical Calculation, and the old Hebrew Kalender, shall apply himself to these studies, I judge it indeed difficult, but not impossible for such a one to attain, not onely the number of years, but even, of dayes from the Creation of the World. That, without doubt, by retrograde supputation, Basil, the great, teaches us we may attain to the first day of the World. (o) Ἄν τις ἐκ τῶν ἀποστόλων ἢ τῶν πατέρων ἀκούσας τὸν λόγον τῆς ἀποκαλύψεως, οὐκ ἔσμεν ὅτι ἡμεῖς οὐκ ἔσμεν. Thou mayst indeed learn in what very time the foundation of the World was laid, if returning from this time to former ages, thou endeavour studiously to find out the day of the Worlds Origin. For thus thou mayest find whence time time had its first motion. But in regard, in divers Ages and Nations, divers Epochs of time were used, and several forms of years: Here it is necessary that some common and known account should be observed, to which the diversity of the rest may most appositely be reduced. And to us there is no measure of time more known, and more accommodated to the common collation of times than the form of the Julian Years and Months, deduced from the middle of the night beginning the Kalends of January, of the first year of the common account from Christ; with those three Cycles, by which being joyned, every year is distinguished from all other years whatsoever. For example, the Roman indiction 19 years, the Cycle of the Moon, or Golden Number 19, and the Cycle of the Sun (the Index of Sunday, or our Lords Day) containing the Period of twenty eight years. Nor is there any thing more or better known than That at this day, the year (I do not say of the true Nativity of Christ, which is controverted amongst the Learned, but) of the common Christian era MDCL is noted with the Characters of 3 in the Roman indiction, 17 in the Lunar Cycle, and 7. in that of the Sun.

But for as much as our Christian Epoch falls many Ages after the beginning of the World, and the number of years before that backward, is not onely more troublesome; but (unless greater care be taken) more lyable to error; Also it hath pleased our Modern Chronologers, to adde to that generally received Hypothesis, (which asserted the Julian Years, with their three Cycles by a certain Mathematical prolepsis, to have run down to the very beginning of the World) an artificial Epoch, framed out of three Cycles multiplied in themselves; for the Solar Cycle being multiplied by the Lunar, or the number of 28, by 19, produces the great Paschal Cycle of 532 years, and that again multiplied by fifteen, the number of the indiction, there arises the Period of 7980 years, which was first (if I mistake not) observed by Robert Lotharing, Bishop of Hereford, in our Island of Brittain, and 500 years after by Joseph Scaliger, fitted for Chronological uses, and called by the name of the Julian Period, because it contained a Cycle of so many Julian years. Now if the Series of the three minor Cycles be from this present year, extended backward unto precedent Times, the 4713 years before the beginning of our Christian Account, will be found to be that year into which the first year of the Indiction, the first of the Lunar Cycle, and the first of the Solar will fall. Having placed therefore the heads of this Period in the Kalends of January, in that proleptick year, the first of our Christian vulgar account, must be reckoned the 4714 of the Julian Period, which, being divided by 15. 19. 28. will present us with the 4 Roman indiction, the 2 Lunar Cycle, and the 10 Solar, which are the principal Characters of that year.

We find moreover that the year of our fore-fathers, and the years

years of the ancient Egyptians, and Hebrews were of the same quantity with the Julian, consisting of twelve equal moneths, every of them containing 30 dayes, (for it cannot be proved that the Hebrews did use Lunary Moneths, before the Babylonian Captivity) adjoyning to the end of the twelfth moneth, the addition of five dayes, and every fourth year six. And I have observed by the continued succession of these years, as they are delivered in holy writ, That the end of the great Nebuchadnezzars, and the beginning of Evilmerodachs (his sons) reign, fell out in the 3442 year of the World, but by collation of Chaldean History, and the Astronomical Cannon, it fell out in the 85 year of Nabonassar, and, as by certain connexion, it must follow in the 562 year before the Christian account, and of the Julian Period, the 4152. and from thence I gathered the Creation of the World did fall out upon the 710 year of the Julian Period, by placing its beginning in Autumn: but for as much as the first day of the World began with the evening of the first day of the week, I have observed that the Sunday, which in the year 710 aforesaid, came nearest the Autumnal Equinox, by Astronomical Tables, (p) notwithstanding, the stay of the Sun, in the dayes of Jehus, and the going back of it in the dayes of Ezekiah) happened upon the 23 day of the Julian October; from thence concluded, that from the evening preceding, that first day of the Julian year, both the first day of the Creation, and the first motion of time are to be deduced.

The difficulties of Chronologers, perplexed by that anomalie, or love of contention, so termed by Basil, being at last over-passed. I incline to this opinion, that from the evening ushering in the first day of the World, to that midnight which began the first day of the Christian era, there was 4003 years, seventy dayes, and six temporarie howers; and that the true Nativity of our Saviour was full four years before the beginning of the vulgar Christian era, as is demonstrable by the time of Herods death. For according to our account, the building of Solomons Temple was finished in the 3000 year of the V World, and in the 4000 year of the V World, the dayes being (q) fulfilled, in which the Blessed Virgin, Mother of God, was to bring forth Christ himself, (of whom the Temple was a (r) Type) was manifest in the flesh, and made his first appearance unto man: from whence four years being added to the Christian era, and as many taken away from the years before it, instead of the Common and Vulgar, we shall obtain a true and natural Epocha of the Nativity of Christ.

But these things, (which I do onely point at for the present) God willing, shall be more fully hereafter confirmed in our Sacred Chronology, which I intend to put forth, together with a Treatise of the Primitive Years, and the Kalender of the ancient Hebrews: In the mean time I thought good to publish the Annals of the Old Testament, built upon the Foundation there laid, with a Chronicle of all Forreign Affairs, transacted in Asia and Egypt, before the beginning of the Olympiads, those things chiefly being reserved to a particular History of the Greeks and Romans, which are recorded to have past in Greece, (to which I joyn Rhodes and the Islands lying betwixt Asia and Europe) and the Western parts.

In representing the Sacred History, I have followed the translation of Junius and Tremellius, using their Hebraism's also, and their Contents of the Chapters. In expressing the Prophane, I have observed the words of their ancient Authours, or of their best Translator out of the Greek, and particularly James Dalechamp in Athenæus; although in noting the Chapters I observed the edition of Natalis Comes, and out of these I have my self collected the Histories, or being gathered by them, taken them out of Codomanes, Capellas Emmias, Pezelius, Eberus, Salianus, or some other Chronologer, which I had at hand; yet so, that the very Fountains themselves of the first Authours, (whose places I did most diligently mark) were alwayes before mine eyes: for being wholly intent upon the right ordering of times, I was not much concerned in the alteration of other words, which, if it had seemed considerable, had been very easie to have performed.

And whereas amongst a multitude of Historians, which were before Julius Cæsars time, the malice of time left only four remaining, Herodotus, Thucydides, Xenophon, and Polibius, (and him also lame and imperfect in the greatelt part of him) these, notwithstanding, I esteemed the most Authentick for their Antiquity; and having by their authority corrected the frequent errors in Chronology of Diodorus Siculus; but in Affairs that related to Alexander the Great, (which they not so much as mentioned, I endeavoured not by Diodorus onely, but by Curtius and Arrianus also, to clear the light of those times, which were by others left dark and obscure.

The four first letters of the Alphabet I made use of, as indexes of the beginnings, progresses, and ending of the years of the World, A. signifying the Autumnal, or first Quarter, B. the Brumal or Winter Quarter. C. the Spring, and the Summer. D. other things, the Prudent Reader will of himself understand: to whom I with the enjoyment of these endeavours, and bid farewell. HIS

to RHENUS.

Have often heard Capino relate thus, When Dalburgius, the Bishop of the Vangions, Rudolphus Agricola, and my self were with Philip Prince Palatine Eleÿor; not onely in common discourse, but also in serious debates about the Affairs of the Common-wealth; they would often bring notable examples, or from the Persian or Grecian or Roman Affairs: whereby the Prince was very much inflamed with the desire of knowledge in History: but said he observed, the distinction of Times, Nations, and Empires, was very requisite to that end. And therefore desired them, that out of all Antiquities, as far as they were known, from the Hebrew Fountains, Greek, and Latine Authours, they would in order dispose the several Monarchies, that so the Times of the World, and the Series of the most considerable mutations might be known. There were then no books extant in the German tongue, concerning ancient Empires. Nor had the Latines any thing of that nature, save Justins confused Epitome, which also wanted the distinction of Times. Those learned men were then at leisure and delighted with the work. They therefore recite in order out of the Hebrew, Greek, and Latine Monuments, the several Monarchies, and insert all the most memorable transactions in their due place and order, with the distinctions of Nations, Nations, and Times. This Ingenious Prince read these Works most earnestly, and declared his delight in them, and That the Series of Times, and the memory of the most remarkable Affairs were preserved by Divine Providence. For they shewed him, how that the History of the World was continued so, that Herodatus begins his Narrations, a little before the end of the Prophetic History. For even before the end of the Persian Monarchy, concerning which we have most clear Narrations in Daniel, Esdras, and Nehemia, some names of the Kings of Assyria and Egypt, are the same in the Prophets and Herodotus. Jeremias foretells destruction to Apries, which Herodotus describes. After Apries kills Jeremie, and then Amasis strangles the proud King after he had taken him. The Palatine Prince said he did acknowledge a Testimony of Divine presence, in the constitution of Empires, for that they could neither be attained nor retained by meer Humane power, and that they were therefore constituted, that they might be the Upholders of Human Society, conjoyn many Nations, Restore Laws, Justice, Peace, yea, they might teach men concerning God. And therefore did often repeat those words of Daniel, God changes, and confirms Empires. He said likewise, That by the mutations and punishments of Tyrants, the just judgement of the Almighty was most conspicuous; and that all Mankind was, by these Illustrions Examples, premonished to acknowledge God, and were given to understand that he wills and ordains justice, and is truly offended with those who transgresse this his ordination. Such were the Speeches of that Prince, considering the Rises and Ruines of Empires.

THE ANNALS

OF THE

OLD TESTAMENT,

From the beginning of the World.

In the beginning God created Heaven and Earth, Gen. 1. v. 1. Which beginning of time, according to our Chronologie, fell upon the entrance of the night preceding the twenty third day of October, in the year of the Julian Calendar, 710.

1004. 710.

Upon the first day therefore of the world, or October 23. being our Sunday, God, together with the highest Heaven, created the Angels. Then having finished, as it were, the roofe of this building, he fell in hand with the foundation of this wonderfull Fabrick of the World, he fashioned this lowermost Globe, consisting of the Deep, and of the Earth; all the Quire of Angels singing together, and magnifying his name therefore. [Job. 38. v. 7.] And when the Earth was void and without forme, and darkness covered the face of the Deep, on the very middle of the first day, the light was created; which God severing from the darkness, called the one day, and the other night.

On the second day [October 24 being Monday] the firmament being finished, which was called Heaven, a separation was made of the waters above, and the waters here beneath enclosing the earth.

Upon the third day [October 25 Tuesday] these waters beneath running together into one place, the dry land appeared. This confluence of the waters, God made a Sea, sending out from thence the rivers, which were thither to return again [Eccles. 1. ver. 7.] and he caused the Earth to bud, and bring forth all kinds of herbs and plants, with seeds and fruits: But above all, he enriched the garden of Eden with plants; for among them grew the tree of Life, and the tree of Knowledge, of good and evil. [Gen. 2. ver. 8, 9.]

On the fourth day [October 26, which is our Wednesday] the Sun, the Moon, and the rest of the Stars were created.

On the fifth day [October 27 Thursday] Fish and flying Fowl were created, and endued with a blessing of encrease.

And upon the sixth day [October 28, which is our Friday] the living creatures of the earth took their creation, as well going, as creeping creatures. And last of all, man was made and created after the image of God, which consisted principally in the divine knowledge of the minds, [Coloss. 3. ver. 10.] and in the naturall and proper sanctity of his will, [Ephes. 4. ver. 24.] And he forthwith, when all living creatures, by the Divine Power, were brought before him, as a Lord appointed over them, gave them their names, by which they should be called. Amongst which, when he found none to help him like to himself, left he should be destitute of a fit companion, God taking a rib out of his side, whilst he slept, fashioned it into a woman, and gave her to him for a wife, establishing, withall, a law of marriage between them; then blessing them, he bade them wax and multiply, and gave them dominion over all living creatures, and for them all he provided a large proportion of food and sustenance to live upon. To conclude, sin being not yet entered upon the world, God beheld all that he had made, and, behold, it was exceeding good. And so was the evening, and so was the morning of the sixth day. [Gen. 1. ver. 31.]

Now upon the seventh day, [October 29, which is, with us Saturday,] when God had finished nished his work which he intended, he then rested from all labour, and blessing the seventh day, he ordained and consecrated the Sabbath, [Gen. 2. ver. 23.] because therein he took breath, as himself is pleased to speak of himself, [Exod. 31. ver. 17.] and, as it were, refreshed himself. Nor as yet (for ought appeared) had sin set footing into the world. Nor was there any punishment laid for a figue, as well of our sanctification in this world [Exod. 31. ver. 13.] as of that eternal Sabbath, to be enjoyed hereafter; wherein we expect a full deliverance and discharge from sin, and the dregs thereof, and all punishments belonging thereunto, [Heb. 4. ver. 49, 10.]

		After the first week of the world ended, as it seemeth, God brought the new married couple into the garden of Eden, and charged them not to eat of the tree of knowledge of good and evil; but left them free use of all the rest.
		But the Devil, envying Gods honour and mans felicity, tempted the woman to sin by the Serpent; whence himself got the name and title of the old Serpent. [Apos. 12. ver. 9. and 20. ver. 2.] The woman then beguiled by the Serpent, and the man seduced by the woman, brake the ordinance of God concerning the forbidden fruit; and accordingly being called, and convicted of the crime, had their severall punishments inflicted on them: yet with this promise added, that the Seed of the woman should, one day, break the Serpents head, (i.) That Christ in the full time should undo the works of the Devil, [1. Ioh. 3. ver. 8. Rom. 16. ver. 20.] From whence it was, that Adam then first called his wife Eve; because she was then ordained to be the mother, not onely of all that should live this naturall life, but, of those also who should live by faith in her feed, which was the promised Messiah: as Sara also afterward was counted the mother of the faithful, [1. Pet. 3. ver. 6. Gal. 4. ver. 31.]
		Upon this occasion our first Parents, clad by God with raiment of skinnies, were turned out of Eden, and a fierie flaming sword set the way leading to the tree of Life, to the end they should never alter eat of that fruit, which hitherto they had not touched Gen. 3. ver. 21, 22, &c. whence it is very probable, that Adam was turned out of Paradise the self same day that he was brought into it, which seemeth to have been upon the tenth day of the world (answering to our first day of November, according to supposition of the Julian Period) upon which day also, in remembrance of so remarkable a thing, as in all reason it should seem, was appointed the solemnity of Expiation, or attonement, and the yearly fast, (spoken of by Saint Paul, Acts 27. ver. 9. termed more especially by the name of neumes , wherein all, as well strangers as home-born people, were commanded to afflict their souls with a most severe intermination, that every soul which should not afflict itself upon that day should be destroyed from among his people, very soul which should not afflict itself upon that day should be destroyed from among his people, [Lev. 16. v. 29. and 23. ver. 29.]
		After the fall of Adam, Cain was the first of all mortall men that was born of a woman, [Gen. 4. ver. 1.]
130.	d.	Abel being murdered by his brother Cain, the first born of all man-kind, God gave Eve another son in his stead; whence his name was called Seth, c. 4. v. 25. when Adam had now lived 130 years, c. 5. v. 3. From whence it is gathered, that between the death of Abel, and the birth of Seth, there was no other son born to Eve; for then he should have been recorded to have been given her instead of him: so that whereas now the race of man-kind had been continued to the terme of 128 years, it is probable, that the number of men was so increased in the world, that Cain might justly fear, through the conscience of his crime, that every man that met him would also slay him, [c. 4. v. 14, 15.]	945. 3769.
235.	d.	Seth now being 105 years old, begat a son, whom he named Enosh; which signifies, the lamentable condition of all man-kind. For even then was the worship of God wretchedly corrupted by the race of Cain: whence it came, that men were even then so distinguished, corrupted by the race of Cain: whence it came, that men were even then so distinguished, that they who persisted in the true worship of God, were known by the name of the children of God; and they which forsook him, were termed the children of men, Gen. 4. v. 26. and 6. 12.

		Now in the second month of this year, upon the 10 day thereof, (answering to the 30 of our November, being Sunday) God commanded Noah, that in that weeke, he should provide himself to enter into the Arke: to whiles the world, (in the mean time) void of all fear, fare eating and drinking, and marrying and giving in marriage, [Gen. 7. v. 1, 4, 10. Mat. 24. v. 38.]
		In the 600 year of the life of Noah, upon the 17 day of the first month, answering to the 7 of our Decemb, upon a Sunday, when he with his children, and living creatures of all sorts, were entered into the Arke, God sent a rain upon the earth forty days, and forty nights; and the waters continued upon the earth 150 days, [Gen. 7. v. 45, 6, 11, 25, 31, 7, 24.]
		The waters abating upon the 17 day of the 7 month, May 6. upon a wednesday, the Arke rested upon one of the mountains of Ararat, [c. 8. v. 4, 7.]
		And the waters still falling upon the first day of the fourth month (which is July 10. being Sunday) the tops of the mountains appeared above the water, [c. 8. v. 5.] And after 40 days, that is upon the 11 day of the 11 month (being 28 of August, falling upon a Friday) Noah opening the window of the Arke, sent forth a Raven, [c. 8. v. 6, 7.] And seven days after, as may probably be gathered, out of those other seven days, mentioned, [v. 10.] Noah sent forth a Dove and the returning, after seven days more, he sent her forth again: and about the evening he returned, bringing the leaf of an Olive tree in her mouth, and then slaying her seven days more, sent the same Dove out again, which never returned more unto him, [c. 8. v. 8, 12.]

1657.	d.	In the 601 year of the life of Noah, upon the first day of the first month (which is Jan. 10. being our Friday) the first day, as first of the new world, so now of this new year; when the surface of the earth was now all dry, Noah took off the covering of the Arke, [Gen. 8. 13.]
		Upon the 27 of the second month, (Dec. 18. falling upon Thursday) when the earth was wholly dry, by the commandment of God, Noah went forth with all that were with him in the Arke, [c. 8. v. 14, 19.]
		Being gone forth, Noah offered unto God sacrifices, for such his preservation: and God restored the nature of things destroyed by the flood: he permitted unto men the eating of flesh for their food; and gave the rainbow for a signe of the covenant, which he then made with man, [c. 8. v. 9.]
1688.	d.	The years of mans life, were now made as it were, half shorter than they were before. Arphaxad, was now born to Sem, being 100 years old; two years after the flood ceased, [c. 11. v. 10.]	2368.	2346.
1693.	d.	Salah was born when his father Arphaxad, had lived 35 years, [c. 11. v. 12.]	2403.	2311.
1723.	d.	Heber was born, when Salah his father had lived 30 years, [c. 11. v. 14.]	2433.	2281.
1757.	d.	When Heber had lived 34 years, he had a son born, whom he named Phaleg, [c. 11. 16.] because in his day the earth was divided, [c. 10. v. 25. and Chron. 1. v. 19.] which it understood for the day of his birth, then it seemeth that at what time Phaleg was born, Noah, who formerly knew the places which were now overpread with bulbes and thornes, made a division of the land among his grandchildren; and that done, that they then went from those eastern parts (whither they first repaired from the mountains of Ararat) unto the valley	2467.	2247.

		no flue, promised him a posterity equal to the stars of heaven in number, which after 400 years (joyning and affliction in a land that was none of theirs, he promised to bring into the land foretold unto him, and bound that promise with a covenant to perform it, [Gen. 15.]
1093.		Sarah longing for that blessed seed, and seeing now ten years spent since their coming into the land of Canaan, gave him to wife Hagar her servant, an Egyptian born, who being great with child of her Mr. Abram; and being evil entreated by her Mrs. for her insolent carriage toward her, fled from her; but being warned of God by his Angels, she returned, and submitted her self to her dame [Gen. 16. 13, 14.]	2803. 1911.
2096. 4.		Arphaxad the third from Noah, died 403 years after the birth of Salems, [Gen. 11. 32.]
2107. c.		God making a covenant with Abram, when he was now 99 years old touching the seed of Isaac, who was to be born of Sarah that time twelve month, gave him the feaful Circumcision (changing both their names, Abram into Abraham, and Sarai into Sarah) for a sure pledge & testimony of his promise, promising also to favour Ishmael the eldest born, for the fathers sake, which promises; Abraham entertaining and embracing with a lively faith, & true obedience, caused himself, being now 99 years of age, and his son Ishmael then thirty years old, and all his household, to be circumcised, the self-same day wherein it was enjoyn'd him, [Gen. 17. 1. 10, 26.]
		Abraham invites Angels coming like men travelling upon the way unto his house and feasts them, who reiterating the promise of the birth of Isaac, in favour of Sarah declared, with all the judgement of God, intended upon the 5 cities, for their utter destruction; and Abraham learning what would become of Lot, and his family in Sodom, made intercession to God for the sparing of that place, [Gen. 18. and 19. v. 29.] Sodom therefor, and Gomorrah and Aadmah, and Seboim, for their horrible sins, riddled by fire and brimstone, raining down upon them from heaven, [Gen. 19.] that they might be an example to all wicked livers in time to come, of the pains of that everlasting fire to be inflicted on them in that lake of fire and brimstone, which is the second death, [2 Pet. 2. 6. Jud. 7. Ap. 19. 20. c. 20. 10. c. 21. 8.] The monument whereof remaineth unto this day; even the dead sea. The valley of Siddim, where these 5 cities stood in former times, which was full of brimstone and salt pits, being since grown into a vast lake; which from the brimstone therein this floating is called Lachmi Alphalitin; a lake of brimstone & from th. lat. mare salum. sh. [alt. sea, Gen. 14. 3. Deut. 3. 17. c. 29. 23. Zeph. 2. 9. W. d. 1. 6. 7.] of which Solinus thus writeth, a great way off from Jerusalem, there lies a woful tract of a country to be seen, which that it was heretofore blasted from heaven appears by the blackness of the earth falling all to cinders. There were in that place heretofore seated two Cities, one called Sodom, the other Gomorrah, where if an apple grow, though it seems to have a show of maturity and ripeness, yet it is not eatable at all, for the sun's heat therein, containeth nothing within it save a stinking steam, mingled with ashes, and being never so lightly touched, sendeth forth a smoke, and the rest falls presently into a light dust or powder.
		Lot being halsted out of Sodom by the Angels, avoided the destruction, by flying to a little city, called Bela, which from thence was called Zoar; but his wife was turned into a pillar of salt; and Lot himself, fearing to continue at Zoar, left the plain country, and betook him to the Hill, as he was commanded, carrying his two daughters with him, [Gen. 19.]
		Abraham, going from the plain of Mamre, towards the south, that he might dwell at a place which was afterward called Beer-sheba, was entertained by Abimelech, K. of the Philistines, at Gerar, where Sarah, going once again under the name of his sister, was reft from him. But the K. being reproved therefore, and punished by God, restored her unto her husband, with large gifts and presents added thereto, and by his prayers Abimelech and all his house were healed of their infirmities, [Gen. 20.]
2108. c.		When Abraham was now 100, and Sarah 90 years of age, the fore-promised son Isaac was born unto them, [Gen. 17. 17. 21. c. 21. 1. 7. Rom. 4. 19.] nor long after was it, that Moab and Ammon were born to Lot, who was both father, and grandfather to them, [Gen. 19. 36. 37. 38.]	2818. 2896.
		When Isaac was weaned, Abraham made a great feast, and Sarah (spying Ishmael the son of Hagar the Egyptian jesting with, or rather mocking (as in Gen. 39. 14. that word is taken) may even persecuting (as the Apostle, Gal. 4. 29.) expoundeth it) her son Isaac; as challenging to himself, by way of eldership, the right of inheritance in his fathers estate, laid unto Abraham, Cast forth this handmaid with her son, for the son of this handmaid shall not be heir with my son Isaac, which though he took very grievously at the first, yet he did it; God having laid unto him, in Isaac shall thy seed be called, Gen. 21. 8. 12. and Rom. 9. 7, 8. and Heb. 11. 17, 18.] where observe that Isaac is called his only begotten son, but among the Hebrews there is a difference of opinions; some holding that this was done in the 5 year after Isaacs weaning; others in the 12, but we choosing a shorter time of age, reckon that Ishmael was cast out with his mother, when he was 18 years old, [alt. St. Jerome, writing of the traditions of the Jews, upon Genesis: so that from this declaration of the elect seed, and perdition (as the Apostle termeth it) of Isaac, by Hagar's son, many of them reckon the 400 years; which the seed of Abraham was to be a stranger and sojourner, and afflicted in a foreign land, as God had foretold unto him (Gen. 15. 13. Abi. 1. 6.) For that those 400 years were to be completed at the instant of the departure of the children of Israel out of Egypt, appears (Gen. 15. 14. Ex. 12. 35, 36.) compared each with other; though the ordinary gloss out of Anst. refers the beginning of the account, to the very birth of Isaac, as if the Scripture called the number of 403 by the name of 400 years, as in a round summe, or number.

2126. d.		Salah the fourth from Noah, died 403 years after the birth of Heber, [Gen. 11. v. 15.]	2100. 1878.
2131. b.		Affis reigned in Egypt by the space of 49 years two moneths: Manetho.	2841. 1873.
		Now Josephus reports that at this time Isaac was 25 years old, lib. 1. Antiq. 14. (al. 22.) and that he was at that time of good years may be gathered from this, that he was able to carry so much wood, as was to go to the burning and consuming of such a whole burnt offering, as himself was then intended by Abraham to have been made, Gen. 22. v. 6.
2145. b.		Sarah being 127 years of age, died in Hebron, for whole burial Abraham bought the cave in the field of Macpelah, which was the first possession that he gat in the land of Canaan, of Ephron the Hittite, for a summe of money, Gen. 23. v. 12, 19. 20. But as Abraham is registered to us for the father of the faithful, Rom. 4. v. 11, 12. So is Sarah for the mother of the faithful, 1 Pet. 3. 6. and she is the only woman whole full and entire age is mentioned in the Scripture.	2855. 1859.
2148. d.		Abraham being careful to get a wife for his son Isaac, sent his chief servant, Eliezar of Damascus, Gen. 15. v. 2. (taking first an oath of him) to look out one for him: who going by the guidance of God into Mesopotamia, there obtained for him Rebekah the daughter of Bethuel, sister to Laban the Syrian, whom Isaac receiving for his wife, brought into the tent of his mother Sarah; and by the solace and content which he took in her, put off the dolor and grief which he conceived upon the death of his mother, who was departed this life three years before, Gen. 24. v. 1. 67. and he was forty years old when he married his wife Rebekah, Gen. 25. v. 20.	2858. 1856.
		About this time began the reign of the Argivi in Peloponnesus, 1080 years before the first Olympiad, as Eusebius in his Chronicle reporteth, out of Censor.
		The first that there reigned was Inachus, who reigned 50 years; of whom Erasmus, in the proverb, Inacho antiquior , speaketh; unto which also I refer that of the most learned Varro, in his 17 th book of Humane Affaires , (cited by A. Gellius in his first book, Noctium Attic. c. 16. and of Macrobius lib. 1. Saturnal.) where he saith, To the beginning of Romulus are reckoned more than 1100 years: For from the beginning of Inachus his reign, according to the account of Censor there mentioned, unto the Pallia, or solemn Festivals of Pales (the country Goddess among the Romans) mentioned by Varro, are reckoned 1102 years.
2158. d.		Scm the son of Noah died 500 years after the birth of Arphaxad, Gen. 11. v. 1.	2868. 1846.
2167. d.		When Rebekah had continued barren nineteen years after her marriage, Isaac in great devotion made praier unto God in her behalf; and she thereupon conceived twins, Gen. 25. v. 21.	2877. 1837.
2168. c.		When the twins strove in the womb, Rebekah asked counsell of God; by whom it was answered, that the hands of two differing and disagreeing Nations should proceed out of her in that birth, of which the one should be stronger than the other, and that the elder should serve the younger. But at the time of her travel, the first that came forth was rudely all over, and like to a flag garment, and his name was called Esau; then came forth the other, holding the former by the heele, whereupon he was called by the name of Jacob; and Isaac their father, at the time of their birth, was sixty years old, Gen. 25. v. 22. Hebr. 12. v. 3.

At this time the Ogygian, Deluge beſel in the country of Attica 1020 years before the fiſt Olympiad: as is reported out of Hellanicus , Cæſtor , Thales , Diodorus Siculus , and Alexander Polyhiſtor in his third book of his Chronography, by Julius Africanus , as we find it in Eufebius his book, de Temp. Evang. which yet Varro his accounts, makes to have been three hundred years before.	2941.	1773.
2221.	b.	Amenophis reigned in Egypt 20 years, 7 months. [Manetho .]	2949.	1765.
2223.	c.	Iſhmael , Abraham 's ſon, at the age of 137 years, died. [Gen. 25. v. 17.]	2952.	1762.

2242.	c.	Euechon , began to reign in Chaldea, two hundred twenty four years before the Arabians , [Julius Africanus .] which ſeemeth to be the ſame with Belus of Babylon , or Jupiter Belus , worſhipped afterwards by the Chaldeans as a god. [Iſa. 46. verſ. 1. Jer. 50. verſ. 2. and 51. v. 41.]
2245.	d.	Iſaac now grown old and blind, in the 44 th year before his death, ſent Eſau his elder ſon, to take ſome veniſon for him, purpoſing to bleſſe him at his return; but Jacob his younger ſon, by the ſubtile counſel of his mothers coming diſguiſed in his clothes, and with favourable meat in his hand, ſtole away the bleſſing, unwitting to his father; and the bleſſing, though to goe, God confirmed ever after. But Jacob ſeeing that for ſo doing, his brother followed him with a deadly hatred, and being deſirous to avoid his traps, willing alſo to take a wife of his own kindred, aſking fiſt his fathers bleſſing, he took his journey into Melopotamia to his uncle Laban . But in his journey, by the viſion of a ladder, God confirmed to him, all the bleſſings formerly given to his father, and aſſured him of his grace and favour for the future, in remembrance whereof, Jacob ſet up a pillar, and changed the name of the place from Luz , to Bethel , and there made a vow to God, And coming at length to Carraan , and continuing a months time with Laban , fell in love with Rachel his daughter, and covenanted to ſerve him ſeven years for her, [Gen. 29. v. 1. and 29. v. 20.] with [Heſai 2. v. 12.] now that this fell upon the 77 year of Jacob 's age, will appear by that which will be ſaid, upon the year of the World, 2259.
		Eſau , ſeeing that Iſaac had bleſſed Jacob , and ſent him away into Melopotamia , there to take him a wife, and that he liked not the daughters of Canaan, to pacifie his fathers mind, who was offended with him for marrying his fiſt wife out of Canaan, took a ſecond wife Rebekah , the daughter of Iſhmael , the ſon of Abraham , [Gen. 28. v. 6, 9.]
		Eſau had been now a married man 37 years, and was 77 years old; whereas Jacob , who was aſold as he, had all this while, lived a Bachelor; but being now mindful of his fathers command, he demanded Rachel his wife to be given to him; uſing this for a reaſon, that his daes were now full, [Gen. 29. v. 21.] that is that he was now of an age ripe for marriage, as Tremellius expoundeth it: though Th. Lady would rather have it underſtood of that infant month or period of time completed, wherein Laban , from the beginning, intended to make proof of Jacob 's induſtry, and ſufficiency in the managing of affairs committed to his charge, before he would beſow his daughter on him: which no doubt was mentioned at his fiſt arrival there; ſeeing it was the only cauſe of his coming thither.
		But by the fraud of Laban , inſtead of Rachel , Leah the elder daughter was put in bed unto him: nevertheleſſe, at the end of the marriage weekes, [Judges 14. v. 12, 17.] Jacob alſo to him was cſpouſed to him; upon covenant of ſerving ſeven years more for her; and Laban gave 2265.	c.	Jacob , perceiving the heart-burning of Laban , and his ſons malice toward him, was warned of God to returne into his own country: which having communicated to his wives; while Laban was ſhearing his ſheep, at the latter end of the ſpring (as will appear anon upon the 77 th year of the world) after his 20 years ſervice, getting away unknown to Laban , with all his ſubſtance, wives, and family, paſſed over the river Euphrates , [Gen. 31. 1, 3, 19, 21, 38, 41.] But whereas it is ſaid that there were twelve ſons born him in Melopotamia , [Gen. 35. 22, 26.] Benjamin is not to be reckoned among them, who was certainly born afterward in the land of Canaan, not far from Bethlehem , [16. v. 18, 19.] in like manner, as the twelve Apoſtles are counted, though to make up that number, Judas was wanting, [John 20. 24. 1 Cor. 15. 1.] of which matter, Angelſtine more at large, in his 117 Queſtion upon Geneſis .

		Laban three daies after (for ſo many daies journey was Laban off from the place where Jacob kept his ſheep) hearing that his ſon in law was gone, took ſome of his friends and kindred along with him, and purſued after him, ſeven dayes journey, and at laſt overtook him in mount Gilead : which took its name, from this their meeting there, for after many and divers expolulations which paſſed there between them, making all fair at laſt, for a teſtimony and monument of their covenant and agreement there made, Jacob erected a pillar, with a heap of ſtones: which Laban the Syrian, called Iſgar ſabadutha : but Jacob the Hebrew called Galaad , (i.e.) the heap of a teſtimony, or witneſſe between them two, [Gen. 31. 47, 48.]
		Jacob being ſent away in peace by Laban , but affrighted with the newes of his brother Eſau 's approach with a band of men, divided his company, into two bands, calls upon God: leads before him preſents to his brother Eſau : and as well by a ſtroage wreſtling with the Angel, as by the name of Iſrael given him by God, grows into a true ſturd of the help of God, [Gen. 32. with Heſai 12. 3, 4.]
		Eſau , entreating his brother courteouſly; after much entreatie, accepts of his preſents, offers himſelf with his company to conſult him on his way; and when Jacob would not, took his leave of him, and departed: Jacob then went on to Succoth : to then called by him, for there he built him a houſe, and coſts for his ſheep, from whence it was called Succoth . Afterward paſſing over Jordan , he came into Canaan, and pitched his tent in ſalem , a city of the Sichemites ; in a parcel of ground, which he had bought of the ſons of Hamor the Sichemite , for an hundred peeces of ſilver: and there he built an altar, which he called by the name of El-Elohe-Iſrael ; or of the mighty God, the God of Iſrael , [Gen. 33.] to wit, in the ſelf ſame place, where Abraham heretofore had built his fiſt altar: [Gen. 12. 8, 9.] and where Jacob well was, near unto mount Gertſim : of which the woman of Samaria , ſpeaking to our Saviour ſaid, our Fathers worſhipped in this mountain, [John 4. 5, 6, 12, 20.] for that that mountain was placed in the country of the Sichemites , appeareth, [Judges 9. 1.]

2287.	c.	Joseph, upon occasion being cast there into prison, interpreted to two Officers of Pharaoh's Court, to each of them his dream, just two years before he was brought into Pharaoh's presence, [Gen. 40. with 41. 1.]	2297	1717.			Joseph heaped together, all the moneys which were to be found in Egypt and Canaan, for the corn which he had sold unto them, [Gen. 47. v. 14.]	3010. 3700.
2288.	c.	Isaac died at the age of 180 years, and was buried by his two sons, Esau and Jacob, [Gen. 35. 28, 29.]	2298	1716.			When the money of both these countries was spent, the Egyptians then sold all their flocks and herds of cattle unto Joseph for food to live upon that year [Gen. 47. 15, 16, 17.]	3011. 1700.
2289.	b.	Pharaoh, when he could not get his dreams, which he had dreamt, to be expounded by his own wife men; hearing of Joseph's dexterity that way, sent for him; being then 30 years old, who having opened to the King his dream; first that of the seven years plenty, then the seven years famine, added moreover, his advice, how to provide out of the store of the first seven years of plenty, against the famine of the other seven years of scarcity, which were to follow. Whereupon Pharaoh, by the general assent of all his Nobles, made him Governour of the whole Kingdom: giving him to wife Asenath the daughter of Potipher, Governour of the Ovis or Heliopolitan in Egypt, [Gen. 41. 1, 16.] Isaiah also out of Trogius Pompeius saies, that he was very great with Pharaoh: For, saith he, he was most exquisite in expounding of prodigies or signes, and was the first that found out, and taught the art of the interpretation of dreams: neither was there any part of divine or humane rights, which seemed to be unknown to him; inasmuch, that he foretold a famine, many years before; wherewith all Egypt had perished, unless the King by his advice, had caused corn to be laid up in store many years before it came.	2299	1715.			At the end of this year, when their money and stock of cattle was all gone, the Egyptians then sold both their lands and liberties unto Joseph: who thereupon supplied them with corn to feed them, and also with seed, to sow their ground withall, in this seventh and last year of the famine, to receive it again the year following, when the barrenness of the earth was over; and to the end, that Pharaoh might have a full title and possession of the lands so bought, Joseph removed and transplanted them, every man from one side of the country to the other, and there assigned unto every man land to till and to manure, reserving nevertheless out of the profits, a fifth part to Pharaohs own use, yearly, by a fundamental law of that kingdom: only the chief Governours, and the Priests lands, came not into Pharaohs hands, because the living of the Kings allowance, had no need to sell their lands for food as others had.	3012. 1700.
		From the harvest of this year, being to be counted 7 years of plenty, wherein Joseph laid up an infinite treasure of corn, and had born unto him of Asenath his wife, two sons, Manasses and Ephraim, [Gen. 41. 47, 53.]			2309	b.	Menophis reigned in Egypt 30 years 10 moneths, [Manetho.]	3019. 1695.
2296.	c.	The seven years of the famine began from the harvest of this year, wherein the foresaith, and wisdom of Joseph, did not only sustain Egypt, but was a help and relief to sundry other countries likewise, [Gen. 41. 54, 57.]	3006	1708.			Jacob drawing toward his end, adopted Ephraim and Manasses the sons of Joseph, and blessing them, by institution from God, for the younger before the elder, [Gen. 48. Hebr. 11. 21.] then calling his sons together, blessed them all; foretold what should betide them in their several generations, and uttered to them that memorable prophetic of the Messias: and taking order with them concerning his burial, dyed when he had lived 147 years: whereof he had spent 17 years in the land of Egypt, [Gen. 49. compared with 47. 25.]	3010. 1695.
2297.	d.	Jacob dispatched away ten of his sons into Egypt to buy corn, whom Joseph, seeming not to know them, caused to be taken for spies, and they being laid in hold, could not be discharged, till Simeon, the eldest and chief of them, who consented to sell him, was cast into prison, and left in pawne, that the rest should bring before him Benjamin, their youngest brother, born of Rachel, Josephs own mother: and now being dismissed, they carried away their corn, and with it the money, which they had paid for, being conveyed unto their several flocks, by the secret appointment of Joseph; they tell their father Jacob, all that had happened to them: and withal, declare unto him, the necessity laid upon them, of carrying their youngest brother Benjamin into Egypt, perfwading him by all means to let him go: but all in vain, [Gen. 42.]	3007	1707.			The body of Jacob being embalmed by the appointment of Joseph, was kept by the space of 40 dayes: lamentation was made over him by the Egyptians 70 dayes, and with Pharaohs leave, was conveyed into the land of Canaan by Joseph and his brethren, accompanied with a great traine of the principal men of Pharaohs court; where lamentation was again made over him 7 dayes, and was buried with his kindred in the cave at Macpelah, as himself had given order for it, [Gen. 50. 15, 22.]	3011. 1695.
		Jacob, pressed with famine, sent again his sons, and with them Benjamin their brother furnished with double money, and other presents unto Joseph to buy more corn, and they at their returne were courteously entertained, and feasted by him, and Simeon was set at liberty, and restored to them, [Gen. 43.]			2309	b.	By faith Joseph on his death-bed spake of the departure of the children of Israel out of Egypt: and gave order that his bones might be carried with him, and then departed this life, in the 110 years of his age: having lived in his off-spring to the third generation, [Gen. 50. 22, 26. Hebr. 11. 22.] to wit, Shuteclach and Tachan, the sons of his son Ephraim, and Hadan or Haran, [Num. 26. 6.] the son of Shuteclach, and Macir the son of Manasse, and Gilead Manasses the grandchild. From whence it is, that the Greek Expositors, speaking of the families of Jacob and Joseph, which were laid to consist of 70 souls, [Gen. 46. 27. Dent. 10. 22.] adding thereto these five which were borne unto Joseph in Egypt, upon 1 Chron. 7.] reckon them in all 75 persons: out of all which appears, that Joseph held on his rule and government of the state of Egypt, which lasted full 80 years, under several Pharaohs, as Eusebius in his Chronicle, hath rightly observed, and digested in this manner: Joseph, saith he, was made Governour of Egypt, in the 30 year of his age; when his father Jacob was 122 years old: which government he held 80 years, after whose decease the Hebrews were held in bondage by the Egyptians 144 years: so the whole time which the Hebrews spent in Egypt, was 214 years: reckoned from the time, that Jacob and his sons went down into Egypt.	3029	1675.			The books of Genesis end with the death of Joseph containing the storie of 2269 years space, which book, that it was written by Moyses himself, is the opinion of the Talmudists in their Baba-babrah. f. b. 1. and so it is generally believed by all the H-brews. The form whereof is delivered by Serrinus Julpius, in the first book of his Historiarum: thus, In this tract of time lived Job: a man embracing the law of nature, and the knowledge of the true God, and all righteousness, rich in substance, and the more noted, for that neither the enjoyment of those riches corrupted, nor the loss of them depraved him in his way. For when at last he was spoiled of his goods by Satan, he was also bereft of his children; and at last tormented with grievous boies and fires in his body, he could yet never be drawn, thorough impatience, to sin in any sort: whereof having first received a testimonie from Gods own mouth; he was after restored to his former health, and had cast into his bosome double, of what ever he possessed before.	3030. 1664.
2298.	b.	Joseph hearing Judah to make this offer, discovered himself to his brethren, and seeing them all amazed at the remembrance of the sin, which they had formerly committed against him, comforted them, by shewing how that act of theirs was so wrought by the providence of God; and then, out of the Kings store, and by his command, furnished them all with carriages and provision for their journey to go, and to return with all speed, bringing their father, and their own several families with them: which when they related to their father, he would not believe, untill he saw the coaches, and other things answerable, all fitted for his transportation into Egypt, [Gen. 45.]	3008	1706. 		Jacob, after sacrifices offered, being strengthened by God, with all his family, in the beginning of the third year of the famine, went down into Egypt, being then 130 years old, [Gen. 45. 6, 17, 27. 47. 9. Levi died in Egypt, aged 137 years, [Exod. 6. 16.] being grandfather by the mothers side to Moses and Aaron, and great grand-father by the Fathers. For when Levi had begotten Kohath in Canaan, who died at the age of 133 years, and a daughter called Jochebed in Egypt, Amram the son of Kohath took to wife: Jochebed the daughter of Levi, his own Aunt, and of that marriage (expressly afterward forbidden) [Levit. 18. 12. and 20. 19.] had Moses and Aaron, and their sister Miriam, and having attained to the age of his grand-father, and withall his father in law, which was 137 years, dyed a little before the departure	3035. 1919.

2589.		Rathosis, the son of Aeneas, reigned in Egypt 9 years: [Manetho.]	1099	1615.
2589.		The Ethiopians, coming from as far as from the river Indus , late down upon the borders of Egypt, [Euseb. Chron.] to which that place of the Paneegyrist refers, where he saith, Let the victories of Egypt give place to this: under which the Ethiopian and Indus both did tremble, and that Ethiopia, which is to the southward of Egypt, is now called the greater India, is delivered by J. Panken in his Ethiopian Platter printed at Rome 1513.
1597.		Aeneas, the son of Rathosis, reigned in Egypt 12 years 5 months: [Manetho.]	1120	1594.
2422.		Armas reigned there 4 years 1 month: [Manetho.]	1121	1593.
2426.		Ramefess reigned in Egypt 1 year 4 months: [Manetho.]	1126	1588.
2427.		Ramefess Minamun reigned there 66 years 2 months; the latter part of whose surname seems to have been deduced from the forepart of the name Amen-ophis; by which name both his son after him, and sundry also of his predecessors were called; but the former part of it from the word Aby : which with the Egyptians signifieth water, as Iosephus 1. 1. contra, Apion and Clemens Alexand. 1. 1. strom. and Suidas (in Man.) affirm, whence also those writers, who deliver all by way of Fables, called Mythologians give him the name of Neptune, the feigned God of the waters, as shall be shewed upon the year 2533. This is that new King , which Joseph saith, as being born after his death, and remembered no more the great benefits received from him. And by his policy it was that the Egyptians, taking a fright at the number and strength of the Israelites in the land, overlaid them with a heave and cruel bondage, laying upon them, over and above their continual labour and tillage of the ground, the building also of the Kings magazines and store-houses: and the whole cities of Ramsis , or Ramefis : [Exod. 1. 8, 14. Ait. 7. 18, 19.] the latter whereof took its name, as Mercator thinketh from Ramefess the founder of it, and the other perhaps from his Queen. Aaron was borne 3 years before his brother Moyses; eighty three years, before the departure of the Israelites out of Egypt. [Exod. 7. 7.]	1140	1574.
2431.		The ungodly king, when he could not prevail with Shiphra and Pua two principal midwives of the Hebrew women, privily to make away the male children of them, let forth a barbarous edict, to destroy them all, by drowning them in the river. [Exod. 1. 15. 22. Ait. 7. 19, 20. in the time which interceded between the birth of Aaron and Moyses.	1141	1573.
2433.		Jocobed, 41 years after the death of her Father Levi, bare Moles to Amram, her nephew and husband, for Moles was 80 year old, when he first spake unto Pharaoh, to let the children of Israel go, [Exod. 7. 7.] and the 40 year, after that he dyed, in the 12 month, being then 120 years of age, [Deut. 31. 2. and 34. 7.]	1143	1571.
		Now for as much as Moles, (God to disposing) was a lovely child to look on, as Justin also out of Trogus Pompeius , mentions him to have been, his parents, hid him 3 months in their house, and did not regard the kings edict, [Exod. 2. 2. Ait. 7. 20. Heb. 11. 23.]
		But when as, by the over diligent inquiry made by the kings searchers, and their bad neighbours the Egyptians, he was at length found out, they put him in a basket of bullrushes, daubed over with slime and brimstone, and layed it in the flags, by the brim of the river, his sister, Miriam , or Mary , [Numb. 26. 59. 1 Chron. 6. 3.] standing a loof from the place, to see what would become of him. But Pharaohs daughter (whom Josephus 2. Antiq. c. 5. l. 9. calleth Thermutis , and to both Epiphanius , in Panario , and others) finding him there, put him forth to be nursed, as it fell out, to his own mother Jocobed , and afterward adopted him for her son, and reauled him to be brought up, and instructed him in all manner of science and learning of the Egyptians, [Exod. 2. 5. 10. with Ait. 7. 21, 22.]	1148	1566.
2448.		Cecrops, an Egyptian, transporting a colony of the Sais into Attica, as we learn out of Diodorus Siculus , lib. 1. set up there the kingdom of the Athenians, 780 years before the 1. Olympiad, as Eusebius in Chron. reporteth out of Cassior , from this Cecrops his time, the Cronologic of the Ile of Paros, published by that most learned J. Selden , among his Chronologia Archaicalliana , deduceth his Historie or Antiquities of Greece; for that after him &c. M. 1. 5. who was contemporarie with himself many memorable things fell out in Greece; as Dionodorus flood, Phaetons fire, the birth of Erichonius , the rape of Proserpina , the mysteries of Ceres , the institution of the Elefian sacrifices, Tripolemus his art of tilling the ground, the carrying away of Europa by Jupiter , the birth of Apollo , the building of Thebes , by Cadmus , and thereof somewhat a later time, Bacchus , Minos , Perseus , Esculapius , Cassior & Pollux , Hercules , Euseb. l. 10. de Prop. Ev. c. 9.	1175	1539.
2465.		In the 18 year of this Cecrops, the Chaldeans made war, and fought with the Phenicians, [Euseb. Chron.]	1176	1538.
2466.		In this war, the Chaldeans being overthrown, the Arabians reigned in the country of Babylon 216 years before Belus the Assyrian came there to reign. The 1. K. of the Arabians was Mardocetus , who reigned there 45 years, Jul. Afric. and seemeth to be the man that is called Meroch : who was afterward reputed by the Babylonians for a god, Ier. 50. 2. [from whom the succeeding kings borrow'd their name: as Meroch , Badadan , and Evil-meroch .]
2473.		Moses being now 40 years of age, and going to visit his brethren, the Israelites, and beholding their bad condition, when he saw anti-egyptians smiting a man of the Hebrews, flue him, and buried him in the place, which when he saw was known, not onely to his brethren but but also to Pharaoh; who thereupon sought to have his life, he fled from thence into the land of Madian, where taking to wife Zipporah the daughter of Jethro, he there spent other 40 years of his life. [Acts. 7. 23, 30. Ex. 2. 11, 22. c. 3. 1. c. 18. 1. 2. Num. 10. 29. Jude 4. 11.]

2474.		Caleb the son of Jephunna was borne forty years before he was sent by Moles to spie out the land of Canaan, [Jos. 14. 7, 10.]	1184	1530.
2494.		Ramefess Minamun died in the 67 year of his reign; the length of his tyrannical reign seemeth to be noted, [Exod. 2. 23.] in these words: After many years died the K. of Egypt; and the children of Israel groaned and cried out for the burthen which they under-went, to wit, the cruel bondage, which continued upon them, even after Ramefess was dead, by the space of 19 years and a half, under his son Amenophis, who succeeded him; for so long and no longer a time of his reign is assigned by Manetho: out of whose whole narration, though stuffed with a multitude of old wives tales, all which are abundantly refuted by Josephus, in his 1. book against Apion: yet there are 2 historical verities clearly appearing in him: 1. that under this Amenophis, the father of Sethosis, or Ramefess (the 1. K. of the following Dynastie, or successive principality) which Manetho makes the 19, and not under the other Amenophis which was the 3 of that Dynastie (as Josephus vainly furnishes) the Israelites, under the conduct of Moles, according to Manethos relation, departed out of Egypt. 2. That he whom the Egyptians call Amenophis the father of Sethosis and Armais, him the Greeks call Belus, the father of Egyptus, and Danaus. For the time of this Belus, by Thallus the Chronographer (as he is alleaged by Theophilus Antiochens and Laetantius) falls in jump with the age of this Amenophis; though the fable writers confounding this Belus of Egypt, with Belus the Assyrian, the father of Ninus, tell us, that certain Colonies were transported by this Belus (who was drowned in the Red-sea), into the country of Babylon.	1203	1491.
2513.		God appeared to Moles, while he was keeping his father in law Jethros sheep in the mountain of Horeb, in a bramble-bush; rning, but never consumed with fire, and called him to deliver his people Israel, out of their slavery and bondage in Egypt. And he though he fought by divers excuses to avoid this imployment, yet at length, partly by miracles, partly by assurance given him of the assistance of God, and his brother Aaron given him for an assistant, he undertook the work. [Acts. 7. 30, 35. Exod. 3. & 4. 1. 18.]	1233	1461.
		Moles, taking leave of Jethro or Jethros Father in law, with his family, took his journey for Egypt: but in the way, for neglecting to circumcise his son Eliezer, he was stoped by God, and not suffered to passe, till he had circumcised his son, and from thence sending back his wife Zipporah, and his two sons, Gerthom and Eliezer, to her father Jethro, and freed from all encombrance, he returned to mount Horeb, where meeting with his brother Aaron, he went on and performed his embassy, confirmed by miracles, in the open sight of the children of Israel, [Exod. 4. 18, 31. & 18. 1, 6.]
		Moles and Aaron, having declared to Pharaoh, the message in which they were sent unto him from God, are charged by him as heads of a mutiny, and sent away with many bad words, and more grievous labours were forthwith laid upon the Israelites, than their daily task formerly came unto: and when the ir officers were beaten, because all was not done that was commanded, and they complained thereof (though all in vain) to Pharaoh, they expostulated the matter with Moles and Aaron, and Moles with God: who graciously heard him, and confirmed him to go on in the work he had begun, [Ex. 5.]
		Moles returned to the Israelites, with further instructions from God; but their oppression still increasing, could do no good with them: and thereupon being commanded by God to go again to Pharaoh, he executed himself, [Exod. 6.]
		Moles being now 80, and Aaron 83 years of age, urged thereunto by God, returned again to Pharaoh, where the Magicians by their sorcery, imitating the miracles of Aarons rod, turned into a serpent, made Pharaoh more obstinate than he was before. [Ex. 7. 1, 13.]
		The chief of these magicians which opposed Moles, were Jannes and Jambres , or Amambres , named by the Apostle. [2 Tim. 3. 8.] whose names are celebrated, not only by the Jews in their Talmudical Tractate of Yoma (i.e. of oblation, c. 9. where they are called by the names of ינאי and ימברי) Joanne and Mame, and in the Chaldee Paraphrase, attributed to Jonathan upon, [Ex. 1. 15. & 7. 11.] but also among some heathen writers, for Numerius Apameus a Pythagorean Philosopher, in his 3 books, μυστικα κρισις , cited by Euseb. l. 9. Prepar. Evang. c. 8. relates this history: Jannes and Jambres , saith he, interpreters of the mysteries of Egypt, were in great repute, what time the Jews were sent out of Egypt, being in the opinion of all men, inferior to none in the Art of Magic. For by the general voice of the Egyptians, they two were chosen to oppose Moles, being leader of the Jews, whose prayers were of all others, most prevalent with God, and they only were able to undo, and frustrate all those most grievous calamities, which Moles brought upon the Egyptians, in the open view and sight of all the Egyptians: whereto also that of Pliny , 30. c. 1. is to be retrieved, where he saith, There is also another sect of Magicians, depending upon Moles, and Jannes and Jotape Iewes. Wherin nevertheless he falls into a double error, 1. In reckoning Moles among the magicians. And 2. in making Jannes and Jotape to be Jews. But when Pharaohs magicians, could do no more, God by the hand of Moles laid his ten plagues upon the Egyptians, all which are recounted [Psalm. 78. & 103.] The which plagues, took up, as the Jewes law, a whole years space, at several intervals of time; whereas indeed they were all sent within one month in this order.

for sin, and then of thanksgiving to the Lord; and when Moses had read the book of the Covenant, containing the Commandments expressed in the [20^e. of Exod.] with the three chapters following, in the years of the people, then taking the blood of the calves and goats [so offered, with water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop, he sprinkled the book therewith, and all the people, or those 12 Tribes representing the 12 Tribes of Israel: and so perfected that solemn covenant between God and his people, [Exodus 24. 2, with Hebr. 9. 19, 20.]

Moses and Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, and 70 men of the Elders of Israel, went up into the mount, and there beheld the glory of God: and the rest returning, Moses with his servant Joshua, abode there still, and waited six days, and upon the seventh day, God spake unto him, and there he continued 40 daies, and 40 nights, [Exod. 24. 9, 18.] (reckoning those six daies which he waited for the appearance of the Lord) eating no meat all that while, nor drinking water, [Deut. 9. 9.] where he also received Gods commands, touching the frame of the Tabernacle, the Priests garments, their consecration, sacrifices, and other things comprised in [Exod. 25.] and in the six chapters following.

The Fourth month.

When those 40 daies and 40 nights were ended, God gave Moses the two Tables of the Law in stone, made by Gods own hand, and written with his own finger, [Exod. 31. 18. Deut. 9. 10, 11.] bidding him with all, quickly to get him down, for that the people had already made to themselves a molten calf, to worship it: Moses by prayer pacified God, and went down from the mount, and seeing the people keeping a festival in honour of their Idol, in the Camp, he brake the Tables of the Law, at the foot of the mount: for which the Jews keep a solemn fast unto this day, the 14 day of the 4 month, which hath led some men into this error, to think that the 40 daies of Moses his staying in the mount, are to be counted from the day immediately following the promulgation of the ten Commandments, omitting altogether the intermediate time, spent in writing, and reading the book of the Covenant, and composing the Covenant to made between God and his people, with solemn Rites and Ceremonies thereunto belonging, [Exod. 24.]

Moses, having burnt and defaced the Idol, put 3000 of the people to death, by the hands of the Levites, [Exod. 32. 20, 29. Deut. 9. 21. & 33. 9.]

The next day Moses returned again unto the mount; and there again entreated the Lord for the people, [Ex. 32. 30, 31, 32.]

He commanded them to lay aside their gorgeous apparel, and to set up the Tent of the Congregation (which for that prefer supplied the room of the Tabernacle afterwards built by Bezaleel) without the Camp; and having drawn the people out of a deep sense of Gods wrath, to repent them of their sin, by his prayer obtained, that no longer the Angel, but God himself, should be their guide and leader in their way, [Exod. 33.]

God commanded Moses to frame new tables of stone, and the next day, to bring them with him into the mount: coming with them the next morning, and standing in the cleft of a rock, God passing by, shewed him a glimpse of his glory, [Ex. 34.]

Moses staying again 40 daies and 40 nights in the mount, without meat or drink, praised there for the people, [Deut. 9. 18. & 10. 10.] God being appeased, renews his Covenant with the people, upon certain conditions, gives his Law anew, and bids Moses to commit them to writing: and he himself again, writes the ten Commandments in the tables which Moses brought unto him, [Ex. 34. 10, 28.]

The Sixth month.

Moses after 40 daies returns from the mount, with the tables in his hand; and covering his face with a vail, because it shone, he published the Laws of God to the people, enjoined the observance of the Sabbath; and commanded a free-will offering to be made toward the building of the Tabernacle according to Gods order, [Ex. 34. & 35.]

And to the end that this offering and contribution should the more orderly and effectually proceed, all were numbered from twenty years old and upward, and they were found to be six hundred and three thousand, five hundred and fifty, every of which, according to the Law prescribed by God, [Exod. 30. 12, 13.] contributing half a shekel, the total summe amounted to one hundred talents of silver, and 1775 shekels, [Ex. 38. 25, 26.] whence it is gathered, that every talent among the Jews, amounted to 3000 shekels: or 50 pounds sterling: every pound containing 60 shekels, [Ex. 45. 12.] over and above which pole-money, out of the voluntary offerings, was made up the sum of 29 talents of gold, and 730 shekels; and of brass, 70 talents, and 2400 shekels, [Exod. 38. 24, 29.] As for other materials requisite to this building of the Tabernacle, there came in more than enough: inasmuch that the people were commanded to bring in no more, [Ex. 36. 5, 6, 7.]

Bezaleel and Aholiab were appointed by God for the chief workmen herein, [Exod. 31. 2, 6, and 35. 35.]

In the first six months of this year, were the Tabernacle, the Ark of the Covenant, the Altar, the Table of show bread, the Priests garments, the holy Oynments, the Candlestick, and other utensils, and vessels belonging to the sacrifices, finished in the desert at mount Sinai, and were brought unto Moses; [Exodus 36. with the three chapters following.]

Then

3224. 1490.

Then was Moses commanded by God, first that upon the first day of the second month he should set up the Tabernacle and furnish it with all things belonging thereto, [Exod. 4. 2, 8.] Secondly, that he should anoint them with holy oyl; and should consecrate Aaron and his sons for the Priesthood, [Exod. 9. 15.] which he also is said to have done; but not both of them at the same time: For upon the very day appointed, he erected the Tabernacle, with all things thereto belonging, [Exod. 40. 17, 33.] but the other part of the command he performed a while after, and at another time, prefixed by God; [Levit. 8. 1, 13.] for performance whereof, one day sufficed not, namely, for the consecration of the Priests and Altar both; but sixteen dayes were spent therein, [Exod. 29. 35, 36, 37.]

On the first day of the first month (answering to our 21. of April, being wednesday) of the second year after their departure out of Egypt, the Tabernacle of the Covenant was set up, and filled with the glory of God, [Exod. 40. 2, 17, 34.] out of which God, at several times, uttered his will and commandments to Moses; which are comprised in the 7 first chapters of Leviticus. In the same 2 year, and 1 first month, the Israelites, forewarned by God, celebrated the Passover at the evening of the fourteenth day, (which with us is 4. May, being tuesday:) Upon which day, some of the people complaining to Moses and Aaron that they could not keep the Passover with the rest of their brethren, upon the day appointed, because they were become unclean by touching a dead body; a law was made by God that all such persons should keep their Passover upon the 14. day of the second month, because they could not keep it upon the day first appointed [Numb. 9. 1, 14.]

On the first day of the second month. (21. of May, Friday by the Julian Calendar) God commanded Moses to take the number of all the males of the children of Israel; except the Levites, from 20 years old to 60 by their Tribes: and to appoint the Levites for the service of the Tabernacle, and to give their attendance, for the setting of it up, for the taking of it down, and removing and carrying it from place to place, as occasion should require, [Numb. 1. 1. c. 26. 64.]

The number of them came to 603 550. [Numb. 10. 1, 46.] being just the same number which was taken 7 months before, when they were listed for a contribution to the building of the Tabernacle, [Exod. 38. 26.]

Moses, according to Gods command, Exod. 29. 37. c. 30. 2, 30, & 40. 9, 35.] anointed the Tabernacle and the Altar, with all things thereunto belonging, with the holy oyl, and consecrated them to the Lord. He consecrated also Aaron, and his four sons, with the same oyl, and with rites and ceremonies prescribed for the execution of the Priestly Office; commanding them not to depart from the door of the Tabernacle in seven dayes space, [Levit. 8.] for so many dayes the work of the consecration of them, and of the Altar was in doing, [Exod. 29. 35, 36, 37. Levit. 8. 33.]

Then was set down and commanded the order of the Tribes in their march and encampings, [Numb. 2.]

The number of Levites from one month old and upward, was found to be 22300. [Numb. 3. 15, 35.] for taking out thence their first born, to 200, only: all which was allotted to the service of God, in lieu of the first born, of all the rest of the children of Israel. And because the number of the first-born of the children of Israel, exceeded the whole number of the Levites, (their first-born deducted) to the number of 273, therefore was there laid upon them for every of those supernumerary heads five shekels, by way of redemption, [Numb. 3. 39, 50.]

The Levites thus set apart, were, with all due solemnity, consecrated to God, and for his service; every man having his certain time appointed, when he should begin, and when he should end his attendance upon his ministrations, [Numb. 8. 5, 26.]

The Levites from 30 years old to 50. were found to be 880, and their offices and services were parted among them, according to their families, [Numb. 4.]

All leprosy and unclean persons were put out of the Camp. The laws for restoring of damages, and of jealousy were ordained, [Numb. 5.]

The vow, the consecration, and manner of the Nazarites was instituted, [Numb. 6.] Upon the 8 day next following the finishing of the consecration, Aaron offered sacrifices and oblation; first for himself, and then for all the people: all which being kindled and consumed by fire, falling from heaven upon them, bred a full belief in the people, that the Priestly office among them was ordained by God himself, [Levit. 9.]

When all the Tabernacle was now fully set up, and anointed all over, together with the utensils, and things thereunto belonging, and the Altar which had been 7 dayes in consecrating, was now dedicated by Aaron his first oblation of sacrifices made upon it; (for the seven former dayes were for expiation, or cleansing, and ordained for the hallowing of it, Exod. 29. 36, 37.)

Then came the Heads of the Tribes which were numbered, and they brought fix waggons covered over, and twelve oxen, and joyfully offered them before the Tabernacle: all which were assigned into the hands of the Levites, the sons of Gethon and Merari; as belonging to their office, and afterward others every day brought their several sacrifices, and things belonging to the ministry of the Tabernacle, and offered them towards the dedication of it, wherein twelve dayes were wholly spent, [Numb. 7. 1, 10, 11, and 84, 88.]

Wherefore upon this first day, Naasson, from whom David, and according to the flesh, our Lord and Saviour Iesus Christ himself came, made his offering for the Tribe of Juda: and then the rest, every one for his Tribe, and in that order as they were ranked in their encampings, [Numb. 7. 11, 12, 83.]

Nadab and Ahihi, the two eldest sons of Aaron (which going with their father up into the Mount Sinai, had there seen the glory of God, Exod. 24. 1, 9, 10.) going into the Sanctuary, with strange or common fire (not with that fire which fell from heaven, Lev. 9. 24, and which was perpetually to be kept alive, and continued for the burning of the sacrifices and incense in times to come) were by fire dead in the place by the Priests were heaven, [Levit. 10. 1, 2, Numb. 3. 2, 3, 4, 26, 60, 61.] And for them the Priests were heave, [Levit. 10. 1, 2, Numb. 3. 2, 3, 4, 26, 60, 61.] And for them the Priests were heave, [Levit. 10. 1, 2, Numb. 3. 2, 3, 4, 26, 60, 61.] And for them the Priests were heave, [Levit. 10. 1, 2, Numb. 3. 2, 3, 4, 26, 60, 61.]

Upon that occasion was the Law made (about the tenth day, as it seemeth, of this month) that the high Priest alone; and he but once in every year, should enter into the Sanctuary; and that to be upon the day of expiation and general fast, which was to be kept upon the 10 day of the seventh month, [Levit. 16. 1, 3, 4.]

On the 14 of this month, [June 3, Thursday] at Even, the Passover was to be celebrated by those, who that day month before were in their uncleanness, [Numb. 9.]

The blasphemous person, by Gods command was carried out of the Camp, and stoned, [Levit. 24. 10, 11, 12, 13.]

All the laws contained in the seventeen last chapters of Leviticus, seeme to have been made in this month.

God commanded two silver trumpets to be made, by which the Congregation was to be called together; and the time of their removing, and marching, and sacrificing, signified to the people, [Numb. 10. 1, 2, 8.]

Jethro, who was also called Hobab, brought his daughter Zipporah, with her two sons, Gershon and Eliezer, which were left with him, to his son in law Moses, and he delivered them to him: and having congratulated his, and the whole people of Israels deliverance out of that Egyptian bondage; he openly declared, both by word and deed, his faith and devotion toward the true God. And by his advice, Moses imparted the government of the people to some others, and obtained Magistrates for the deciding of lesser causes, [Exod. 18, with Deut. 50. 9, 18, and Numb. 10. 29.]

The 19 day of this month, seemeth to have been the last that the 12 Heads of the Tribes made their oblations in, for the dedication of the Altar; on which Ahira made his offering for the Tribe of Nephtalim, [Numb. 7. 78, 88.]

On the 20 day of the second month (being the ninth of our June, falling on a Wednesday) God commanded the Israelites to remove their camp, and to go forward in their journey, to take possession of the land which he had promised to give them, [Numb. 10. 11, 12, Deut. 1. 6, 7.] whither Moses would have had Jethro to have gone along with him: But he refused, and thence returned to his own home, [Numb. 9. 29, 30, with Exod. 18. 27.]

The cloud, which covered the Tabernacle being lifted up, they cast themselves into four quadrans, or battalions, and marched from Sinai; where they had stuck, by the space almost of one whole year; and after 3 dayes continual journey, came to the wilderness of Paran, [Numb. 10. 12, 33.] where they rested them 23 dayes, without removing.

The 13 remove, was to Kibroth Hattaavah, [Numb. 33. 16.] where they that murmured were struck with fire from heaven, (whence that place, was called Tabar) but were delivered at the intercession of Moses; yet fell again to murmuring, and provoked God, by their loathing of Manna, and desiring of flesh, [Numb. 11. 1, 10, Psalm 78. 19, 20, 21.]

Moses complained to God of the over-great burden of this government which lay upon him; and desired to be discharged of it: but God to ease him of the charge, gave him for assistants, the Court of the 70 Elders; of which number, Eldad and Medad, remaining in the Camp, prophesied, [Numb. 11. 10, 17, 24, 30.]

God gave the people Quails: not as in the year before, for one day, [Exod. 16. 12, 13.] but for the whole month together: but sent withal a most grievous plague among them. Whereupon, and from the burying place, or graves of them that lust, that place was called, Kibroth Hattaavah, [Numb. 11. 31, 34, Psalm 78. 26, 31, and Psalm 106. 15.]

The fourteenth remove, was to Hazaroth, [Numb. 11. 35, & 33. 17.]

Miriam and Aaron spake evil of Moses their brother; because he had married a woman of Ethiopia: to wit, Zipporah of Midian, which was a part of the Eastern Ethiopia, otherwise called Arabia: and made themselves equal in all points with him: But God main-maintained Moses above them, and struck Miriam with a leprosie: whereupon she was removed out of the Camp: But at the prayer of Moses, after seven dayes, she was healed, [Numb. 12. 15, Deut. 24. 9.]

Miriam, being cleansed, upon some day of the 4 month; as may be gathered out of what is laid before, returned into the Camp: and upon her return, the Israelites removed: and,

15. Upon their 15 remove, they pitched in Rithma, in the desert of Paran, [Numb. 12. 6, 33, 18.] near unto Kadesh-Barnea, [Numb. 13. 26.]

On the fifth month.

From the Wilderness of Paran, [Numb. 13. 3.] or Kadesh Barnea, [Numb. 32. 8, Deut. 1. 19, 22, & 9. 23, Josh. 14. 7.] the people desiring it, and Moses liking well thereof, [Deut. 1. 22, 25.] But above all, God commanding it, [Numb. 13. 1, 2.] at the time when grapes first grew ripe, twelve spies, one for every Tribe, (of which Caleb the son of Jephonah, was for the Tribe of Judah) being then 40 years old, [Josh. 14. 7.] and Holhea the son of Nun, whom Moses had called by the name of Joshua, for the Tribe of Ephraim, were sent to discover, and spy out the land of Canaan: which entering into it by the desert of Sin, lying toward the south, went quite thorough it, to the very North parts thereof, even to Rechob, [Numb. 13. 21, 22, Deut. 1. 23.]

The sixth month.

The spies having spent 40 dayes in searching out the land, returned to Kadesh in the Wilderness of Paran: bringing with them one branch of a vine, with a cluster of grapes upon it, gathered in the valley of Etheloh, which took its name from thence, with Pomegranates and Figs of the land, [Numb. 13. 23, 27, Deut. 1. 24, 25.] from which ripeness of the fruit at that season it appeareth, that this happened near before the 7 month, because a little before the feast of Tabernacles (which was kept upon the 15 day of that month) the fruits of the barne and wine-press, were always gathered, [Exod. 23. 16, Levit. 23. 39, Deut. 16. 13.] Ten of the twelve went to spy out the land, by speaking ill of the country; and the barrenness thereof, and withal, magnifying the Cities for their strength, and the giantly stature of the men therein; disheartened the people from marching any further toward it; whereas Caleb, did all he could, to persuade the people to go on, [Numb. 13. 28, 33, & 32. 9.]

The people being terrified with the relation made by the rest, would needs back again into Egypt; and were ready to stone Caleb and Joshua, for telling a contrary tale. And God threatening the people, with a sudden destruction, was bowed to spare them, by the prayers of Moses: Yet so, as withal he denounced to them, that all of them which were then twenty years old and upwards should die in the Wilderness, and never see the land which was promised unto them: ad that they should wander in that Wilderness forty years, [Numb. 14. 1, 35, & 26. 64, 65, & 32. 10, 13, Deut. 1. 26, 36, & 9. 23, Josh. 5. 6, Psalm 95. 8, 11, & 106. 24, 25, 26.] reckoning all in a round summe; for it is manifest, that their children entered that land, in the 39. year, by comparing [Numb. 32. 13, with Deut. 2. 14.]

The ten spies, which had caused this mutiny among the people, God destroyed all by sudden death, [Numb. 14. 36, 37.] in remembrance whereof, the Jews to this day, keep a fast, upon the seventh day of the sixth month, called Elul.

God therefore had them remove their camp, and called back into the desert toward the Red Sea. But they, contrary to this command, would needs go forward into the mountains: and were there vanquished by the Amalekites and Canaanites, and pursued, as farre as Hormah. Therefore they sat down and wept before the Lord; but he would not hear them, [Numb. 14. 40, 45, Deut. 1. 40, 45.]

Upon this calamity, and the continual dropping away of the Israelites, in the Wilderness, Moses composed the 90 Psalm, [Lord thou hast been our refuge, &c.] in which he also sheweth that the ordinary age of men, was reduced to 70 or 80 years at that time: therefore,

The age of man was now a third time, contracted and cut short a third part of what it was before.

The Israelites continued in Kadesh many dayes, [Deut. 1. 46.] for whether it were for a day or two, or a month, or a year, so long as the cloud continued over the Tabernacle, the Camp all that while continued in the same place, and removed not, [Numb. 9. 22.] But that in some places the Camp continued many years, appeareth, for that in the space of 37 years, there are but 17 encampings mentioned; for leaving Kadesh, they returned into the Wilderness, as I laid be, toward the Red Sea, and encamped about the Hill-Comeray of Seir many dayes, [Deut. 2. 1. Indg. 11. 16.] Now the 17 encampings, belonging to this compassing of the Wilderness of Seir, mentioned in the 33 of Numb. were in this order:

The 16 encamping was at Rimmon Parez. The 17 at Libna. The 18 at Rissa. The 19 at Kehelath. The 20 at Mount Shepher. The 21 at Harada. The 22 at Makheleth. The 23 at Thahath. The 24 at Thara. The 25 at Mithka. The 26 at Hithmona. The 27 at Moseroth. The 28 at Bene-Iaakon, or Beeroth Bene-Iaakon: (i. e.) Of the well of the fons of Iaakon, [Deut. 10. 6.] The 29 at Horagidgah, or Gudgoda, [Deut. 10. 7.]

The

The 30 at Iotitha, (i.) a place full of springs of water, [Dent. 10. 7.] The 31 was Helrona. The 32 was Ezion-Gaber, which is near to Elotha, and joining upon the shore of the Red Sea, in the land of Edom, [1. Reg. 9. 26.]

Now to that long denourage of this in Kaddih, or the encampings next ensuing upon their removes from thence, all that seems to referre; which we finde delivered in the fifteenth, and four next ensuing chapters, of Numbers; as well that of the lawes there mentioned to have been done, as the Historical part thereof. As how he that gathered sticks on the Sabbath; (for though the sacrifices were omitted in the Wilderness, yet was still the use of the Sabbath entirely observed) was, by the Oracle from God, stoned to death, by all the people, c. 15. and how Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, raising a mutiny against Moses and Aaron, were swallowed alive into the earth, and 250. of their associates, whilst they offered incense perished by fire, sent upon them from God. And how God commanded their censors to be taken and used, for the over-laying of the Altars, for a memorial of them to the children of Israel. And how the people murmuring against Moses and Aaron for the calamities which had befallen their brethren, were stricken by God and perished, to the number of 14700. men, c. 16. And how twelve rods being brought by the twelve Princes, and laid in the Sanctuary: Aarons rod, only budded, and brought forth almonds; and was laid up before the Ark, for a sign to those who should afterward be given to rebellion, [cap. 17.] All which things are thought to have been done in the later half of the second year, after their departure out of the land of Egypt. Moses committing to writing nothing, but what fell out in the two first years, and the last of their travel in the Wilderness; and passing by what else happened in those 37 years intervening, laying only the matter of the 17 stages or encampings formerly mentioned, see Athenis, upon Numb. cap. 1. Quaest. 3.

The Scripture also sheweth that the time, which the Israelites spent in travelling from Kaddih Barnea, till they passed the vale, or brook Zerad, which was half a year after they removed from their 32 encamping; and another half year before they passed the River Jordan, took up the full time of 38 years. In which space of time, all that generation of rebels against God was wholly spent, dead and buried, [Dent. 2. 14, 15, 16.]

Now for the 9 first years, which the Israelites spent in the Wilderness, Armais governed in Egypt, and Sethosis invaded the East: both which were brothers and sons to Amenophis, (which was he that was drowned in the Red Sea) as we have formerly noted, to the year of the world, 1494. Of whom Manetho in his Egyptiaca, mentioned by Josephus in his first book against Apion, writeth thus, Sethosis being furnished with cavalry and shipping, made his brother Armais ruler, indeed over all Egypt, and let him use all other Regall power and authority there: only he forbade him to wear a Crown; and charged him no wife to abridge the Queen, which was the mother of his children: and that he should also refrain from all other concubines of the King: But he himself made war in Cyprus and Phoenicia, and against the Assyrians and the Medes. Some of which he subdued by power and force of arms, others he took in, thorough the sole dread and terror of his name: and now passed up with this great success near home, he went on with the greater confidence to ravage and spoil all the Kingdoms and Countries of the East. But some few years after he was gone, Armais whom he left in Egypt, casting off all fear of June, did all things contrary to what he was commanded by the King: For first, he misused the Queen, and lay continually with the Kings concubines; and at length, following the advice of his friends, used a Crown also, and plainly rebelled against his brother. Thus Manetho the Egyptian, adding withal, that Armais was Danau; and Sethosis was called both Egyptus, and that from him, the whole land was called Egypt: and also Rameffes, after his Grandfathers name. From which similitude of names and things, it is manifest, that both Tacitus comes to call him Rameses, and Herodotus, Seloftris; for so Tacitus saies, That a King called Rhamfes, having conquered all Lybia, and Ethiopia, and the Medes and Persians, and Bactria, and Scythia, and all the lands which the Syrians and Armenians, and their borders the Cappadocians held, together with Bythinia, and Lycia, lying upon the Mediterranean Sea: and so far Tacitus of him, under the name of Rhamfes. And for Seloftris, Herodotus in his second book, writes in this manner. Their Priests, saith he, speaking of the Egyptians, report; That he was the first, who with a Fleet of long Ships, going out of the Arabian Gulf, brought all the nations bordering upon the Red Sea, into his subjection. Which done, he came back the same way: and having gathered a mighty Army, marched into the Continents (of Asia) and there subdued all the nations which stood in his way. Then passing out of Asia, crossed into Europe; there conquered the Scythians, and Thracians: whether, or no further, saith he, it seemeth to me, that Egyptian Army came, because here, and no further off, are to be seen yet extant, the Markes and Monuments of his name and Victories. Of which Monuments he erected by Seloftris, he averreth, that himself had seen some remaining in Palestine of Syria: as also two others in Ionia, one at Ephesus, as ye go into Phocia, the other, on the way leading from Sardis to Smyrna. The like report makes Diodorus Siculus, of Seloftris lib. 2. but makes him far ancienter, than these times: and indeed the age attributed to his brother Danau proves, that he was contemporarie with Moses, as also Manetho makes makes him, an I Dio lorus himself in his 42 book, misseeth not much of the same mark: where he saith, That at what time all foreigners were turned going out of Egypt, Danau and Cadmus, with their companies came into Greece, and Moses with his went into Judaea, as we may find in the Seloftris of Phosion, for the better understanding whereof, and in some sort to fill up this void space of 37 years, omitted by Moses, it shall not be amiss here to inferre, the times of these foreign affairs, taken out of Eusebius his Tables, and are as follows.

2520. Egypt (which was formerly called Aria) was so called from Egyptus who was there made King, upon the expulsion of his brother, Danau: wherein our account varies two years only from that of Eusebius, for 2522. Egyptus, who was also called, Rameffes, and Seloftris, and Seofosis, after the terms of 9 years (part in several voiaiges and wars in foreign parts, (as Diodorus Sic. in his first book testifieth,) returned to Pelusium, Whereby Armais, who is also called Danau, when he had ruled over Egypt 9 years, fled for fear of his brother Rameffes, or Egyptus; and falling from the Kingdom which he had gotten in Egypt, came into Greece, as Georgius Syncellus hath it, in the Greek Eusebius, published by Scaliger, page 26. 27, having first attempted to poison his brother Egyptus, at a banquet provided for him: but missed of his purpose, as both Herodotus lib. 2. cap. 107. and also Diodorus Siculus lib. 1. pag. 53. (in the Greek and Latin edition of him) testifies.

320. 1484.

322. 1482.

2530. Danau coming into Greece, there made himself Master of Argos; and made it abound with waters: Danau by his 50 daughters, destroyed the 50 sons of his brother Egyptus: save only his son Lyceus, which reigned after him, 50 years at Argos.

3240. 1474.

2533. Bufris the son of Neptunus, and Laba the daughter of Epaphus, exercised a tyranny in the parts joining upon the River Nile, barbarously murdering all strangers, which passing that way fell into his hands; whence is that of Ovid, lib. 3. Ede Tuffi, more cruel thou, than was Bufris art, and that of Virgil 3. Georg. who of Eunthy us hard hearty, hath not heard? And alars, by the unworthy B. fir heard; unworthy indeed to be defended; but much more unworthy was he to have been commended by any man, which yet was his hap to be by Socrates the Orator, in his Bufris Encomium, and therein, (as after him, also Eusebius did) he saies, that he was the son of Libya, the daughter of Epaphus and Neptunus. Where observe, that this Rameffes, (named Myamun, (of whom I spake, in the year of the world 2427) is by Mythological writers termed Neptunus, and was the man who commanded the new born infants of the Hebr. was to be drowned; and that left behind him two sons, Amenophis, (i.e.) Belus of Egypt (the father of Egyptus and Danau) that oppressor of the Almighty God, and which with his host, was overwhelmed in the Red Sea; and left Bufris his son, to infamous, for butchering of strangers, (a fitting offspring of such a father) to succeed him, wherunto you may add, it you please, out of A. Gellius, lib. 15. cap. 21. that the Poets were wont to call men, barbarous, cruel, and devoid of humanity, the sons of Neptunus: as born of that mercurial element, the sea.

2543. In these times, Tat the son of Hermes Trimegistes, lived, saith Eusebius, with which agreeeth that which the Egyptians deliver, that Seloftris, learned his wisdom, from this Hermes, as we find in Elian, lib. 12. Var. Histor. cap. 4.

3253. 1461.

2549. Cadmus and Phenix, going from Thebais in Egypt into Syria, erected a Kingdom in Tyre and Sidon, Euseb. Chron.

3259. 1455.

2552. Now after the Israelites had compassed the hill-country of Seir and Edom, by the space of 37 years, from Kaddih-barnea, to Ezion-gaber, in Edom; going from the North to the South, even to the shore of the Red-sea, God then commanded them to turne Northward, and march forth forward to the land of promise: and because the land of Edom lay in their way thitherward, he charged them, that they should not, in any wise, draw a sword upon them, asbeing their brethren: telling them how great a providence and care he had used, in preserving themselves by the space of 40 years in the wilderness, [Dent. 2. 17.] putting (such an imperfect number of 40. for an imperfect, of 39.

In the first moneth of the 40 year, after their departure out of Egypt, the Israelites coming into the wilderness of I zin, they there encamped.

33 Encamping was at Kaddih, [Numb. 20. 1. with the 33. c. of the same, v. 36, 37, 38. and Isa. 11. 17.] To wit in Kaddih of Tzin, in the very borders of Edom, c. 20. 14. 15. towards Ezion-Gaber, and the Red-sea, and not at Kaddih Barnea, where they made their fifteenth encamping, and which lay near the border of Canaan, toward the south, Numb. 34. 4. Ios. 15. 3.]

Here Miriam, al. Maria, died. [Numb. 20. 1.] 4 moneths before her brother Aaron, and 11 moneths before her brother Moses. 11: that she was the eldest of the three; and attained to the age of 130 years, appeareth, [Exod. 2. 4. 7.] to that she was a pretty big Maid, when Moses was born: as was noted before upon the year of the world, 1433, and the Jews to this very day, keep the memory of her decease, upon the tenth o. the first moneth.

The people again, for lack of water, murmured against Moses and Aaron: whom when God commanded to call water out of the hard rocks only by speaking to it, Moses being moved moved in his mind, through impatience, and diffidence of the thing; spake something, what ever it was, unadvisedly with his lips, but struck the Rock twice with Aarons rod, that was budded and blossomed, and thereby drew water from it, which as those other were drawn out of another Rock, 37 years before, [Exod. 17. 7.] upon this occasion, were called Alorahab, or Waters of strife, [Numb. 20. 2, 13.] for it is most likely, that the former waters, which Tertullian calleth, Aquam Contem. The water that followed them, (of which I spake in the eleventh encamping) was swallowed up in the Red-sea, so that in this second distresse for water, the children break out into the like malicious disposition, as their Father, so long before, had done.

Moses and Aaron for their diffidence and unbelief here shewed, in executing the commandment of God, were debarred from entering into the land of Canaan, [Numb. 20. 3, 24. c. 27. 14. Psal. 106. 32, 33.]

The Israelites, sent messengers to the Edomites and Moabites, to desire passage thorough their land; but they refused to let them passe thorough the bodie of their country, [Numb. 20. 14, 20. Judg. 11. 17.] yet were content they should passe by the skirts thereto, [Deut. 2. 4, 6, 29.] whereupon they, staying a while at Kadesh, [Jud. 11. 17.] went forward, [Numb. 20. 34.] The 34 encamping, which was in mount Hor, upon the borders of Edom, [Numb. 20. 22, 23 and 33. 37.] for Mofera, [Deut. 10. 6.] whither the Israelites are said, when they removed from Beerah-bene Isakken, or the wells of the sons of Isakken, which was their 28 encamping, to have come; to wit, having by the way encamped, in Gulgodasal, Hor-agidabab, Isakabab, and other places; for whereas it is said, [v. 7.] that from thence, they came to Gulgodasal, and from Gulgodasal to Isakabab, the words from thence are not to be understood of Mofera, but of Beeroth, as many learned men have long since observed upon this place.

Upon the first day of the fifth month, our August 18, being uesday, in the 40 year after their coming out of Egypt, Aaron dyed at Mofera, in the top of the Mountain, of Hor, at the age of 123 years, leaving his son Eleazar, his successor, in the high Priest-hood, [Numb. 20. 23, 28. and 33. 38, 39. Deut. 10. 6.]

The Israelites bewailed Aaron 30 dayes long, [Numb. 20. 29.] to wit, all that whole month, wherein he dyed.

Upon the sixth month, the king of Arad, who dwelt on the Southern part of Canaan, hearing of the Israelites approach, went forth and fought against them, and took many of them prisoners, whereupon they vowed, a vow to God; and having gotten the victory over them, accordingly they destroyed them and their cities: from whence that place was ever called Horma, (i. e.) the place where that vow, of utterly destroying the Cananites, was made, [Numb. 31. 1, 2, 3. and 33. 40.]

Then leaving mount Hor, and thunning the plain country, which leadeth from Elath, and Ezion-Gaber, and the Red-sea straight into Idumea, they leitch a campe and came about to the East side of it, [Numb. 21. 4. Deut. 2. 40.] and there they made

35 The 35 encamping at Zalmona, [Numb. 33. 41.] so called from an image there set up: for when the people murmured because of the fierie serpents, (not little worm-bred-up in their flesh, as Fortunius Licetus, in his third book de spontaneo ventum oriu, c. 51. dreameth) but plain fierie serpents) sent among them by God, which annoyed them, they were there healed, by looking up to the figure or image of a brazen serpent, set up upon a pole, or post, by Gods appointment, [Numb. 21. 5, 9. Job. 3. 14. 1 Cor. 10. 9.]

36 The 36 encamping, was at Punon, [Numb. 33. 42.]

37 The 37 at Oboth, [Numb. 21. 10, 33, 43.]

38 The 38 at Ije-Abarima upon the borders of Moab, [Numb. 33. 40.] to wit in that desert, which lyeth over against the land of Moab, toward the East, [Numb. 21. 11.] and is called the desert of Moab, [Deut. 2. 9.] for continuing their march thorough that wilderness, they came at length to the East of Moab, [Judg. 11. 18.]

And when they removed thence, to passe by the valley or brook of Zared, God forbade them to make war upon Moab, [Numb. 21. 12. Deut. 2. 8, 13.]

Now they passed over Zared, 38 years after the sending of their spies from Kadesh Barnea, the whole race of them which murmured, and rebelled against God from 20 years old and upwards, being wholly extinct and dead, [Numb. 2. 6.]

39 The 39 encamping was at Dibon-Gad, [Numb. 33. 46.] al Beth-Diblatbam, in the wilderness the 40 was at Almon-Diblatbam, [Numb. 33. 46.] al Beth-Diblatbam, in the wilderness of Moab, [Jer. 48. 20. Ezek. 6. 14.]

The Israelites coming now to passe the borders of Moab, at Ar, and approaching the country of the Ammonites, God forbade them to make any war upon the Ammonites, [Deut. 2. 18, 19, 37.] and then commanded them to passe over the river Arnon: which at that time was the boundary between Moab and Ammon, [Deut. 2. 24. Numb. 21. 13.] so that they encamped over Arnon, and never touched upon the territory of Moab, [Deut. 2. 24. Numb. 21. 13. Judg. 11. 18.]

For departing from thence to Beer, where was the well, which the Princes, and better sort of the people, with Moses their Law-giver, digged with their staves, they came at Mathana, Nahaliel, Bamoth, and the valley, which is in the country of the Moabites, at the entrance of the hill, which looketh toward the wilderness, [Numb. 21. 16.] to wit of Kedemoth, [Deut. 2. 26.] and there pitched.

Being

41. Being their 41 Encamping: to wit, at Abarim, over against Nebo, [Numb. 33. 47.] For as for Maanah and the others names, they were not encampings, as Tremellius observeth upon [Numb. 2. 12.] but only places thorough which they passed in their march; for Moses sent messengers to the Amorites, Though the Chaldee Paraphrases take them not at all for proper names of places, but only as appellative, and interpret them of the waters of the well (as of the Rock, 1 Cor. 10. 4.) which followed the Israelites to the brooks, and from the brooks, to the mountains, and from the mountains, to the Valley of the Moabites.

From the wilderness of Kedemoth, Moses sent messengers to Sihon the Amorite, king of Habbon, praying him to suffer him to passe quietly through his borders (as the Edomites and Moabites had done) because that was a shorter cut to the foorde of Jordan; but when he denied them passage, and made war upon them, they slew Sihon, and possessed themselves of all his Cities, and dwelt in them [Deut. 2. 24, 36. Numb. 21. 21, 31. Judg. 1. 19, 22.]

Then sent Moses his spies to Jafer; which they took, with the townes thereunto belonging, and cast out thence the Amorites, from the river of Ruah, which is the bound of Moab, [Numb. 21. 13. & 22. 36.] to the brook of Jabboc, which parish it from Ammon, [Deut. 3. 16. Job. 1. 28. and 13. 10.] yet never meddled they with the Country lying upon the river Jabboc, neither with any of the lands belonging at that time to the children of Ammon: Moab, as God had commanded them, [Deut. 2. 9. and 9. 37.] And therefore, when the Ammonites, 264 years after, complained that the Israelites had taken their land, from Jabboc to Arnon, and even to the brooks of the river Jordan; Jephtha rightly answered them, that they had not meddled with the lands, either of the Moabites or the Ammonites; but that when they had slain Sihon, they took all the lands belonging to the Ammonites, from the river Arnon, to Jabboc, and possessed it, as their own inheritance, [Judg. 11. 13, 15, 22, 23.] Though it be true also, that Sihon King of the Amorites had formerly taken from Vahab King of the Moabites, Habbon, and all that Country of his, unto Arnon: [Numb. 21. 14.] so also had he taken from the Ammonites, and their Country, in like manner, even to Arctot, which lieth over against Rabba, [Deut. 3. 11.] for that all that land belonged formerly to the Ammonites; and afterward was taken from the Amorites, and assigned to the tribe of Gad, to dwell in, appereth, [Job. 13. 25.]

When the Children of Israel marched on their way to Balan, Og King of Balan, being a remnant of the Giants, met and fought with them at Elreim, and was there with all his people utterly destroyed; and the Israelites possessed the selves of all his Country, to wit, threefore Cities, and all that coast, as far as Argob, [Deut. 3. 11. Numb. 21. 33, 34, 35. Amos 2. 9.] All which Country of Argob, stretching to the borders of the Gatharim, and Malacathim, Jair the son of Manasse, is said to have taken and called after his own name: Havoth-Jair, [Numb. 32. 41. Deut. 3. 14.] Which Manasse was indeed the son of Segub, of the tribe of Judah; but reckoned among the Manassites, both in regard of the inheritance he had among them, and also in reference to his Grand-mother, for being the daughter of Machir, of the tribe of Manasse, the father of G. gad, bar Segub, father of this Jair, so Hezron, when he was sixty years of age, as appereth [1 Chron. 2. 21, 22.] where it is further added, that this Jair possessed 23 Cities, in the land of Gilead, and that he took Geshurim and Aram (according to the best Expositors) with the villages of Jair, and Kenath with her villages, sixty Cities in all, though indeed Nobach, under him, took Kenath, with her villages, and called it Nobach after his own name, [Numb. 32. 42.]

After these victories the Israelites leaving the mountains of Abarim, encamped in the plain of Moab, on this side of the foorde of Jordan, which leadeth to Jericho, from Bath-Jamoth, unto Abel-Shittim, [Numb. 22. 1. and 32. 43, 49.] So that their

42. Two and fortieth encamping, was at Shittim, [Numb. 25. 1. al. Abel-Shittim, c. 3. 49.] where they continued, till at length under the leading of Josiah, they came to the bank of Jordan, [Job. 3. 1.]

Baalak the son of Zippor, King of Moab, considering all, what the Israelites had done to the Amorites, feared, lest that under colour of passing through his Country, they would possess themselves of his whole kingdom: and therefore, taking counsel with the Princes of the Midianites, his neighbours, sent for Balaam the son of Beor, a soothsayer, out of Mesopotamia, to come and curse the Israelites, promising him great rewards for his labour: purposing afterward to make war upon them, [Numbers 21. 15, 16. Deut. 33. 4. Jeshu. 24. 9.]

Balaam, forewarned of God, refused at first to come; but being sent for a second time, he importuned God to let him go, and went with a purpose indeed to curse Israel; but God offended herewith, made the dumb Ass of this wizard, on which he rode, speaking in a mans voice, to reprove his folly, [Numbers 22. vers. 7, 35. 2 Peter. 2. vers. 15, 16.]

Balaam, twice offered sacrifices, and would fain have cursed Israel, to gratifie Balak therein: but being forced thereto by the Spirit of God, instead of cursing, he blessed them altogether; fore-telling, what felicity attended them, and what calamity should befall

to kill their enemies, [Numb. 23, and 24. Dent. 22. 5. Josuah 24. 10.]

And by his advice it was, that the women of Moab, and Midian were set on work, to turn the Israelites away to Idolatry: and to make them fall a whoring with them, [Numb. 25. 1, 2, 3, 6. 31. 16. Dent. 4. 3. P'sal. 106. 28. Apocal. 2. 14.] Wherefore God commanded Moses, first to take all the ring-leaders of this disorder, and to hang them up before the sun: and then he gave order to the Judges, to put to death all such of them as had joined themselves to Baal-Peor; and last of all, God sent a plague upon the people, whereof there died 23,000 men in one day, [1 Cor. 10. 8.] which added to them which were hanged, and killed with the sword, amount in all to twenty four thousand, [Numb. 25. 4, 5, 9.]

Phineas the son of Eleazar, by killing Zimri, the son of Salu, chief of his fathers family, of the Tribe of Symeon; and Cosbi the daughter of Sur, a Prince of the Midianites, appeased the wrath of God, and so that plague ceased, [Numb. 25. P'sal. 106. 30.] And God therefore setting the High-Priesthood for ever upon the house of Phineas, commanded them also to make war forthwith upon the Midianites, [Numbers, 25. vers. 17, 18, 17, 18.]

Moses and Eleazar, by Gods commands in the plain of Moab, near unto Jordan; over against Jerico, numbered the people from 20 years old, and upward; and found them to be 601,730 men: besides the Levites; whose number, reckoning them, from one month old and upwards, came to 23,000, and then Moses received Gods command for the parting of the land of Promise, among the Israelites, [Numb. 26. 1, 63.]

The daughters of Zelophead, had their fathers land parted among them for want of issue male: and by this occasion was the law for succession in heritages drawn up, and made, [Numb. 27. 1, 1.]

God signified to Moses, that he should die: and Josuah was thereupon declared to be his successor, and Moses laid his hands upon him, and gave him instructions, [Numb. 27. 12, 21. Deuteronomie 3. v. 26, 27, 28.] And several laws were then made, [Deuteronomie 28. v. 29, 30.]

Twelve thousand of the Israelites, under the leading of Phineas, vanquished the Midianites, and slew all the males among them, with their five Princes, and among them the father of Cosbi, all which were under the subject on of Sihon the Amorite, whilist he lived; and Balaam the wizard, who when he should have returned into his own Country of Mesopotamia, [Numbers 24. 25.] flaid among the Midianites, [Numbers 31. 1, 8. Josuah 13. 21, 22.] And of the females only the virgins were saved alive, [Numb. 31. 9, 54.]

The lands which belonged to Sihon, and Og were divided and given to the tribes of Rubens and Gad, and the half tribe of Manasses, by Moses, [Numb. 32. Dent. 3. 13, 20. and 6. 29, 8. Jos. 13. 8, 12, and 22. 4.] all from the river Arnon, to mount Hermon (which is also called to hemir, and Syrian, and Sion) and joyneth upon Anti-Lebanon, [Dent. 3. 8, 9. Dent. 4. 48. Jos. 12. 1. Jos. 13. 9, 11.]

When the Israelites were now going into the land of Canaan, God commanded them to root out the Cananites and their Idols, [Numb. 33. 50, 56.] and that they should divide the land, westward of Jordan, among the nine remaining tribes, and the other half tribe of Manasses, [Numb. 34.] and concerning the 48 Cities of the Levites, and six Cities of Refuge, [Numb. 35.] of which there were three appointed then by Moses himself, on the east of Jordan, [Dent. 4. 41, 42, 43.]

Upon the 5 day of 11 month (Feb. 20. falling upon our Saturday) in the 40 year after their departure out of Egypt, in the plain of Moab; Moses made a speech to the children of Israel; set down in the 1, 2, 3, 6. of Dent, and to the 40. v. of the 4. c. and afterward continued his speaking to them; to the 27 c. of the same.

Moses, with the Elders of Israel, commanded the people, that in their passage over Jordan, they should set up great stones, whitened over with chalk or plaster, and the ten Commandments to be written upon them, and the forme of blessing upon the mount Gerizim, and of cursing in mount Ebal, [Dent. 27.] exhorting them to observe the Law of God, by setting before their eyes, what benefits would ensue thereof; and detaching them from the breach of that law, by assuring them of what miseries would overtake them: if they forsook the Law, [Dent. 28.]

Moses, by Gods command, renews the Covenant, made by God with them, and their children in mount Horeb: and again perswades them, to keep that Covenant, by all the blessings and curses, which would undoubtedly follow the keepers or breakers of it, [Dent. 29.] yet with a promise of pardon and deliverance, if at any time, having broken it, they should repent them of their sin: and tells them further, that God had therefore thus declared his will unto them, to the end, that none hereafter offending, should pretend ignorance, if he offended, [Dent. 30.]

Moses having written this law, delivered it to the Priests, the sons of Levi, and the Elders of the people to be kept: The same day also he wrote his song, and taught the same to the children of Israel to be sung, and having finished the book of this law, he took order to have it laied up, in the side of the Arke, [Dent. 31.] But that most excellent song of his, is contained in, [Dent. 32.]

Moses,

Moses, drawing now near to his end, blessed every tribe in particular, by way of prophecy, saving only the Tribe of Symeon: which his last Will and Testament is contained in [Dent. 33.]

In the twelfth month of this year, Moses, going up out of the plain of Moab, into mount Nebo, which was a part of the country of the Abartims, from the top thereof, lying over against Jerico, he beheld the land of Promise, all over, and then dyed, [Numb. 27. 12, 13. Dent. 3. 23, 29. Dent. 34. 49, 50. Dent. 34. 15.] [being then, 120 years old; [Dent. 31. 9, 32. 4, 7.] Of all which time, he spent a full third part, wanting only one month; in his government of the people of Israel: as is not amiss observed by Josephus in the later end of his 4 book of antiquities: as departing this life in the last month of the year, and first day of that month, which by the Macedons is called Dysmeris, and by the Hebrews Adar: which better suiteth, with the account of Historians shortly after following, than with the tradition of the Jews of later time: who faith that he died upon the seventh day of the month Adar, as in Seder Olam rabba, c. 10. וסדרה book of the death of Moses, in the promise of Maymonidas to the book, called Misnaith, and in the Calendars of the Jews of this time appeareth: who still celebrate the memorial of his death, by a solemn fast upon this day.

The body of Moses, God translated out of the place where he died, into a valley of the land of Moab, over against Beth Peor, and there buried it: nor doth any man know the place where he laied it, unto this day, [Dent. 34. 6.] [But that this valley was in the land of Sihon King of the Amorites, which the Israelites won from him, appeareth out of [Dent. 4. 46.] and that Beth Peor, was assigned to the Rubenites, out of [Jos. 13. 20.] and therefore, whilist here Moses is laid to have been buried in the land of Moab; as likewise [Dent. 29. 1.] the Covenant is laied to have been renewed in the land of Moab, it is to be understood of the land which formerly did belong to them: but was lawfully taken from them by Sihon King of the Amorites, as I shewed before out of [Numb. 21. 26.] and was now possessed by the Israelites.

Michael the Arch-Angel, as we read in the Epistle of Jude; disputed with the Devil about the body of Moses: which the Devil would fain have brought to light; that he might thereby have ministered an occasion of Idolatry to the people of Israel, as Chrysostome in his 1. Homilie upon Matthew: and Theodoret, upon Deuteronomie, Quest. 43. and Procopius Constant, upon Deuteronomie, and others say: though we now where find that the Jewes ever gave themselves to this Ανταρτία, i. e. This worshipping of Reliques: But this contention of Michael with the Devil about the body of Moses, went about heretofore in a certain Apocryphal, entitled, μετ' Αραβικών Μυστηρίων, i. e. of the Assumption of Moses, as we read in Origen de 1. 2. lib. 3. cap. 2. and in Geladius Cyprianus in the Acts of the Council of Nice, part. 1. c. 20. Like unto which, somewhat is also found in מסכת of Rabbi Nathan.

The Israelites mourned for Moses in the land of Moab, 30 dayes, [Dent. 34. 8.] to wit, all the whole 12 month.

And here ends the Pentateuch, or the five books of Moses, containing the history of 2552 years and a half, from the beginning of the world; and the book of Josua begins with the 41 year after the departure of the Children of Israel out of Egypt.

The First Month.

Josuah being confirmed in his Government by God, sent forth twelve spies from Shittim to the City of Jerico: which being harboured by Rahab in an Inn, and privily sent away when search was made for them, lay three dayes close in the mountain, and then returned to him, [Jos. 2.]

Josuah commanded the people, besides their manna, which as yet ceased not, to take other provant and victuals along with them, as being three dayes after to passe over Jordan, [Jos. 1. 10, 11.]

The next morning, they removed from Shittim and came to the river Jordan, and there encamped that night, [Jos. 3. 1.]

The third day after, warning was given them, as it should seeme, to provide victuals; the people also were commanded to sanctifie and prepare themselves to passe over Jordan the morrow after, [Jos. 3. 2, 5.]

Upon the 10 day of the first month, April 30. being on a Friday, to wit, the same day that the Paschal lamb was to be chosen out of the flock, the Israelites, by the leading of Josua, a type of Jesus Christ, went up out of the river Jordan, into the promised land of Canaan: a type of that heavenly country: they passed through the river on dry foot, the waters being for that present divided, and that at a season, when they usually over-flowed the banks, for a memorial of which miraculous passage, Josua set up twelve stones in the very channel of Jordan; and taking twelve other stones from out of the middle thereof set them up in the place where they next encamped, at Gilgal, [Jos. 3. and 4.]

The day following (as it seemes) Josuah renewed the use of Circumcision in Gilgal, which had been omitted 40 years, and there the people rested them and abode, untill they were whole again, [Jos. 5. 2, 9.]

Upon

Upon the fourteenth day of the first month (the fourth of May, being our Tuesday) in the evening, the Israelites celebrated their first Passover in the land of Canaan, [Joshua 5. ver. 10.]

Next day after the Passover (May 5, being Wednesday) they are of the fruit of the Land of Canaan, unleavened bread, and parched corn, and manna ceased, the very day after they began to live of the fruits of the land; and the children of Israel after that, saw manna no more, but lived that year, of the fruits of the land of Canaan, [Josh. 5. 11, 12.]

Our Lord Jesus, Captain of his Fathers Host, appearing to Joshua, the typical Jesus, before Jericho, with a drawn sword in his hand, promised there to defend his people, [Josh. 5. 13, 14, 15.]

Jericho, the Ark of God having been carried round about it, was taken the seventh day, the walls thereof falling flat down, at the found of the Priests trumpets: and was utterly destroyed, and all put to the sword, saving only Rahab, and her family, [Josh. 6.] who marrying afterward to Salmon, of the Tribe of Judah, bare of him Boaz, [Mat. 1. 5.]

The Israelites at their siege of Ay, being abandoned by God, for the sacrilege, committed by Achan, are smitten by their enemies: Achans sin being discovered by the casting of lots, and he found guilty, was stoned to death, and together with his children and cattle, burnt with fire, [Josh. 7.] and God being hereby pacified, Ay was taken by an ambushment; and utterly destroyed, and twelve thousand men slain in the taking of it, [Josh. 8. 1, 2, 9.]

In mount Ebal, according to the law made, there was an Altar erected, for sacrifices to be made thereon, and the ten Commandments, engraved on it, the blessings and cursings were repeated in mount Ebal, and mount Gerizim, and the book of the Law read in the ears of all the people, [Josh. 8. 30, 35.]

The kings of Canaan moved with this great success of the Israelites, bandy themselves together against them, save only the Gibeonites, who craftily found a way to save their own lives, by making a league with them: but were, nevertheless, afterward deputed to the service offices of the house of God: [Josh. 9.]

Adoni-zedec, King of Jerusalem, with the Kings of Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, and Beir, hearing that Gibeon was fallen off from them, joyned their forces together, and besieged it: But Joshua having raised the siege, pursued those five Kings, and had the killing of them, as far as Azekah, and Makeda, at which time, the sun stood still over Gibeon, and the moon over the valley of Ajalon, by the space almost of one whole day, and until the Israelites were fully avenged of their enemies, [Josh. 10. 1, 14.] Whereupon Laurentius Comanenus observes two things: 1. That whereas Ajalon, was distant from Gibeon, scarcely one German mile toward the west, it is very likely that the moon was then past the full and well on in the wain. 2. That seeing both those great lights began and ended their standing still both together, the Astronomical account is no waies confounded by this stay, even as (saith he) in music, the harmony is not in any sort broken, nor the voices jar, if they all rest at the same time, and then begin again, every man in his part, unto the end of the lesson.

Joshua, following the chase, those five Kings hid themselves in a cave at Makeda, which cave, Joshua commanded to be rammed up with stones, and a guard to be set upon it, till the enemy being wholly routed, had betaken themselves to their fenced Cities: and when all the army was safely returned to Joshua at Makeda, then were the stones removed, and those five Kings taken out of the cave, and the captains of the Host, bid to put every man his foot upon their necks; and them to be hung up upon five gibbets, until the sun went down, and then to be thrown into the same cave again, and the mouth thereof stopped up with stones as before: [Josh. 10. 16, 17.]

And thus ended that most busy year of the world, 2553, in the first six months, whereof Moses himself took in and possessed all that land over Jordan, toward the east, and in the later, Joshua conquered the most part of all, that lay to the west of it: and in the midst of the year, manna ceasing, the people of Israel began to sit still and live upon the profits of the land of Canaan.

From the Autumn of this year, wherein, after the falling of manna, they began to till the ground and sow it, it is to be reckoned the first year, anagynesis, (i.e.) of their tillage, and the rise of the sabbatical years hence to be taken, Ex. 23. 10, 11, Lev. 25. 2, 7, Deut. 15. 1, 9, and Deut. 31. 10.]

The five Kings thus destroyed, all the rest of the kings, combined together against the Israelites; and with them Joshua had long wars, [Josh. 11. 1, 18.] which lasted full six years: as we shall see anon.

Joshua, now grown old, was commanded by God, to divide all the land on the west of Jordan, among the nine tribes remaining, and the other half tribe of Manasse, [Josh. 13. 1, 7,] whereupon he first divided the land of Gilgal, (where the Tabernacle of God then was, and the Army then lay) among the Tribes of Judah, and Ephraim, and the half tribe of Manasse, [Josh. 14. 6, Josh. 15. 16, 17,] at which time Caleb the son of Jephthah, 45 years after the time that he was sent to spy out the land by Moses, desired to have Hebron with the mountain countries of Judah, to be assigned to him for his part: undertaking to expulse the Anakims from thence, [Josh. 14. 6, 10, 13.]

Ycc

Yet would not Joshua permit (as Tremellius hath here very well observed) that Caleb with his own company should assault Hebron: but himself went with the whole Army to take it in; and having taken it, then gave it unto Caleb, to wit, the land and villages thereunto adjoining: reserving the city itself, and suburbs thereof for a city of refuge, and for the Priests use, [Josh. 21. 11, 12, 13. 1 Chron. 55. 56, 57.] For, that neither Hebron, nor Debir, though both lying within the land, and inheritance assigned to Caleb, were yet taken by the Israelites, nor the Anakims rooted out from thence, appeareth out of the 14 and 15 chap. of Joshua [so that all which is contained in the book of Joshua, from verse 28. cap. 10. to the end of chap. 11. and in the first chapter of the book of Judges, from the ninth, to the fifteenth verse, seems wholly to be referred to this place, because of the contiguity and coherence of the matter handled in each of them.]

For when as the children of Juda and Joseph, being established in their possessions, according to their Tribes; a great part of the land of Canaan remained still in the hands of the Geshites; Joshua before he proceeded to any further apportioning of lands, going with the Host of Israel from Gilgal, took Makeda at the first assault: and so did he Libna in like manner; utterly destroying the Kings and people of either Kingdom, [Josh. 10. 28, 29, 30.]

From thence he marched with his Army to Lachish: took it the second day after he came before it, and put all there likewise to the sword. And when Horam King of Gezer came to relieve it, Joshua met him, and destroyed him and his people, so that he left not a man of them alive: and then marching to Eglon, took it the very day he came before it, and put all to the sword, [Josh. 10. 31, 35.]

Afterward Joshua with all Israel, going up from Eglon to Hebron; took it, and put to the sword the new king thereof; (for the old one was hanged six years before) with all the cities belonging, [Josh. 10. 36, 37.] whence Caleb also cast those three Gynats, the sons of Anak, so much renowned and talked of 45 years before, [Numb. 13. 2, 3, 23.] to wit, Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmai, [Josh. 15. 14.]

Then Joshua with the Army, marching out of the south of Canaan, came before Debir, [Josh. 10. 38.] which formerly was called, Kariath-Seppher; where, when Caleb had proclaimed, that whoever took it, should have his daughter to wife: it fell out that Othniel, cousin german to Caleb, and the son of Kenaz took it: and thereupon married his daughter Achah, and had with her in dowry, a piece of land with springs of water in it, [Josh. 15. 15, 19 judge. 1. 11, 15.] and having taken the city, he put their new King also (for the other he had caused to be hanged with the rest, six years before) with all his citizens to the edge of the sword, [Josh. 10. 39.]

To conclude, Joshua destroyed all the Hill-Country, and all the South parts, plaine and valley, and all their Kings, even from Kadesh-Barnea, as far as unto Gaza; and all the country of Goshen, (which was in the lot of the Tribe of Judah) as far as Gibeon. And all these Kings, and all their lands, took Joshua at one time (i.e.) in one expedition or journey; for God himself all that while fought for Israel: and having thus done, then he with all the Host of Israel, came back to Gilgal, [Josh. 10. 40, 43.]

The rest of the Kings, with whom Joshua had waged a long time, hearing what Joshua had done, resolved to set upon him with all their forces united in one: but Joshua coming suddenly upon them, and unawares, slew them and possessed all their lands, [Josh. 11. 1, 16.] from the mountain, which goeth up to Seir, which is the frontier of Edom, unto Baal-Gaddem, in the valley of Lebanon, which lyeth under the Hill of Hermon, [Josh. 11. 47, Josh. 12. 7.]

Then went Joshua and rooted out those Gynats, the Anakims with their cities: out of the Hill-Countries, out of Hebron: (this was done by the hands of the Tribes of Judah, [Judg. 1. 10,] out of Debir, out of Anab, and generally out of all the mountains of Juda, and all Israel. And so having gotten the whole land into his hands, he divided it among the children of Israel for a possession, by shares or portions (as we shall see in the year following) according to their Tribes: and so the land rested from war, [Josh. 11. 23, Josh. 14. 15.]

The seventh year, reckoned from the first year wherein they began to till the ground in Canaan, was withal the first Sabbatical year which was kept among them. When by this typical Jesus they were brought into this place of rest, which was a true type; and figure of that Sabbath and Rest, which the true Jesus was to acquire, and bring the people of God into, [Heb. 4. 9.] And from hence also, the years of Jubile, or of every fifty years space, to be reckoned, [Levit. 25. 8, 13.]

Upon the 15 day of the seventh month, (our November the fifth, falling upon a Saturday) the Israelites kept the Feast of Tabernacles in booths made of boughs of trees, according to the law, [Levit. 23. 29, 40,] and much more solemnly than was afterward used in the times of the Judges or Kings, [Neb. 8. 17.]

When God was now about to give the Israelites rest from all their enemies round about them, so that they might dwell there securely; it was requisite that a place also should be appointed, which himself should chuse, to place his name there, [Deut. 12. 10, 11.] Wherefore coming together at Shilo, they there fixed the Tabernacle of the Congregation;

tion; after the whole land was subdued unto them.

[Josh. 18. 1.] Now Shilo (where the Tabernacle with the Ark of the Covenant continued by the space of 328 years) both by the signification of the name, and alio by the situation of the place, seemeth to be the same with Salem; for, as שָׁלוֹם significeth Peace, or Rest, [Gen. 34. 21. Nahum 1. 12.] so also doth שִׁלּוֹ [Dan. 4. 1.] where also the Messias is thought to have been called Shilo, [Gen. 49. 10.] because not onely himself was peaceable and quiet; but was also the Author of eternal rest and peace unto us; being as well as Melchisedech, King of Salem, (i. e. the King of peace, [Hebr. 7. 3.] which was Melchisedech's dwelling place, or palace, as Jerom in his 126. Epistle to Eutimius saith, was in his time to be seen in the city of Salem, near the place where John baptiz'd, [Joh. 3. 23.] which, [Gen. 33. 18.] according to Jerome's own, and the Sepuagins exposition, was called Sichem, became feared as Shilo was, [Josh. 24. 25, 26. Josh. 18. 1. Gen. 35. 4. Judg. 9. 6. compared with 21. 8, 19.] In the country of the Sichemites.

The land which remained, was divided among the other seven Tribes for their inheritance, and a book drawn up containing their several proportions, [Josh. 18. and 19. chapters] and so after the seven Nations of the Canaanites were destroyed, the distribution of their lands among the Israelites followed; and was completely finished.

In the year after the Election of the Fathers, much about 450. [Acts 13. 17, 19, 20.] for from the birth of the promised seed Isaac, to this time, are reckoned, 452. years: and from the rejection of Ismael, 447. but between both, we may count, 450. years.

d. Out of the land, as well on this, as on that side Jordan, were set apart, 48 Cities for the inheritance of the Levites: six whereof were made Cities of Refuge; and Sanctuaries were therein made, unto which those who committed not wholly wilful murder, might flee for protection, [Josh. 20. and 21.] and so the Israelites now possessed the land promised to their fathers: God giving them rest and peace round about, according to all that he had promised to the fathers by Moses, [Josh. 21. 43, 44.] whereupon the companies of the Rubenites, Gadites, and half the Tribe of Manasse, which came over Jordan to help their brethren in this achievement; God having now fully settled them there, took their leave of Joshua, and returned to their possessions, which Moses had given them; on the other side Jordan, [Josh. 22. 4. with chap. 1. 14, 15. and Num. 32. 8, 22.]

But when in their return homeward, they were come unto Gilead at the passage of Jordan, in the borders of the land of Canaan, they had there built a great Altar: the other Tribes (supposing thereby that they intended a separation, and to revolt from them, they resolved to make war upon them; yet sending Phineas, the son of Eleazar, the High Priest, with ten other Princes of the people, to know the reason of their doing; and understanding, that the Altar was not built to offer sacrifice thereon, but onely to testify the communion and fellowship which they had with the rest of the Tribes of Israel, they changed their purposes, and laid down their arms, [Josh. 22.]

2561. Joshua built the city of Tinnah-Sera, in mount Ephraim, in which he dwelt many years, after that God had given Rest to Israel; and having lived 110. years (which was the age of Joseph, mentioned in the end of Genesis) he there died, and was buried, [Josh. 23. 1. Josh. 24. 29, 30.]

2591. d. When as in the times of Anarchie or mis-rule, which followed after the decease of Joshua and the Elders, who out-lived him, and who being young men, when they came out of Egypt, could well observe and remember the wonders which God had wrought for Israel: every man now doing what seemed him good in his own eyes, all those disorders were committed, which are reported in the five last chapters of the book of Judges; to wit, the Idolatry of Micah, and the children of Dan, and the war of the Benjamites, and the cause thereof. And there succeeded a generation of men which forgot God, and mingled themselves with the Canaanites by marriage, and worshipped their Idols. And God hereby provoked to wrath, gave them up into the hands of Cushan, King of Metopotamia; which first calamity of theirs, held them eight years onely, [Judg. 2. 7. and Judg. 3. 6, 7, 8.]

2599. d. Othniel of the house of Kenaz, and sonne in law to Joshua, [Josh. 15. 17. Judg. 1. 31.] of the Tribe of Juda, being stirred up by God, as a Judge and avenger of his people, defeated Cushan, and delivered the Israelites out of their bondage: And the land had rest 40 years, after the first rest, which Joshua procured for them, [Judg. 3. 9, 10, 11.]

2609. a. In this year was kept the first Jubilee, in the land of Canaan.

2658. a. Was kept the second Jubilee.

2661. d. After the decease of Othniel, the Israelites, falling again to sin against God, were again by him given over into the hands of Eglon, King of Moab; who joining with the Ammonites monies, and Amalekites, overthrew the Israelites, and took Jericho, and this second oppression of theirs continued, for the space of eighteen years, [Judg. 3. 12, 13, 14.]

2679. b. Titten Ehud, the son of Gera, of the tribe of Benjamin (which was but a little before, almost wholly destroyed) was raised up by God for an avenger of his people: for leigning a message to Eglon, he ran him into the belly with his dagger, and left him dead in his own dining room, and then getting cunningly away, he gathered all Israel into a body, in Mount Ephraim, and slew ten thousand of the most valiant men of Moab, and the land had rest 40 years; after the former rest, and deliverance gotten them by Othniel, [Judg. 3. 15, 30.]

After him also Shamgar, the son of Anath, slew 600 Philistines with an Ox-goad; and he also avenged Israel, ib. v. ult.

2682. a. Belus the Assyrian reigned in Babylon, after the Arabians 55 years, saith Iul. Africanus.

2699. d. The Israelites, after the death of Ehud, returning to their old sinne, were given up by God into the hand of Jabin of Canaan: who reigned in Hazor, and had 900 chariots of Iron: and this third thraldom of theirs continued 20 years, [Judg. 4. 1, 2, 3.]

2707. a. Was the 3 Jubile.

2737. Ninus the son of Belus founded the Empire of the Assyrians; which continued in Asia by the space of 520 years, as Herod, in his first book, cap. 95. affirmeth: whom Appian, Alexander, in the beginning of his work followeth. But Dionysius Halicarnassus, a most diligent searcher into all such matters, in his first book of Antiquities, saith, that they had a very small part of Asia, under their command; yet Diodorus Siculus in his Bibliotheca, reports that Ninus, confederating with Atrius King of Arabia, possessed all Asia, having India and Bactria, by the space of seventeen years, and that at length, he took in the Bactrians also with the king Zoroastres: of whom Justin also; out of Trogus Pompeius, thus writeth, lib. 1. Ninus, having conquered his next neighbours, joyed their rest to his own, and thereby went on still the stronger to the conquest of the next, and every last victory was a step to another, and by this means, he subdued all the people, of the east. His last war was with Zoroastres King of Bactria, who is said to have been the first that found out the art magicke, and to have most diligently looked into the nature of the world, and motion of the stars: him Ninus slew; and presently after died himself. Julius Africanus and Eusebius say, that he reigned 52 years.

2752. d. The Israelites sinning again, are delivered into the hands of the Midianites, which fourth thraldom of theirs, lasted 7 years, [Judg. 6. 1.]

2759. a. Was the 4 Jubile.

The Israelites falling into this fourth thraldom, cryed unto God for help, and were re-prieved by a prophet. Then was Gideon of Manasse, son of Joath the Abiezrite stirred up by an Angel sent from God, to deliver them. And first by command from God, he overthrew the Altar of Baal, and burnt his grove: whereupon, when strife arose between him and the people, he was called terub-baal, and terub-bepheth, [2 Sam. 11. 21.] He out of 32 thousand men, which came unto him, chose onely (God lo commanding) 300, but with them, and their trumpets, pitchers and torches in them, he so affrighted the Midianites, that he put to flight all their host; whom the Ephraimites afterwards pursuing, slew their Princes, Oreb and Zeeb. Gedeon then, having first pacified the Ephraimites, who complained that they were not called to the battle at first, passed the river Jordan, and defeated the remainder of the Midianite armie: he chastised also the men of Succoth and Penuel, who had refused him victual in his journey, and slew two Kings of the Moabites, Zeba and Zalmunna. After which great victories attained, when the Israelites offered to settle the kingdom upon him, and his posterity, he refused it: but receiving their golden earrings, he made thereof, an Ephod, whereof they took afterward an occasion to fall into Idolatry, and so the Midianites being vanquished, the land had rest 40 years, after the former rest restored to them by D. Bora and Barak [Judg. 4. 8, 28.]

2768. d. So soon as Gedeon was dead, the Israelites falling back to Idolatry, worshipped Baal-Berith for their god, [Judg. 58. 33.] and Abimelech the son of Gedeon, (begotten upon a woman of Sichem, his Concubine) purposing to get to himself the kingdom, which his father had refused, slew seventeen of his Brothers, all upon one stone, [Judg. 9. 15, 18, 24, 56.]

79. When Abimelech, by the help of the Schemites had got to be made king, Jotham
a. the youngest son of Gedcon, who onely escaped Abimelech's clutches, from the top of the mount Gerizim, expostulated with them in the wrong they had done to his fathers house: and by way of a parable, foretold them of their ruine, that would ensue thereon: which done, he forthwith fled, and dwelt quietly in Beerith, [Indg. 9.]

2771. ^d When Aimelech had now reigned over the Israelites three years, Gaal, a man of Sichem, made a conspiracy against him; which being discovered to him by Zebul, the city of Sichem was utterly destroyed, and fowed with lait, the inhabitants all put to the sword, and the temple of their god B-erith burnt with fire. And from thence Aimelech, going to beliege Thebez, he was there knocked on the head, with a piece of a millstone, callt upon by a woman, and then kild out right, by his own Armour-bearer, Judg 9, 50, 54. with 2 Sam. 11. 21.

2772. After Abimelech, Tolah, the son of Puar, of the tribe of Issacar, judged Israel 23 years,
a. [Indg. 10. 12.]

Argon, the son of Ninus, after the Aryadans first reigned in Sardis: whose posterity held the kingdom of Lydia, by the space of 505 years, two and twenty generations; the son ever succeeding the father in his throne: down to Candaules the son of Myrtilus, Herod. lib. 1. c. 7.

278.^b
Semiramis, the daughter of Deceus, wife, first of Menon, afterward of Ninus, reigned over all Asia, & the whole of India, and lived sixty-two years, whereof she reigned forty two, as Dionysius Siculus reports in the second book of his Bibliothecæ: so of Ctesias Guiding us to one of the same Ctesias, he testifies at large, her nobility Acts, especially against Strabotarch King of India, though Megasthenes, who writes expressly of the Indian affairs, as we find in Strabo, lib. 15, and in Arrianus in his books of Indica faith, that she dyed before she ever came into India. Herod. lib. 1, cap. 18 reporteth, that she cast huge works round about Babylon: whereas formerly the river ever (Euphrates) was wont to overflow all the lower parts thereof: and Justin also, [speaking of her], lib. 10, of Trogus Pompeius, [speaking] in this wife. This Semiramis built Babylon, and walled it round with bricks: laying the stones with brimstone instead of sand, which brimstone riseth naturally out of the earth, every where in those parts. This Queen did many other very remarkable acts: for not content to keep what her husband had got, she added also Ethiopia to her dominions, [she also made war upon India; which never any foot in besides her self; as] and Alexander the Great. Where yet we must note, that besides these two, Dionysius says also, alio. 16. Bacchus, is reported by all other writers, to have conquered India; as if that tale which goes of her enclosing of Babylon, with a wall of brick, is indeed generally to be laid, when in truth it was the work of Nabucadnezar, and his daughter in law Nitoris many ages after. But for that lie of her first building of Babylon, reported by Diodorus and Trogus, as also by Strabo, in his second and sixteenth books of his Geography, it is evidently refuted, not only by the sacred History of the book of Gen. 11.
but also out of Eusepius, who in his book, qui Indiarum Accetibus, in Eusebius, lib. 1.
Preparat. Evangelicæ, teacheth, that it was first built by thole, which elapsed out of the of Eratamus, mention'd by Stephanus Byzantinus in his book, Geographia, in the word Babilonia, and Eutalius in Dionysy. Perki. p. 136. where he notes, that Babylon was built 1002 years before Semiramis was born; & who if he had said 1022 years, as per d'ieraphie de Gergé had much varied from the Babylonian Calendar or account, sent from thence by Calisthenes (which I am mentioned before) out of Porphyry upon the year of the world, 1770.
The same Porphyry also, lib. 4. c. 19. de Philosophia, cited by Eusebius, lib. 1. Prepar. Evangelicæ.
[speaking of one Sardanapalus, Borsippus, a most ancient writer of the first origin, or beginning of the Phœnicians, wherein that he took his argument or matter from Hieromabal (who comes very near to the name of Jerubbah, of whom I spoke before), to the year of the world 2750.] A Priest of Ise of Jexo, al. Jehovah, the God of the Jews, which History was dedicated to Abibalas, King of the Brutians, and he says further, that the Sardanapalus, which lived in the days of Semiramis, Queen of the Assyrians; ὅτι αὐτὴ ἦν τῆς Τροίας βασιλίσσης, καὶ ἐκείνη ἀπὸ τοῦ Περσέως γενεᾶς, (i. e.) who [said] to have been before the Trojan wars or about that very time: which very well agrees with my account: which, allowing her to have out-lived the destruction of Troy eleven years, shews, that she was in her prime both before, and at the time of the war at Troy.

2790. Eli, the Priest was borne, for he dyed at the age of 98 years, [1 Sam. 14. 15.] in the year of the world, 2888.

2795. an. The wound. Tola was dead, and buried at Shamir, in mount Ephraim; there succeeded after him, Jair, a Gileadite, of the tribe of Manasse, beyond Jordan, who judged Israel 22 years, [Judges 10. 1, 2, 3.] and was descended of that Jair, who having taken the cities of Argob, called them after his own name, Havoth-Jair, [Numb. 32. 41, Deut. 3. 14] after whose example, the thirty sons of this second Jair, (who, to differentiate him from the former, is Sam. 12. 12. and 1 Chron. 7. 17.) seemeth to have been surnamed Bradan; called likewise the 30 cities, which they possessed by the name of Havoth-Jair, [Judg. 10. 4.]

2799 The Israelites, forsaking the true God, and falling to worship the gods of several nations, were given up into the hands of the Philistines, and of the Ammonites, which 2805 fifth thralldom of theirs, lasted 18 years; [Judg. 10. 8.] ending with the victory, which was gotten over the Ammonites, in the beginning of Jephthah's ruling over the Israelites.
Was the fifth Jubile.

2816 This year, to wit, on the eighth of their thralldom, when the enemies had cruſhed the
d. Iſraelites, which dwelt beyond Jordan, to pieces, and the Ammonites had paſſed the river also, to ſet upon Juda and Benjamin and Eſſaiſim, whom the Philiftins had already ſorely harrowed, the Iſraelites calling upon God, were grievouſly rebuked by him, yet at length ſhewing their repentance and abandoning their Idols, obtained mercy, Judg 10. 8.
2817 Their dyed, and was buried at Camon, Judg 10. 5.

4. The same year, the Ammonites camping in Gilead, and the Israelites in Mispah, which is also in Gilead, [Judge, 10, 17, and chap. 12, 17.] Jephtha the Gileadite, being called by the men of Gilead, was made Captain of the host of Israel. He, when he had tried all fair means with the Ammonites, and could do no good with them, made war upon them, and subdued them. But returning from the war, he vowed his daughter unwares to be offered in sacrifice to God, and put to the sword 42000 Ephraimites, who had behaved themselves somewhat insolently against him, and judged Israel six years, [Judge, 11, and 12, 6, 7.]

1820. Troy was destroyed by the Greeks 408 years before the first Olympiad.

2823. When Jephtha was dead, and buried in Gilead, Ibbzan, the Bethleamite, judged Israel
d. seven years, [Indg. 12. 7, 8, 9.]

1830. ^{a.} Ibzan deceasing and being buried at Bethlehem, Elon the Zabulonite succeded him, who judged Israel 10 years, [Judg. 12. 10, 11.]

2831. Semiramis, when she would have lain with her son, was by him slain, having held that kingdom 42 years after Ninus. Justin lib. 1. cap. 2. and although it be a thing (scarcely) credible, that a woman of 62 years of age, should affect such a prodigious act of incest, yet it seemeth that St. Justin, lib. 1. 8. de Civitate Dei, believed it; but of Semiramis her death, you may read more in Diodor. Sicul. lib. 2. Biblio.

Her son and fuccellor in the kingdom, Ninus; or Ninyas, resting content with the Empire, which his parents had gotten, laid aside all cares of military affairs, and, as if he had changed sexes with his mother, seldom came in company, or fight of men; spent his age in the company of women and Eunuchs, Iustin. lib. 1. cap. 2. out of Trogus, Diador. Sic. lib. 2. and Athenæus lib. 12. out of Ctesias, lib. 3. Persicorum.

840. Elon being dead, and buried at Ajalon in the tribe of Zabulon, Abdon the Ephramite, the son of Hillel the Pirathonite succeeded him, and judged Israel eight years, [Judg. 12. 12, 13, 14.]

The Angel appearing to the wife of Manoa, of the tribe of Dan, at Zora, told her, that the hitherto barren, should yet conceive and bear a son, who should be a perpetual Nazarite: and should begin to deliver Israel out of the hands of the Philistines [Judg. 13. 5.]

zarkie and would begin to deliver Israel out of the hands of the Philistins, [Judg. 13, 5].
6. Sampson the Nazarite, as the Angel had foretold, was born at Zorah, [Judg. 13, 24, 3] for since it appears, that he was conceived after their forty years thralldom, by the Philistins begun, [the same chap. v. 1, 5.] and likewise, that he avenged the Israelites twenty years, in the time of the Philistins, as is poffibly faid, [Judg. 15, 20.] it is manifest, that the time of his birth, cannot be put off to any further day, unllesse we will imagine, that he began to be an avenger of Israel, before he was 18 years old.

1854 Was the fixth Jubile.

While Elie High Priest executed the office of a judge in civil causes, under the Philistines, Sampson picking a quarrel against him by occasion of a marriage, which he had contracted with a woman of Timnah, began to play the part of an avenger of the Israelites, being then about 22 years of age (Judg. 14. 4.) for, when, on the day of his betrothing, he had killed a Lion, having nothing in his hand, and there of made a riddle: at the wedding feast, he proposed it to the guests, with a wager: which when he had lost, he was obliged to write down, when with the meaning of the riddle was, in a rage, he went and slew thirty men of Aikalon, the fathers of them that had asked the riddle, and so, by their bodies in performance of the wager, which he had lost, and returned home.

The year of the World.	34	The fourth Age of the World.	The Julian period.	The year before Christ.
2919.		Jeffai the Ephrathite in his old age, [1 Sam. 17. 12.] had his youngest son David born at Bethlehem: which was therefore afterward called The City of David , [1 Sam. 20. 6. and Luke 2. 4.] thirty years before he succeeded Saul in the Kingdom, [2 Sam. 5. 4. with 1 Sam. 16. 1.]	3629.	1085.
2941.		God having now rejected Saul, and debarred his race and family from succeeding in the Kingdom, sent Samuel, after his long mourning for Saul, to Bethlehem, there to anoint David to be King, forty years before the rebellion of Abiſalom, [1 Sam. 16. 1. with 2 Sam. 15. 7.] who being, A lovely keeper of a lovely flock , was called from keeping his fathers sheep, [1 Sam. 16. 13.] and preferred before his elder brethren: and being anointed in their presence, [1 Sam. 16. 13.] incurred their envy, [chap. 17. 28.] no less than Joſeph did of his brethren: and at last, was let over the Tribe of Judah, at the same age that Joſeph was made Ruler over all Egypt, [Gen. 41. 46.] Meane while, from the very day of his anointing, the Spirit of God came upon him; to wit, the Spirit of courage and wisdom, [1 Sam. 18. 5, 13, 2 Sam. 5. 2.] In both which respects, even while Saul lived, he was made General over all Israel, [1 Sam. 18. 5. 13. and 2 Sam. 5. 2.] and withal grew a great Warrior, to fight the Lords battles, [1 Sam. 25. 28.] and besides was a Prophet, and made the sweet Singer of Israel : as one, who by his divine Psalms should teach and instruct the people of God to the end of the world, [Aſa. 2. 30. 2 Sam. 23. 1, 2.]	3651.	1063.
2944.		Mephibothesh, who was also called Meribbaal, [1 Chron. 18. 34. and 9. 40.] the son of Jonathan was borne five years before the death of his father, [2 Sam. 4. 4.]	3654.	1060.
2949.		David fearing he might at last fall into Saulls hands, fled to Gath, (whither he had also formerly retired himself, 1 Sam. 21. 10.) unto King Achish, carrying with him, six hundred men: and having obtained of him the town of Ziklag to dwell in, he continued one year and four months in the land of the Philistines: from whence, making often incursions upon the Gittites, and Geshites, and the Amalekites, he put forward all, both men and women, not leaving one alive to carry news thereof to King Achish, of what he had there done, [1 Sam. 27. 1, 2, 6, 7, 8, &c.]
		Whiles David was at Ziklag, there repaid to him of the kindred of Saul, many valiant men of the Tribe of Benjamin, as also of the Tribe of Gad, sundry principal leaders, which came over Jordan to him in the first month, at what time it overflowed all his banks, with divers other Captains and Commanders of the Tribes of Benjamin and Judah, [1 Chron. 12. 1, 15, 18.]
		King Achish purposing with his army of Philistines to invade the Israelites: took David along with him in that voyage, [1 Sam. 27. 1, 2.] and to him whiles he was upon his march with his six hundred men, reputed faithful others of the Tribe of Manasse, and joyined with him, [1 Chron. 11. 19.] and the Philistines were then encamped at Shunem: but the Israelites, in Gilboa, [1 Sam. 28. 4.]
		Saul seeing the Army of the Philistines, fell into a fear, and sought counsel from the Lord: But receiving no answer from him, neither by dream, neither yet by Urim, nor by his Prophets: leaving him, he went to Endor by night, to consult with a Witch there: whereby a vision of Samuels raised by her, he received that dreadful doom. God shall deliver Israel, together with thy self, into the hands of the Philistines: and to morrow, thou and thy children shall be with me , [1 Sam. 28. 5, 6, 19. and 1 Chron. 10. 13, 14.]
		While David was away upon his march, the Amalekites took Ziklag: plundered it, and burnt it: carrying away with them among the rest, Davids two Wives, Abinoam of Jezrael, and Abigail, the eldest of Nabal, [1 Sam. 30. 2.]
		Saul returning the same night from the Witch, the Israelites removed to the Fountain of Jezrael, and the Philistines to Aphek: where the Princes of the Philistines growing jealous of Davids, he and his company early the next morning left their army, and returned towards Ziklag: and the Philistines in this interim, marched up to Jezrael, to fight with the Israelites, [1 Sam. 28. 25. and 29. 1, 3, 10, 11.] whence it appears, that Saul and his sons, were not slain the next day after his communication with the apparition of Samuel (for all that day David was in the army of the Philistines) but some while after his departure from them.
		When David was upon his return to Ziklag, there came unto him seven Colonels of the Manassites, [1 Chron. 12. 6, 2, 3.] where arriving the third day after, and finding the town plundered and filled with fire, he left two hundred of his Company, which were circled in the marches at the brook Bazar: and with the other four hundred he followed after the Amalekites, and overtaking them, slew them, from the twilight of the first day, to the evening of the next: and having recovered all that was lost, returned home with joy, [1 Sam. 30.]
		The Host of Israel being wholly routed, the three sons of Saul, Jonathan, Amindab, and Mithai, were there also slain: Saul, and the Squire of his body fell upon their own swords. The day following, the Philistines having taken off the head of Saul, hung up his armour in the temple of their Ido Ashtaroth: and the bodies of him, and his three sons, upon the walls of Bethshemish: But the men of Jabesh Gilead, remembering bringing the favour which Saul at the entrance of his reign had done unto them, stole away their bodies from thence and burnt them: and buried their bones under an oak at Jabesh, and kept a fast for them seven dayes long, [1 Sam. 31. verſe 1. 1 Chron. 10.]

	Mephibothesh, the son of Jonathan, who was now slain, when his nurse, upon the rydings thereof, fled away with him, in a great fright and haste, fell out of her armes, and became lame of his feet ever after, [2 Sam. 4. 4.]
	David returning from the slaughter of the Amalekites, three dayes after heard of the defeat of the Army of the Israelites, by a boy of the Amalekites, who was in the fight: and brought Saulls Crown, and the Bracelet of his arme (both which he had taken off from Saulls body,) unto him, [2 Sam. 1. 1.] From which to late rydings, though brought with all speed, coming unto David, it is gathered, that the defeat in Gilboa, happened some number of dayes after Davids leaving the Army of the Philistines. Nor may any man marvel, that the battel was so long after delayed, when we read, that the Syrians also long after that, encamping against the Israelites at the same place of Aphek, fate there seven dayes, and upon the seventh, joyined battel with them, [1 Reg. 20. 26, 29.]
	David having put to death the Amalekite who professed that he had slain Saul, lamented the death of Saul and Jonathan, and of the people of God in a funeral Song, [2 Sam. 1.] And when the companies of the Israelites Army came daily flocking to him, [1 Chron. 12. 22.] asking counsel first of God, he went up to Hebron with those which were about him and their families: where being anointed King by the men of his own Tribe, when he was now thirty years of age; he reigned over Judah by the space of seven years and six months, [2 Sam. 2. 1, 3, 4, 11. and chap. 5. 4, 5.]
	Abner, who was formerly the chief of Saulls gendarmery, carrying Ithobeth Saulls son to Mahanaim, there made him King over the rest of Israel; who being then forty years old, is said to have reigned two years over Israel, [2 Sam. 2. 8, 9, 10.] to wit, quietly, and without any quarrel with the house of David: as also his fathers two years reign is meant of his reign free and uncumbered by the Philistines: as was said before, [1 Sam. 13. 1.]
	David sent messengers to the men of Jabesh Gilead, thanking them for the kindeſſe which they had shewed to their Lord and Master Saul: and to let them know, that the kingdom of Juda was settled upon him, [2 Sam. 2. 5, 6, 7.] wherein the better to strengthen himself, he contracted affinity with Tolmaie, King of Gethur, and married his daughter Maacah: which bare unto him, Abiſalom and Tamar, [2 Sam. 3. 3. and 13. 1.]
2951.	After the two years quiet reign of Ithobeth over Israel, there grew a long war between his partakers, and the partakers of David: Joab the son of Zervia, Davids sisters son, bearing up the one side, and Abner the other: and sundry battels and skirmishes passed between them; yet so, that Davids party waxed every day stronger and stronger, and the other weaker and weaker, [2 Sam. 2. 26. and chap. 3. 1.]	3651.	1053.
2952.	Was the eighth Jubilee.
2953.	Abner being used with some disgrace by Ithobeth, revolted from him, and fell over to David: and dealt with the chief Men and Heads of Israel, to transfer the whole kingdom unto David, and this, in the hearing of the Benjaminites, [1 Sam. 25. 14. 2 Sam. 3. 14, 15.]	3656.	1048.
	Michal Davids wife, whom her father Saul after David was fled, had given in marriage unto Phaltiel; upon Davids demand, was sent back to him by Ithobeth, [1 Sam. 25. 44. 2 Sam. 3. 14, 15.]
	Abner coming with a traine of twenty men unto David, was by him received and feasted: and returning from him in peace, was upon the way treacherously slain by Joab: and with great mourning and lamentation made over him by David, was buried at Hebron, [2 Sam. 2.]
	When all Israel was troubled at the death of Abner, Bahana and Recab, of the Tribe of Benjamin, murdered their Lord and Master Ithobeth, as he lay resting himself on his bed in the heat of the day: and bringing his head to David, were for their pains by him put to death, [2 Sam. 4.]
	The Captains and Elders of all the Tribes coming to Hebron, made David now a third time, an anointed King over all Israel, [1 Chron. 12. from verſe 23. to the end of that chapter, with chap. 11. 1, 2, 3. and 2 Sam. 5. 1, 2, 3.]
2957.	David with all Israel marched to Jerusalem against the Jebusites: and there took the Fort of Sion, by the special service of Joab: and from thence, that was called the City of David , no less than Bethlehem, where he was borne. And making Jerusalem the seat of his kingdom, reigned there over all Israel, the terme of 33 years, [2 Sam. 5. 5, 6, 7, 9. 1 Chron. 11. 4, 5, 6, 7.]
	The Philistines hearing that David was, by the general consent of the tribes, made King over	3667.	1407.

over all Israel, led their army twice against him to the valley of the Raphans: and were twice beaten by him; [2 Sam. 5. 1 Chron. 14.] where when David, in the time of harvest, desired a draught of water, out of the well at Bethlehem; and three most valiant Captains of his army, to pleasure him, brake through the host of the enemy to fetch it, and brought it to him, he would not drink it; [2 Sam. 23. 13. 1 Chron. 11. 15.]

David built the City of Sion round about, as well the fortification, as the houses within, and Joab repaired the rest of the City; [2 Sam. 5. 9. 1 Chron. 11. 8.]

Hiram sent messengers to David, and cedar wood, and Carpenters and Masons, who built him his house; [2 Sam. 5. 11. 1 Chron. 14. 1.]

The Arke of the Covenant, which in the first Sabbatical year, was brought from Gilead to Siloh, was this year, being also a fabatical year, brought from Kirith-jarim (whither it was removed from Siloh 70 years before) out of the house of Abinadab, thirty thousand choice men out of all Israel, attending on it, and singing the 68 Psalm, as may probably be collected out of the first verse thereof, because taken out of that forme of prayer which was appointed by Moses, to be used and sung at every removal of the Arke; [Numb. 10. 35.] and was carried hith to the house Obed-Edom; and after three months, removed into the City of David, or the fort of Sion; David himself rejoicing before it, and singing that of [Psalm. 132. 8.] which Solomon his son in the year of Jubile next following, when he brought the Arke into the Sanctum Sanctorum of the Temple, repeated, viz. Arise O Lord unto thy resting place, thou and the Arke of thy strength; with the rest there found, concerning the same Arke, [2 Sam. 6. 17. 1 Chron. 16. 1. 2 Chron. 1. 4.]

For the Tabernacle of the Congregation built by Moses, with the brazen altar, whereon was offered the daily sacrifice, remained at Gibeon (which was likewise in the Tribe of Judah, and layed no longer in Siloh), which was in the tribe of Ephraim; until the Temple of Solomon was built; [1 Chron. 6. 34, 48, 49. 1 Chron. 16. 39, 40. and 21. 3, 16. 2 Chron. 1. 3, 5, 6. 1 Reg. 3. 2, 4.]

And to the Arke, being removed out of the Tribe of Joseph, of which Ephraim was a part, into the Tribe of Judah, Siloh from thence forth lay neglected; [Psalm. 78. 63, 64. Jer. 7. 12, 14. and Jer. 26. 6.]

David now dwelling in his house of cedar, which he had built, and living in a full and perfect peace, imparted unto Nathan the Prophet, the purpose he had of building a house for God: but was answered from God, that this was a work which should be done, not by him, because he was a man of blood, and trained up wholly in warlike affairs, but by his son Solomon a man of peace, which should be borne unto him; [2 Sam. 7. 1, 2, 11, 13. 1 Chron. 17. and c. 22. 8, 9, 10. and c. 24. 3, 6. and 2 Chron. 6. 8, 9. 1 Reg. 8. 18, 19.] Now the time which passed from hence forward, till the birth of Solomon, was all taken up, and spent in wars; wherein David subdued the Philistines, the Edomites, the Amalekites, the Moabites, the Ammonites, and the Syrians; [2 Sam. 8. 3. 1 Chron. 18. 1.] and the bounds of Israel stretched not only from Shicor in Egypt to Hamath; [1 Chron. 13. 5.] but even from thence to the river Euphrates, and even to the borders of Syria Zabeai; [2 Sam. 9. 3.] which was the utmost bound of all that land, which had been formerly promised to the seed of Abraham; [Gen. 15. 18. with Deut. 11. 24. and Isai. 1. 3, 4.] and never possessed by any of them, save only by David, and his son Solomon; [1 Reg. 4. 21, 24. 2 Chron. 9. 28.]

At this time Hadad-czer, al. Hadar-czer (for T and D are with the Hebrews easily taken one for the other) the son of Rehob, was King of Syria Zoba, and to him was joyned Rezon the son of Eliod with his forces out of Syria of Damascus when he was ready to fight against David, not far from the river Euphrates. But David having first routed Hadad-czer's army, flew afterward, two and twenty thousand of the Syrians of Damascus, and put garrisons upon all that country: But when Rezon saw that David prevailed, he fell off from Hadad-czer, and commanded, himself in chief, over such forces as he had newly raised; and marching with them to Damascus, set up there a kingdom for himself, and his own posterity, who, we find, afterward proved very bitter enemies to Solomon; and the rest of the Kings of Israel; [2 Sam. 8. 5, 6. 1 Reg. 11. 23, 24, 25.] of this battle fought by David near unto the river Euphrates, Nicolaus Damascenus, in Josephus, [lib. 7. Antiq. c. 6. al. 5.] maketh mention, where he calleth this Rezon Adad; and addeth, that he left this name to defend to his successors to the tenth generation, as Ptolemy did to his in Egypt.

After Naath King of the Ammonites, succeeded Hanun his son: who fowly abused such messengers, as David or of kinne had sent to comfort him over the death of his Father.

Against

Against him therefore Joab, sent by David, went and overthrew a huge army of the Ammonites, and Syrians, whom the Ammonites had in pay: and so returned with victory to Jerusalem; [2 Sam. 10. 1 Chron. 19.]

David passing over Jordan with his army, made a vast slaughter of the Syrians, led by Shobach, General of the army of Hadad-czer, King of Syria Zoba: whereupon followed a peace between David and the petty Kings of Syria; so that they durst no more send aide to the Ammonites: but served him; [2 Sam. 10. 1 Chron. 19.]

At the end of this year, what time kings use to go forth to battle, Joab, going with the army against the Ammonites, besieged Rabba, the head City of Ammon: whilst David took his ease at Jerusalem; [2 Sam. 11. 1. 1 Chron. 20. 1.] and there defiled, by adultery, Bathsheba the wife of Uriah the Hittite, who was then in the army, and in consequence thereof, procured the husband to be slain by the hand of the Ammonites; [2 Sam. 11.]

When the child to gotten in adultery, was born, David being convinced by Nathan the Prophet of his fault, repented him of his sin, and composed the 51 Psalm, for a memorial of it: yet the new born babe was taken away by death; [2 Sam. 12.]

Bathsheba, being now his wife, bare David a son, unto whom, as to one who should prove a man of peace, God gave the name of Solomon; [1 Chron. 22. 9.] and as to one beloved of God, the name of Jedida; [2 Sam. 12. 25.]

Ammon, David's eldest son, d. throwed his sister Thamar; [2 Sam. 13.]

Ammon two years after that incestuous rape of his, was slain by the setting on of his brother Absalom at the time of sheep-shearing; [2 Sam. 13. 23.] to wit, at the end of the spring, at the second mow of grass, which was wont to be mowed before come harvest, a little after the middle of the first month: as Codomanus upon this place noteth, out of [Amos 7. 1. compared with Isai. 3. 15. and Jer. 5. 10, 11, 12.]

But Absalom having done the deed, fled away to Gethur in Syria: where he continued 3 years with king Tolmay his grandfather by the mothers side; [2 Sam. 13. 37, 38. and 15. 8.]

Absalom, after three years exile, returned to Jerusalem: his father being then pacified towards him by the speech of the woman of Tekoa, let on work by Joab; [2 Sam. 13. 38. and 14. 1, 2, 3, 4.]

Absalom, having set Joab's barly on fire, a little before harvest this year (for the year following was a fabatical year, wherein there was no harvest in Judah) was by his means admitted to his fathers presence, whom he had not seen in two years after his return from exile; [2 Sam. 14. 28, 30, 33.]

This fabatical year came between the burning of Joab's corn field, and the rebellion of Absalom against his father: in which this rebell son, having gotten chariots, and horses, and a guard of ruffians about him, insinuated himself into the favor of the people, and stole away their hearts from his father David; [2 Sam. 13. 1.]

Fourty years after the anointing of David by Samuel, Absalom, following the advice of his chief counselor Achitophel, got him self into possession of his fathers kingdom, between Easter and Whitsonide; as Codomanus gathers out of Barzilai his furnishing of David (when he fled) with new truits, and parched corn; [2 Sam. 17. 28.]

Against the praefiles of Absalom, and Achitophel, David composed the 33, and 55 Psalms: Shimei also, of the Tribe of Benjamin, rallied upon David, as he fled; [2 Sam. 16.]

And Achitophel seeing his counsel not followed by Absalom, went and hanged himself; [2 Sam. 17.]

Absalom, having lost twenty thousand men, fled, and a bough of a thick oak, catching hold of his long hair, he there hung between heaven and earth, and was thrust through and slain by Joab; [2 Sam. 18.]

After the victory thus gotten, David, by the men of Judah, and one half of the people of Israel, was brought home again; and the Israelites mutinied, because they had not had a chief hand in that work, a new rebellion grew thereon: which yet was soon over, by throwing the head of Sheba the son of Bicti, over the walls to Joab, by the inhabitants of Abel; [2 Sam. 19. 20.]

The harv of this year failing, there began a famine, which afflicted the land three years; for the blood of the Gibionites, shed by Saul and his family; [2 Sam. 21. 1, 2.]

The famine still continuing, the Gibionites, in the beginning of barley harvest, hung up two sons, and five grand-children of Sauls: whose bodies, Rissa, Sauls concubine, watched, and kept from being devoured by ravenous birds or beasts, till water dropped upon them from heaven; [2 Sam. 21. 8, 9, 10.]

David caused the bone of Saul and Jonathan his son to be removed out of Jabel Gilead, together with the bones of the seven that were hanged, and to be buried at Zela, in the sepulchre of Kili the father of Saul; [2 Sam. 21. 12, 13, 14.]

Many battles were fought with the Philistines and their Giants; in one whereof, David being now old, and fainting in the fight, was like to have been slain by Ishi-benod bened a Gvnt, and hardie escaped : and this was the last fight that ever David was in, in person, [2 Sam. 21. 1 Chron. 20.]

1987 d.		David, what by the temptation of Satan, what through his own ambition, would needs have the number of his people to be taken; and thereby kindled the wrath of God against the Israelites: The number therefore throughout all the tribes, (except the tribes of Levi, and Benjamin, [1 Chron. 21. 6. with chap. 27. 24.] of all the men upwards of twenty years old, [1 Chron. 27. 23.] was taken. Which numbering, being finished in nine months and twenty dayes, [2 Sam. 24. 8.] the choice of famine, sword or Pestilence, was put unto him by Gad the prophet, [2 Sam. 24. 48.] which famine was to be of three years continuance, to wit, one after another then immediately following, as [1 Chron. 21. 12.] or of seven years, as [2 Sam. 24. 13.] to wit, counting the three years of famine preceding, and this present fabbatical year, (which having no fowling, cannot repair the losses of the former years) for a fourth, as it had been said. Three years of famine, for the slaughter of the Gibeonites, are already past: after which there was a harvest indeed; but for want of seed, a very poor one, and no wayes able to supply the want of the two years following, which the interceasing of the fabbatical year must needs draw with it; so that the famine must needs befall years of famine; God prophecied unto thee three years more of famine, to chuse, if thou wilt. And the way or reason of reconciling these two differing places, hath especially moved me in this passage, to refer this history of Davids numbering the people, unto this Sabbatical year.
		Now of the three, David chose the plague; whereof Jerusalem, God of his mercy bade him hold his hands; and withall, commanded David to offer whole burnt offerings, and peace-offerings in the threshing-floor of Araunah or Ornan the Jebusite, [2 Sam. 24. 1 Chron. 21.]
1988 a.		David for-seeing, that the house of God should be built in that threshing-floor of Araunah, [1 Chron. 22. 1. with 2 Chron. 3. 1.] began presently to prepare materials necessary for to great a work, exhorting his Sonne Solomon, God of his mercy bade him hold his hands; and withall, commanded David to offer whole burnt offerings, and peace-offerings in the threshing-floor of Araunah or Ornan the Jebusite, [2 Sam. 24. 1 Chron. 21.]
		He also taking the number of the Levites, first from thirty, then from twenty years old and upwards, divided them into many ranks, and appointed to every of them their several offices and established a set forme, both of ecclesiastical, and also of civil government, in the fortieth year of his reign, [1 Chron. 23. 2, 27, and 24. 35, 31.] to wit, in the beginning thereof, (i. e.) one year and an half before his death.
		Rehoboam was born unto Solomon by Naaman, an Ammonitish woman; as being 40 one years old, when he began to reign, [1 Reg. 14. 21. 1 Chron. 12. 13.] for though Solomon called himself a little child, [1 Reg. 3. 7.] and David his father said, he was a child, young and tender, [1 Chron. 22. 5. and 29. 1.] yet in another place, he termeth him a man of wisdom, [1 Reg. 2. 9.] and thus, before that great measure of knowledge and understanding was cast upon him over and above by God: which three things; tender years, a son born, and perfect wisdom, no man may wonder to find attributed to Solomon, at eighteen years of age, when he sees the very same to be spoken afterward of King Josiah, at his age of sixteen, [2 Chron. 34. 1, 2, 3, with chap. 36. 5.]	3698. 1016.
1986 d.		David being now seventy years of age, and broken with continual cares and wars, was grown to weak and feeble, that applying of warm cloaths, would hardly keep any heat in him: And therefore was there sought out Abihag, a young maiden, a Shunamite, to keep him warm: and Adonias, seeing his father thus declining, by the countaile and advice of Joab, and Abiathar, the High Priest made himself King: whereof, when David was advertized by Bathsheba, and Nathan, he presently caused his son Solomon to be anointed King by Zadock the Priest, and Nathan the Prophet, and Benajah, the son of Jehojada, in Gihon; which to soon as Adonias heard, he presently fled, and took Sanctuary: and laying there hold on the horns of the altar, was pardoned by the grace and favour of Solomon, and set at liberty, [1 Reg. 1.]
		David assembling all the Governours, Captains and Commanders of Israel, together with his sons and servants, exhorted them all to the fear and worship of God, and in speciall, Solomon his son to go in hand with the building of the temple: giving him in writall, the platform, or model, according to which it was to be contrived and built, and consigning unto his hands gold and silver, by weight, for the making every vessel and implement for the use of the Temple [1 Chron. 28.] after which, what by his example, what by his exhortation, he prevailed so far, that every man, cast in gold and silver, and brasse, and iron, and stone, all in great abundance towards the building of Gods house. And then, thanks first rendered unto God, the next day after, they offered a thousand young bullocks, a thousand rams, and a thousand lambs, with the meat-offerings therunto belonging: and for a conclusion, made Solomon King the second time anointing him for their Sovereign King, and Zadock, for the High Priest, [1 Chron. 29. 1, 23.]
		David

There of the World.	39	The fifth Age of the World.	The Julian Period.	The year before Christ.
1990 a.		David having given instruction to his son Solomon; departeth this life, [1 Reg. 2. 110.] after he had reigned in Hebron seven years six months, and 33 years in Jerusalem, over all Israel, [2 Sam. 5. 5.] of which the forty years, which the Scriptures attribute to his reign, we must take for the terme which he reigned, before he made Solomon king in his room; and that he survived six months after: so that the years of Solomons reign, mentioned in the scriptures are to be reckoned from the first month, a full half year, before the decease of David.
		Adonias, by the means, and intercession of Bathsheba, sueth to Solomon; to give him Abihag the Shunamite to wife, and was therefore as one aspiring to the kingdom, put to death, Abiathar of the race of Eli, was put from the High Priesthood; and Zadock put in his room, who was descended from Phineas: as it was foretold by God, should come to pass, [1 Sam. 2. 33, 35.] and so the High Priesthood reverted from the family of Ithamar to the family of Eleazar, and there continued; Joab for fear fled to the Tabernacle, where, having hold on the horns of the altar, he was slain by Benajah the son of Jehojada, who was forthwith made captain of the host, in his room by the king. But Shimei, who had heretofore railed upon David, was confined onely to his house, yet with this condition, that if at any time, he passed over the brook Kedron, he should die the death, [1 Reg. 2.]	3700. 1014.
1991 a.		Hadad the Edomite, hearing that Joab was dead, returned out of Egypt into his own country. Him God afterward, when Solomon began to follow after vanities, raised up an enemy unto him, [1 Reg. 11. 14, 21.]
		Pharaoh King of Egypt, gave his daughter in marriage to Solomon, and gave her Gezer, a city sometime belonging to the tribe of Ephraim, [Job. 21. 21.] but which he had taken from the Canaanites, putting all the inhabitants to the sword, [1 Reg. 9. 16.] and Solomon brought her into Sion, the palace of David, [2 Reg. 3. 1, 2. 2 Chron. 8. 11.]
		Salomon offered a thousand whole burnt-offerings at Gibeon, where the Tabernacle then was, where, when God appearing to him in his sleep, and bad him chole and ask what he would, and it should be given him; he chole, and asked wisdom to be given him: God therefore gave him wisdom from above; casting in all other gifts over and above: And of his wisdom, the first experiment was made; in deciding the controversie between the two women about the child, and that first gave him an opinion and reverence with the people, [1 Reg. 3.]	3701. 1013.
1992 a.		Solomon being visited by messengers sent from Hyram, King of Tyre, desired further of him, to help him with timber, toward the building of the Temple: which Hyram, upon certain conditions, and consideration of paying for it, promised to doe, and did it, Solomon finding the work-men, over whom he had let pay-masters, and other officers to put on the work.
		The fifth Age of the World.
		In the year 480, from the coming of the children of Israel out of Egypt, in the fourth year of the reign of King Solomon, on the second day of the second month, which was then called Ziu (of our May 21. being munday) the foundation of the temple was laid, [1 Reg. 6. 1, 37. 2 Chron. 3. 2.]	3702. 1012.
1993 b.		Shim, three years after he was commanded to keep him at Jerusalem, and not to go over the brook Kidron; returning from Gath, from whence he had lecher back two run-away servants of his, was put to death by Solomons command, [1 Reg. 2. 39.]	3703. 1011.
1994 a.		In the eleventh year of Solomons reign, in the eighth month, which was called Bul, the building of the temple was finished with all things belonging therunto: having been seven years and an half in working, [1 Reg. 6. 38.] but the dedication of it was put off till the next year by reason of the Jubile.	3709. 1005.
1995 a.		This was the ninth Jubile, opening the fourth Millennium of the world, wherein Solomon with great magnificence, celebrated the dedication of the temple. For all Israel being assembled together in the 7th month, called Echeman, the Ark was brought out of Sion, into the Sanctum Sanctorum, and the Tabernacle and holy vessels, from Gibeon, into the treasury of the Temple; where when God had given a visible and wonderful token of his presence, Solomon being upon a scaffold made of brasse, and kneeling upon his knees, uttered a set prayer unto God, and afterward blessing the people, he offered twenty two thousand oxen, and 120 thousand sheep; and so having celebrated the feast of the dedication of the Altar seven dayes, (and the feast of Tabernacles other seven dayes, and the solemnity of the eighth day of Tabernacles being finished, at last, upon the three and twenty day of the seventh month, the people were dismissed every man to his home, [1 Reg. 8. 1, 2, 63, 66.]	3710. 1004.

65, 66. 2 Chron. 5. 3, 4, 5. chap. 6. &c. chap. 7. 8, 9, 10.]

The eighth day of the seventh month, (to wit, 30 of our Octob. being Friday, was the first of the seven days of the dedication; the tenth day, (with us Novemb. 1, upon a Saturday) was the last of expiation or atonement held, whereon (according to the Levitical law, [chap. 25. 9.]) the Jubile was proclaimed by the sound of a trumpet.

The fiftenth day, (our November 6, being Friday) was the feast of Tabernacles. The 22 (our Novemb. 13, being also Friday) was the last of the feast of Tabernacles; which was alwayes very solemnly kept, [2 Chron. 7. 9, with Levit 23. 36. and John 7. 37.] and at the day following, (Novemb. 14, being our Saturday) when the sabbath was ended, the people departed home.

Solomon, in the thirteenth year after the temple was built, made an end also of building his own house, having pent full twenty years upon both of them: whereof seven and a half upon the Temple, and thirteen or twelve and a half upon his own, [1 Reg. 7. 1. and 9. 10, 16, and 2 Chron. 8. 1.]

After all which, Solomon offered unto Hiram King of Tyre 20 cities of Galilee, or Cabul, joyning upon the tribe of Ather, (which himself had purchased) in requital of those many good offices which Hiram had done him; toward the building of the temple; which when Hiram refused, he built them all anew himself, and planted colonies of the Israelites in them, [1 Reg. 9. 10, and 2 Chron. 8. 1, 2.]

When Solomon had finished both houses, and the wall of Jerusalem round about, then he removed his wife, the daughter of Pharaoh, out of the city and house of David, unto a house, which himself had built, and prepared for her, [1 Reg. 3. 1, and chap. 7. 8. and chap. 9. 24, and 2 Chron. 8. 11.] He new built also Gezer, which Pharaoh the father, having taken from the Canaanites, had given to Solomon, lying within the precincts of the tribe of Ephraim, [1 Reg. 9. 15, 16, 17.]

Sebacks; which others call Solonchis (according to our Egyptian Chronology) began to reign; unto whom Jeroboam the son of Nebat fled, and continued with him till after Solomon was dead, [1 Reg. 11. 40, and chap. 12. 2.]

Solomon, having forsaken his lusts and vanities, to which he was too intemperately addicted toward his later dayes, having testified his deep repentance for it, in his book called The Preacher, and having made his peace with God, [2 Chron. 11. 17.] at last died; when he had reigned 40 years, [1 Reg. 11. 42, 2 Chron. 9. 30.]

Rehoboam the son of Solomon, when all Israel met at Sichem to make him King, by a harsh answer made unto them, alienated the hearts of ten tribes from him, who presently sending into Egypt for Jeroboam the son of Nebat, made him King over them, and under his conduct, they fell off both from the house of David (killing Adoram, whom Rehoboam had sent unto them) and all from the true worship of God, [1 Reg. 12.] In memorial of which sad disaster, the Jews afterward, kept a solemn fast yearly, upon the 23 of the third month, called Sivan.

From this dismal rent made of that kingdom, Rehoboam reigned over Judah and Benjamin seventeen years, [1 Reg. 14. 21, 2 Chron. 12. 15, 2.] and Jeroboam over Israel, (i.e.) over the other ten tribes, by the space of 22 years, [1 Reg. 14. 20.]

Rehoboam returning to Jerusalem, levying men to the number of one hundred, and fourscore thousand men, and purposed to make war upon the ten tribes: but being admonished from God by the prophet Semajah, he gave it off, [1 Reg. 12.] though there followed continual wars between the two kings all their dayes, [1 Reg. 4. 13.]

Jeroboam in the beginning of his reign, repaired Sichem, where he was chosen king by the people, and which had been destroyed by King Abimelech 28 years before, and there dwelt, till going afterward over Jordan, he there built Peniel, [1 Reg. 12. 25. and at last, built Tirza, and made that the seat of his kingdom, [2 Chron. 14. 17.] But fearing lest his new-gotten subjects should happily revolt from him again, he diverted their thoughts from looking any more after Jerusalem by a new devised form and fashion of religion, setting up two golden calves, the one at Bethel, the other at Dan, for the brain-sick people, to run a whoring after them, [1 Reg. 12.]

JEROBOAM.

Jeroboam, the 15 day of the 8 month, (our Decemb. 6, Monday) at a feast of his own devising, somewhat resembling the feast of Tabernacles among the Jews, upon an Idolatrous altar, which he had built, at Bethel, offered sacrifice to his calf, [1 Reg. 12. 32, 33.] At what time, a certain certain Prophet sent by God out of Iury, foretold what judgement out of King Davids linages Iosias by name, should one day execute upon the Altar, and the Priests that served at it: which Prophecie he then and there confirmed, by signs and prodigies shewed upon that Altar then standing, and upon the King himself, [1 Reg. 13. 2, Reg. 23. 16, 17.] From which beginning of this Idolatrous worship, and publick manifestation of Gods judgement thereupon; we are to reckon the 390, years of the iniquity of Israel, spoken of in [Ez. k. 4. 5.]

This Prophet being deceived by another Prophet of Bethel, who abused the name of God unto him: did contrary to the expresse commandment of God to himself delivered, eat meat at Bethel; and was therefore in his return homeward met with and slain by a Lion: whereof when tidings came to the Prophet which had deceived him, he took up the body, and honourably enterea it, assisting his sons, that what had been foretold by that other Prophet, should undoubtedly come to pass, [1 Reg. 13. with 2 Reg. 23. 17, 18.]

Jeroboam persisting in his revolt, cast off the Priests that were of the lineage of Aaron and the Levites, and made Priests of the High places, mentaken from among the common people, [1 Reg. 13. 33, 34, 2 Chron. 11. 14, 15. and chap. 13. 9.] whereupon the Priests and Levites, leaving their possessions which they formerly had in those parts; retired into Iury, and were followed thither, by all such out of every Tribe, as set their minds upon the true worship of God; and came to Jerusalem, there to do worship and to sacrifice to the God of their forefathers, [2 Chron. 11. 13, 14, 16.]

Rehoboam, being once settled in his kingdom, looked the Law of the Lord, and all Israel and Juda with him, [2 Chron. 12.] For the Jews, who by their good example should have stirred up their brethren the Israelites to repentance, provoked the Lord with their own sins; wherein they offended beyond all that ever their forefathers had done. For they made also to themselves High places, and Images, and Groves, upon every high hill, and under every green tree, doing according to all the abominations of the Gentiles, which the Lord had therefore cast out before them, [1 Reg. 14. 23, 24.]

3104. d.			About a year after, Benhadad came a second time up as far as Aphek, to make war upon the Israelites; where upon a mighty overthrow received, he gave himself up into Achabs hand. Achab received him with all curtesie and honour, and after a while, let him fairly go, having made a league of friendship with him: for which act of his, God forthwith denounced a judgement upon him by his Prophet, [1 Reg. 20.] Nevertheless, upon this league made, there followed a three years cessation of armes, between the two Nations, [1 Reg. 22. 1.]	3814. 900.
3105. e.			Achab, when he could not get Naboth to sell him his vineyard, grew sick upon it. Jezebel his wife, gave Naboth by false witness to be condemned to death, and stoned; and so put him in possession of the vineyard. Whereupon the Prophet Elias, foretold him of destruction which was to befall him, and all his posterity: and upon Jezebel her self, Achab, trembling hereat, by a timely repentance, obtained a respite of this judgement, [1 Reg. 21.]	3815. 899.

3106. d.		Jehoshaphat after the example of Ahab, made Jehoram his son, Vice-Roy of the kingdom: whereupon it is that Jehoram the son of Achab, who succeeded his brother Achaziah in the kingdom over the Israelites, in the 18. year of Jehoshaphat, King of Juda, [2 Reg. 3. 1.] is said to have begun his reign, in the 2. year of Jehoram, the son of Jehoshaphat, [2 Reg. 1. 17.]
3107. e.		Jehoshaphat going to visit Achab in the third year of the peace which he had made with the Assyrians, in the very end of the year; was invited by Achab, to go with him to the siege of Ramoth Gilcad, and upon his entreaty he went: but escaped thence, not without extreme danger of his life, [1 Reg. 22. 2. 2 Chron. 18.] At his return home, he was reproved by the Prophet Jehu, the son of Hanani, for aiding such a wicked King, [1 R. g. 19. 1, 2.]	18. 22.	3817. 897.
3108. f.		When Jehoshaphat had rigged his Navy, to send it to Ophir for gold, and Achaziah the wicked son of Achab, would needs go thither with him in that voyage: at first, Jehoshaphat would not, [1 Reg. 22. 49.] but at last, condescended thereto. And for so doing, God reproved him by the mouth of his Prophet Eliezer, the son of Dodona, and destroyed his Fleet, [2 Chron. 20. 35, 36, 17.]
3109. g.		Achaziah King of Israel, falling out of a grate of his Dining-room in Samaria lay sick of it, and asked counsel of Baal-zebub, the god of the Ekronites, concerning his recovery. And the Prophet Elias, when two Captains over fifty men a piece, with their companies, were sent to apprehend and bring him to the King; destroyed them & their companies with fire called down from heaven upon them: and at last, going voluntarily with the third Captain that came for him, he told the King plainly, that he should die, [2 Reg. 1.] and accordingly die he did, after he had spent two years, partly with his father, partly by himself, in the administration of the kingdom, [1 Reg. 22. 51.]	19. 1.	3818. 896.

		Prophet sent a gracious message, with a promise of deliverance to him, and destruction to his enemies: And for a sign of his deliverance (when the incredulous King, being bidden to ask what sign he would, would ask none) God made him a promise of a Virgin, that should bear Immanuel; who both in regard of his person, should be God and man: God with us, or dwelling in our flesh; and also in regard of his office, whereby, as the only Mediatour of God and man, [1 Tim. 2. 5.] he should bring to passe, that Go. should be with us, [Esay 8. 10.] gracious and propitious to us, and a very present help in trouble, [Psal. 46. 1, 2, 7. with Rom. 8. 31, 32.] which advertisement was most befitting the businesse then in hand, both in regard that all promises of God in Christ, are Yea and Amen, [2 Corin. 1. 20.] to be fulfilled generally in him, and for him: and besides, for that, the land of Judea, by a special privilege, was to be the land of this Immanuel, [Esay 8. 8.] wherein, as pertaining to the flesh, he was to be born, not onely of the Jews, but also of the very house of David; and that, according to the foretelling of Jacob, [Gen. 49. 10.] before the Scepter should depart from Juda, (i. e.) before Judea should wholly leave off to be a Commonwealth, ruled by a Kingly government; and therefore at that time, the destruction or abolishment of the house of David, or nation of the Jew, was not to be feared; which misery sixty five years after, betided the nation of the Ephraimites, as had been foretold them, by the Prophet Esay, [chap. 7. 8.] As for the utter and final destruction of those Kings who had then banded themselves against him, the Prophet was commanded to foretew it, by bringing forth Shear Jashub his son: and to tell him (after he had declared that great Mystery or Oracle of a God-bearing Virgin, by the motion of his finger, or some other gesture) that butter and honey he should eat, and be nourished thereby, until he came to such an age, as to know the good from the evil; so: that before that time, both those Kings should be destroyed each out of his own land, [Esay 7. 3, 15, 16.] And whereas it fell out at the same time, that Esay his wife, a Prophetess, bare him another son: by Gods appointment, his name was called Maher-shalal-haz-baz, importing, that the Assyrian

	Assyrian should make haste, and take away the spoile: and should plunder both Syrians and Israelites, before the child should be able plainly to pronounce, My father, or My mother. And to the sons of the Prophets were made to serve for signs and documents from God to the Israelites, [Esay 8. 3, 4, 18.] After these prophecies uttered, Rezin and Peka, jointly came up to besiege Jerusalem, wherein Achaz then was: but could not take it, as was told beforehand that they should not, [Esay 7. 1, 7. 2 Reg. 16. 5.] But this wicked Achaz, was no sooner delivered out of this imminent danger, but he forsook God his Deliverer: For he forthwith walked in the wayes of the Kings of Israel, and set up the Idolatrous worship of Baal; offered incense in the valley of Ben-Hinnon, and made his own son to passe thorough the fire, and offered sacrifice in the High places, and upon the Hills, and under every green tree, [2 Chron. 28. 2, 3, 4. 2 Reg. 16. 3, 4.] So when Achaz forsook God, God also forsook him: wherefore Rezin and Peka, dividing their forces, overcame him, which both joyned together, they could not do. For God gave him over both into the hands of the Syrians, who, having smitten him, carried away a great multitude of his people captive to Damascus, and also into the hands of the King of Israel, who made a great slaughter of his people, [2 Chron. 28. 5.] At the same time, Rezin subdued Elath, which King Azarias, or Uzzias had recovered to Juda, and built it anew, and placed his Syrians therein to dwell, [2 Reg. 14. 22. 2 Chron. 26. 2, 2 Reg. 16. 2.] Moreover the Edomites invaded Juda, and carried from thence many Captives. The Philistines also whom King Uzzia, whilst he trusted in God, had subdued, [2 Chron. 26. 6, 7.] now brake in upon the cities of Juda, in the low countries and south parts thereof, and dwelt therein; for God gave them over to the spoile, for Achaz his sin: and because he had drawn away Juda, to forsake the Lord, [2 Chron. 28. 17, 18, 19.] But Achaz took all the gold and silver, that was found in the Lords houses, and in the Treasury of the Kings house, and sent it for a present to Tiglath-Pileser King of Assyria, desiring him to come and deliver him	2	19.	Peka slew the men of Juda, 120, thousand in one day, all valiant men of war; Zichi also a mighty man of the Tribe of Ephraim slew Maateia the Kings son, and Azrikam, the Steward of the Kings house, and Elkana who was next the King in authority. The Israelites also carried away captive out of Juda and Jerusalem, two hundred thousand women, boyes, and maides, and made a vast spoile of their goods, and carried away all to Samaria: but, upon the counsel of Odeda a Prophet of God, they released all that multitude of prisoners, and restored them their goods in the presence of their Princes and whole congregation of Samaria, who entertained them kindly, &c. caused them to be conveyed safe to their brethren at Jerico, [2 Chron. 28.]	3263.		3273. 741.

				Candaules having ſlew his wife to Gyges a Courtier of his, the ſon of Dalcyllus, in an unſeemly manner, was by him (his wife ſetting him on thereto) murdered; and he thereby got, not only her, but with her the kingdom it ſelf of Lydia alſo, for his labour, which is mentioned by Archilocus, of the Iſle of Patos, who lived at the ſame time, in a Trimeter lambus of his; and ſo the kingdom of Lydia fell from the race of the Heraclide into the ſtock of the Mermuades: wherein it continued by the ſpace of 170 years: of which Gyges himſelf reigned eighteen in it; Herod. lib. 1. Now that this Gyges was but a bond-ſlave, appeareth by that ſaying of Cretus his grandchild in Xenophon, Inſtit. 				Elulcus king of Tyre, reduced under his obedience the Gittæans, which had revolted from him, making a voyage thither by ſea. Againſt the Tyrians, Salmanaſſer king of Aſſyria marching with his army, invaded all Phenicia: yet ſhortly after, making a peace with them, he returned home again: and not long after, Sidon and Ace (called afterward Ptolomais and Polcyrus or old Tyus, with ſundry other Cities, fell off from the Tyrians to the Aſſyrians; and when the Tyrians only now ſtood out againſt him, he returned a ſecond time: in which action, the Phenicians ſuſtained him, with ſixty ſhips, and eight hundred Mariners: whom the Tyrians let upon with twelve ſhips only, and routed all that Navie, and took five hundred priſoners of them: whereby they got no ſmall reputation at ſea: But Salmanaſſer returning to beſiege it, ſet guards upon the river, and conduits, which ſerved the City, and cut them off: which hindered them from watering; which coult being held againſt them five year together, forced them at laſt to digg wells within their Citie walls, and to live of that. This is delivered by Menander of Ephelus in his Chronicles, tranſlated into Greek, out of the Tyrian Annals, cited by Iſoph. 9. Antiq. cap. ult. where for Elulcus, Rufinus, an ancient Latine interpreter, calleth him Aylutus ; and thence Scaliger taketh occaſion to call him Elſeus ; from whom yet I differ in this, that he here ſaith that the Cyprians were by Menander called Kiteans: whereas he by the name of Gittæans, underſtood in deed the inhabitants of Gitta, or Gath known well enough by that name in the holy Scriptures, [2 Sam. 15. 18. and c. 21. 19.] compared with [1 Sam. 17. 4.] who were alſo ſubdued to Juda, by Elechia, in the very time of this Elulcus or Elſeus, as may be gathered out of Joſephus: who ſaith that Elechia made war upon the Philiftines, and having vanquiſhed them, joynd with their Cities and Countie, from Gath, to Gaza, to the kingdom of Juda: 9. Antiq. c. laſt ſave one: as alſo, it is clear out of [2 Reg. 15. 18. and 18. 8.] that Elechia did ſmite the Philiftines as far as Gaza, and the territories thereof: but againſt the Tyrians, who at this time were grown proud and intolerant by reaſon of their wealth and ſucceſſe in wars, was uttered that prophecie by [Eſai. 23. 1.]
				But when Salmanaſſer died, his ſon Sennacharib reigned in his ſtead, [Tob. 1. 18.] whom Herod. l. 2. calleth the K. both of Aſſyria, and Arabia too, perchance for that the Aſſyrians at at that time, together with Petra, or the land of Gilead, and Hamath, or Ituraea held also a part of Arabia, either Petra, or Deserta. For that Iva, or Ava, which Sennacherib so much boasted of, to have been conquered by him or his ancestors, [2 Reg. 18, 34, chap. 19, 13,] Ezay 37, 13,] was a country lying in the desert of Arabia, Fram, Junius affirms, upon [2 Reg. 17, 24,] and the prophet Isaiah; foretelling the calamity which was to fall upon the Moabites, under Salmassar, of which I speak before upon the year of the world 3278, and 3280, threatens them, that what ever they had laid up in store, the Assyrians should carry it away into the valley of the Arabians, Berolus also, in his History of the Chaldeans, cited by Josephus, lib. 10, cap. 1, faith, both that Sennacherib reigned in Assyria, and also that he made hot war upon all Asia and Egypt.

Now that this war of his upon Egypt, lasted 3 whole years, and that Palestine also joyed with him therein, I gather out of the 20 of the prophet Elyas: where putting off his coat of hairy cloath (belonging to his prophetic function, as in Zach. 13, 4.) from his loynes, and his shoes from off his feet, he was commanded to walk up and down, naked and bare-foot 3 years together, for a sign and token to the Egyptians and Ethiopians; intimating, that that time once run out, they should in like manner strip out of their cloths, and bare-foot, be led away into captivity and bondage, by the King of Assyria, which command the prophet is said to have received in the year, when Tartan being sent by Sargon, King of Assyria, besieged Ahlod, and took it, [Ezay 20, 1,] whereby; Sargon, we must understand: Sennacherib himself: among whole commanders we find this Tartan to be named, [2 Reg. 18, 17,] and by Ahlod, that famous city Azotus, a city of the Philistines; whom we shewed before out of Josephus to have been subdued by King Ezekia.

But when Ezekia had shaken off the king of Assyria's yoke (which his father Achaz had taken) and would no longer serve him, [2 Reg. 17, 7,] then in the 14 of his reign, toward the end thereof, Sennacherib, coming up against the kingdom of Juda, besieged their fenced cities, and took a many of them, [Ezay 36, 1, 2 Reg. 18, 13, 2 Chron. 32, 2,] And which Ezekia perceived that he had a draught upon Jerusalem likewise, taking advantage with his princes, he stoped up all the fountains that were about the city, and turned away the brook Gichon, which ran through, and overflowed the region thereabout, and then built up all that part of the wall, which Joas the king of Israel had demolished in the time of Amazia, and a waumure without; and fortified the house of David, and provided himself of Darts and Targets in great abundance, and set captains and colonels over the people, and calling them together to him in the street, of the gate of the city, he made a very pithy and grave oration to them, perswading them to be of courage, and not to have any dread of the king of Assyria, nor of his army, [2 Chron. 32, 2, 8, 30.]

In those dayes, Ezekia fell deadly sick, and being told by Isaiah that he should dye, powowing out his tears and prayers unto God, he recovered his health, and obtained a prolongation of his life and kingdom, for fifteen years, [Ezay 38, 1, 5, 21, 2 Reg. 2, 1, 7, 2 Chron. 32, 24,] Whereupon he composed and set forth that song; wherein first he sheweth, the grievousness of his bodily sickness, with the trouble, and disquietness of mind, which he endured therein, and withall his prayer unto God thereupon; and then acknowledgeth the great benefit of his recovery received from God; and last of all, testifieth his faith in God, and prometh to be everlastingly thankful to him for the same. It is true, that in the scripture this is set down, after the story of the slaughter of Sennacherib, and his army; yet not precisely, but with a general annotation onely of the time, In those dayes. For that this fell out before his sickness, those words do plainly shew, I will add unto thy dayes fifteen years, and will deliver thee and this city out of the hand of the king of Assyria, and I will defend this city, [Ezay 38, 5, 6, 2 Reg. 20, 6,] Now if we will subduct, out of the 29 years which Ezekias reigned, these 15 years, we shal plainly find, that this slaughter of Sennacherib and his army fell out, in the later end of the 14 year of his reign.

Now the signe of Ezekia his recovery, which God at his request gave unto him, was that miraculous going back of the shadow of the sun, upon the diall of Ahaz; of which we read in Ezay 38, 8. Behold, I will bring again the shadow of the degrees, which is gone down in the Sundial of Achaz, ten dayes backward, so the sun returned ten degrees, by which degrees it was gone down. For to Jerom renders the word שָׁדוּם which Jonathan the Childe Paraphraser interprets, to be שָׁדוּם the stone of the hour, and renders it, by the hours and the degrees, yet in his commentary upon this place, he observeth, that the Hebrew word signifieth, degrees. Which also in [2 Reg. 2, 9,] he thus expresseth, will thou that the shadow ascend ten degrees, or that it return back ten degrees? nor may we make light of the Greek interpretation of this place, as being more ancient than any of these, which faith, that by these words of שָׁדוּם and שָׁדוּם here used, no other thing is meant in this history, but the degrees of thoe scales or stairs which were made by Achaz, seeing that it cannot be made appear, that till after their returne, from the captivity of Babylon, there was any observation or use at all of hours, among the Jews: and others also attribute the invention of the Gnomon in the diall among the Greeks, to men of a younger date as Anaximander or Anaximenes, as I shall shew hereafter upon the year of the World, 3457. wherof yet that they received originally from the Babylonians appeareth by that place of Herodotus, where he faith, lib. 2, cap. 109, Πάνος ἡγεμόνα ὅτι πρὸς Βαβυλῶνα ἦσαν οἱ ἄρχαι τῆς ἀρχαίας πόλεως Βαβυλῶνος ἡμετέρας ἀναλαβόντες. That is, The Pole, and the Diall, and the distribution of the day into twelve hours, all these the Greeks learned from the Babylonians.

But as concerning the retrogradation of the Sun, mentioned in, [Ezay 38, 8, and Ecclesiastic, 48, 8,] as when the Sun stood still at the prayer of Jolhua, the Moon also stood still at the same time, [Josh. 10, 12, 13,] to herealso, it is manifest, that with the Sun, the Moon also, and all the frame of heaven was retrograde and went backward, and that there was as much subtracted from the night, as there was added to the day. For albeit, that there was a miraculous alteration in the parts of the civil day; yet that by the divine providence, things were therein so ordered, that no hurt or hinderance did thereby accrue to the constant and ever self-like motion and harmony of the heavenly bodies, is evident by thole three lunar Eclipses, of which I spake before, out of Ptolome: the account whereof being cast up from these our times backward, yield the same result of the times, as was formerly observed by the Chaldeans, and in the same manner, as if no such retrogradation or going back of the Sun had ever been.

Now in the beginning of the 19 year of Ezechia's reign, renewed, as it were, together with his life, Merodach, or Berodach Baladan, the son Baladan, the King of Babylon, sent messengers with Presents to him, to inform themselves of that prodigious and miraculous retrogradation of the Sun, which was made in the World. To whom when Ezechia out of pride and vain ostentation, had shewed all his Treasure and Pomp of riches; God presently foretold him of the captivity of Babylon, which was to endure, in these words, Behold the day's come, that all that is in thine house, and that which thy fathers have laid up in store until this day, shall be carried away into Babylon; nothing shall be left, saith the Lord: adding further concerning his sons, when as he had yet none born, that they should also be carried into captivity, in this manner, Thy sons also, that shall issue from thee, and which thou shalt beget, shall they take away, and they shall be eunuchs in the Palace of the King of Babylon, [Ezay 39, and 2 Reg. 20, 12, 19,] Nevertheless when Ezechia had humbled himself for his former pride, both he, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the fierce wrath of the Lord fell not upon them, in all Ezechia his dayes, [2 Chron. 32, 25, 26, 31.]

Mica also the Morasthit, prophesied to the people in Ezechia his dayes; That Sion should be plowed, and Jerusalem laid in heaps, and the mountain is self of the house of the Lord, as the high places in a forest [chap. 3, 12, Jer. 26, 18, 19,] Memnon writeth, that Astacum in Bithynia, was built by the Megarense, in the beginning of the 17 olympiade, in Biblioth. Photii, p. 374.

Herodotus, lib. 2, cap. 141, telleth us, that Sennacherib invaded Egypt, with a vast Army, and made war upon Sethon, the Priest of Vulcan, a poor spirited King, and famous for nothing; but for being devoutly, or rather superstitiously addicted to the worship of his petty god Vulcan. Where he also addeth, that even in his time, there remained an image of his cur in stone, holding a moulc in his hand, and uttering these words in a label of letters; which Hieroglyph, the Priests there, for his, and their countries, and their own Priesthoods honour, expound in such manner, as if Sethon, being both King and Priest, had by virtue of his piety and prayers to his god Vulcan, so far prevailed with him, as that when Pelusium, which stands in the very entrance of Egypt was besieged by the enemy, their horse-bridles, and buckles of their bucklers, were to gnaw in pieces by the mice, that the next day they were faine to run all away, with the losse of many of their men; but what ever the matter was at Pelusium, the undoubted word of the Prophet assures us, that the Assyrians, marched far into the very body of Egypt, and thence took and led away a great multitude of them captive.

Let every man that looks on me, Learn godly and devots to be.

In this expedition of Sennacheribs, I conceive, it was, that the foretelling of Nahum the Prophet against No, a great and strong City in Egypt, was fulfilled: The words of which prophesie, were these; yet was she carried away; she went into captivity, her young children also were dashed in pieces in the top of every street, and they cast less for their honourable men, and all her great men were bound in chains, [chap. 3, 10.]

In the rest of Egypt also, was fulfilled what was spoken 3 years before by the Prophet, [Ezay 24,] The King of Assyria shall carry away a great multitude of the Egyptians captive; and of the Ethiopians young and old prisoners, naked and bare-footed: neither do I see, why that should not be referred to the Jews which is said in the two verses next following; viz. And they shall be ashamed of Ethiopia their expedition, and of Egypt their glory: and the inhabitants of this country shall say in that day: Behold such is our expectation, whither we flee for help to be delivered from the King of Assyria, and how shall we escape?

For

For it was not for nothing, that the Assyrian messenger put them in mind of Egypt, saying, Now behold, you trust in the staff of this bruised reed Egypt, on which if a man lean, it will go into his hand and pierce it; for even so is Pharaoh, to all such as trust upon him. [2 Reg. 18. 27.] for we finde the same similitude used by God of the Egyptians and Iſraellites, in Ezekiel, 29. 6, 7, and likewise in Ezay, chap. 30, and chap. 31. many things, spoken against the vain hope which the Jews had of help from Egypt, and among the rest this also, Therefore saith he, shall the strength of Pharaoh be your shame, and your trust in the shadow of Egypt your confusion, for the Egyptians shall help in vain, and to no purpose: therefore have I cried concerning this, Their strength is to stay at home. (chap. 30. 3, 7.)

Sennacharib, returning out of Egypt into Palestine, besieged Lachish, and all his power with him. [2 Chron. 32. 9.] Ezckias sent unto him to Lachish, to buy his peace, and agreed with him for it, at a certain price; wherefore draining all his own treasure, whereof he had formerly been so proud; as also the treasury of the temple, he paid him 300 talents of silver, and 30 talents of gold; but he having received the money, stood not to his word, but sent Tartan, who had now taken Azotus, and Rabfari's, and Rabheca with a great army, from Lachish to Jerusalem. [2 Reg. 18. 14, 17.]

These coming to Jerusalem, stood at the conduit, of the upper pool, upon the high-way of the fullers field, and when they called out to speak with the king Eliakim, the son of Hilkiah; which was over the household, and Shebna the scribe, and Joach the son of Asaph, the Recorder, went fourth unto them. And when they would not deliver up the city, as was desired, Rablecah then cried out, that Ezckia did all in vain rely upon God, and having reviled the God of Iſraell and Ezckia, his servant with many reproachfull language; he moved at last the people, to mutiny and to fall over to his master the king of Assyria. And this they speak aloud, and in the Hebrew tongue; that the people which then stood upon the wall might hear and understand what they said; to frighten and perplex their minds, that in that tumult they might assault and take the city. [Ezay 36. 2 Reg. 18. from v. 17. to the end of the chapter, 2 Chron. 32. 9. 18.]

Ezckia hearing thereof, rent his clothes, and putting on sackcloth, went into the house of the Lords; and withal sent Eliakim and Shebna, and with them the elders of the priests, clothed likewise in sackcloth unto Iſaiah the prophet, to pray him that he would ask counsel of God, in this sad case, and power forth his prayers unto him for help, and the prophet bade him be of good comfort; for that the king of Assyria, should hear a flying report, and thereupon should break up his siege, and get him gone into his own country, and there be slain with the sword; all which forth-with came to passe. [Ezay 37. 1, 17. 2 Reg. 19. 1, 7.]

Rabhecah, when he could not prevail, returned to Sennacharib, whom he found risen from before Lachish, and besieging Libna, [Ezay 37. 8. 2 Reg. 19. 8.]

Tirahak king of Ethiopia, did not invade Egypt, and Syria, as Scaliger, without all ground, in his notes upon Eusebius, p. 72, and in his litagogical Canons, pag. 311, would have it; but rather, he sent forces to assist and help the Egyptians and Jews; for the Scripture is clear, that he came forth to fight against Sennacharib, [Ezay 37. 9. 2 Reg. 19. 9.] This Tirahak, Strabo lib. 1. and 15, calleth, Tarcon the Ethiopian; and further reporteth out of Megasthenes, a writer of the affairs of India, that he passed over into Europe, and went as far as Hercules his pillars.

Sennacharib therefore hearing a report of Tirahak his approach, being ready to remove to Libna, sent his minatory and rayling letters unto Ezckias, speaking therein of the God of Iſraell, as of the gods of the nations, the work of mens hands, which Ezckias opening and spreading before the Lord in his Temple, with many tears poured forth, craved aide and deliverance from God, against the Assyrians, and received an answer from God by Iſaiah the prophet, that God would defend that city, and that the king of Assyria should not so much as come before it, but should return by the way he came. [Ezay 37. 9, 35. 2 Reg. 19. 9. 2 Chron. 32. 17, 19, 20.]

The very self same night after these things passed at Jerusalem, and a few dayes, after his victory achieved against the Ethiopians, which to have fallen out much about this time, some gather out of the 18 and 20 chapters of Iſaiah, God sent his Angel, and destroyed every man of valour, every commander, and chief man in the Assyrian army, and the next morning there were found one hundred fourscore and five thousand dead carcases lying on the ground: whereupon Sennacharib with shame, brakup, and returned into his own land, and rested him at Ninive; where it came to passe, that as he was at his devotions, before his god Nitroch, Adramelich and Shazerzer slew him with the sword: which done, they fled presently into the land of Ararat, or Armenia; and Esor-haddon his son reigned in his stead, [Ezay 37. 36, 37, 38. 2 Reg. 19. 35, 36, 37. 2 Chron. 32. 21.] All which had been fore-told by the prophet Iſaiah, [Ez. 38. and in chap. 31. 9. also,] as I have conceived.

In

In the first chap. of the book of Tobia, there are these things found which belong to this story: That Sennacharib, when he came fleeing out of Judea, for the very hatred which he bare to the Iſraelites, slew many of the Jewes, and that Tobia, or Tobia the elder, stole away the dead bodies, and bestowed burial on them; and that being thereof accused to the King of Ninive, he was faine to get him gone from thence, and to hide his head elsewhere for a certain time: and that he was plundered and spoiled of all his goods, having naught left him to trust unto, save onely Anne his wife, and Tobias his son. That after 45 dayes, or as the Greek copy hath it, before 55 dayes, Sennacharib was murdered by his sons: and that they fleeing away into the mountains of Ararat, Elarchaddon his son reigned in his stead, being wrong named in sundry copies; in some Achirdon, in some Sarchedon; and that the new King let Achiaracus, the son of Hananel Tobis brother, over all his fathers accounts and his own: inasmuch, that he was not onely his Steward and keeper of his accounts; but was also cup-bearer, and privy seal unto him, and was the second man after the King.

Ezckias had his son Manafes, by Hephzibah, after the prolonging of his life 3 years, and 12 before his death.

When the Medes had hitherto now lived without a King, and Dejoces would not attend the judging of their causes and controversies any longer, and thereupon ensued nothing but spoilings and robberies in all places; the people finding the inconveniences of an Anarchie, or want of a King, whereof the least was not, that the Assyrian taking hold of this occasion, had possessed himself of many cities and places in Media; as I noted before upon the year of the World, 3283, they submitted all with one accord to Dejoces, 150. years before Cyrus began his reign: as Herodotus in his first book averreth; whom, giving off Ctesias in this point, both D onylus, Halicarnassus, and Appianus Alexandrinus, in the beginning of his Roman Histories, do follow. Though Diordorus Siculus, in his second book: whether thorough failer of memory, or false copying, hath here put Cyaxaris for Dejoces; who is said to have been elected King over the Medes, about the second year of the 17 olympiade, according to Herodotus: For subducing 150. years from the beginning of Cyrus his reign, which as he supposes, falls in with the beginning of the 55 olympiade, and consequently with the middle of the years 4154, of the Julian Period: it follows that the 1 year of Dejoces the first King of the Medes must be placed upon the 3 year of the 17 olympiade, and the middle of the 4004. year of the Julian Period; allowing the later end of the second year of the same olympiade, to have been taken up and spent in the transaction of the business itself, and election made of the new King; which first Epocha or point of the beginning of this new kingdom of the Medes to have been most rightly assigned and set down by Herodotus, the precise times of every Kings reign, compared with the Eclipse of the Sun, which betel in the reign of Cyaxares, here underneath, in the year of the World, 3403, to be spoken of, will manifestly declare.

The fifteenth Jubilee, which was the middle-most of all the rest, and the most joyfully kept, next to that of Solomons at the dedication of the Temple; both for the fresh memory of so great a deliverance, and also for the great prosperity of the place ensuing thereupon: So that many brought offerings and gifts to the Lord at Jerusalem; and rich presents to the King himself; for he was magnified after this among all nations, and prospered in whatever he undertook, [2 Chron. 32. 23, 27, 30.]

And God himself did rule, and govern the people it self of Juda, after such their delivery, that (according to his own promise made) they took root downward, and brought forth upward, [2 Chron. 32. 22. [Ezai. 37. 31, 32.] Moreover the consideration of the Jubilee is necessary for the understanding of that sign of Gods mercy given the year before unto Ezckia: You shall eat, saith God, this year, that which groweth of it self, and the second year, that which springeth of the same; and in the third year, sow ye, and reap ye, and plant vineyards, and eat of the fruit thereof. [Ezai. 37. 30. 2 Reg. 19. 29.] for because the last years harvest was either gathered by the enemy which roved all the country over, (according to Gods threatning, Levit. 27. 16. Dent. 28. 33. Jerem. 5. 17.) or by them spoiled and troden underfoot; necessary it was for the people to live that year upon that which grew of it self: and this year by reason of the Jubilee, it was not lawful either to sow or reap, which otherwise, no fabballical year intervening, might well have been done: seeing the Assyrian Army being destroyed by the Angel, there was nothing to hinder them. But the year following, when there was neither enemy to fright them, nor fabballical year to withhold them, they might fall securely to their husbandry as at other times.

Unto Mardolempadus, or Merodach Baladad, after he had reigned 12 years in Babylon, succeeded Arkianus in the 29 year of Nabonaser, and reigned 5 years [Ptol. in Reg. Can.]

Parion in the coast of Hellespont, near unto Lampacus, was built, Enlish Chron. or rather re-edified by the Milesians and Erythreans, who sent thither a Colony at this time to plant it anew.

[2 Reg. 21.2, 11.2 Chron. 33.2, 9.] and moreover shed much innocent blood; inasmuch that he filled Jerusalem therewith: besides his own sin committed, in making Juda to sin, and to do that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, [2 Reg. 21.16, and 4.4.] In which shedding of innocent blood, the death of the Prophet Isaiah is principally remembered, whom he caused to be cut in two pieces with a wooden saw; as the Babylonish Talmud, in their Treatise Mosai and Justin Martyr in his Colloquie with Tryphon, Jerome upon Isaiah , [c. 20. and 57.] and others of our men, report, who expound that word in the vision [Heb. 11.37.] i. e. Were sawed in pieces , as meant of the Prophet Isaiah: For all which, God threatened that he would stretch out over Jerusalem, the line of Samaria, and the plumb of the house of Achab: and that he would wipe Jerusalem, as one wipeth so, when he wipeth a dish, and turneth it upside down [2 Reg. 21.15.]	4016.	694.

The race of the babylonish Kings failing after those 8 years vacancie, Elarchaddon the King of Assyria, reduced them under their former yoke of his obedience, and held that kingdom 13 years: as we learn out of Ptolemies, [Can. Reg. For that this Alaradus is the same with our Elarchaddon, appears, not onely by the vicinity and likeness of the name, but also by the content of holy Scripture, which intimates to us, that he was King both of Assyria and Babylon at the same time; as we shall see anon, in the year of the World 3327.

Chron.] who consulting the Oracle at Delphos concerning a place to plant in; were answered, that the one should saile westward, and the other eastward, as Stephanus Byzantinus in the word Gela , reports, out of Aristentus his first Commentary of Phacelis. And Heroppythus in his book of the Borders of the Colophonians, treating of the building of Phacelis, saith that Lacius, who transported a colony thither, gave unto one Cylabra, a shepherd, whom he met driving his flock to feed, the price of the ground whereon he built his city, in certain pained provisions, which he required. But Philostephanus in his book entitled, Of the Cities of Asia , delivereth more fully, that Lacius, a man of Argos, one of them which went with Mopius (the founder of the city Colophos) and whom some call Lindius, brother to Antiphemus the builder of Gela (which Lindius, is also said to have been of Rhodes by Herodotus lib. 7. and by Thucydides lib. 6.) and that being sent by Mopius with certain other men, by the Oracle and bidding of Mantus, Mopius his mother, for that the popes of his Ships were in a tempest split about the Chelidonian Isles, he could not arrive till late at night: and that there he bought the plat of ground whereon he built his city, as Mantus had foretold, giving certain lile meats for unto Cylabra the owner of it, such as out of all their ship-provisions he most desired. [Athenæus Deipnosoph. lib. 7.]	4037.	677.
		This year also was fulfilled the prophetic spoken by the mouth of the Prophet Esaiiah, [chap. 7. 2.] in the beginning of the reign of Achaz, within sixty and five years Ephraim shall be broken in pieces, so that it shall be no more a people. For although the greatest part of them were carried away by Salmanassar 44 years before, and the kingdom utterly abolished, yet among them which were left, there was some shew of a government. But now they left off to be any more a people, by reason of the great multitude of foreigners which came to dwell there: in comparison of whom, the small remainder of the Ephraimites were counted as nothing: for, that they were not utterly extinct in their own country appears, out of the story of Jolias, [2 Chron. 34. 6, 7, 33, and chap. 35. 18, with 2 Reg. 23. 19, 20.] But there were ever now and anon, new colonies or companies sent out of Babel, Cuth, Hava, and Sepharuaim; which possessing Samaria by way of inheritance, dwelt in all the cities thereunto belonging, [2 Reg. 17. 24.] And that this was so done by Elarchaddon King of Assyria (who was also called, Assnapper the Great, and magnificent) is easie to be understood by the confession of the Cuthites, mentioned, [Ezra 4. 2, 10.]
		At which time also, as it should seem, and in the same expedition, whereby these things were done in the land of Israel; some of the chief Commanders of the Assyrian Army, made an inroad into Judea, and there took Manasses the King, as he lay hid in a thicket, and binding him with chains of brasse, carried him away captive unto Babylon, [2 Chron. 33. 1.] which calamity to falling upon Judea, some think to have been foretold, by the Prophet Isaiah, where he saith, within sixty five years Ephraim shall be so broken in pieces, that it shall be no more a people. And the head of Ephraim is Samaria, and the head of Samaria, is the lion of Remaliah: And if you will not believe, you shall not be established. [chap. 7. 9.] (i.) as Jacobus Capellus hath noted in his Chron. you your selves also shall be broken in pieces. Where he addeth further, that the Jews also in Seder Olam Rabbæ , and the Talmudists, cited by Rabbi Kimchi, upon [chap. 4. Eccekel] do deliver, That Manasses 22 of his reign, was carried away captive unto Babylon; and that he repented him of his sin 33 years before his death: after which the Scripture witnesseth, that God again restored him to his liberty and kingdom, [2 Chron. 33. 12, 13.] For that his captivity lasted not long; may be gathered by this, that taking no notice thereof, it is recorded that he reigned 55 years in Jerusalem, [2 Reg. 21. 1. 2 Chron. 33. 1.]
		The new inhabitants of Samaria, when as at their first coming thither, they served not the God of Israel, were troubled with Lions: whereof when the King of Assyria was informed, he took order that one of the Priests, which were brought from thence in the captivity should be remanded thither; and he coming thither, made his residence at Bethel and there taught them how to worship God indeed: but all after the manner of Jeroboams appointment. But when together with the Calf which they found there, they worshipped also their old idols, they are said to have feared God, and not to have feared

And unto him succeeded his son Josias, a child of 8 years old, and reigned 31 years [2 Reg. 22. 1. 2 Chron. 34. 1.]

Thole of the Isle of Thera, wearied out with their seven years drowth, hired one Corobius, a trader in scarlet, of the City of Iteaus in the Isle of Crete, who had formerly been driven by a tempest into a place called Platea, an Isle of Lybia: and sent him a second time with some of their own country-men, to spie out that Isle: These leaving Corobius there with provision for certain months, returned with all speed, to let their country-men know what they had found: But not returning from thence to Platea, according to the time appointed, it fortuned that a ship of Samos, wherein was Master, one Cleus, coming out of Egypt, put in there, and left Corobius 4 years provision more for him and his company, and then putting to sea again; and being hurried with a strong wind, was let quite out beyond Hercules his Pillars into the main Ocean; and came unto Tartarus in Spain, Herod. l. 4. c. 151. 152.

The Thereans, out of their seven townes taken by lot, so many as should serve for that Colonie, sent them away to Platea, in two ships, under the command of one Batus, otherwise called Aristoteles, or Aristeus, [Herod. lib. 4. c. 151. 152.]

Thales the son of Examius, was this year also born at Miletus in Ionia: in the 35 Olympiade: in the first year thereof: as Lactius reports out of Apollodorus his Chronicle. The Cimimerians, being turned out of their dwellings by the Scythian Shepherds, called Nomades, passed out of Europe into Asia, and keeping on their way by the sea-side, came at length to Sardes, where they took all the City save the Castle at what time Ardys the son of Gyges there reigned, [Her. l. 1. c. 5. & 1230. and in his 4 book. c. 1. and 12.]

The Thereans, when they had dwelt in Platea now two years, leaving one of their company behind, sailed all to Delphos to know of the Oracle there, what was the cause why things went no better with them than they did, since their coming into Lybia: and answer was made them, that they were not yet come to the City of Lybia, whither they were bid to go, wherefore returning again to Platea, and taking in him whom they had there left, they fate them down in a place in the continent of Lybia, over against the Isle of Platea, called Aziritus; environed with most pleasant hills, and a river running under it on either side, [Herod. l. 4. c. 157.]

In that place near adjoining to the gardens of the Hesperides, and the greater Syrt, or quicksand, the earth happening to grow moist, with a shower of rain of pitch, or sulphur there presently grew up an herbe called Syphius or Laster, (i.e.) Beniamin, as the Cyrenians say: which fell out seven years before the building of their city: [Theophrast. in his History of Plants, l. 6. Plin. in his natur. Hist. lib. 19. c. 6.]

Phraortes king of the Medes, dyed at the siege of Nimve with a great part of his army. After whom came his son Cyaxares, who reigned 40 years: in the beginning of his reign he purposed to revenge his fathers death, and making first all Asia, as far as the river Halys, fast unto him, he began his war against the Assyrians: [Herod. lib. 1.]

Josias, at the 16 year of his age, had a son called Eliakim of Zebudda the daughter of Pedaias, of Ruma: which was 25 years old, when he came afterward first to reign, [2 Reg. 23. 36.]

Yet he, when he came to be sixteen years of age, and though then a father, yet but a child, began to seek after the God of his father David, [2 Chron. 34. 3.]

Cyaxares overcame the Assyrians in battel, but when he went to besiege Nineve, a vast army of the Scythians fell upon him, to wit, whole Scythians who having driven the Cimimerians out of Europe, pursued their point, & departing from the lough of meotis, left the mountain Caucasus on their left hand, and entered media, under the conduct of their king Madois the son of Protothyia, [Herod. lib. 1. c. 104. lib. 2. c. 1. and lib. 7. c. 20.] which was none other, than Indathyrus the Scythian, which breaking out of Scythia, went over the belly of all Asia, till he came into Egypt; as Strabo, in the entrance of his Geography, reports out of Megasthenes, and Arrianus in his book, of the affaires of Judea, being of the same name with that Indathyrus, against whom Darius the son of Hytaspes afterward made such an unlucky voyage, as we read of in Herod. l. 4. c. 76. 126. 127. Here then the Medes being overthrowen in battel by the Scythians, lost the loverygnty of Asia; which the Scythians held for 28 years after [Herod. lib. 1. c. 104. and lib. 4. c. 1.] To which Tremellius and Junius refer that prophetic of Nahum, [c. 2. 5.] He (to wit, Cyaxares, besieging Nineve) shall reckon up his great men; but they shall fall in their perambulation: to wit, in the perambulation of the Scythians; whose coming at this time into Asia might well be termed a perambulation, or sodain passing through, rather than any settled government or kingdom in Asia; as those who in the space of 28 years over-ran, possessed, and lost Media, Assyria, and all Asia, They shall hasten to his wall, as if they would be his Protectors, (i.e.) They shall come hastily to Nineve, as if they had delivered it out of the hand of Cyaxares, and would deliver it.

In this year was born unto Josias, Shallum or Jehoachaz, by Hamital the daughter of Jeremias of Lybna, for him, being 23 years old, did the people (putting by his elder brothers) make king in his fathers room, [2 Reg. 23. 30. 31.] The name of Shallum, as it it seemeth, being, for good lucks sake, changed into Jehoachaz, which otherwise had been the same with Shallum the son of Jabelth, who, having reigned not past one month, was murdered by Manahemus, [2 Reg. 23. 31. 32.] it is manifest, out of [Jeremy 21. 11, 12. compared with 2 Reg. 23. 30, 31.] that this Shallum is last named; not Johannahes the first born, as some have imagined; for that Jehoachaz was not the first-born is easily gathered, because it is said, that he was anointed by the people, [2 Reg. 23. 30.] because the first born of kings, were not wont to be anointed, upon whom the kingdom by common right descended: and also, by his age of 23 years, of which he is said to have been, at the time of his anointing, seeing that when his brother Eliakim, was at three months end, yet in his place, he is said to have been 25 years old, whereby it is manifest, that he was elder than this Jehoachaz, and so Jolephus, in his tenth book of Antiquities, cap. 6. l. 7. affirms.

Sadyattes the son of Ardys, reigned in Lydia 12 years, Herodotus, lib. 1. cap. 16. Thole Scythians, having gotten all the upper Asia, went straight into Egypt unto whom, when they were come as far as Syria Palestina, Pamitricus the king of Egypt came in person, and what by entreaty, what by gifts and presents, wrought to far with them, that they went no further that way. But when in their return they came to Alkalon, which is in Syria, the greatest part of the army passing a long without hurt doing some straglers coming in the rear, robbed the Temple of Venus Urania, whose posterity were ever after stricken with the Emerodes, [Herod. lib. 1. cap. 105.] But this year, which was the second of the 37 Olympiade, thole Scythians invaded Syria Palestina; as Eusebius in Chron. notes, as also that Sinope, was this year built; which being the chief city, in all the kingdom of Pontus, was built by the Milesians, as Strabo in his 12 book saith, but by Macritus of the Isle of Coos, as Phlegon says, cited by Stephanius de Tribibus in Sinope. But sure enough it is, that the Cimimerians, coming into Asia, when they fled from the Scythians, built Cherlo-melus, in the place, where Sinope a city of the Grecians now standeth, saith Herod. l. 4. c. 12.

The men of Thera, in the 7 year after they were created, and had dwelt in Aziritus, by the persuasion of the Libyans, removed from thence, and went to a place called Irafra, and there settled themselves, near to a fountain, which was called after Apollonos name, [Her. lib. 4. cap. 158.] and there Batus, having built a city, which was called Cyrene, in the second year of the 37 Olympiade, reigned 40 years, and after him his son Arcesilaus, 16 years, with thole of the first plantation only; but afterward in the reign of Batus the second Arcesilaus his son, there went thither a great multitude of other Greek, stirred up thereto, by the oracle of Delphos, at what time Apryas reigned among the Egyptians, [Herod. lib. cap. 159.] which concurrence of the reign of this Egyptian king, sheweth, that what I have laid of the time, when the city of Cyrene was built, is much truer, than what others have variously written of it.

Josias in the 12 year of his reign, began to cleanse Juda and Jerusalem from that filth of Idolatry, wherein they had so long lain, and from the high places and groves, and altars of Baal, with the images which were openly placed on them, destroying their graven and molten images, and burning the bones of their priests upon their own altars, and then proceeding to their cities of Manasses, Ephraim and Symeon, as far as Nephthali, he threw down all the altars and groves, and graven or carved images, and all their statutes, which stood without doors, did he demolish and deface, throughout all the land of Israel, [2 Chron. 34. 3. 7.]

Jeremias, in the 13 year of king Josias, was called by God to his prophetic function; but refused to take it upon him: till being called thereto the second time, & strengthened with all by sundry promises, and signs belonging to the office and function of a prophet, he was bid to fore-warn the Jews, of the calamitic, which was to be brought upon that place, by the king of Babylon, [Jer. 1. 2. 17. with c. 28. 3.] to whom was also joynt the prophet Zephany, and others, all who sought to move that rebellious people, to repentance, but could not, [Zeph. 1. 1. Jer. 25. 3. 4. 5.]

Prusias, or Prusa was built in Bithynia, [Euseb. Chron.]

Nabopolassar of Babylon, who was made General of the army by Saraco, al. Chinadadus king of Assyria and Chaldaea, and Alytages, who was made Governour of Media, by his father Cyaxares, entering now into affinity, by Alytages, his giving his daughter Amytis in marriage unto Nebucadnessar the son of Nabopolassar, joynted their forces together, and took the city of Nineve, and therein Saraco the king, (as we gather out of a tractament of Alexander Polyhistor (misunderstood by Georgius Symbles, who cites it in Graec. Scalig. p. 38. 39.) And as we also find in the end of the book of Tobit, in the Greek copie, that Nabuchodonosor, al. Nabopolassar, and Assuerus, al. Alytages, called al. Assuerus, [Dan. 9. 1.] whilst Tobit the younger was yet living, who when Salmanassar took Samaria, being together with his father, by Salmanassar carried away into Assyria, is said to have lived to the age, of 127 years, whereas 95 years passed, from the captivity of Israel, unto this time, and so, Josias yet reigning, (as Jerom also, in his commentaries upon the prophet Jonas affirms) Nineve was destroyed, and the prophecies both of Nahum and Elay, concerning the destruction of Nineve, were fulfilled, whereof as of a thing already already come to pass and done, there is a most elegant description in the 31 ch. of Ezekiel . Sarcus therefore being now dead, Nabopolassar took into his hands the kingdom of Chaldea, as Polyhistor, expressly says; which he held by the space of 21 years, as Berosus in his third book of the Affairs of Chaldaea; and Ptolemy, in Reg. Can. affirms.	4089, 625.

379.		Sadyattes king of Lydia, invaded the territory of the Milesians, with his army, and continued that war for six years pace.
380.		Josias in the 18 year of his reign, gave charge to Hilkia the high priest, that with the money which had been collected, he should repair the house of the Lord, and he, falling in hand therewith, found the original book of the law, which was at the first laid up in the side of the Ark of the covenant, [Deut. 31. 26.] and which seemeth to have been missing ever since the beginning of Manasses his reign; and having found it, sent it by Shaphan the scribe, to the king. Josias, having heard the book read all over to him, asked counsel thereupon of Huldah the prophetess, who foretold him, that that kingdom should certainly be destroyed; yet not whilst he lived; [2 Reg. 22. 3. 20. 2 Chron. 34. 8, 28.] whereupon the king calling to him the elders of Juda and Jerusalem, with the priests and prophets, caused that book of the Law to be read over before all the people, renewed the covenant, between God and the people; and again, cleansed the city from idolatry, and thoroughly restored the worship of God, [2 Reg. 23. 1, 14. 2 Chron. 34. 29, 30.] demolished the altar and high place, which Jeroboam the son of Nebat had set up, having first burnt the bones of the dead upon the altar, as had been expressly foretold it should come to pass; 350 years before, [2 Reg. 23. 2.] And when he had taken away the altars which the kings of Israel had built in the cities of Samaria, and had slain all their priests, and burnt dead mens bones upon them, he then returned to Jerusalem, [2 Reg. 23. 15, 20.] And from this solemn renewing of the covenant, and general reformation of religion, joyning therewith, that inevitable decree of desolation, which was to ensue, for the sins of the people, is deduced the Epochæ or beginning both of the 30 years, spoken of in the first of the prophetic of Ezekiel, and also of the 40 years of the iniquity of Juda, c. 4. 6. of the same book.]	4090, 624.
381.		Josias, in the same 18 years of his reign, toward the end thereof, 14 day of the first month (our May 4, being Sunday) in the presence of all Juda and Israel, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, kept the feast of the passover, with more solemnity, than ever had been done by any of the kings of Israel or Juda in former times, [2 Reg. 23. 21, 22, 23. 2 Chr. 35. 1, 9.] to conclude, he took away all witches and looth-layers, all Images and dumb-hill gods, and all the abominations, which were found in the land of Juda, &c. in Jerusalem, that he might performe all the words which were written in the book that was found by Hilkia the priest, in the house of the Lord, [2 Reg. 23. 24, with Deut. 18. 9, 10, 11.]	4091, 623.
383.		Toward the later end of the 5 year of Nabopolassar, (which is the 127 from the Epoch of Nabonazar,) upon the 27 day of the month Athyr, of the Egyptians, drawing on to the 28 thereof, the moon entered into an Eclipse at Babylon, beginning 5 measured hours after midnight; Ptol. Syntax. p. 125, in the Greek edition, to wit, 22 of April, according to the Julian Calendar, falling on a Saturday, or the 27 of Athyr, drawing to an end; which was our Friday, for that is Ptolemies meaning, when he saith, that it was from αὐτῆς αἰνῆς (i. e. from the 27 to the 28, being in all, six measured hours after midnight of the 27 day, to the sun-rising, when the 28 day was to begin.	4093, 621.
384.		Hammutala bare unto Josia, after Shallum, or Jehoachaz, Mattania also, who was afterward called Sedechias, for he was 21 years old when he began to reign; [Jer. 21. 2 Reg. 24. 17, 18.]	4094, 620.
385.		Xenophanes Colophonius, chief of the sect, of the Eleatic discipline in Philosophy, εἰς τὴν (i. e.) was begotten as Elmus Empiricus saith, in his first book, contra Mathematicos , c. 12, or quinto , as is more rightly related out of Apollodorus, cited by Clemens Alexandrinus , lib. 1. Strommar , (i. e.) was born, in the 40 Olympiade.
385.		After Sadyattes, his son Halyattes, the younger reigned in Lydia 57 years, of which he spent the first 5 years in prosecuting the war which his father had commenced against the Lydians, [Hered. lib. 1. cap. 17, 18, 25.]
387.		Jehojakim son of Josias, had a son by Nechushta, the daughter of Elnathan of Jerusalem, called Jehojakim, Jeconia, who was 18 years old when he began to reign, [2 Reg. 28. 8.]	4097, 517.
388.		Neco, the son of Piammitichus, reigned in Egypt 16 years, [Hered. lib. 2. c. 159.] who in the scripture is Neco or Pharaoh Neco, [2 Chr. 35. 24. 2 Reg. 23. 29, Jer. 46. 2.] This man began from the Nile, into the gulf of Arabia, in which work he spent the lives of 120 thousand Egyptians. But giving that work off in the middle of it, he [encertain Phœnicians, to sail round about Africa, and they setting sail out of the gulf of Arabia, or the red-sea, went into the southern sea; and compassing about the coast, came at length, into the strait of Gibraltar, and lo returned into Egypt, in the third year after they set out, [Hered. lib. 1. cap. 158, and lib. 4. cap. 52.]	4098, 616.
390.		In the 12 year of the war between the Lydians and the Milesians, when the Lydian army had burnt the harvest of the Milesians, as commonly every year they did, it happened, that the flames, driven by force of the wind, caught in the Temple of Minerva in Aëlius, and burnt it to the ground, and when at the return of the Army, Halyattes, was fallen	4100, 514.

		fallen sick, and lay long off it, at length, he sent to consult the Oracle at Delphos, and had answer made him by the prophetess there, that until he had repaired the Temple, which his men had burnt, he should get no answer there. Thrafsibulus, understanding what answer was made at the Oracle, by Pericander the son of Cyphelus, tyrant at Corinth, with whom he was very inward; took order that at the coming of Halyattes his Ambassadors about that matter, all the Milesians should dispose themselves to all kind of feasting and merriment: whereupon Halyattes supposing that there was no want of any thing, but rather great abundance of all provisions; made a peace & a league of friendship with them; and instead of one temple which was before, he built up two temples of Minerva at Aëlius: and having thereupon recovered his health, sent rich presents and offerings unto Delphos, [Hered. lib. 1. ca. 19. 20, 22, 23, 24, with Polyannus, lib. 6. Strumag .] Was the 17 Jubilee.
393.		Anaximander Milesius, the son of Praxidemus, was born in Ionia. See hereafter in the year of the World, 3457.	4102, 612.
394.		Neco king of Egypt, by Gods command went against the king of Assyria, who at that time made war upon him, to besiege Carchemish upon the River Euphrates, [2 Reg. 23. 29. 2 Chron. 35. 20, 21, 22.] or, as Josephus hath it; to fight against the Medes and Babylonians, who had overthrowen the Empire of the Assyrians, [lib. 10. Antiq. ca. 6.] And indeed that Carchemish, in the time of Sennacherib did belong to, and was possessed by, the Assyrians, appears in [Ezay 9.] but that kingdom being ruined; it returned into the hands of the Babylonians: And as the king of Persia, having overcome Babylon and Assyria, [Ezra 6. 22.] was called king of the Assyrians; so here the king of Babylon, having now gotten Assyria, was likewise called king of Assyria: besides that, Hebraean authors also tell us, that Babylon was in former times part of Assyria, and the holy Scriptures teach us, that the kingdom of Chaldaea was founded by the king of Assyria, [Ezay 23. 13. See Num. 24. 22, Ezay 52. 4. Nehem. 9. 22.]	4103, 611.
		Josias, unadvisedly engaging in this war was slain, [2 Reg. 23. 29, 30. 2 Chron. 32. 22, 23.] in the valley of Megiddo, which belonged to the tribe of Manasses, [Jos. 17. 11, Judg. 5. 17.] to which that story of [Hered. lib. 2.] refers, where he saith, Σωφρονιστὴς δὲ Νεκῶς οὐρανοῦθεν ἐν Μαγδαλῇ, ἡνικέναι: πῦρ δὲ τῆς πόλεως, καὶ δόξιν ἐν πόλει τῆς Σωφίας, ἡνικεν ὑπὸ Νεκῶν . (i. e.) Neco falling upon the Syrians with an army of foot, overthrowen them in Magdala, and after the fight took Nadyia a great city of Syria: where learned Scaliger noteth, that this Nadyis was Kaddeh, mentioned in [Num. 20. 16.] and conceives, that Magdala and Megiddo, stood near together: but because Magdala was the more noted place of the two, therefore that fight was said to have been there: as the battel fought by Alexander against Darius at Gaugamela, is commonly said by Writers to have been fought at Arbela, because Gaugamela was an obscure place. But what will we say, if Magdala and Megiddo were all one? and mean the place from whence that other Mary took her surname of Magdalen: For certain it is, that in [Mat. 15. 39.] where we read Magdalenam the Syrian renders it, Mageda : and the old Latine translation, Magedan ; a name not much varying from Magiddo.	4104, 610.
		The good King being thus taken out of the world, whose life onely kept off the Babylonish captivity from that nation, [2 Reg. 22. 20,] a world of miseries growing on upon it, the last years Jubilee, was turned this year into lamentations: so that it grew almost into a common proverb, The Lamentation of Haddadrinmon in the valley of Megiddo , [Zacharia. 12. 11.] For not onely the whole people which was then living wonderfully bewailed the death of Josias; but even in after-time, a publick mourning for him was voluntarily kept, as if it had been ordained by a law: the Prophet Jeremy also, in remembrance thereof, wrote his mourning Song of Threnes, or Lamentations , [2 Chron. 35. 24, 25.] wherein bewailing the calamities which were shortly to befall that people, as if he had then presently beheld them, in a most passionate manner, and pointing as it were, with his finger, at the death of Josias, as from the source and original of all ensuing miseries, he useth these words: The breach of our fortress, the angined of the Lord, is taken in their pits: of whom we said, under the shadow of his wings we shall live among the larches , [Lament. 4. 20.] So that we may very justly question the first verse, or proeme of that book; which we find in the Greek and vulgar Latine translation: but contrary to Jeromes mind, prefixed before the Threnes or Lamentations of Jeremy; to wit: And he came to passe after that Israel was carried into captivity, and Jerusalem laid waste, Jeremy the Prophet fave down and wept, and made this lamentation in Jerusalem, and sighing and howling, out of the bitterness of his heart, said: which whosoever made, should have remembered that saying of the Wise-man, Adde not to his words, that he blame thee not, and thou be found a liar , [Prov. 30. 6.] There was also a second Song of Lamentations for the miserable condition of the kingdom of the Jews, after the death of Josias, composed by the Prophet Ezechiel, and appointed to be sung, [Ezech. 19. 1, 14.]
		After the death of Josia, the people, fearing least the King of Egypt should invade the kingdom in the vacancy of a king, anointed his youngest son Shallum or Jehoachaz, to be their king: And he presently fell to doing of that which was evil in the sight of the Lord:

Lord: even as his forefathers had done, [2 Reg. 23, 30; 31, 32. 2 Chron. 36. 1.] See before in the year of the World, 3371.

Neco at his return from his voyage into Assyria, removed Shallum from the throne, when he had reigned only 3 months; and made Eliakim his elder brother King in the room of his father Josias, changing his name into Jehojakim, [2 Reg. 23, 31, 32, 34. 2 Chron. 36, 2, 3, 4.] that thereby he might testify to the World, that he ascribed the victory by him gotten against the Assyrians to the Lord Jehovah only, as he formerly professed that it was he by whom he was sent against him, [2 Chron. 35, 21, 22.] and then imposing a tribute of one hundred talents of silver, and one talent of gold upon the land of Juda: he put Shallum or Jehojakim in fetters at Ribla, and carried him away with him prisoner into Egypt, where also he ended his days, [2 Reg. 23, 33, 34; 35. 2 Chron. 36, 3, 4. Ezech. 19, 3, 4.]

The Prophet Jeremy, going by Gods appointment to Shallum, the new Kings Palace, earnestly moved both him, and his Courtiers, and all the people, what with promises, what with threats from Almighty God, to a newness of life: foretelling them, that Shallum or Jehojakim might be carried away captive into Egypt, saying, weep not for him that is departed (meaning Josias) nor make lamentation for him; but weep for him that is to depart: (that is Shallum) because he shall return no more to see his native soil. [Jer. 22, 1, 2, 10, 11, 12.]

In the beginning of the reign of Jehojakim, Jeremy, commanded by God, went and stood in the court of the Temple, and there exhorted the people (assembled out of all the cities of Juda; to bow themselves there before the Lord; (it being then the feast of Tabernacles, wherein all the males out of the cities were bound to appear at Jerusalem, Dan. 16, 16.) to repentance; and when they would not, he denounced the judgement of God against them, saying, That this House shall become as Shilo: and that city should be accursed among all the nations of the earth: Whereupon, he was presently apprehended by the Priests and Prophets, and all the people that were then in the court; and accused as a man worthy of death: but was acquitted and set at liberty by the public judgement of the Princes and Elders, [Jer. 26, 1, 2, 19.]

Uria also the son of Shemaria, of Kirath-jearim, prophesied against Jerusalem, and the land of Juda, agreeably to the sayings of the Prophet Jeremy; and when Jehojakim the King sought to put him to death, he fled into Egypt. But the King first after him El Nathan the son of Achor, and others with him overtook him, and brought him back to the King, and he put him to the sword, and threw his carcase among the vilest sepulchres of the common people; yet Ahikam, the son of Shaphan, who had formerly been a man of great authority with king Josias, [2 Reg. 22, 12, 2 Chron. 34, 20.] stuckle to well for the Prophet Jeremy, that he was not delivered over into the hand of the people to be put to death, [Jer. 26, 20, 24.]

To these I might add the Prophet Habakkuk; to whom, when he complained of the stubbornness of the Jews, God made this answer: That he would shortly send the Chaldeans into Juda; and further declared his purpose concerning that matter, in these words. I will do a work, in your days, which you will not believe when it shall be told unto you: For behold I will stir up the Chaldeans, a fierce nation, and a swift: which shall walk thorough the breadth of the land, to possess a land which is none of theirs as their own inheritance, [Habakkuk 1, 5, 6.]

In the beginning also of the reign of Jehojakim, Jeremy also foretold that Sedechia should be king of Juda, and Nabuchodonosor king of Babylon; and that he should subdue the neighbouring nations to his dominions; [Jerem. 27, 1, 11.]

When the Governor of Cœlolyria and Phœnicia, had revolted from Nabopolassar king of Babylon, father to Necho, king of Egypt, after the taking of Carchemish; Nabopolassar sent against them his son Nebuchadnezar (having first associated him in the kingdom) with a great army: and that this was done in the later end of the third and beginning of the fourth year of Jehojakim king of Juda, is gathered by comparing the [1 cap. v. 1. of the Prophet Daniel, with the cap. 25, 1. of Jeremy.]

When Nebuchadnezar was associated with his father in the kingdom, the things which he was to do, were presently revealed unto Jeremy: the first whereof was the overthrow of the Egyptians; first at the River Euphrates, then in their own country, and that Nebuchadnezar should make himself master of it, [Jer. 46.] The first whereof came to pass almost immediately; Pharaoh Neco his forces, which he led at Carchemish being cut off by Nebuchadnezar King of Babylon, in the 4 year of Jehojakim, [Jer. 46, 2.] The second was not till after the taking of Tyre, in the 27 year of the captivity of Jeconia, [Ezech. 29, 17, 18, 19.]

In the self same 4 year of Jehojakim, which was the first of Nebuchadnezar King of Babylon; the Prophet Jeremy reproving the Jews, for not harkening to the word of the Lord, which from time to time he had spoken to them, from the 13 year of King Josias, even to that present 4 year of Jehojakim; this, faith he, is 23 years; and for that they had shewed themselves stubborn and refractory to the admonitions and exhortations tions of himself, and all the other Prophets which the Lord had sent unto them: and then again told them of the coming of Nabuchadnezar upon them, and of their being carried away captives to Babylon, and that captivity to last 70 years long: which term Judea first, then the other nations there mentioned every one in his order, were to serve the King of Babylon: and that at last the kingdom of Babylon it self, should be destroyed, and the land of Chaldaea exposed to desolations, [Jer. 25, 1, 3, 11, 12.] of which 70 years mention also was long before made by the Prophet Elaiab, though more obscurely, when he spake of the destruction of Tyre, [Esa. 23, 15, 17.]

In the 4 year of Jehojakim, Baruc the son of Neria wrote in a book from the mouth of the Prophet Jeremy, all the words of the Lord which he had spoken to him concerning Israel and Juda, from the time of Josias until that day: and he read them in the house of the Lord, in the audience of the men of Jerusalem and of all the Jews which were there assembled out of all their cities, in the day of the fast, [Jer. 36, 1, 8.] to wit, of that solemn fast which was yearly kept upon the 10 day of the 7 month, [Levii. 16, 29. & c. 23, 27. & Num. 29, 7.] five days before the feast of Tabernacles; wherein all the males out of all the cities of Juda, were to appear at Jerusalem; as I have shewed before in the year of the World 3395. As for Baruch himself, who was extremely amazed and afflicted in his soul, with the horror of these direful judgements which he had written, the Prophet comforted him, by the word of the Lord; over this calamity which was to be brought upon all flesh by the Babylonians, and assured him of his owalife, in the midst of all these troubles, [Jer. 45, 1, 5.] whereunto also perhaps all those consolatory speeches contained in 30 and 31 chapters of the same Prophet, and promises made concerning the restoration of the Church, may be referred.

The Rechabites, of the posterity of Jonadab, the son of Rechab, [2 Reg. 10, 15.] when Nebuchadnezar King of Babylon approached now unto Judea, for fear of the host of the Chaldeans and Syrians, leaving their tents (wherein, by the rule of their forefather Jonadab, they were wont to remain and dwell) came unto Jerusalem [Jerem. 35, 11.] whence (seeing they speak of the present time; so we do now remain in Jerusalem) we gather, that the matter of this chapter which concerns the Rechabites refusing to drink wine, was in agitation, at what time the city was besieged round, by Nebuchadnezar, [Dan. 1, 1.]

God therefore gave up Jehojakim the King of Juda, into the hands of Nebuchadnezar King of Babylon, with part of the furniture of the House of the Lord, [Dan. 1, 2.] to wit, in the 9 month called Ciliu: as may be collected out of the anniversary fast, which in remembrance, as it seemeth, of this calamity, by a received custom of the Jews, [Zachar. 7, 3, 5. and chap. 8, 19.] was kept in this month, [Jer. 36, 9.]

Nebuchadnezar put Jehojakim at first in chains, to carry him away to Babylon, [2 Chron. 36, 6.] but afterwards, upon submission, and his promises of subjection, he left him in his own house: where he lived his servant 3 years. From which entering of the King and people of the Jews into the subjection and service of Nebuchadnezar, are the 70 years of the captivity of Babylon to be reckoned, which were foretold by the Prophet Jeremy, [Jer. 25, 11. and c. 29, 10.]

Nebuchadnezar gave order to Athenapha the overseer of the eunuchs, or pages, that he should carry from thence of the children of Israel, both of the blood-royal, (as was expressly foretold by Elay the Prophet to Ezechia it should come to pass, [Esa. 39, 7.]) as also of the noblest families, the choicest boyes, both for beauty and wit, that he could find: which being by his care educated 3 years in the language and sciences of the Chaldeans, might be thought afterward fit to stand before the King, and serve in his Palace: among whom of the tribe of Juda, were Daniel, who was Beldazzar, Hananiah, who was Shadrach, Michael, who was Melchach, and Anania, who was Abednego: every of them having his name changed at the discretion of the overseer, or master of the Eunuchs, [Dan. 1, 3, 7.]

Now after those Scythians of whom I spake before, had taken their pleasure in Asia 28 years, Cyaxares and the Medes fasting them, and making them all drunk upon a certain day, cut all or the greatest part of their throats, [Herod. lib. 1, ca. 106.] Besides which, certain other Scythians of the Nomades or Shepherds, being driven out of their own country by a contrary faction, had been entertained by Cyaxares, and by him employed, partly in hunting, partly in the educating of children: who being roughly and basely used by him, and also, as it seems, repining at the general massacre of their other countrymen, killed one of the boyes which they had taken to educate and instruct; and dressing the flesh of him for venison, set it before Cyaxares and his guests to eat: which done, they fled away speedily to Halyattes the King at Sardes, and put themselves under his protection; whom when Cyaxares demanded to be given up unto him, and Halyattes refused to deliver them; there grew thereof a war between the Medes and Lydians which lasted five years, [Herod. lib. 1, ca. 73, 74.] As for the Cimmerians of whom I spake before in the year of the World, 3368, Halyattes himself drove them out of all Asia, [Herod. lib. ca. 16.]

Sedechia, in the 4 year of his reign, went, or rather, in his own stead, sent Seraia, the son of Neria, the son of Maalcia, prince of Menucha, to Babylon, to whom Jeremy delivered the foresaid prophecies, or the destruction of Babylon, written in a book to be first read, and then to be thrown into the river Euphrates, [Jer. 51. 59.] with whom his brother Baruc, son also of Neria, the son of Maalcia, [Jer. 32. 12.] Jeremy his pen-man, is thought also to have gone to Babylon.

Baruc is said to have read all the words of his own book, in the audience of Jeconia, the son of Jehoiachim, and of all the captives, that were then dwelling with him at that time in Babylon, in the 5 year, (to wit, after Jeconia, his being carried away to Babylon) in the 7 month, at the time when the Chaldeans took Jerusalem, and burnt it with fire, [Baruc. 1. 2, 3, 4.] even in the same month, as it is thought, wherein, Jeconia giving himself up to the king of Babylon, Jerusalem was taken, and perhaps begun in part, to be set on fire by the Chaldeans: for I cannot assent to Severus Sulpicius, who (grounding himself perchance upon this text) saith, that at this very time, Nebuchadnezzar entered Jerusalem with his army, and laid both city and walls, Temple and all, even with the ground, in his first book of his Sacred History, yet the former guests of Fran. Junius, concerning the quenching of the fire, and having the city, is somewhat more tolerable, than that of our Seminary priests at Doway is, where they say, that the whole time of the taking of Jerusalem, lasted eleven years before it was wholly burnt: to wit, from the time, when it was taken under Jeconia, till the time it was taken under Sedechia, and this book was written in the fifth year of that interval of time. But Hugo Grotius thinks, that the first writer thereof, here meant, the fifth year, after the carrying away of Jeconia, but that the rest of the burning of Jerusalem, was added afterward, by some other hand, who was of opinion, that Baruc never went to Babylon, till after the consuming of Jerusalem by fire, which fell out in Sedechia his reign.

In the beginning then of the 30 year, from that solemn renewing of the covenant, and restoration of the worship of God, in that memorable year, the eighteenth of Josia his reign, which falls in with the fifth year of the carrying away of Jehoiachim, at Jeconia, in the beginning thereof, in the fifth day of the fourth month, (upon the 24 of our July, falling upon a Saturday) was the first vision from God shewed to Ezekiel, being then, among the rest of the company, carried away to Babylon, by the river Chebar, called by Strabo and Ptolemy, Chaborra, [Ezek. 1. 1, 2, 25.] and from hence was he sent, to execute the function of a prophet among the Jews of the captivity, unto whom dwelling at Thel-abbi, near the river Chebar, when he was come, he laid him down, as a man beddressed, for 7 days space: after which time, God again put him in mind of his charge, both with promises, if he undertook it, and with threats, if he refused; and then confirmed him, with a new sign shewed unto him: gave him courage and boldness by his word and ratifying his vocation by a new command, [Ezek. 2 & 3.]

The prophet is commanded to make a draught of the siege of Jerusalem, in a table of slate, and to live along upon one side 396 days, which was to be a type or prefiguration, of so many days, that the siege of the city of Jerusalem should last, and of so many years, of the iniquity of the house of Israel, [Ezek. 4.]

Pammis king of Egypt, returning from his journey which he had made into Ethiopia, shortly after died, and to him succeeded his son Apries, who reigned 25 years, [Herod. lib. 2. cap. 161.] and is the same, who in the scripture is called Pharaoh Hephra, [Jer. 44. 30.] He with an army every way well furnished, having made an incursion upon the Isle of Cyprus, and upon Phœnicia, took Sidon by main force, and the rest of that country, by the very dread and terror of his name, and after a main victory gotten at them, both Cyprians and Phœnicians, returned into Egypt, with a huge spoil taken from them, [Diod. Sic. lib. 1.] And it is reported of him, that he was altogether of opinion, that no God was able to put him besides his kingdom, so fire he thought he had made for himself, [Herod. 2. cap. 169.] which in [Ezek. 39. 3.] (as Trelenius hath noted) is in that allegorical Propopœia, most elegantly expressed, The river is mine own, for I have made for it my self. Ezekiel, when he had lain 350 days upon his left side, turned him on his right, and there lay 40 days more, which were for a type of as many years of the iniquity of Juda, [Ezek. 4. 6.] to which we must also refer what is said in the fifth chapter, of the same prophecy, with the two chapters following.

In the sixth year of Jeconia his going into captivity, and fifth day thereof, (which was the 22 of our Septem, falling upon a Wednesday) God carrying away Ezekiel by the Spirit, to Jerusalem, in a vision there, shewed him the infinite Idolatry there used; and the plagues which were to befall that city for the same, [Ezek. 8. 1. and c. 9. 10, 11, 16.]

According to his foretelling, Pelatias, the son of Benaja died. God comforts the godly in their captivity in Babylon, by the sanctification of his presence, and with his evangelical promises for the time to come. The vision vanishing, the prophet is brought back by the Spirit, to his people in Chaldea, and there declares to them, all that God had shewed him, [chap. 11. 13, 25.]

God both by typical figures, and also in plain words foretells Sedechia his flight by night the putting out of his eyes, his leading into captivity, his dying in Babylon, the carrying away of the Jews into captivity, and the calamities which they were to endure before their going, [Ezek. 12.] to which year also the seven following chapters belong: out of which we further understand, that Daniels name was at that time grown very famous for the continual prayers which he made for the people of the captivity, [Ezek. 14. 14, 20.] and that Sedechia, not regarding the covenant and oath which he had sworn, rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar, [c. 17. 15, 17.]

In the 7 year of Jeconia his captivity, 10 day of the 5 month (27 of our August, being Sunday) Ezekiel reproved the Elders, which came and requested him to aske counsel of God, for their grosse hypocritie: and then foretells them of the calamities that were to come upon all flesh; pronounces Gods judgements upon the Idolaters, and gives sweet comfort to the godly, [Ezek. 20. 1.] to which the three chapters following, seem also to appertain.

After Batus the founder of the kingdom of Cyrene, succeeded his son Arceilaus, and reigned 16 years, [Herod. lib. 4. c. 159.]

This fell out to be a sabbatical year; wherein the men of Jerusalem, hearing that Nebuchadnezzar approached with his army, proclaimed liberty to their servants, [Jer. 34. 8, 9, 10.] according to the law, [Exod. 21. 2. Deut. 15. 1, 2, 3.] For Nebuchadnezzar marching with his army against Sedechia, and having wasted all the country, and taken their strong holds, came now before the very walls of Jerusalem, [Jer. 34. 10, 11.] or he had taken all the Cities of Juda, saving only Lachish, Azekah, and Jerusalem: all which, he besieged with all the forces which he could make out of all the lands of his dominions, [Jer. 34. 1, 7.]

But the siege of Jerusalem began not till the middle of winter, for in the 9 year of the reign of Sedechia upon the 10 day of the 10 month, (answering to our 30 of January, falling upon a Thursday) Nebuchadnezzar with all his army came before Jerusalem: raising forts round about it, [2 Reg. 25. 1. Jer. 39. 1, 2, 4.] For a memoriall whereof, not only during the captivity, [Zach. 8. 19.] but even unto this day there is a yearly fast kept among the Jews.

Upon the very self-same day, was the siege of Jerusalem, revealed by God to Ezekiel, being then in Chaldea; and the utter destruction thereof, represented to him by the type a seething pot; and his wife died that day in the evening; for whose death he was charged not to mourn: thereby signifying the grievous calamity of the Jews, which was to surpass all expressions of grief by mourning, [Ezek. 24. 1, 2. 8cc.]

Jeremiah the Prophet was commanded by God to foretell the utter destruction and burning of Jerusalem by the king of Babylon, to Sedechia: and that he should be carried away prisoner to Babylon; and that there he should end his daies, and yet be honourably entered, [Jer. 34. 1, 7.]

The Prophet for so laying, was by Sedechia clapt up, in the court of the prison of the kings house, where in the tenth year of Sedechia and beginning of the 18 year of Nebuchadnezzar, having a promise of his delivery, made him by God, he recovered the land of Hamath, his uncles son, by right of redemption, [Jer. 32. 1, 6.] and all things then came to passe which he foretold, and are contained in the 32 and 33 chapters of his Prophecie.

Pharaoh Hophra, at Vaphris, coming with his army out of Egypt, to relieve Sedechia, the Chaldeans raised the siege from before Jerusalem; and Sedechia sent messengers to Jeremiah (who upon the raising of the siege was set at liberty, and not yet cast into the dungeon, as afterwards he was,) to pray him to make intercession to God for the deliverance of the people; but the Prophet returned him answer, that those succours out of Egypt, should into Egypt returne again, and that the Chaldeans should returne to Jerusalem, and take the City, and destroy it by fire [Jer. 37. 3, 10.]

They of Jerusalem seeing the siege raised, and themselves quit of that fear, presently took back their Hebrew servants again, whom they had formerly set at liberty according to the law; and made them serve as before, contrary to their covenant; for which, as for a most impious and barbarous act, Jeremy reproved them, and to cry quittance with them for it, proclaimed a liberty to the sword and pestilence and famine, against them, telling them withal, that the Chaldeans, should come again to the siege, and should take their City, and destroy it with fire, [Jer. 34. 1, 2, 3.]

But while the Chaldeans were away to encounter the Egyptian army, Jeremiah purposed to save himself by flight; but was prevented by the Princes, and taken and scourged, & cast into the Dungeon, which was in Ionahtans house, & there lay a long time, [Jer. 37. 11, 16.] Nebuchadnezzar, at his going against the Egyptians in the 18 year of his reign, took 832 men which had fled out of Jerusalem to him, for safeguard, and sent them all away prisoners to Babylon, [Jer. 52. 29.]

Pittacus of Mitylene, one of the 7 wise men, was sent against Phrynon, surnamed the Pan-cratist, i. e. a man excellent in all sorts of chivalrie, and the Olympionice, i. e. one that had won the bell in the games at Olympus; and at that time, General of the Athenian army, and had taken two towns, Sigium and Achilleum, from the Lesbians, with a Navie to Troas; in which battel, the Athenians, having gotten the victory, took the Target of Abreus, the Poet of Mitylene, who in flying had thrown it away, and hunting it up in the temple of Minerva in Sigeum : Phrynon afterward challenged any man that durst encounter him to a single combat. Pittacus undertook him, and with a little net which he had hid privily under the hollow of his target, caught him by the head, and so flew him with his three-forked Spear; for which service, when the Mitylenians offered him a large proportion of lands, he desired no more of it, than so far only as he could throw his Spear; wherein he afterward built a temple, which from him was called Pittacium. This story seems to be mangled and is imperfect in Herodotus, lib. 5. c. 95. but that defect in him, is supplied by Plutarch, in his book entitled, De malignitate Herodoti, (i.) of the envy, or spitefulness of Herodotus, together with [Strabo, lib. 13. Polyonymus, lib. 1. Festus, in the word, Retarius. (i.) a fighter with a net: and Diogenes Laertius, lib. 1.] who tells us, that the Mitylenians for that service made him their Prince, or Sovereign, of their own accord, 20 years before he died: which, as he there saith, was in the third year of the 52 olympiade: and which upon a due account I chuse rather to place in the 3 year of the 57, than with Eusebius, upon the 2 year of the 43 olympiade: though that seems more to favour his opinion, because in the Catalogue of the Stadionians, (i.) of those which gat the prize in running, Phrynon is said to have gotten it in the 36 olympiade. Neither yet was the war ended by this duel; but the matter of their quarrel being referred by both parties to Periander of Corinth, who was also reckoned an other of the seven Wise men of the world; as to an indifferent Arbitrator, he ordered, that each party should hold what they had then in their possession: (i.) that the Mitylenians should keep the Town of Achilleum, and the Athenians Sigeum, [Herod. lib. 5. cap. 94. Strabo lib. 13.] which Periander, as Laertius in his life, out of Solicitude shews, died, 6 years after this, and before the 49 olympiade; which bewrays Herodotus his error in his account of times, where he makes this peace to be made between the Athenians and Mitylenians, not to have been till toward the latter end of the Pisistratide, or successors of Pisistratus in the government of Athens.

In the 10 year of the carrying away of Jeconia, and on the 12 day of the 10 month, (upon our Feb. 1. falling upon a Sunday) Ezechiel uttered his prophesie against Pharaoh and all Egypt: that he should prove but a staffe of reed to the house of Israel; for he had all in vain already attempted to relieve them, and sift for Pharaoh Hophra or Apries himself, that he should have an overthrow given him in the Desert of Lybia by the Cyrenians, (as we shall see anon in the year 3430. of the World) and then for Egypt it self, that it should be miserably waited by the Babylonian; and that, that desolation should last 40 years, [Ezech. 29. 1, 16.]

When Nebuchadnezzar had routed the Egyptian army, he presently returned to the siege of Jerusalem about the 15 day of the 4 month, to wit, 30 dayes before he took it: as we may gather out of that type or representation of, [Ezech. 4. 5, 8.] But then Jeremia, being consulted with by Sedechia, told him that he must be given up into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar: and he then, at Jeremia's humble suite, commanded him to be removed out of the Dungeon in Iouanahs house, into the court of the prison; and that he should have a rowle of bread daily out of the bakers street, so long as there was any bread left in the city, [Jer. 37. 17, 21.]

The siege continuing, Sedechia sent again to Jeremia; but he still sent him the same answer, that both King and people must fall into Nebuchadnezzars hands: that they who would stay in the city should perish, either by the sword, or by famine, or by pestilence: but they that would go out, and submit to the King of Babylon, should have their lives saved, and be glad with that, [Jeremia 21.]

For this answer, the Princes cast Jeremia into Malchias his Dungeon, which was in the court of the prison; from whence, yet he was delivered by the help of Ebed-Melech, one of the Kings Eunuchs, and was again consulted by the King; and when he still continued in pronouncing judgment against the Land of Iudah, he was still kept in the Court of the prison, till the very taking of the City. [Jer. 38.] Where he assured Ebed-Melech, in the Name of the Lord; that he for his own part, should be free from all harme and danger in that general calamity, [Jer. 39. 15, 18.]

In the 11 year of the carrying away of Jeconias in the first day of the first month; as it seemeth, not of the 5 month, as Tremellius and Pradus would have it, (for that would fall upon the 12 year of Jeconia his carrying away to Babylon) God, by Ezechiel, foretold the city of Tyrus, which much rejoiced in the wretched condition into which Jerusalem was fallen, by the power of Nebuchadnezzar King of Babylon, that she also should perish by the same hand, and in so dreadfull a manner, that all who had seen her former wealth and bravery should be amazed thereat: Foretelling the like misery to befall the Sidonians, their neighbours, to the glory of God, and good of his Church; concluding this whole prophetic with this assurance to her, [Ezech. 26. 1.] and from thence to the end of the 18 chapter. In all which prophesie this is also to be noted; that at that time the fame of Daniels wisdom was grown to great, even in forreign nations, that they used to say, by way of a proverb; as wise as Daniel, from whence it was that God upbraiding Ithobous King of Tyre, with his pride and arrogancy of his minde; Bibbidi, faith faith he, thou art wiser than Daniel; no secret can be hid from thee, [Ezech. 28. 3.]

In the same year, the 7 day of the 3 month, (our 26 of April, upon a Tuesday) God revealed his will to Ezechiel, of sending and arming Nebuchadnezzar against Pharaoh, to the ruine of Egypt, [Ezech. 30. 20, 26.]

In the same year also, upon the first day of the 3 month, (June 19. falling upon a Sunday) God declared that the Egyptian, could no more avoid his determination, than the Assyrian had done before him, [Ezech. 31.]

In the latter end of the 11 year of Sedechia, [Jer. 1. 3.] 9 day of the 4 month (27 of our July, upon a Wednesday) when the famine grew strong in Jerusalem; the Cite was broken up, and the Caldeans entered in, [2 Reg. 26. v. 2, 3. 4. Jer. 39. v. 2, 3. and c. 52. v. 5, 6, 7.]

The City being taken, Sedechia, and all the men of war, fled away by night: but the Caldeans pursuing after them, tooke Sedechia, and brought him prisoner to Ribla, where Nebuchadnezzar lay, and where having seen his children slaughtered before his eyes, he had then his eyes put out, and being clogged with chains of steel, he was carried away from thence to Babylon, [2 Reg. 25. v. 4, 7. Jer. 39. v. 4, 7. and chap. 52. 7, 11.] fulfilling therein the prophesies foretold of him, that with his eyes he should see the King of Babylon, [Jer. 32. 4. and chap. 34. 3.] but Babylon, he should not see, though he was to die there, [Ezech. 12. 13.]

Upon the 7 day of the 4 month (being our August 24. Wednesday) Nebuzaradan, Captain of the Guard, sent by Nebuchadnezzar, made his entry into the city, [2 Reg. 25. 8.] and having spent two dayes in making provision, upon the 10 day of the laid month, (our Aug. 27. falling upon the Sabbath) to which time perhaps he had purposely put off the execution of that his charge; he set fire on the Temple, and on the Kings Palace, and upon all the Noble mens houses, with all the rest of the houses in Jerusalem, and burnt all down to the ground, [Jer. 52. 13. with chap. 39. 8.] though our Country-man Tho. Lydiate, thinks that fire was set on the 7 day; but not burnt down till the 10. In remembrance of which calamity, the fast of the 5 month was ordained to be kept, [Zach. 7. 3, 5. and chap. 8. 15.] which is observed by the Jews unto this day: though kept by them, upon the 9 day, and not the 10 of the month Ab. But the Temple was destroyed in the 19 year of Nebuchadnezzars reign, [Jer. 52. 17. 2 Reg. 25. 8.] in the latter end thereof, in the beginning of the first year of the 48 olympiade, in the 16. year, running of Nabonassars account, 424 years, 3 months and 8 dayes, from the time that Solomon laid the first stone thereof.

Upon the same 5 month, [Jer. 1. 3.] all the walls of Jerusalem being razed to the ground, all that were left in the City, and all that had formerly fled over to Nebuchadnezzar, and all the common people of the City, with all the treasure of the King, and of his Nobles, and furniture of the Temple, did Nabuzaradan carry away unto Babylon, [Jer. 52. 8, 9. c. 52. 14, 23. 2 Reg. 25. 10, 17. 2 Chron. 36. 18, 19, 20.] And thus was Juda carried away out of her own land, [Jer. 52. 17. 2 Reg. 25. 21.] 468 years after David began to reign over it: from the dividing of the 10 Tribes, from the Tribe of Juda, 388 years, and from the destruction of the kingdom of Israel, 134 years.

The Sixth Age of the World.

The basest sort of the people of the land of Juda, and such as were nothing worth, Nebuzaradan let there, to dress the vineyards, and to till the ground; over whom the King let Gedalia the son of Ahikam, a man of the same country, to govern them, [Jer. 39. 10. and chap. 42. 16. 2 Reg. 25. 22, 23.] but without any badge of Regality, or Kingly title: because, as Severus Sulpitius, in his sacred History, saith, To have some preeminence over a few miserable boors, or peasants, was not reckoned to be any dignity at all.

Seraia the chief, and Sephanias the secondary Priests; and the three Keepers of the gate of the Temple, and other principal men, Nebuzaradan took and carried them to Riblah, to Nebuchadnezzar, and there were they put to death, [Jerem. 52. 24, 27. 2 Reg. 25. 18, 21.] but Jehoiadake the son of Seraia, and who after him came to be high Priest, was carried away prisoner to Babylon, [1 Chron. 6. 15.]

Jeremy being bound with chains, was carried with the rest as far as Rama towards Babylon, and had there his irons knockt off, and was set at liberty, and had his choice given him whether he would go on to Babylon, there to be honourably entreated, or stay in the country with that miserable crew, which was left behind; and he chusing to stay, was sent back to Gedalia the governour; who made his residence at Mizpa, in the Tribe of Benjamin, with money in his purse, [Jer. 39. 11, 14. and chap. 41. 6.]

The year of the World.	92	The sixth Age of the World.	The Julian period.	The year before Christ.
		The captains and companies, which upon the first taking of the city, fled away by night, [2 Reg. 25. 4. Jer. 52. 7.] and were scattered over the country, and all the Jews, which had fled to the Moabites and Ammonites, and other nations adjoining, returned after a while, to Gedalia, into their own country, where they gate good provision of Wine and Oyl, and other summer fruits to subsist withall, [Jer. 40. 7. 12. 2 Reg. 25. 23. 24.]
		Ismael, the son of Nethania, of the race of the kings of Juda, being suborned by Baalis king of the Ammonites to kill Gedalia, came to him with ten resolute fellows to Mizpa, and were familiarly entertained by him, and he gave no credit to such as disclosed their treacherous intent unto him, which turned to his own destruction, [Jerem. 40. 13. 16.]
3417.	a.	In the 7 month, therefore Ismael with his ten companions, taking their opportunity, wickedly murdered Gedalia, and such Chaldeans and men of arms, as at that time he had about him at Mizpa, [Jer. 41. 1, 2, 3. 2 Reg. 25. 25.] In remembrance whereof, the Jews keep a fast unto this time, upon the third day of this month Tizri . And a day or two after, the same Ismael slew 80 men more, which clad in mourning apparel, brought offerings and frankincense from Sichein, Shilo, and Samaria to the house of the Lord, now lying in her own dust, and these, having drawn them by a sleight to Mizpa, they slew there in the open streets, and threw their carcases into king Aza his well, [Jer. 41. 4. 9.]
		As Ismael returned with the kings daughters, and the rest of the people which was left at Mizpa, his prisoners, to the king of Ammon, Johanan the son of Kareac, met him with a band of men; took away from him all his prisoners, and set them at liberty, and Ismael, with eight men onely in his company, fled to the Ammonites, [Jerem. 41. 10, 15.]
		Johanan, and all his captains, with the rest of the people remaining about Bethlehem, for fear of the Chaldeans, had a purpose to flee into Egypt, [Jerem. 41. 16, 17, 18.] But went many of them to Jeremy, desiring an answer by him from God thereupon, and he from God, after ten dayes, brought them an answer, exhorting them all in his name, not to stir out of their own country: assuring them, if they stayed, of Gods protection there, and that no harme should befall them from the Babylonians; but if they went into Egypt, they should there, every man of them perish by sword, by famine, by sundry kinds of death. But the common sort, according to their old custom, of never obeying wholesome counsel, nor Gods commands, went into Egypt; and because needs they would have it so, Jeremy and Baruc the son of Neria, went thither with them; and when they were come as far as Taphnes, Jeremy there, declared to them in a figure, the destruction of Egypt, even by Nebuchadnezzar, of whom they were now so much afraid, [Jer. 42. and 43. with Severus Sulpicius, in his Sacred History , lib. 2.]
b.		In the 12 year of the carrying away of Jeconia, the 5 day of the 10 month, (our 25 Jan. being Wednesday) when tidings came to Ezekiel of the taking of Jerusalem, the prophet foretold of the utter destruction, which should befall the last remainder of the Israelites, (after those others which went into Egypt) even to those which remained in their desolate country, [Ezek. 32. 1, 16.]
		In the same 12 year, in the first day of the 12 month, (March 22. being Wednesday) Ezekiel uttered his prophecy, concerning the grievous plague and affliction, which Nebuchadnezzar should bring upon the land Egypt, [Ezek. 33. 1, 16.]
		And upon the 15 day, the same prophet foretold, of Pharaoh, and all the tag and rag of Egypt, that they should be brought down as low as hell, with the rest of the uncircumcised nations, [Ezek. 32. 17, 32.]
		Jeremy also prophesied of the destruction, which should follow the Israelites, at Migdol, not far from the red sea, [Exod. 14. 2.] at Taphnes, at Daphne-Pelufium, at Noph; at Memphis, and in Pathros, a country in Egypt; and for a sure sign of their own misery, gave them Pharaoh, at Apries, king of Egypt himself, whom they should see brought to all extremities before their eyes, [Jer. 44. 1. 30.]
		Obadiah the prophet uttered a prophecy against Edom, which shamefully insulted over the calamity of the Jews, when Jerusalem was destroyed, and the like did Jeremy, [49. 7. and Ezek. 25. 12.] and the authors of the Psalms, [79. and 137.] which wrote all about the same time.
3418.		Cyrus, when he had lived 12 years, or somewhat more with his father in Persia, being sent for, with his mother Mandane, by his grandfather Astyages, came into Media, [Xenophon, lib. 1. of the Expeditio , of Cyrus.]	4218.	586.
4419.		Tyrus (Ithobalus then reigning there) was besieged 13 years by Nebuchadnezzar; as Josephus reports out of Philostratus and other writers of the affairs of Phoenicia: [Antiq. lib. 10. cap. 11. & lib. 1. cont. Apion.] And in the compass of those 13 years, it seemeth that the neighbouring nations, as the Moabites, the Ammonites, and Edomites, were all subdued by Nebuchadnezzar, according to the foretellings of the prophet, [Jeremy in his 27, 48, 49. chapters, and of Ezek. cap. 25.]	4219.	544.
		Whiles

The year of the World.	The Babylonian Empire.	93	The Julian period.	The year before Christ.
3420.	Whiles Nebuchadnezzar lay before Tyre, which borders upon the land of Israel, [Isa. 19. 29.] in the 23 of his reign, Nebuzaradan, captain of his guard, carried away all the remainder of the Jews and Israelites together unto Babylon; to the number of 745 persons, [Jerem. 52. 30.] In which extreme depopulation, which left the very ground, until the 390 years of the iniquity of Israel, distinct from Juda; and the 40 years of the iniquity of Juda by itself, foretold by [Ezekiel 4. 5, 6] were accomplished; and fully ended.	4219.	584.
3421.	When Cyrus was now almost 16 years of age, Evil-merodach, the king of Assyria his son, being about to marry a wife, called Nicotris, made an inroad, with a great army of horse and foot, upon the borders of Media, there to take his pleasure, in hunting and harrowing of the country: against whom Astyages, and Cyaxares his son, and Cyrus his grandchild; who then first began to bear arms, marched out, met with him, and in a battail of horse, overthrew him, and drove him out of his borders, [Xenophon lib. 1. of the Expeditio of Cyrus.]
	Cyrus afterward, was called home, by his father Cambyfes; when as yet he had one year to spend at Schoole, as Xenophon in the same book tells us, to which also that hath reference, which Athenæus, in his 14 book Dipsopoli , reports out of Dion; that Cyrus, when he had served Astyages, first, as one of his halbardiers, and then as one of his armoured bearers returned into Persia, and that at the same time Angares a musician, when Astyages feasted his friends, sang them a song, wherein he said, That a fierce wild beast, more fierce than any bear; was let go, and sent into a fenny country, and that he should reign over all those provinces, and should with a handful of men, maintain war against great armies, &c. and that thereupon, Astyages would have called back Cyrus again, but could not get him.
3422.	Cyrus, when he had spent 17 years among boyes, spent ten years more among the youths, [Xenophon lib. 1. of the Expeditio , of Cyrus.]	4132.	582.
3424.	In the 50 Olympiade, wherein Epitides, the Lacedemonian, wan the race in running , certain men out of Cnidos, not Rhodes, and brooking the rough carriage, of the kings of Asia, agreed together, to make a plantation of themselves, some where else: and making one Pentathlus a Cnidian, (who deduced his pedigree from Hippotas, the son of Hercules,) they went for Sicily, at the time, when they of Egesta, and Selinuntæ, were in war each against the other: where Pentathlus taking part with the Selinuntians, was slain; and the rest, making Gorgasus and Thestor, and Epithidis, all men of Pentathlus his lineage and kindred, their captains, set sail again, and seated themselves in the Isle of Lipara, [Diodor. Sic. lib. 5.]	4134.	574.
3429.	Arcefilas, when he had reigned 16 years, in Cyrenaica, left to succeed him his son Batus, (named Eudammon; unto whom a huge multitude of Grecians, advised thero by the Oracle at Delphos, repaired; waited first the lands of the bordering Lybians, and then parted it among themselves: whereas before, the plantation made in Cyrene consisted onely of those, which came from the Isle of Thera, with their first founder Batus, [Hærod. lib. 4. cap. 159.]	4139.	574.
3430.	In the 25 year of the captivity of Jeconia, in the beginning of that year, (i. e.) in the first month thereof (as Jonathan the Chalde Paraphrast expoundeth it) upon the 10 day of the month (our April 30. upon a Tuesday) 14 years after the destruction of Jerusalem, Ezekiel had a vision, of the restitution of the Temple, City, and Kingdom of the Israelites; porcending the restauration of the Church by Christ, with the greatness, honour, and excellence thereof, [Ezekiel 40. 1. to the end of the chapter.]
	The Lybians, being put out of their lands and country, by the inhabitants of Cyrenaica, put themselves under the protection of Apries king of Egypt: and he gathering a great army together, sent them against the Cyrenians, and the Cyrenians, pitching at a place called Irala, near the fountain called Thelitis, to rout the army of the Egyptians, that few of them were left to return again into Egypt, whereupon the Egyptians grew angry with Apries, and revolted from him; supposing that he purposely sent them to that break-neck service, to be rid of them, that so he might the more easily, dominion over the rest that were left, [Hærod. lib. 4. cap. 159. lib. 2. 161. Diodor. Sic. lib. 1.]
3431.	Amasis, (being that Saitis, so much spoken of by Platon in his Timæus) was sent by his father to appease this mutiny of the people; but they took and made him king, in his fathers stead. And Apries, having sent a noble person, named Patachbanes to call back Amasis, at his return, cut off his nose and ears, because he brought him not with him. Upon which unworthy act of his, all fell off from him to Amasis his side, [Hærod. lib. 2. cap. 162.]	4141.	573.
3432.	Tyre at last was given up to Nebuchadnezzar, for that it was not taken by force, and given up to be ransacked by the Souldiers, appears by [Ezek. 29. 18, 19.] but rather rendered upon conditions. And therefore for king Ithobalus, (יְחֹבָאֵל) he appointed one Baal (בַּאֵל) a man of the same country, to be a petty king there, who	4142.	572.

		who governed them 10 years, as Iosephus affirms out of the Annals of the Phenicians, lib. 1. contra Apion. In the 1 day of the 1. month of the 27 year of the captivity of Jeconia, (21 of April, upon the day with us,) God promised to give all Egypt to be Nebuchadnezzar to be spoiled; in recompence of his long labour; endured in the taking in of Tyrus, [Ezech. 29. 17, 20.] Cyrus having now attained almost the full age of 27 years, was taken out of the rank of the striplings, and reckoned among the number of full men, according to the discipline, and use of the Persians, [Xenophon, l. 1. of the Institution of Cyrus.] Nebuchadnezzar laying hold of the rebellion in Egypt, and peradventure solicited by Amasis to assist him against his Father Apries, invaded Egypt with his army; and having gotten it into his hands, even from Syene, to the end thereof: made havock as well of the Egyptians, as of the Jewes which dwelt among them, killing fowles, and leading away the rest into captivity, according to the several prophecies of Jeremiah, [43. 44, 46. and Ezech. 29. 20, 31.] Pharaoh Hophra, al. Apries, being forced to retire into the Country of Thebais; Nebuchadnezzar, as it should seeme, made Amasis his Viceroy, over all Egypt, though Herodotus knew not this: for as Scaliger well observeth in his notes, Ad Fragmenta Th. Priests of Egypt, which informed him, of such thing, as he desired to be satisfied in, told him so much only as made for the honour of their Nation, but concealed the rest, which bewrayed their cowardise and slavery, and payment of tribute to the Chaldeans. Nebuchadnezzar, having finished his conquests, returned to Babylon: and there, as he lay at ease, and in all kind of jollity in his own house, had that remarkable dreame, of the great Tree, (whose destiny was to be cut down) represented to him, the meaning whereof, when he could not learn by his wizards of Chaldaea, the Prophet Daniel unfolded to him, [Dan. 4.] Nebuchadnezzar new built Babylon, in a wonderfull magnificence and beauty; building a whole new City without the old, and enclosing all, with a treble wall, made of brick: and in favour of his wife called Amyrris, (of whom I spake in the year of the world, 3374) a woman of Media, and King Attyages his daughter, made that famous and so much renowned garden, borne upon pillars: of which Berolus; He built (saith he) that garden, called the hanging Garden, because his wife desired the pleasure of the hills, as having been brought up in Media: And Q. Curtius; It is said (saith he) that a King of Syria, reigning in Babylon, built this great work at the importunity of his wife, whom he dearly loved; and who out of a desire she had to enjoy the pleasure of hills and woods, in that low country of Babylon, let her husband upon it, to imitate the genius or spirit of Nature in itself, by the amenity and pleasantness of this work. But who so will know more of the infinite magnificence, and sumptuousness of this work, must read the Fragments which are left, of Berolus and Abydenus, the former of which, blames the Greek writers, who attribute this work to Semycamis, whereas indeed, this, and those other vast and magnificent structures, were the proper work of this Nebuchadnezzar; as Iosephus, in his first Book contra Apion, reports out of him. And the later saies plainly that those vast walls, with the brazen gates thereof, reckoned among the miracles of the world, and which remained to the times of Alexander the great, were built by this Nebuchadnezzar, as we find in Eusebius, in his monib. book De Evangelica Preparat. And Clitarchus, and others, which attended Alexander in that voyage, say that the compass of that wall, was 365 furlongs, according to the number of the dayes of the year, [Diod. Sic. l. 1.] and that every furlong length thereof, was built and perfected in one day, as Q. Curtius, lib. 5. c. 4. reports. Twelve whole months were no sooner past, but Nebuchadnezzar, growing proud, and boasting of the magnificence of his buildings, fell disdraught of his wisdom being put from his house and home, spent seven years in the woods and fields among beasts, [Daniel 4. 32, 33.] Apries, gathering an army out of Ionia and Caria, to the number of thirty thousand soldiers, to assist him for their hire, fought with his son Amasis, at Memphis: but being routed and taken prisoner, was kept for a while in the City of Says: and not long after strangled, according to the prophetic of [Jer. 44. 30. and reported by Herod. lib. 2. c. 162. and 169, and by Diod. Sic. lib. 1.] After his death Amasis reigned 44 years, as Herod. reporteth, lib. 3. c. 10. but, which the Priests would not be known of to Herodotus, paid tribute all that while to the King of Babylon. Was the 8 year of Jubile. Nebuchadnezzar at the end of 7 years, after his humble acknowledgment of the power of God, was restored both to his right wits and kingdom also, and thereupon publicly proclaimed Gods great grace and mercy shewed upon himself, and his power over all Nations, [Dan. 4.] And having himself foretold concerning the taking of Babylon by Cyrus as Abydenus (quoted by Euseb. l. 9. Prepar. Evang. c. ult.) reports out of the relation of the Chaldeans, departed

Apion.] Abdorus (אבדור) the High Priest judged the Tyrians 3 moneths: and after him, Micytous and Geresstratus (מיקטוס וגרסטראטוס) governed them 6 years, [ib.] To Cressus living at Sardes refoled all the wise and learned men of Greece; and among them, Solon the law-maker: who had with him that so much renowned conference of the uncertainty of manslife, and of all humane felicity therein, [Herod. lib. 2. from the 28 chapter to the 32.] There is extant a short Epistle of Solon to Cressus, in the end of Solons life, in Laertius; wherein he saies, that he was sent for by Cressus, what time Plistreus governed in Athens. Cressus a Phrygian borne, that famous composer of Fables, was at the same time sent for by Cressus, to come to him at Sardes; and was held in great esteem by him: And he condoling with Solon in a letter for that he was uncivily turned away by Cressus, only for the freedom of speech, which he had used to him; and telling him withal, that Kings must have, δυστυχία, καὶ ἀντιπρῶτος (i.) either very few, or very pleasing words used unto them; wrote back in answer thereto, That Kings must have, καὶ εὐτυχία, καὶ ἀντιπρῶτος (i.) either very few, or very honest things spoken to them. [Plutarch in the life of Solon.] Elope going from Sardes to Delphos, was there most unjustly sentenced to die; and accordingly was thrown down the rock there, called Phœdras, about the 54 olympiade, as Strabo; to wit, toward the end of the 4 year of that olympiade; if the precedent time be rightly calculated. Thereveng of which foule murder, so often threatened by the Oracle ere, was taken afterward by Judmon, grandchild to that Judmon of the Isle of Samos; whole slave; together with Rhodope of Thracia, that famous Trumpeter, Elope sometime had been, [Herod. lib. 2. ca. 134.] Solon, leaving Cressus, went into Cilicia; and there built a city, and from his own name, called it Solos: wherein he planted certain Athenians, who in process of time, having corrupted the native language, were said Σολωνιστæ (i.) to commit to themselves in their speech; as Laertius in his life reporteth: which yet is more properly said of the Solis in Cyprus, than of the Solonides in Cilicia; as Solon in his elegies written to Philonyptus the King, recorded by Plutarch, in the life of Solon, shewes: where Plutarch also tells us, that this petty king of Cyprus, who made use of Solons wit and counsel, in some affairs of his own; removed a little town formerly called Epita, into a lower ground more fit and useful for habitation, and in honour of Solon, called it Solos. After Solons departure, Cressus, who deemed himself the happiest man alive; found by sad experience, that all Solon had told him, of the instability of mans life, and felicity thereof, to be too true: for presently after he had a dreame, wherein he saw his son Arys thrust thorough with a Spear: a true token of a violent death, which was effectuon to befall him; which whiles he fought by all care and diligence to prevent, and was now buisic about a marriage for him, one Adrastus a Phrygian borne, and of the Kings blood there, who having slain his own brother against his will, was by his father Midas, the son of Gordius, (not that old Midas, the son of Gordias King of Phrygia, whose Epitaph made by Homer and set upon his tombe; Herodotus in the life of Homer recounteth) banished, and came to Sardes, there to receive his expiation from Cressus his hand: Cressus having expiated or cleansed him, committed to him over and above, the care and charge of his son Arys; who at that time, was sent unto by the Mylians, and requested to come and help to kill a boar of a vast bigness, which wasted the corn and other country commodities growing about the hill Olympus, not without the destruction, many times, of the husbandmen themselves. Where Adrastus aiming at the boar with the point of his Spear, goared Arys, and so against his will slew him. But when Cressus had pardoned him the fact as done unawares, he flew himself upon the tombe of the deceased. Cressus having thus lost his son; passed two whole years in continual duell, and mourning for him: from which yet he was forced in the end to rouse himself, for fear of Cyrus, his growing then into power; and by whom indeed, he was afterward depolled of all, [Herod. lib. 1. from the 34. chapter to the 46.] whereof also you may see, what

3444.	c.	Evil-merodach King of Babylon, a man odious for his vicious life, had many attempts made upon him: and at last, was murdered by Neriglissor his sisters husband, when he had reigned little more than two years: as Berosus tells us, [lib. 3. of the Chaldean affairs. cited by Josephus lib. 1. contra Apion:] and because we read that Jeconia King of Juda, had a daily stipend and allowance made him for his diet and entertainment by him, ad diem mortis sue, omnibus diebus vite sue (i. e. to the day of his death, all the days of his life), [Jer. 52. 34. 2 Reg. 25. 30.] therefore it is most probable, that Jeconia himself died also much about the time that Evil-merodach died.
	a.	After Evil-merodach, came he that murdered him, Neriglissor (נרְגִלְסֹר) and reigned 4 years, [Berosus lib. 1.]
		In the kingdom also of Media, upon the decease of Astyages, [Tob. 14. 17.] called Astiurus, succeeded his son Cyaxares, Cyrus his mothers brother: as Xenophon says, [lib. 1. of the Institution of Cyrus: to wit, in the beginning of the first year of the 55 Olympiad 31 years before the decease of Cyrus: which Cyaxares, Daniel calleth Darius the Mede , son of Astiurus.	4755.	559.
3445.		The King of Babylon, not only raised his own subjects, but also solicited Cræsus the King of Lydia with the Cappadocians, both forces of Phrygians, Carians Paphlagonians, and Cilicians, on the West: and the very Indians on the East side of him, to join with him in arms against the Medes and Persians: telling them, that they were two great Nations, and now link together by mutual affinity, and would, if not look unto, and opposed in time, over-run, and bring in subjection all countries far and near. Whereupon Cyrus was by his father Cambyles, and the council of the kingdoms made General of the Persian army, and sent away into Media with 30000. soldiers, and one thousand Commanders, all of equal authority under him: as Xenophon, [in his 1 book of the Institution of Cyrus says:] and there, when he came, was he also made by his Uncle Cyaxares, who had sent for him, General of the Median Forces, and the management of the war against the Babylonians, wholly committed unto him. And from this time are the 30 years of his reign or principality reckoned, toward the end of the 1 year of the 55 Olympiad, from which period Julius Africanus in the third book of his Annals, out of Diodor, Sic. Thallus, Censor, Polybius, Phlegon, and other Chronologers, counts the beginning of Cyrus his reign, and is to that purpose quoted and justified by Eusebius, [in his 10 book de Preparat. Evangelicæ.]
		At the same time to wit, in the Spring-Season in the close of the same year of the same Olympiad, Solon, taking leave of Philocyrrus the King, and of his Solians, thought to return to Athens: as we find by his elegies, mentioned as before in Plutarch; but being furnished with a sickness, he there took leave of them, and of all the world besides: and died in Cyprus, being fourscore years of age: as Laërtius writeth, in the year when Hegelstratus was Archon or President of Athens, in the second year of Pisistratus his domination there: as Plutarch relates out of Phanias the Ephesian.
3446.	b.	In the 30 year after the desolation of Jerusalem, the unknown author of the 4 book of Esdras, faines himself to have had that conference with the Angel Uriel: which is there let down [Esdras 3. 1. and ca. 4. 1.] at what time Salathiel was Captain, or chief of the people, [cap. 5. 16.] because Jeconia was then dead.
		Cræsus, preparing now against Cyrus, sent great presents to Delphos, and consulted the Oracle there concerning the issue of this war, 3 years before the taking of Sardes, [Herod. lib. 1. ca. 53. 54. 55. 91.]	457.	557.
3447.		The King of Armenia, perceiving the Babylonian to make preparations against Cyaxares, would neither send him aid, nor pay him tribute any longer: contrary to agreement made, what time Astyages or Cyaxares had overcome and had him in his power. Whereupon Cyaxares, under colour of a hunting voyage, fell into Armenia, where overcoming both him and his son Tigranes in a battle, he reduced them again to his subjection: he also possessed himself of the mountains, which lie between Armenia and Chaldaea: and there building a strong Fort, made peace upon certain conditions, between the two nations, [Xeno. lib. 3. de Instit. Cyri.]
3448.		Cyaxares and Cyrus, march against the Babylonian King and Cræsus, and the rest of the confederates, and gain a main victory against them; the King of Babylon fell in the battle: Cræsus, with those which were left, brake up his camp by night, and fled. Cyrus having made a league and amity with the Hircanians, who had fallen over to him from the Babylonians, using their help, and guidance in the way, pursued the enemy that was fled; overtook them, fought again with them, and again overthrew them; Cræsus fled; withdrew his women by night, by reason of the heat by day, withdrew out of his camp, with all his horse. The Hircanians fell upon the companies of the Cappadocians and Arabians, and slew both their Kings. Cyrus, sparing the lives of such as either were taken by force, or had yielded to mercy, divided the Spoile of the field among his soldiers, [Herod. lib. 3. and 4.]	458.	557.
		Labro-

The year of the World.	The Babylonian Empire.	97	The Julian period.	The year before Christ.
	Laborofoarchodus (לְבוֹר־רֹחַדִּי) (son of Neriglissor, a man far riper in wickedness than in age succeeded him in the kingdom of Babylon, and reigned 9 months, [Herod. lib. 1.]) Baltoratus (בַּלְטֹר) reigned in Tyre, among other Judges one year, [Phanici. Annal.]
	Gobrias, (whose onely son, that new king of Babylon, in his fathers life time, had in a hunting march, villainously slain,) with his friends, revolted to Cyrus, [Xen. 4. 4.]
	And now came Cyrus to invade the country of Babylon it self, and appeared before the walls of the city, and there challenged the new king, to a duell, or single combat. Gadatas, a noble man, and one, whom this new king had got, upon a jealousy he had with his wife, fell over to Cyrus, and Cyrus, when the Babylonians in revenge thereof, killed out and spoiled his lands, let upon them, and routed them; But the Cadusii, whom Cyrus had appointed to bring up the rear of his army, making an on-let unawares of Cyrus, upon a country lying near the city, were cut by the king of Babylon; who issued out upon them: and Cyrus having first revenged the death of these his men; came to agreement with the king, to hold truce with the Paissants or Plowmen on both sides, and the war to go on between the Soldiers only. And then, passing beyond the city, took in three forts of theirs, then returned to the confines of Assyria and Media, from whence he set forth upon this journey. And thither, upon his invitation, came his Uncle Cyaxares unto him; and was there by him honorably received and entertained in the pavilion of the king of Assyria that was, to wit, Neriglissor, and the winter approaching, they there entered into a consultation, for things necessary to maintain the siege, if need should be, [Xenophon lib. 5. & 6. in the beginning thereof.]
3449.	After Laborofoarchodus, Nebuchadnezzars grandchild by his daughter, who was made away by his subjects, for that excess of villany, which appeared in his actions, succeeded the grandchild of the same Nebuchadnezzar, by his son Evil-merodach, called by Berosus (בְּרִי־נְבוֹ) Nabonidus, but by Herodotus, Labynius (לְבוֹ־נִי) by Abydenus Mabanidochus, and by the prophet Daniel, Belshazzar, al. Belshazzar , who reigned 17 years, as Berosus in his third book of his Chaldee History, and Ptolemy in Cat. Reg. tells us.	4159.	555.
	In the first year of this kings reign, Daniel had the vision shewen him of the 4 beasts, signifying the 4 monarchies of the world, and of God, delivering over all power and sovereignty to the son of man, [Dan. 7. 1.] Baltoratus, the petty King of Tyre deceasing, one Merbolus (מֶרְבֹּלוֹס) was sent for from Babylon, and reigned there 4 years, [Phanici. Annal.]
3451.	In the 3 year of Belshazzar, the vision of the Ram and Goat, foreshewing the destruction of the Persian Monarchy by Alexander, and the great misery which Antiochus should bring upon the people of God, was shewed to Daniel, living then at Sula, in the province of Elam, upon the bank of the river Ulai, [Dan. 8. 1. 2.] which river Environes the Castle of Sula, and parts the provinces of Sula and Elimas, (i. e. the Shuthanchians from the Elamites, as the inhabitants of those two provinces are distinguished by [Ezra 4. 9.] and as Plinie lib 6. c. 27. teacheth us, from whence we learn, that at this time the province of Sula was not in the hands of the Medes or Persians, but of the Babylonians, under whom Daniel then lived, as I noted before in the year of the world, 3405.	4161.	553.
	Now Berosus tells us, [in his third book of his Chaldee History, quoted by Josephus, lib. 1. c. 1. cont. Apion,] that those walls about the river of the city of Babylon (which were begun by Nebuchadnezzar) were fully finished with brick, laid with a kind of lime, or liquid brimstone. For his mother Nicotris, a witty woman, foreseeing a storm ready to fall upon Babylon from the Medes: to hinder them in their passing the river by boats into Babylon, turn'd the river Euphrates, which of it self ran straight along, with a swift current, and drawing it through many winding channels, which she had cut for that purpose, made it withal to run more slowly than formerly it did; and then raised a huge damme upon each side of the river, and up the river from the city ward, digged a vast pond, into which the turned the river, so that the left the old channel of the river dry, which done, she then fell to work, and fenced the banks of the city within, with her brick walls, and the water-gates thereof, answerable in every point to the walls, which were made on the farther side of the channel, round about the city, the built also a bridge of stone in the midst of the city, and having all done, then the turn'd the river out of the pond, into his right channel again, [Herod. lib. 1. cap. 185. 186. 188.] The magnificence of which stone-bridge (which joyned to the kings houses, that stood on each side the river) Philostratus, in the life of Apollonius, (lib. 1. cap. 18.) describing, saith, that it was built by a Queen; that came out of Media; whence we gather, that as Nebuchadnezzar himself took Amyitis himself, likewise his son, Evil-merodach took to wife this Nicotris out of Media.
3453.	Merbalus deceasing, the king of Babylon sent one Hirom (חִירוֹם) Merbalus his brother in his place; who reigned there 20 years, [Phanici. Annal.]	4163.	551.

Crcfus, being made General of the confederate army of the Babylonians; and others; passed the river Halys, which parted the dominions of Media and Lydia, without a bridge, by the skill, and industry of Thales the Milesian Philosopher, and came into Cappadocia: and there took the City of Perria; and all the Cities thereabout, utterly destroying the Syrians, who had deserved no ill at his hand: for that the Cappadocians were called Syrians by the Grecians, is testified by Herodotus, [lib. 1. c. 72.] Cyrus, having first sent to the Ionians, to feel their pulse; and to try whether he could draw them over from Crcfus or no, fought a pitched battle with Crcfus, and it fell out to be a drawn battle between them; But the next day Crcfus, because Cyrus came not on upon him, returned to Sardes; where he meant to hang up his sword for that winter, and the beginning of the next spring, to march against the Persian again. In the mean while, he sent all his Auxiliaries to their own homes; and employed Embassadors to such as were in league and friendship with him, among whom were the Lacedemonians; giving order to all, to come to the Rendezvous at Sardes, upon the fifth month after: But when Crcfus had thus sent away, and scattered his army, then fell Cyrus upon him with all his forces; upon which suddain and unexpected approach of his; Crcfus, though much troubled, yet he went forth to fight with him, with such of his Lydians as he had about him, trusting principally in his troops of horse. Cyrus to cross him in that designe, placed his camels in front against them; the very smell of which beast, a horse cannot endure; and therefore all the horse of Crcfus presently turned taile, and carried their riders away with them; But the Lydians left their horses, and ranged themselves in battalions on foot: yet at last, many being slain on either side, they brook them to their heels: But the Persians pursuing the point of this their victory, followed them to Sardes; which after 14 days lying before it, they took. Crcfus was condemned to the fire, but coming to the place of execution, and there crying out, O Solon, Solon, (whose wife counsell), concerning the instability of humane condition he had formerly to much despised) Cyrus thereupon not only spared his life; but took him also into his privie councill, Cyrus took care then of the funerals of Abradates the king of Sufa (who having fallen off from the king of Babylon to him, was slain in the battle) and of Panthea his Queen, who seeing her husband lying dead, flew her self over his dead body: and made them a huge and sumptuous monument, Herod. lib. 1. from the 75. cap. to the 90. with Xen. Infr. lib. 7. The collections out of Diod. Sic. by Hen. Valf. p. 241. Plut. in the life of Solon. Polyan. in his firstag. lib. 7. in Cyrus and Crcfus: and Solinus in Polybist. lib. 1. where he saith that Cyrus made his entry into Sardes, in the 28 Olympiade, to wit, in the 1 year thereof, as Eusebius hath it in Chron.

Crcfus, sending his shackles for a present to Delphos, complained all in vain, that he had been cheated by the Oracle there, [Herod. lib. 1. c. 90. 91.] When the men of Ionia and Iolia, would fain have submitted to Cyrus, upon the same conditions, that they had formerly lived in under Crcfus, Cyrus refused them; granting that only to the milesians, who seeing what mightfall, had formerly made their peace with him, [Herod. lib. c. 141. 142. 169.] The rest of the Greek Nations, fortifying each of them their own Cities, sent Phermion of Phoea, with other Embassadors, to the Lacedemonians, to crave aide of them: which though they refused to send, yet they sent their Embassadour Lachrines to Cyrus, to forewarn him not to touch any of the Greeks in Asia; and he sent them word again, that he would shortly make them leave off caring for the Ionians, and the rest of the Greeks in Asia, and look to themselves at home, [Ibid. cap. 141. c. 152. 153.]

Thales the Milesian, gave them all advice to hold a Common Council at Teos, which was a City, seated in the very heart of Ionia, [Herod. lib. cap. 170.] whilst Cyrus remained at Sardes, and there made his provision of Ramms and other Instruments of battery, purposing to raze the walls of all that stood out against him, the Carions sent and craved his help to compose a war which was grown among themselves. He sent thither Adusius, a Persian, with an army, in which service, the Cilicians and Cyprians very willingly followed him. Adusius put an end to their difference, yet so, as he left sufficient garrisons of his own, in the Cities of either party, [Xenoph. lib. 7. Infr.]

In the 58 Olympiade, toward the end of the 1 year thereof, Thales the Milesian Philosopher, died, as Laertius reports out of Soficrates, and Anaximander his countryman first observed the Loxodromic, or biasing motions of the stars, in the Zodiac, as Pliny, out of other authors saies, [lib. 1. cap. 8.] though Plutarch in his 2 book, de Placitis Philoprophorum, hath more rightly informed us that that point of Astronomy was not unknown to Thales the Milesian, Anaximanders master: And that he himself, in the 2 year of this Olympiade, at the age of 64 years, died, Laertius tells us, out of the Chronicle of Apollodorus the Athenian, of whose Mathematical inventions, he further addeth out of Phavorinus, that he first invented the making of the Dial, and let it up in Sparta, in a place, fit to receive the shadow of the sun; as, saith he, Phavorinus reporteth in his Varia Historiae adding further, that he also invented the Horoscope; for the finding out the equinoctials and Solstices for the Dials: to find out the hour of the day by; is one thing, and the Horoscope, or instrument whereby to observe the Equinoctials, and the Tropicks, or the summer and winter solstice, is another: though Pliny attributes the invention of the Dial and Clock to Anaximenes his scholar, and fellow citizen, [lib. 2. ca. 70.] in these words; This rule and reason of shadows, which we use to call Cosmical, or Dial-work, was first found out by Anaximenes; Anaximanders scholar; and he was the first that set up a Scithriscum, (i. a Dial to shew what a clock is in sparta: v. d. sup. in the year of the World, 3291.

Anaximenes the son of Eurytraus succeeded Anaximander in his school at Miletus; as Clemens [Alexander, in his a book of his Stromata,] shewes; but Pythagoras, when both his masters, Anaximander and Anaximenes were dead, went into Egypt; as Thales had advised him to do: being commended to Amasis King of Egypt, by a letter from Polycrates of Samos, as Laertius in his life reporteth: which Amasis, it seemeth, the Egyptians (surnamed Sommesfortene, For that in his reign, Pythagoras came into Egypt; Pliny in his 36, book, cap. 9, sheweth: and there he continued 22 years, conversing with the Priests, and from them it was that he learned his skill and knowledge in Astronomy and Geometry; and was cataphied or initiated in all their rites and ceremonies, as saith [Iamblicus, in the life of Pythagoras; ca. 3. and 4.] for therefore also, was he circumscribed, that being admitted into the secrets of their religions, he might the more freely partake of the mystical philosophy of the Egyptians: in the attaining whereof, he was principally beholding to one Sonchides, the Arch-prophet among them, [Idem, Alexan. lib. 1. Strom.] This Sonchides, I take to be him of Saïs, with whom Solon had formerly much conversed, as Plutarch in his life reporteth. And from them it was that Pythagoras learned his Metempsychosis, or transmigration of souls out of one body into another, as Diodor. Sic. reporteth: and being used to their books, and diving into their writings, concerning former times, he thence pickt out the observations of unnumerable by pastages, saith, [Valer. Max. lib. 8. c. 7.]

Hyltales and Adusius, joining together, conquered all Phrygia bordering upon the Hellespont; and took the King thereof, and brought him prisoner to Cyrus, [Xenoph. Infr. lib. 7.]

Cyrus committing Sardes to the keeping of Tabalus a Persian borne, and delivering the treasure of Crcfus, and the rest of the Lydians to Pactyas a Lydian borne, returned towards Ecbatan, and took Crcfus along with him, little regarding how matters went in Ionia: but no sooner was Cyrus gone from Sardes, but Pactyas forthwith periwaded the Lydians to revolt from Cyrus, and from Tabolo, the Governour there; and laying out the Kings treasure, to hire souldiers from other parts, drave Tabolo into the Castle and there beleiged him very straitly: whereof when Cyrus was advertised upon the way; by the advice of Crcfus, he sent back Mazares a Median, with a part of his army; who disarming the Lydians, brought them to follow a more idle counte of life, [Herod. lib. 1. from the 153. to the 157. chap.] and so a Nation formerly famous for laboriousness, power, and chivalry, falling into effeminacy and luxury, lost their courage, and all kind of virtue, as saith [Iust. out of Trogus, lib. 1. ca. 7.]

Mazares redeemed Pactyas of the Cumaeans, unto whom he was fled out of the Castle. The Cumaeans consulted the Oracle at Branchis, and received from thence an answer, That they should deliver him up yet they not willing, either to give him up to be slaine by the Persians (being much diswaded therefrom by Aristodocus the son of Heracles, a man of great authority among them) or by keeping him, to draw Cyrus his displeasure upon their city to their own destruction, they sent him away late to Mitylene. And when the Mitylenians were ready to give him up, the Cumaeans again sent a Ship to Lesbos and there took him in, and conveyed him to Chios; and the Chii drew him by force out of the temple of Minerva there, and delivered him up to Mazares: and had in reward therefore Atarneum a place in Mysia, lying over against Lesbos given them, [Herod. lib. 1. from Chii, c. 157. to cha. 160.] though Plutarch looks to justify both the Mitylenians and the Chii in this point, in his book, of the malignity of Herodotus, upon this grounds, for that a more ancient Historian than he; to wit, Cronos of Lampiscus, tells the matter simply in this wise. Pactyas hearing of the approach of the Persian Army, fled first to Mitylene, and then to Chios, and there Cyrus took him.

Mazares having gotten Pactyas into his power, marched presently against those, who with him, had assaulted Tabalus: and in part subdued the inhabitants of Priene, partly wasted the country lying upon the Meander, and gave both it, and the city of Magnesia for a prey to his souldiers, [Herod. lib. 1. ca. 161.]

Harpagus, who was a chief man about Cyrus, went with his army against Ionia, and fought with them (as Eusebius in his Chron. upon the 2 year of the 59 Olympiade noteth) for Mazares dying of a disease, Harpagus (whom some erroneously call Harpalus) was made General in his place. And he coming into Ionia, fell presently to entrencing round about, and blocking up their cities where ever he came, and thereby took Pnocea, the chief city of all Ionia, [Herod. lib. 1. ca. 162.]

The Phoeaeans, abandoning the city, which they could not hold, shipt themselves, their wives and children, and put over into Chios: whence returning upon an o-wrought at last by the death of the Messias, uttering that most famous and memorable prophetic of the 70 weeks, [Dan. 9. 24. &c.]

Cyrus having spent one whole year with his wife in Babylon, gathered thither his whole army, in which there are said to have been counted, one hundred and twenty thousand horse, two thousand iron Chariots, and six hundred thousand foot Souldiers; which having furnished with all necessary provisions, he undertook that voyage; wherein he is said to have subdued all Nations, inhabiting from Syria to the red Sea, [Xenophon, Infist. lib. 8.]

Cyrus, his father Cambyfes being now dead in Persia, Cyaxares in Media, held all the Empire or Monarchie of the East in his own hand: from which year, both Xenophon, 8. Infist. reckons the 7 years of his reign, and the holy Scripture, out of the Records of the Medes and Persians, reckoneth this first year: for it teacheth us, that in this year came forth that renowned Edict of his; Thus saith Cyrus King of Persia, Into my hand hath God given all the kingdoms of the earth: in which year, the 70 years of the Babylonish captivity, (foretold by Jeremiah, and according to the prophetic of Isaiah uttered of him by name, c. 44. 28. and 45. 13.) being now expired, he gave leave to all the Jewes, dwelling wheresoever in his dominions, to return into their own country, and commanded such as did returne, to fall in hand with the re-edifying of the Temple of God; prescribing, or rather at their request, granting to them a power to build it to such a bigness; which had been far prescribed, and they (as needs they then must) observed the frame thereof had been far greater, than that of Solomons was; which, now it was not, [Haggai, 2. 3.] And he allowed the charge thereof, out of the kings treasure, and restored all the vessels of the house of God, which Nebuchadnezzar had brought from thence, [1 Chron. 36. 22, 23. Ezra, 1. 1, 2, 3, 7, and 5. 13, 14. and 6. 2, 3.]

Of the Jewes therefore which returned to Jerusalem, Cyrus made Schoasar the Captain, or his Lieutenant, and into his hands did Meritdates the Treasurer, by Cyrus his command, consigne all the vessels belonging to the Temple, to be carried to Jerusalem, [Ezra. 1. 7, 11. and 5. 14, 15.] Now that his Chalde name, or that by which he went in Court, was in Hebrew, Zerubbabel; appears out of [Ezra 3. 8, 10. compared with chap. 5. 16.]

The Jewes therefore prepare for their return into their country, the poorer sort, have allowance made them to defray their charges upon the way, [Ezra 1. 5, 6.] Now the number of the children of the province, or poor people of the Hebrews, born in Chaldea, which with their Captain Zerubbabel, the son of Shealtiel, al. Salathiel, and their high priest, Jehu, al. Jotha, the son of Josadak, returned out of that captivity, amounted to 42360, besides procluytes, man-servants, and maid-servants, to the number of 7337. [Ezra 2. 1. Nehem. 6. 67, and c. 12. 1. 9.] Now the particular sums cast up in Ezra, make only 29818. and in Nehemiah, 3103; neither of which make up the full sum of 42360. and yet either of them, in the foot of each of the catalogues, of 42360. is said to have been the number of the whole congregation, [Ezra 1. 64. and Nehem. 7. 66.] wherefore to make up the full sum of 42360, the Hebrews in their great Chron. tells us, that we must cast in those of the other tribes of Israel, which came up out of the captivity with the Jewes. For even at the last extirpation of the Jewish state, there was a remainder, of the other ten tribes, [Ait. 26. 7.] not onely of the dispersion, [James 1. 1.] and at Jerusalem, [2 Chron. 9. 3. Luke 2. 36.] and other cities of Juda, [2 Chron. 11. 16. with c. 31. 6.] but also of those, who kept still upon their old lands, for Salmanaſar swept not all away out of all the tribes, as I shewed before in the year of the world, 3227. out of the History of Josias: but he left a remnant of them, in their own country, which was afterward, together with the Jewes, and Benjamins, and Levites, carryed away by Nebuchadnezzar unto Babylon, and were now dismissed and sent back again by Cyrus. After which, as in the first year of Cyrus, now dismissed and sent back again by Cyrus. After which, as in the first year of Cyrus, all the Israelites, are said to have dwelt in their own cities, [Ezra 2. 70.] so in the sixth year of Darius, they are said to have been present, at the dedication of the Temple, and so have offered there 12 bee Goats for the sin of all Israel, [Ezra 6. 16, 17.] and when Christ preached the Gospel in Galilee, [Matthew, 14. 14.] that prophetic of Isaiah, is said to have been fulfilled of the people of Zabulon and Nephthali, who saw a great light.

The chief men of their fathers families, coming to Jerusalem, offered every man according to his ability, toward the reſtauration of the Temple, to the sum in all of 61000 drachmans of gold; and 5000 pounds of silver, and 100. Priests robes; and both priests and Levites, and the rest of the people, dwell every man in his own city, [Ezra. 2. 68, 69, 70.]

On the first day of the seventh moneth, in the feast of trumpets, the Israelites came all as one man out of their several cities to Jerusalem, and there built the altar, and every morning, and every evening offered the daily sacrifice unto God, and upon the 15 day of the same moneth, kept the feast of Tabernacles, and moreover, provided for materials and workmen toward the building of the Temple, as Cyrus had given them leave to do, [Ezra 3. 1, 7.]

In the second year after their return from Babylon, in the 2 moneth (called Jair) they appointed Levites to oversee the work of the House of God; and laid the foundation of the Temple, with the great lamentation of the old men, who 55 years before had seen the old Temple standing; but with the great rejoicing of the younger sort who saw the new one now going up, [Ezra 3. 8, 13.]

The Cutheans, the old enemies of the Jewes, who had heretofore been planted in Samaria by Elarchaddon, cunningly offered to joyn with them in the building of the Temple; but being refused, they crossed the Jewes all they could in the work, and discouraged the people from proceeding therein, [Ezra 4. 1, 4.]

This was the first sabbatical year, kept by the Jewes, after their return from the captivity of Babylon.

The Samaritans, by the means of certain Courtiers about Cyrus, whom they had bribed for that purpose, disturbed the Jewes in their work of the Temple, [Ezra 4. 5.] from whence, as it seemeth, proceeded that 3 weeks mourning of the Prophet Daniel: In which, he continued his fasting, which was begun about the 3 day of the 1 moneth, in the 3 year of Cyrus, thorough all the time of the feast of Easter, [Dan. 10. 1, 4.] after which, upon the 24 day of the 1 moneth, that vision of the Kings of Persia, of Alexander the great, and his successors, and their kingdoms was shewed and revealed unto Daniel, as he stood upon the bank of Hiddikel, or the River Tigris: all which is contained in the 1 last Chapters of Daniel: which as may be collected out of the close thereof, was the last vision that ever he had, and that but a little before his death.

Amasis, as it seemeth, fell off from Cyrus; and the people of Egypt carried away formerly by Nebuchadnezzar, after 40 years compleated there, were now sent back again, by Cyrus into their own country; and so were they restored to the old kingdom, in the later end of Amasis his dayes: a kingdom old and ancient indeed, but the meanest of all others, and of no long continuance in one stay, [Ezek. 29. 11, 16. Jer. 46. 26.] For that Cyrus had Egypt in his possession assigns, both by Xenophon, [8. Infist. Cyr.] as also in the Prologue to his whole work: and that it was afterward subdued by his son Cambyſes, all Authors agree; from whence we gather, that in the intermediate time, they enjoyed their own liberty.

But by this occasion of Amasis his revolt from Cyrus, perchance also it came to passe, that when Hirom had stood King of Tyrus full twenty years, (who was the last King mentioned by Josephus, in his Catalogue of them) he was put out, and in stead of men of their own country, such as hitherto they had been governed by, as the Egyptians had been by Amasis (for the very Punic names of those Kings, shew them all to have been of the same country) they had Governours let over them of other nations.

Cyrus being now 70 years of age, having lived from the time that he was first made General of the Median and Persian armies, full 30. years: and after the taking of Babylon, 9 years, and after his full Monarchie, 7 years, and one or two moneths over. Of the manner of his death, Authors much differ. Herod. [lib. 1. ca. 214.] Justin out of Troguſ [lib. 1. c. 8.] and Valer. Max. [lib. 9. c. 10.] say that he was slain in a fight, against the Maſſagetæ or Scythians: and that his head was severed from his shoulders by Tomyris their Queen, and by her thrown into a tub full of blood, and he bid there to satiate himself with blood, which he had so much thirsted after in his life time. Diod. Sic. lib. 2. says, that when she had taken him prisoner, she crucified him, [Ctesius lib. 11.] sayth, that in a battel against the Derbicans, a people bordering upon Hircania, being himself wounded in the thigh by a certain Indian, he slew Amorgesus their King, and his two sons; and 3 dayes after died himself. Johannes Malela of Antioch, out of a forged book, attributed to Pythagoras of Samos, says, that he was slain in a Sea-fight, against the Samians. But [Xen. Infist. lib. 8.] reports that he died his own death quietly, in his own country of Persia; adding among many other things, that he gave order to his sons, that they should wrap his body neither in gold nor silver, but in plain moulds, and bury him out of the way: yet that they should call all his friends, Persians and others to his Monument; and having there presented them with what ever was fit to be given them at the Funeral of a fortunate man, should to dismiss them: but that his tombe was made him at Patagere, is delivered by those who wrote the noble Acts of Alexander the great, as Curtius, Plutarch, Arrianus, and by Aristobulus, whom Alexander sent expressly to see it cited to this very purpose by Strabo [lib. 5.] of his Colmograpie, where he recites also this inscription found upon his tombe: O man, I am Cyrus, who founded the Persian Monarchie, and was King of Asia; and therefore envy me not that I have a Monument. As for that Greek Epitaph, upon him written, if any man will believe it, in Persian characters, reported also by the same Strabo, out of Onesicritus

Ἡμεῖς ἐσμὲν Κύριος καὶ βασιλεὺς Περσῶν,

Here Cyrus I do lie, who King of Kings was high,

It is of the same stamp with that other cited by Lucian, out of the same Onesicritus in his discourse, De Longævitâ, or of long-lived men, that Cyrus missing at last those friends of his his, which his son Cambyes had made away, when he had lived an hundred years, died for grief.

		Cyrus left his kingdom to his eldest son Cambyes, and to his younger son, Tanaoxarces, al. Tanyoxarces, whom Herodotus calls Smerdis, Justin out of Trogus calls Merdis; he left, as Ctesias saies, the signories or Commanderies, of Bactria, Choromene, Parthia and Caramania, but as Xenophon, [Isis. lib. 8.] of the Medes, Armenians, and Cadusians.
		In the entrance of the kingdom of Achaemenes (for by that name is Cambyes known in the language of the Scripture) the Samaritans, who had hitherto sought secretly to undermine the Israelites, now openly framed a direct information in writing to the king against the inhabitants of Juda and Jerusalem, [Ez. 4. 6.] for they knew very well, what difference there was between the father and the sons nature and disposition; for that Cyrus was naturally kind and loving to those that were under him, and the other furious by nature, and sudden in his resolutions, as Diad. Sic. rightly observeth of him, in his Excerpta , published by Hen. Valefius, [p. 238, 249.] with Herodotus: [4. 3. 89.]	4186, 528.

Cambaphes an Eunuch, who could do all in all with the king of Egypt, by the means of his cousin germane, Ihabat an Eunuch likewise, who could do also as much with Cambyes king of Persia, betrayed the bridges, passages and other things to the Persian, upon promise made him, that he for his pains, should have the Government of Egypt, conferred upon him, [Ctes. lib. 3. Persicorum.]
		In pursuance whereof, Cambyes gathered an army: whereof his land companies consisted, as of sundry other Nations, so among them, of Grecians, out of Ionia and Eolia in Asia; but his sea forces principally of Sidonians and Cyprians, who had freely submitted to him; Polycrates also, the king or tyrant of Samos, furnished him with 40 sail of ships, all men of war, and into them he put all such as he suspected for enemies at home, desiring Cambyes that he would spend them there; and never send them home again, [Herod. lib. 3. c. 1. 19. 44.]
		Phanes of Halicarnassus, a chief man among the aides of Egypt; and well versed in their affairs, but one that bare a hate to Amasis, seeing Cambyes preparing war against Egypt, fled over to him: and disclosed to him many secrets of the land of Egypt, and his finding Cambyes much troubled how he should passe through the deserts that lay in his way, for want of water, advised him to send to the king of Arabia, to obtain leave to pass through his country; [Id. ib. cap. 4. & 7.] for against his will, there was no passing for him, to the borders of Egypt, [Id. c. 88.]	4189, 525.
3479.		The king of Arabia, making a league with Cambyes, by the messengers that were sent unto him, sent all his camels laden with borachoes or leathern bags full of water to the places by which Cambyes with his army was to pass; and there attended his coming, [Id. ib. c. 9.]
		Cambyes coming with his army into Egypt, found Amasis newly dead, when he had reigned 44 years, [Id. ib. c. 9. & 10.] Diad. Sic. lib. 1. Biblioth. tells us, that he died, when Cambyes began his war in Egypt, in the latter end of the year of the 63 Olympiade; after whom, his son Phammutus, (whom Ctesias calleth Amyrtus) reigned 6 months, [Herod. 1. 3. c. 14.] in whose reign it rained at Thebes, which in the upper part of Egypt is taken for a great prodigie, [Id. c. 10.]
		The Persians, having passed those sandie dry deserts of Arabia, sat down upon the edge of Egypt, [Id. c. 11.]
		But Cambyes coming at last to besiege Pelusium, caused cats and dogs, and sheep, and birds called Ibides, and all kinds of living creatures, which the Egyptians worship, for gods, to be placed in the front of his army; whereat the Egyptians being troubled, for fear of hurting their own gods, forbore shooting at the enemy, and so Cambyes taking Pelusium, got an entrance into, and a footing in Egypt, [Polyenus in the 7th book of Stratag.]
		They that came to assist the Egyptians, as the Grecians and Carians, in hatred of Phaoes who had been a chief instrument in conducting this foreign army into Egypt, slew his sons, whom he had there left, before his eyes, and drinking up their blood, fell a skirmishing with him, [Her. 1. 3. c. 11.]
		After a sharpe encounter, where in many were slain on either side, the Egyptians fled; [Id. ib.]
		Cambyes, sent a Persian Herald up the river in a ship of Mitylene, to Memphis, whither the Egyptians in great disorder and confusion were fled, to exhort them to render themselves; but the men of the city sallied out upon the ship, took her, brake or burnt him, and having cut all the men in her, into gobbets, brought them into the city; and afterward endured the siege for some short time, [Id. lib. 3. c. 13.]
		Arcesilaus, son of Batus the Lame, and of Phieretima his wife; yielded up Cyrenet to Cambyes, and submitted to pay him tribute, [Id. 4. c. 16.] for they of Cyrene, and the Barcei, and the Lybians, bordering upon Egypt, terrified with his successe against their neighbours neighbours the Egyptians, rendered themselves unto him, and sent their presents to Cambyes; and Cambyes took what came from the Lybians graciously, and in good part; but those of the Cyrenians, not so, because they were so small, for they sent him onely five hundred pounds, which he took, and threw among the Souldiers, [Id. lib. 3. cap. 13. and cap. 91.]

	Ten dayes after he had taken the walls of Memphis, he had thought to try the patience of Plammenites, whom in contempt of him, he had with other Egyptians, committed to prison, in the suburbs of the city, lending his daughter with other maidens of the prime nobility of Egypt, with pitchers on their arms to the river, to fetch him water; and sending his young son, with two thousand more of the same age, and all principall noble mens sons with ropes about their necks, and bridles in their mouths, to be shameful put to death: all which was done, in revenge of those Mitylenians, whom being sent in a ship to Memphis, they had murdered the kings Judges, having fo ordered, that for every Mitylenian then slain, ten of the chief of the Egyptians should be put to death, and among them, in the first place, Plammenites his own son, whom Cambyes would have saved, but, when it was too late, But the father himself lived afterward with Cambyes, without violence, or other wrong done too his person: till at last, being convicted of flurrying up the people to a new rebellion, he drank bulls blood, and died, [Herod. lib. 3. cap. 14. 15.] though Ctesias saies, that he was sent away prisoner, to live in Sufa.
	Cambyes marching from Memphis, came with his army before the city Sais; where coming into the palace of Amasis, against whom he undertook this war, he caused his body to be haled out of his vault, and to be brought before him, and causing his carcase to be whipt with scourges, and all kind of reproach, and contumely to be used upon it, then caused it to be consumed with fire, [Herod. lib. 3. cap. 16. and Diad. Sic. in his Excerpta published by Hen. Valefius, pag. 249.] Cambyes having thus conquered Egypt, in the 5 year of his monarchy; he reigned in it 3 years, [Jul. African. and Euseb. in Chronic. Graec. pag. 17.] having slain fifty thousand of the Egyptians in fight, and sent away seven thousand of them prisoners to Sufa, [Ctes.]
	Tamblicus reporteth, that Pythagoras was among the rest then also taken and sent away to Babylon, where he converted with the Chaldeans, [Tamblic. in his Life.] and another writer of his life, namely Malchus, al. Paphyrus, saith, that at Babylon, he not onely converted with the other Chaldeans, but applied himself also to Zabratus, and that he was by him purified and cleansed from the sins of his former life. This Zabratus is thought by some, to have been that Nazareus of Assyria, whom Alexander, (Polyhistor I think) in his book of Pythagorall opinions , makes to have been Pythagoras his master, and some others mistaking the matter, judge to have been the prophet Ezekiel, as Clement of Alexandria, [lib. 1. Strom.] relateth. But this sheweth, that he did converse with the wise men of the Jews in Babylon, for that he made use of many of their opinions afterwards, in the course of his Philosophy, as Hermippus, in his first book of Pythagoras , quoted by Josephus (lib. 1. cont. Apion.) and in his first book of Law-makers , cited by Origen, (lib. 1. cont. Celsum), reporteth. And no lesse doth Aristobolus the Jew, a Peripatetic Philosopher, in his first book to Phylomator , as we find in Clement of Alex. lib. 1. Strom. and as Euseb. lib. 13. Prepar. Evangelic. affirms; and upon the same ground 1. Strom. and as Euseb. lib. 13. Prepar. Evangelic. affirms; and upon the same ground he believes, that the books of Moses were translated into Greek, before the Persian Monarchy began: whereas it is far more likely, that he got that part of his learning and knowledge, by conversing with the Jewsin Babylon; for that Pythagoras had familiarity and discourse with them also, appeareth by Porphyr in his Life, out of Diogenes, in his vicinia Othia arizon (i. e.) of the incredible relation made of Thule.
3480.	Cambyes also was about to prepare a navy, to go against the Carthaginians; but gave it off, for that the Sidonians, upon whom he was most to rely, for that kinde of service, refused to go against their own Colony and kindred: mean while, he sent for some of the Neethophagians , from the city Elephantina; who of all others in those parts, were most versed in the Ethiopian language; and sent them for so many spies, to the Ethiopians called Macrobi , because they are generally very long lived, and inhabit the lower parts of Africa, bordering upon the fourth sea; yet under colour of carrying presents to their king, and to see The Table of the Sun . The king of Ethiopia in the presence of those whether Embassadors or spies, took his bow, and bent it; and then unbent it again, and so gave it them, to carry it to Cambyes, and bad them tell him, that when his Persians should be able to bend such bows as those, he should then, and not before begin to get him an excessive great army, and come fight with the long lived Ethiopians, [Herod. lib. 3. from chap. 17. to chap. 25.]	4190, 524.
	Smerdis, al. Tanyoxarces, Cambyes his full Brother, assaying to bend this bow, came within two fingers breadth of the nock, which none other of all the Persians could do, for very envy whereof, Cambyes presently dismissed, and sent him away into Persia, [Herod. lib. 3. cap. 30.]

But as he lay at Ecbatane in Syria, the messenger brought him word, what the commandment of Patizithes was: who hearing of the conspiracy that was against him, presently leapt to horse, purposing in all haste to march with his army to Sula, against the conspirators; but as he was leaping, his sword fell out of his scabbard: and ran into his thigh. Upon the twentieth day after which accident, he sent for the Nobles of Persia to come unto him, unto whom he made known both the slaughter of his brother, and the treason of the Magi, against himself: requiring them by no means to suffer the kingdom to return to the Medes, (for the Magus was a Median born as may be gathered out of Herodotus, lib. 3, cap. 73. and cap. 126.) and soon after, [Herodotus, lib. 3, from cap. 62. to 66.] Josephus tells us that in his return out of Egypt, he dyed at Damascus, [lib. 11. Antiq. cap. 3.] putting Damascus instead of Herodotus his Ecbatane in Syria. Ctesias will have it, that he came as far as Babylon: and that there he took his wound, and died of it; writing of his death, and the foregoing signes and prefiges thereof in this manner.

When Cambyfes was offering sacrifices, and the beasts' throats were cut, there came no blood out, at which he was much amazed, and Roxane bare him a boy without a head, and that amazed him much more, and the Magi told him, that this portended, that he should leave no successor of his own blood line. His mother also appearing to him in a dream, seemed to threaten him destruction, for his brothers death, which troubled him yet more than all the rest, and that when he was come to Babylon, and there saw whirling a little stick with a knife, to spend the time, he by chance hurt there-with a muscle in his thigh, wherof he dyed the 11 day after: [Ctesias.] But at his departure out of Egypt, he left Artaxerxes to govern it, in his stead.

When Cambyfes was now dead, little thought the Persians that they had got a Magus to be their king: but that his brother indeed had succeeded him in the kingdom, especially, when Prexaspes stood to it, that he never kill'd him, nor was it in truth safe for him now to confesse that he had killed a son of Cyrus with his own hand. [Herod. l. 3. c. 66.] And the matter it self was therefore the more easy to be concealed, because among the Persians, 'twas ever held for a point of state, to have the person of the king seldom seen abroad [Justin l. 1. c. 9.] and so it came to passe, that this Magus, bearing himself for Smerdes, Cyrus's son, as being of the same name, and very like him, held the kingdom seven whole months quietly, which served to make up the 8 year of Cambyfes his reign. But during that time he spared for no cost, to shew all kind of bounty and munificence to the subjects in all parts, inasmuch, that when newes came afterward of his death, all Asia, and all nations save the Persians, much lamented for it, for the dispatching away courriers into all parts, he proclaimed three years freedom from paying of tribute, and service in the wars and this he did, to soon as ever he took the title upon him, [Herod. lib. 3. cap. 69.] and he took moreover Astasia Cyrus his daughter, and all the rest of Cambyfes his wives to himself, [lib. c. 68. 89.]

Ammianus Marcellinus, [lib. 23.] out of ancient books reporteth, that after Cambyfes his death, 7 Magi took the management of the Kingdom of Persia into their hands: which number, Valer. Max. also in his [9 book, c. 2.] retaineth. But of them there were two chief, named by Herodotus, [lib. 3. c. 61. 78.] Patizithes, whom Trogus calls Cometes, and his brother, who only bare the name of king, as in the person of Cyrus his son: and is called by Herodotus, Smerdis; by Echyclus, Maras, by Ctesias, Spendabates, by Trogus, Orospes, and in the Scripture, Artachshatha.

To this Artachshatha it was that letters were brought from the Samaritans, to forbid the further building of Jerusalem, as of a city, which they blazoned for a rebellious and wicked place, and which if it went on to be built, would never pay tribute to the kings of Persia [Exod. 7. 16.]

Artachshatha, by his letter, forbade the building of Jerusalem, until he should give further orders: by virtue of which inhibition, the Samaritans taking courage, came flying to Jerusalem, by strong hand, made the Jews give off their building, not of the City only, but also of the Temple, for which nevertheless, they had Cyrus his expresse order, to finish it: But as they had been hitherto often interrupted in that work, so now they wholly gave it off, till the second year of the reign of Darius, [Exod. 4. 17. 24.]

Whiles this Artachshatha held the kingdom, Otares the Persian continuing at Sardes first reproached Mitrobrates, Governor of Daclylum in the continent of Asia, for not having gotten the Isle of Samos, into his hands, and annexed it to his government; in Pooleycrime among the Persians, and slew them committing sundry other outrages, and among the rest, caused a messenger, which came to him from Darius, because he told him something that pleased him not, to be murdered. [Herod. l. 3. c. 126.]

Ctesias tells us, that Ištabates the Eunuch, who had the charge of carrying the Corps of Cambyfes into Persia, disclosed all the plot, and fraud of the Magi to the army; & that being therefore pursued by them, he fled for safeguard to a Temple, and there they took off his head: but Herodotus saies, that 8 months after Cambyfes his death, the matter was brought first to light by the cunning of Otares the son of Pharnaspes, and afterward, more more fully manifested by Prexaspes; who being himself in a certain Tower, called the people to him, and from thence declared to them, and acknowledged that he himself, being forced thereto by Cambyfes his command, had murdered his Brother Smerdes the son of Cyrus, and that they were the Magi which then ruled all; and having so laid, he threw himself thence down headlong among them, [Herod. lib. 3. c. 68. and 75.] As for the discovery made by Otares, and destruction of the Magi, Justin out of Herodotus, and Trogus Pompeius, sets it down in this wise.

Otares (which is that Otares) saith he, by a messenger enquired of his daughter (which was one of the concubines, or harlots of the King) whether it were indeed Cyrus his son that was King: she answered, that she her self knew not, nor could possibly tell how to learn it out of any of her fellows, because they were all kept apart in several lodgings one from the other. Then he advised her when her turn came to lie with him, to feel his head, as he lay a sleep: for Cambyfes, or (as Herodotus hath it) Cyrus had caused the Magus his cares to be cut off. And being afterward assured by his daughter, that the King had no ears, he made the Princes of Persia acquainted therewith: and having drawn them into a conspiracy against the mock-kings, bound them all with an oath unto it. There were seven of them only in this conspiracy: who instantly, least by delay repentance might befall any, and so the thing come to be disclosed: carrying every man a dagger under his coat, went directly to the place where the King was, and killing such as stood in their way, at last came where the Magi were assembled: nor were they wanting to their own defence; for they slew down right two of the conspirators, (or rather wounded them only, as Herodotus hath it) but they were all laid hold on by the more in number: among which, Gobyras having one of them about the middle, when his fellows could not come at the Magus to kill him: for fear of hurting Gobyras himself, he bade them kill the Magus through his body. But yet as good luck would, they killed the Magus, and did him no hurt, [Justin lib. 1. c. 9.]

The names of these 7 Persians (whom Jerome upon Daniel 11. verse 2. would needs call the Magi) were these, Onophas, Idernes, Naradobates, Mardanius, Barisai, Artaphernes, and Darius, the son of Hytaspes: as Ctesias hath it: But in Herodotus, these, Otares, Hydarvates, Megabyzus, Gobyras, Aspachines, Intaphernes, and Darim: which Darius was then newly arrived there from Sula; where his father Hytaspes was Governor. But both Ctesias and Herodotus tell us, that the Persians ever after kept a yearly Festival upon the day wherein the Magi were thus destroyed.

Six dayes after the Magi were made away, those 7 Persians met in counsel, and advised together, what form of government they should now set up in Persia. Otares advised for an Aristocracy; Megabyzus, for an Oligarchie; but Darius, perswaded by all means for a Monarchie: and when this last opinion, for the supreme power to be settled in one person, had carried it by the major part of voices; Otares resigned all his right to the other six, upon condition that neither himself, nor any of his should ever be subject to any of them or theirs: whence it was that his family only among the Persians were left free, and not subject to the Kings command further than themselves listed: provided that they brake no law of the Persians: and because he was the first that set this wheele a going, and drew the rest into the action; therefore they thought fit, to have him magnificence and honour upon him and his posterity. And among the rest, to have him every year presented with a Median Robe. But for the Election of a new King, they came to this agreement among themselves, that every of them should get on horse-back a little before sun-rising, and whose horse happened first to neigh after the sun was up, he should be King in Cambyfes room: which when the horse of Darius the son of Hytaspes, by the craft and subtlety of Oebaris his Quiry happened to do presently: all the rest kept off their horses, and adored Darius, crying, God save the King, [Herod. lib. 3 from ca. 80. to ca. 88.]

Nor yet were they lesse mindful of their own priviledges and immunities, than Otares had been; for this they had common to them all: First that both Otares and the rest, should come to Court when they pleased; and have free access to the Kings person, without sending in word that he was there to speak with him, unless he were in bed with the Queen, [Id. lib. ca. 84. and ca. 118.] And secondly, that they might wear every man his turban, in a different fashion from all other men. For whereas the King only and his heir apparent, might wear their turbans upright: (as Seneca hath it, lib. 6. De Beneficiis ca. 31. and so hath Plutarch in the lives of Theopoles and Artaxerxes) and the rest of the Nobility wear them hanging backward; it was now granted to them and their posterity, that they should wear them pointing forward; because when they went about the slaughter of the Magi, they used this fashion as a token or sign between themselves, [Plutarch in his Praecepts of government.] For Darius had given this as a sign for each to know another by in the dark: that they should turn the buckle that fastned their turbans behind, and wear them in their fore-heads, [Polya. lib. Strang. 7.]

But this, as it seemeth, was the grand priviledge to them granted; that although the King had, as it were a perpetual Dictatorship in himself over them, yet they every man

	in his turn, should have a kind of a tribunitian power with him; to which opinion or imagination of mine own, there are three considerations moving me. First, for that these confpirators forefaw that they should prove burdesome (and wherein I pray more than in this way) to Darius, they bound him with an oath (which is most religiously observed among the Persians) that he should never do any of them to death, either by poison, or sword, or by any violent way, or by starving them; as Valer. Max. [lib. 9. ca. 2.] affirmeth. Secondly, for that Elchylus, who was in the fight against the Persians at Marathion names two Kings, successively between the slaughter of the Magi, and Darius his reign; to wit, Maraphis and Artaphernes. And lastly, for that in Ezra, in the edit of Darius, in the second year of his reign, for the rebuilding of the Temple, we find Artachshastha also called by the name of King of Persia, [Ezra 6. 14.] to have given his consent thereto, in his 2 year of his reign; for the rebuilding of the Temple; we find Artachshastha also called sometime King of Persia, [Ezra 6. 5. 14.] to have given his consent thereto: by whom it is hard to understand any other than Artaphernes. In the beginning of his reign, Darius took Astofa the daughter of Cyrus, who had formerly been married to his own Brother Cambyles, and afterward to the Magus, and made her his wife, purposing to establish his kingdom the better, by matching into the Royal Stock: that to the kingdom might not seem translated to another family, but rather returned into Cyrus his house, [Herod. lib. 3. ca. 88. and lib. 7. ca. 2. and Justin out of Troguus lib. 1. ca. 10.] And as himself was first called Ochus, as appears by [Valer. Max. lib. 9. ca. 2.] (i.e.) OCHUS yet afterward taking the Regal addition upon him, with the kingdom of Cambyles, took also his surname to him; so I conceive, that both he was that Achash-veroath, al. Ahasuerus, which in the Story of Esther, is said to have reigned from India to Ethiopia, over one hundred twenty and seven Provinces; and that this his chief wife Astofa, was none other than Valthi, of whom there is so much mention made in the same book. Ores continued still Governour at Sardes, and kept a thousand Persians for his guard about him. But Darius sending his royal letters by Bagages the son of Arton to the soldiers there, caused him to be dispatched out of the way; whose goods being all brought as confiscate to Sufa; there came also a long with them Democedes, whom he had made his slave, a Physician of Crotona, [Herod. lib. 3. ca. 127, 128, 129.] as was laid before. It fell out afterward that Darius, as he was a hunting fell from his horse, and with the fall, wenchr his foot, and strained it very sorely; which whiles the Egyptian Chirurgeous sought to bring right again, and used much violence in the cure, they made him that he could not stand for seven days. Upon the 8 day this Democedes was brought unto him, all poor and ragged, and shackled, as he was; he with such Greek lamentations as he used, quickly brought the King to sleep again: and in short time recovered him. Whereupon he was rewarded with rich gifts by the King and his Wives; and dwelt in a goodly house in Sufa: and sat at Table with the King, abounding with all things that his heart could wish: save only that he could not return into Greece again; and moreover when Darius would have hung up his Egyptian Physicians, because a Grecian could do more in his cure than they all, he obtained their pardon of the King: And whereas there was a certain Fortune-teller of Elis, which came in company with him, and had followed Polycrates to Magnesia, and was brought to Sufa, among the rest of Ores his slaves; he got him also to be set at liberty, [Herod. lib. ca. 129, 130, 132.] It fell out afterward that Astofa, daughter to Cyrus, and Darius his chief wife, had a Cancer in her breast: and being lanced, it spread further and further; and when Democedes had cured her of that sore, he prevailed so far with her, as to move the King to make war upon Greece. Upon whose perswasion, Darius presently called to him fifteen choice men, all Persians; and commanded them to follow Democedes, and by his directions to view all the Maritime places of Greece, and bring him back again with them to him. These when they were come into Phenicia, and from thence to Sidon; fitted themselves there of shipping, and other provisions, and sailed into Greece, and viewed all the Sea-coasts of Greece, and drew it into Maps; and were the first Persian spies that ever came into Greece. And then having taken a view of the most celebrated cities and places in the heart of Greece, they passed from thence to Tarentum in Italy, from whence Democedes stole away to Crotona where his own home was, and there marrying the daughter of Milo Crotoniates, that famous Wrestler: would not return any more to Darius, [Herod. lib. 3. from ca. 133, to ca. 136, with Athenaeus, lib. 2. Deipnosoph. and Aelian, Var. Histor. lib. 8. ca. 17.] This was the third Sabbatical year held by the Jewes, after their return from Babylon. Mardocai the Jew said to have had a dream in the Greek additions of [Ezra 6. 11.] upon the 1 day of the month Nisan, in the 2 year of the reign of Artaxerxes the great (or to Ahasuerus al. time to speak with Darius, without sending in, to tell him that he was there, was kept out by the door keeper, and groom of the bedchamber, who told him that the King was asleep with the Queen: But he, supposing that they lied unto him, drew his Cimitre, and cut off both their ears and noses; and tying the reigns of a horse about both their necks turned them going: But when they presently ran in to the King, shewing him what they had suffered, and upon what occasion: the king effrontery, sent for the rest of the Princes, severally, fearing that this might happily have been done by the common consent of them all: but finding it was not, he caused both Intaphernes and all his sons, save only the eldest, whom he spared at his mothers petitions, to be put to death: Herodotus relateth this matter [lib. 3. cap. 118. 119.] as a thing acted presently upon the execution done upon the Magi: but Valer. Max. following other Authors, [lib. 9. cap. 2.] tells us, that finding himself curbed by these Princes, put them all to death by a new devised kind of punishment: For saith he, making a lower room, and filling it with cinders, and beating up the room over it, with one post, and having feasted and filled them with meat and drink, he put them all into that upper room; and when they were all fast asleep, taking away the post that bare it up, they all fell into the cinders, in the under room, and there perished.

Now though it be not very likely that they perished in this manner, yet is it very credible, that putting them from the government of the kingdom, he eased himself of that yoke, which hitherto lay so heavy on his neck.

And from that time forward, Darius was a free and absolute Monarch; and he it is, that we, in the Scripture, find called by the name of Assuerus. This Assuerus; therefore, in the 3 year, reckoned from the beginning of his reign, as he sat in his throne, in his palace at Susa, to shew the glory of his kingdom, and magnificence of his state, made a feast for all the Governors, and great men of his dominions, which lasted 180 dayes long, [Esh. 1. 2. 3. 4.] now this city of Susa, as Pliny, [lib. 6. c. 27.] saies, was built by this Darius; or rather as Elian, [lib. 13. de animal. c. 59.] was embellishd with goodly and magnificent palaces by him, and Herod. [lib. 5. c. 49.] tells us, that he made that the place of his residing and there kept all his treasure.

After this half years banquet was ended, there followed an other of seven dayes long; whereunto were invited all the dwellers, and whoever else was then present at Susa, from the greatest to the least. The men sitting with the King, in the court of the garden of the kings house, and the women within the palace it self, with Vasthi the Queen, (which to us is Arofta, the daughter of Cyrus,) [Esh. 1. 5. 9.]

Upon the last day of this feast, the king, being somewhat high flown with drink, would needs shew the beauty of the Queen to the men, and sent for him to come unto him: but she refused; and thereupon, by the advice of Memucan, one of the seven wise men, of the Medes and Persians, which knew the lawes and statutes of those countries (for these were the kings Judges, which judged in all causes arising among the Persians, and resolved all cases in point of law; of whom, Herod. [lib. 3. c. 14. 31.] and Plutarch in the life of Artaxerxes maketh mention,) divorced and put her away, making moreover a law, that every man thereafter, should be Master in his own house, [Esh. 1. 10. 22.]

Hereupon, there was enquiry made after all the faire damels that were to be found in Assuerus his dominions, to find out a fit consort for the king, to reign in the stead of Vasthi, which was divorced, and among others, Hadassa, a damsel of the Jews, which was also called Esther; the daughter of Abichajile, a woman of Benjamin, was taken into consideration, [Esh. 2. 1. 8.]

In the fourth year of Darius, the fourth day of the ninth month, called Chisleu, when the Jews, by Sharezer, and Regem-melech, consulted with the Priests and Prophets, concerning the fast appointed to be held upon the day of the destruction of the City and Temple of Jerusalem, God answered them, that those fasts of the fifth and seventh months which they had observed for seventeen years space, were no wayes pleasing to him; and put them in mind of their obstinacie, and perseverance in their sins, which had brought that terrible desolation upon them, [Zach. 7. 1. 14.] now from the said destruction, and the death of Gedalia (which gave occasion of that fast, held in the 7 month,) following two months after, to the very instant of this prophetic, we in our Chronologie, gather, that there were 70 years.

And in the eighth chapter of the same Zacharie, God tells them, that he would restore Jerusalem, and put an end to all their former miseries, and that he would change their fasts; as well that of the fourth month, on the ninth day whereof, the City was taken, as that of the fifth month, upon the tenth whereof, the Temple was burnt, and of the seventh month, wherein the remnant of the people, upon the murder of Gedalia, was scattered among the Nations, and of the 10 month, upon the 10 day whereof, the City under Sedechia, began to be sieged by Nebuchadnesar, into mirth; and would send joy and gladnesse, and liberty unto his people.

In the 6 year of Darius, toward the later end thereof, on the 3 day of the 12 month, called Adar, was the structure of the Temple finished. The dedication whereof, the Israelites which returned out of the captivity, celebrated with great joy, and abundance of sacrifices, the Priests and Levites, every one in his place and office attending in the ministry of the Temple, [Ecra 6. 15. 18.]

And they also upon the 14 day of the first month, celebrated the first Passover in the second Temple; keeping also the feast of seven-bread seven dayes, with great joy, for that God had turned the heart of the king of Assyria toward them, [Ecra 6. 19. 22.] to wit of Darius, who having recovered Babylon, after 20 months siege, by the means of Zopyrus, was in full right, stiled now king of the Assyrian; no less than of the Persians, [Herod. lib. 3. in fin.] and Justin in the end of his first book.

When Esther turn came to be brought to the king Assuerus, she was attended on, from the Seraglio, to the kings chamber, by Hegaius the Eunuch, [Esh. 2. 12. 15.]

But in the 7 year of Assuerus his reign, in the 10 month, called Tebeth; when Esther came unto the king, she found grace and favour in his eyes, above all the other damfels; insomuch, that he put the crown of the kingdom upon her head, and made her Queen in the stead of Vasthi, [Esh. 2. 16. 17.] whence I gather, that as Vasthi was Arofta, so Esther was she, whom Herodotus, call: the Virgin Artystona, and whom he says, that Darius loved above all his wives, and whole statue, he caused to be made of solid gold, [lib. 3. cap. 88. with cap. 69. lib. 7.] though I am not ignorant, that Hadassa, which was another name given to Esther, comes a great deal nearer to Arofta, and that Herodotus makes Artystona, to have been Cyrus his daughter, and Aroftas sister, whether we should say, that Herodotus was not so well skilled in the Persian genealogies, or that the Persians themselves, for very envy, concealed the name of Esther.

Assuerus in honour of his new spouse, made a most sumptuous feast for all his Princes and servants, and called it Esthers feast, wherein he caused the provinces of many taxes and tallages, and gave gifts answerable to the state and magnificence of so great a king, [Esh. 2. 18.]

		And presently after this, Haman was himself hanged up, at the gibbet which he had provided for Mordecai, [chap. 7.] Haman's house was given to the Queen; and Mordecai her cousin-germaine, and who had brought her up, had daily honours bestowed upon him, [ca. 8. 1, 2, 15. ib.]				Artabagoras to Myus to the army, which upon their return from Naxos, remained there, and by a stratagem, took all the principal Commanders of their Fleet. And Artabagoras, now openly revolting from Darius, made a fair shew of a kind of liberty to the Milesians, and took away the tyrants that were in some cities of Ionia; and then went to the Lacedæmonians to pray an aide of them; but received a flat denial at their hands, [Herod. lib. 3. ca. 36, 37, 38, 49, 50, 51.]
		Upon the 23 day of the month Sivan, there was an edict published at Sufa, and copies thereof sent away speedily by carriers, into the 127. Provinces, that the Jews upon the 23 day of the month Adar, which was the day appointed for their massacre, should have leave to stand upon their own guards, and to defend themselves every where, and to kill all such as should offer to assault them, and should moreover, have the spoils of such mens goods: whereupon both in Sufa, and in all the Provinces there was great rejoicing among them, and divers of the people in several countries joyning themselves to their side, turned Jews, [ib. cap. 8. 9, 17.]			5503.	In the 20 year of the reign of Darius, 245. of Nabonassars æra, upon the 28 day of the month Epiphu, according to the Egyptian Calender, [upon the 29. of our November] ending about midnight, there was an Eclipse of the Moon observed at Babylon, [Ptol. Mag. Synax. lib. 4. ca. 9.]
d.		Hippias (twenty years before the fight at Marathon, in which he served on the Median party) being now grown an old man; was thrust out of Athens by the Lacedæmonians, and the faction of the Alcmaonids there: and taking a passage from the Athenians, went first to Sigeum, and from thence failed to Lampacus, to his son in law Eantides, and from thence got him away to Darius, [Theod. lib. 6.] Now Pisistratus, Hippias his father, had committed Sigeum in Troas, to Hegelistratus his base son: and that was a receipt to him now for Hippias, and afterward for others of the race of Pisistratus, in case of extremity to retire unto, [Herod. lib. 5. ca. 65, 91, 94.]				Hippias the son of Pisistratus being sent for from Sigeum upon a vain hope given him of being restored to his Principality in Athens, by the Lacedæmonians, returned from thence into Asia, and accusing the Athenians of many things to Artaphernes, did what in him lay to bring Athens under the subjection of Darius, [Herod. lib. 5. chap. 91. 96.]
		Upon the 13 day of the 12 month Adar, the Jews in all parts slew all those who were provided to slay them upon the same day, according to Haman's decree: In Sufa itself, and the very Palace there, they slew 500. men, together with Haman ten sons: and in the rest of the Provinces to the number of 75000. men: but meddled not with one penny of their goods, [Esth. 9. 1, 16.]	4105.	509.		The Athenians understanding that Hippias had defamed them to Artaphernes, sent their messengers to Sardes, to persuade the Persians there, not to give credit, nor to lend any ear, to those out-laws of the Athenians: But Artaphernes advised them, if they loved themselves, and their own safety, to call home, and receive Hippias again; But whilst they stood out, and refused to hearken to any such conditions, it fell out that Artabagoras the Milesian returning from Sparta, where he got nothing but a denial, came to Athens, and there obtained of them 200. sail of Ships to aid the Ionians in their war against the Persians: whereof they made Melantho an eminent man in Athens Commander, [Herod. lib. 3. ca. 96, 97.] Which Fleet, as [Herod. ca. 98. ib.] hath well noted, was the beginning of all mischief, both to the Grecians and Persians: for this was the beginning of all the wars which grew between the Grecians and the Persians, and which ended in the ruine of the Persian Empire.
		Upon the 15 day the Jews that dwelt in Sufa made merry and feasted themselves, [D. c. 9. 18.]			3504.	The Athenian Fleet arrived at Mileus, and with them came also five tall Ships of the Eretrians, for the Athenians sake. There Artabagoras staid himself, but sent his own brother Charopinus Commander over the Milesians, and Helmophantus Commander over the rest of the Ionians, against Sardes. The Ionians, in company with the Athenians and Eretrians, coming with their Fleet to Ephesus, left their Ships at Coretus, a Port of the Ephesians, and marched themselves in a body over-land to Sardes: and took and burnt it all, save the Castle which Artaphernes himself kept, not sparing the very temple of Cybele. But when the Lydians and Persians joyning together, made good the Market-place, thorough the midst whereof ran the River Pactolus, and there detended themselves against them; the Ionians for very fear left the place, and retired to the Hill Tmolus, thence adjoining, and from thence by night fled away to their ships: whereupon the Persians dwelling on that side the River Halys, gathering into a body, pursued them, and overtaking them about Ephesus: fought with them, and routed them; killing many, and among them Enalcidas Captain of the Eretrians; a man who had borne away the garland in many of their games, and highly commended by Simonides the Poet in his verses. They which escaped out of the battle, dispersed themselves into their several cities: and the Athenians abandoning from thenceforth the Ionian cause, though earnestly entreated thereto by Artabagoras, would no more appear in it, [Herod. from ca. 99. to ca. 103.]	4214.	500.
3500.		In the Isle of Naxos, some of the richer sort were turn'd out by the meaner people; and they repaired to Artabagoras of Molagoras, and son in law, and cousin-germain by the mothers side, to Histiasus, Tyrant of Mæcus; and whom Histiasus had left Governor there in his room, when Dar us under a shew of Honour, had taken himself along with him unto Sufa: and Artabagoras imparting the matter to Artaphernes, son of Hytastaspes, and brother to Darius, Governor of Ionia, residing at Sardes, persuaded him to possess himself of Naxos, and Paros, and Andos, and the rest of the Cyclades, all depending of Naxos, to the Kings use: which being well liked of by Darius at Sufa; he furnished out the next Spring, 200. Ships for that service, [Herod. lib. 5. cap. 30. 31, 32.]			4211.	501.	Onchilus, turning out his own elder brother Gorgus, King of the Salaminians, and forcing him to flee over to the Medes for succour, prevailed with the whole Isle of Cyprus to fall off from them; save only those of Amathua: But while he was besieging that city, tydings came of the firing of Sardes by the Athenians, to Darius: who thereupon growing wrath with the Athenians, gave order to one of his attendants, that as often as he ate meat, he should three times remember him of it, and say, Sir, Remember the Athenians: and then, very improvidently sent away Histiasus, the brother of that Artabagoras, from Sufa to Mileus as if of purpose to be afterward the ring-leader of the Ionian Rebels against himself, [Herod. lib. 5. ca. 104, 105, 106.]
3501.	6.	Artaphernes, making Megabates a Persian borne, Darius his, and his own, near kinsman, Commander in Chief of the Persian Army; gave him order with his Fleet of 200. sail, to go to Mileus, and there to take in Artabagoras and the Ionian Army, which he did; and failed from thence to Chios: where a jar falling between Artabagoras and Artaphernes, when they had spent four months in the siege of Naxos to no purpose: each returned home, nothing done, [Herod. ib. ca. 32. 33, 34.]				The Ionians entering into the Hellespont, took Byzantium, and other cities in those parts; and failing from thence, drew over many of the cities of Caria to join with them in this war against the Persians; for the city Camus, which hitherto stood off, and would not side with them, hearing now of the firing of Sardes, fell also to them, [ib. ca. 103.]
3502.	6.	Here end the 70 years from the taking of Tyre, by Nebuchadnezar, which is the just number of years of the bondage of that city, expressly foretold by the Prophet, [Eze. 33. 15, 17.] from which time, it seems they lived in freedom from any foreign subjection, till the time it was again taken afterward by Alex. the Great.	4212.	502.		At Clazomenæ (which was of it self sometimes an Island, but now joined to the continent of Ionia, by a neck of land, as [Strabo lib. x.] sheweth) was borne Anaxagoras the Artabagoras fearing what might befall him, because he had not been able to perform what he had undertaken to Artaphernes for the taking of Naxos, and had not wherewithal to pay his army; began to think of revolting from the Persians. And it fell out in the very nick, that there came a messenger from Histiasus in Babylon, having his errand written in letters made with hot irons upon the flesh of his head, and now grown over with hair, by which Artabagoras was advised both himself to fall off from Darius, and also to put all Ionia in arms against him, if he could, [Herod. lib. 5. ca. 35. Polyæ. Stratag. lib. 1.]
		Artabagoras hereupon, having imparted this to his friends, persuaded them to rise with him, though Hecateus the Historian diluaded them by all means from rising in arms against the King of Persia: but all in vain; for the conspirators dispatched away satis-

the Philosopher, son of Hegesibulus, [Olym. 70.] as Diogenes Laertius sheweth in his life, out of Apollodorus his Chronicle.

Whiles Onesilus, lay with his army before Amathusa, news came to him, that Artabazus, a Captain of the Persians was making toward Cyprus, with a very numerous army, whereupon he sent to crave aide of the Ionians, and they out of hand advanced toward Cyprus, with a great fleet. But the Persians putting over out of Cilicia, into Cyprus, landed there, their men, and marched by land to the city of Salamis, sending about the Phenians with the ships, to double the point of a Promontory in that Island, called, Claves Cyprus, (i. e.) the keys of Cyprus, and anon after, there followed a fight between the parties, both at land, and sea. And at sea, the Ionians, behaved themselves all very bravely that day, especially the Samians, and had the better of the Phenians. But at land, while the rest were busie in fight, first Stesenor, Tyrant of the Curi, betrayed his fellows: and then presently the men of Salamis, who fought in chariots, did the like; whereupon the whole army of the Cypriots being routed, many of them were put to the sword: and among them Onesilus, the author of this war, and with him, Aristocypus, king of the Solians, son of that Philocypus, whom Solon, at his being in Cyprus, so much extolled above all other Tyrants, in his verses. The Ionians hearing that Onesilus was slain, and the rest of the cities of that Isle besieged, and that Salamis it self had opened her gates to Gorgus, their old king, returned into Ionia, with all the haste they could make. But among all the cities of Cyprus, that of Solos stood it out longest; yet at seven months end, the Persians having undermined the wall round about, took it; and to the Cypriots paid dearly for their one years liberty, and were reduced to their former estate of slavery, [Herod. lib. 5. from cap. 108. to 116.]

3505 The Persian Lords at Sardes, who had married Darius his daughters, as Daurises, Hymenes, and Otanes, pursuing the Ionians, who had been in the service against Sardes, alter they had routed them near unto Ephesus, and driven them aboard their ships, parted the rest of the work among themselves, and took each of them, in hand what cities of theirs they would subdue, [Herod. lib. 1. 16.] Daurises for his part, undertook the parts thither, they would subdue, and there took Dardanus, Abydus, Percotes, Lampacus, and Pylon, every day a city: but as he was on his way from thence, to the city Paros, he understood that all Caria had revolted from the king, and joynd with the Ionians, wherefore he gave off that purpose, and marched away with all his army into Caria, [cap. 117.] Hymenes undertook the parts about Propontis, and coming thither, won Cios in Mylia. But then hearing that Daurises was marched out of Hellepont into Caria, he left Propontis, and marched into Hellepont, [ib. cap. 121.] But Artaphernes, the Governor of Sardes, and Otanes the third of those undertakers, went against Ionia it self, and the country of Æolia, adjoining therunto. In Ionia they took Clazomenæ, and in Æolia, the city Cuma, [ib. cap. 123.] which being taken, Anaxagoras with his companions, consulted together, whether they might flee, in which counsaile, Hecateus the Historian advised, first to transport into the Isle of Leros, and there to fortify for the present; and dwell till occasion were offered to return to Miletus. But Aristagoras his opinion was, to saile rather to a place called Myrcinus, a city among the Edones, (who dwelt upon the bank of the river Strimon) which his own Brother Histæus had formerly built: wherefore committing the charge of Miletus to Pythagoras himself, with such Volunteers, as he could get, sailed from thence into Thrace, and possessed himself of the place, which he intended, [ib. c. 124. 125. 126.]

Histæus, the Tyrant of Miletus, dismissed from Susa by Darius, came to Sardes: where being upon his very first arrival, hody charged by Artaphernes, as the author of all the rebellion in Ionia; he got away the night following to the sea side, and there finding a ship ready, sailed over into Chios; where the people supposing that he had been sent thither by Darius, of purpose to sollicite them against the Grecians, laid him in irons; but understanding shortly after, that he came in a contrary errand, they quickly let him at liberty: and he forthwith dispatched away letters to Sardes, by Hermippus of Atarne, to perswade some Persians there, to a revolt. But Artaphernes having gotten knowledge of this practise, by the discovery of some of them of Chios, to grant him a convoy back to Miletus. But the Milesiens, as they were glad to be rid of Aristagoras, so they would by no means hear of taking another Tyrant in his room; inasmuch, that when Histæus, assailed to get privie into the city by night, he received a wound in the thigh, given him by a Milesi; and so being cast out thence, he returned again to Chios, [Herod. lib. 6. in the beginning of it.]

3506 Daurises the Persian, leading his army against the Carians, they met together, and made a body, at a place called Columna Albes, (i. e.) the white Pillars, near the river Marlyas, where Pixodorus the son of Maufolus, a man of Cyndia, who had married the daughter of Sienacles the king of Cilicia, gave them advice to passe over the river Mæander; and that having that river at the back of them, they should there abide the coming of the enemy, and fight with him, upon that advantage: but the contrary opinion carried it, that they should put the Persians to have the river at their backs, and force them to fight at that disadvantage, to the end, said they, that if they fled, having that river at their back, they should not be able to get away. At last therefore, the Carians and Persians came to a battail, near the river Marlyas, which was a very sharp one, and lasted long, and in which the Persians lost two thousand men, and the Carians ten thousand. But when the Carians fled at last to a place called Labranda to the Temple of Jupiter the warrior, and were there in consultation what to do, whether to submit to the Persian, or to abandon Asia, the Milesiens with their partakers, came to aide them: whereupon they took fresh courage, and fought again with the Persians upon a new supplic, a fight longer than the former, they fled again; in which they lost very many men, especially of the Milesiens: after which great losses; yet the Carians, upon a new supplic, fought with them a third time; for hearing that the Persians, went about now to sack and ransack their cities, they lay in ambush for them upon their way, as they were marching to Mylassa, following therein the advice, of Heraclides Inabolus, a man of Mylassa, into which ambushment, the Persians falling by night, were all cut off, with their commanders, Daurises, and Amorges, and Simaces, and with the rest Myrles also the son of Gyges, was there slain, [Herodotus lib. 5. from cap. 118. to 121.]

Hymenes the Persian which led his army into the country of Hellepont, took in all the Æoles, which inhabited near the coast of old Troy, and the Gergihes, the remainder of those ancient Teucrians, and having done all, deceased himself, of a sickness at Troas, [ib. cap. 122.]

Histæus the Milesi, when he could not prevaile with the men of Chios, to let him have away their shipping, put over to Mitilene; where the Leibyans by his perswasions, let him have eight tall men of war, well and fully furnished, in which they sailed with him to Byzantium, and staying there, they intercepted certain ships of loading, of the Ionians, which came out of Pontus, all, except such as professed themselves willing and ready to serve Histæus, [Herod. lib. 6. cap. 5. and 26.]

Aristagoras, Histæus his brother, lying with his army at the siege of Mircinus, a city of the Edones, was there slain with all his men by the Thracians, after they had taken his word, for their own safe passage, and leaving of the place, as Herodotus, in the very end of his fifth book delivers. But Thucydides, [lib. 4.] reckons from hence, 61 years, to the carrying of a colony of the Athenians, by Agnon the son of Nicias, and planting it in Amphipolis, which Diod. Sic. in his 12 book, saies, was done in the 85 Olympiade, to which period of times, we have here conformed our relation of the fix years (ending the year following) of the rebellion of the Ionians against the Persians.

3507 There was now a huge preparation making against the city of Milens, by land and sea, for the Persian Commanders, of all those parts, uniting their forces, set up their rest, to carry that place, what ever became of the rest. Among the Seamen their Phenicians, were the forwardest of all others, and with them were joynd the Cypriots, lately subdued by the Persians, and the Cilicians, and Egyptians, [Herod. lib. 6. cap. 6.] of which danger thus hanging over their heads, mention seems to be made in those letters, which are attributed to Anaximenes the Milesi, written to Pythagoras living then in Crotone, by Diogenes Laertius in his life: where, when he had spent 20 year, he went to Metapontus, and there ended his dayes, as Justin reports out of Trogus, [lib. 20. cap. 4.] to wit in the fourth year of the 78 Olympiade, (as Ensch. hath it in his Chron.) which takes up part of this, and part of the year following.

The Ionian fleet consisted of 363 ships; the Persian of 600. Æaces the son of Solyon, the Tyrant of Samos and other Tyrants of Ionia, which having been thrust out by Aristagoras, were now in the Persian army, laboured what they could to draw over every man his country-men, and acquaintance from the Ionian to the Persian side. In a sea fight at Lada, which is a little Island lying over against Miletus, between the Phenicians, and the Ionians, of 60 ships that came from the Isle of Samos, and fifty slunk out of the fight, and returned home, so did 70 more of the Leibian ships; and sundry other of the Ionians in like manner, onely there were 100 saile of the Isle of Chios, which fought it out very manfully, till at length having taken many of the enemies ships, and lost many of their own with what they had left, they returned home: some of which yet being hardly pursued by the enemy, ran themselves on ground, at the promontory of Mycale, and there gar to land, and travelling all night on foot, came safe to Ephesus, whiles the women there were celebrating their feast and sacrifices called Theomophoria, to wit, in honour of their goddesse Ceres: whereupon the men of the city, supposing the Chians to have been theves, come to spoil them at that time, fell suddenly upon them, and slew them. But Dionysius, captain of three ships of the Phocæans, having taken three ships of the enemies, carried them, not into Phocæa, which he knew well enough was ere this seized on, and possessed by the enemies, with the rest of the Ionian territories, but furnished as he was, sailed directly into Phinicia; where lighting upon some ships of loading, and having taken out of them a great booty of monies, and other things, he set sail, and came away for Sicilie, [Herodotus lib. 6. from cap. 7. to 17.]

ca. 42.] When Artabarnes had brought them to this, then laied he out all their country by Parasanges: for so the Persians call every division, containing 30 furlongs: and laied a certain tribute upon every such division, which they were to pay yearly to the King, much after the rate of what formerly was paid, [saith Herodotus lib. 6. cap. 42.] meaning that rate, which (as he had formerly written) Darius; when he came first to the crown; had imposed throughout all his Dominions, [lib. 3. cap. 89. 90.] before, he was Master of the Islands, [cap. 96.] In the narration whereof we may observe, that however, for the more easie levying of tributes, the 127. Provinces mentioned in Eliater, were now by Darius reduced to 20 Governments, yet the bounds of that Empire were still the same; namely, India, and Ethiopia, whereof the one was of Cambyles his acquies, and the other of Darius himself: of whose revenue out of India, Herodotus (speaking, saith in this wile, The Indians as they are a most populous nation, above all other men living, that they pay tribute far more than any other nation doth, to wit, 360. talents of gold dust; and this is the

In the 31 year of Darius, 257 of Nabonassar, the 3 day of the month Tybi (25 day of our April) half an houre before midnight, there was an eclipse of the moone, observed at Babylon, (Ptol. mag. Syntax. lib. 4. cap. 9.) Darius removed Mardonius from his charge, as a man that had not ordered matters well at sea, and sent others to take charge of the war against the Eretrians and Athenians, to wit, Datis, a Median born, and Artaphernes, (whom whom the Scholiast of Aristophanes calls Artabazus] Commander of the horse, the son of his brother Artaphernes. To these, as they lay encamped in a plain of Cilicia, near the sea, repaired all the sea forces, with their ships, as well for fight, as for transportation of horses; which the tributary Cities had provided and furnished according to order given: into which having put their foot and horse, they set sail, and went for Ionia; [Herod. lib. 6. c. 94, 95.] with a fleet of 600 ships. Yet Plato in his Menexenus, counteth only 300 ships, and 500 thousand land soldiers; which number Lyfias also holds to, in the Epitaph which he made, upon the Corinthian Auxiliaries; but Emilius Probus, in the life of Miltiades, says, there were in that fleet, 500 ships; 200000 foot, and 10000 horse.

The Persians, setting sail from Samos, came to Naxos, and set fire on all their houses, and Temples: But sparing Delos, they went to other Islands, from whence they took away both men to serve them, and also their children for hostages; which when the Carystii refused to deliver; they endured a siege, till at last they also were fain to surrender their City, and give up themselves to their enemies discretion; [Herod. lib. 6. cap. 95, 96, 99.]

The Persians, having taken Eretria, after seven daies siege, and spent some few daies in settling things there, sailed thence to the island of Attica, and wasted a great part thereof: and came at last, by the guidance of Hippias the son of Pisistratus into the field of Marathon; where they were all defeated by the men of Athens, and of Platae, under the conduct of Miltiades, who had gotten the sovereignty, or command of the Chersonesus, in Thracia: of their part were slain, 192 men: of the Persians, 6400. [Herod. lib. 6. c. 101, 102, 112, 117.]

The Persians, being routed, fled to their ships, of which many were sunk, and many taken: in both the fights, the Persians lost 200000 men, Hippias also, sometimes the tyrant of Athens, died there, who had been the author and procurer of this war. [Justin. out of Trogus, lib. 2. c. 9.] The whole army of the Persians at this battle consisted of 300000, as Valer. Max. lib. 5. c. 3. saith, and Plutarch intimates no less in the beginning of his Parallels: Justin, and Orosius following him say, they were in all 600000 men: Emilius Probus in his Miltiades, says there were 100000 foot, and 10 thousand horse: of the Athenians there were 10000, and of their auxiliaries out of Platae, 1000, saith Justin with Orosius. Probus assures us, that the Athenians, with the men of Platae, and all, made but 10000. This inglorious victory, was gotten by them, upon the 6 day of Boedromion, the 3 month in the Attic Calendar, after the former solstice, as Plutarch in the life of Camillus, says; when Phanippus was Prætor or L. Chancellor of Athens: as the same Plutarch hath it in the life of Aristides: to wit, in the year of the 72 Olympiade, 4 years before the death of Darius, as Severus Sulpitius, in 2 book of his Sacra Historia telleth us: and in the year before Xerxes his passing over into Greece, (as Thucydides in his 1 book of his history, witnesseth; and Lyfias in his Epitaph of the Corinthian Auxiliaries, hath it) and before the sea fight at Salamis, in the same month of Boedromion, 10 years compleat, as we find in Plato [3 de Legibus.]

Darius and Artaphernes returning into Asia, carried with them their captives of Eretria to Sufa, [Herod. lib. 6. cap. 119.] though Ctesias would have it, that Darius was slain in the fight at Marathon: and that, when the Persians desired to have his corps, the Athenians refused to give it.

Darius, when the Eretrian captives were brought unto his presence, gave order to have them placed in a part of the Cissian country, which is called Anderica, 20 furlongs from Sufa, [Herod. lib. 6. c. 119.] of whom a man may see more in Philostratus, in the life of Apollonius, lib. 1. c. 17.]

When Darius had spent now 3 years, in making greater preparations against Greece than before; in the fourth year the Egyptians revolted from him. [Herodotus, lib. 7. cap. 1.]

When Darius was now ready to begin his war against the Egyptians, and Athenians both, he was, by the Lawes of the Persians, to declare his successor in the kingdom.

Artobazanes, whom others call Artemenes, or Ariamenes, his son by Gobryas his daughter, born to him before he came to be king, claimed the succession, by right of primogeniture, or as first born: But Xerxes, who was begotten and born, after Darius came to be king, and that of Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus, the founder of the Persian Monarchie, was declared to be king, in succession. [Herod. lib. 7. cap. 2, 3.] of which friendly contention between the two brothers, more is to be seen in Justin, out of Trogus, [lib. 2. c. 10.] in Plutarch, in the life of Artaxerxes, and in his Apophthegms, and in his treatise megalocritus, (i. e. of Brotherly love.

Darius, having declared Xerxes to be king in succession, when he was now ready to take his journey, nay rather when he was now putting over into Greece, as Diad. Sic. lib. 11. reporteth, in the year after the revolt of the Egyptians, at the later end thereof, departed this life, when he had reigned full 36 years, [Herod. lib. 7. c. 4.]

Next

Next him came Xerxes, the 4 king of Persia after Cyrus: who trusting in his riches, (as they were indeed exceeding great) stirred up his own subjects, together with all his allies and friends, to make war upon the Grecian kingdom; according to the prophecy of [Daniel 11. 2.] though not moved hereto at the first so much by any desire of his own, as set on, by the persuasions and instigations of Mardonius, his Cousin German, of the Alvedas, the kings of Thessaly, of the kindred of Pisistratus, and of one Onomacrius, a Sorcerer of Athens, [Herod. lib. 7. cap. 5, 6.]

Xerxes, in the very beginning of the second year, after the death of Darius, took a journey against his rebel Egyptians; whom when he had subdued, and brought into a harder state of bondage, than they had ever felt under his predecessors, he set his brother Achamenes, the son of Darius to be ruler over them, [Herodotus lib. 7. cap. 7.]

This year was Herodotus the Historian, the son of Lyxus, and Eryone born at Halicarnassus in the province of Caria: for that he was 33 year old, when the Peloponnesian war began. [A. Gellius lib. 15. cap. 23.] affirmeth out of Pamphyla. Now at that very time, Artemesia, the daughter of Lygdamis of Halicarnassus, upon the decease of her husband, obtained, (during the pupillage of her young son, whose name was Pinudelis, as may be gathered out of Suidas, in the word Ἡρόδοτος: (i. e.) Herodotus) the Tyranny which her husband held, and ruled over the Halicarnassians, the Coi, the Niliarians, and Calyndonians: and she, a while after, came into Greece with five good fighting ships, to the aid of Xerxes in his war there, [Herod. lib. 7. cap. 99.]

Xerxes, when he had gathered together out of all his dominions, Egypt, Phœnicia, Cyprus, Cilicia, Pamphyla, Pisidia, Lycia, Caria, Mysia, Troas, Hellefpont, Bithynia, and Pontus, to the number of 1200 ships, making his Rendezvous at Cuma, and Phœcea in Ionia, himself with all the foot and horse, that he could make out of all his provinces, set out at length from Sufa, in the beginning of the 4 year of the 74 Olympiade, though [Diad. Sic. in the beginning of his 11 book.] huddling together the gets of 2 years into one, relates this as done, in the first year of the Olympiade following Herodotus, lib. 7. cap. 21. affirms, that this provision was in making the 3 whole years before this year; but with a note premised in the chapter preceding, which cannot consist with the exact couple of the times: For (saith he) from the subduing of Egypt, he was full 4 years in gathering an army, and in making his preparations; and in the beginning of the fifth year; he began to march with a huge army: for indeed, he set out from Sufa, in the beginning of the fifth year, not from his subduing of Egypt, but from his coming to the crown: so that both Justin out of Trogus, [lib. 2. cap. 10.] and Orosius following him, do unadvisedly attribute five years; but most absurdly doth Julianus in his first Oration of the praises of Constantius, say, that he was ten years in making this preparation. But more ingenious than all these, (though he not over exquisite in his account neither) is Babianus, in his Babiloniarum, where he saith, that between Darius and Xerxes, there was ten years time spent in making this preparation against Greece; since we have formerly shewed out of Plato, that from the fight at Marathon, to the fight at Salamis, which was fought in the first year of the 75 Olympiade, (almost a full year after Xerxes his setting out from Sufa,) there were only ten years ran out.

At Critalis in Cappadocia, all Xerxes his forces came into one body; and from thence he passed the river Halys, and came to Celæna, a city in Phrygia: where Pythius, a Lydian born, (whom yet Pliny lib. 33. cap. 10.) makes to be a Bithynian) the son of Atyis entertained him, and his whole army, in a most magnificent and sumptuous manner: from hence passing by Anavasa, a city of Phrygia, and the river Lycus running under ground, so forth it self, and from thence again, to a town called Cyndra, seated in the confines of Phrygia, and Lydia, and then passing the river Meander, and passing by the city called Callateas, he at length arrived at Sardes, from whence he dispatched away his messengers into Greece, to demand of them earth and water, (i. e.) to require them to give themselves up into his power, [Herodotus, lib. 7. from the 26. chapter, to the 32.]

The Navy in this mean while, was at Eleus, in Chersonesus, from whence a part of the army went to dig thorough the neck of the mount Atos, which was twelve furlongs over; and were forced to this work, with Batinadoes. The inhabitants also of the places adjoining, were drawn into the work, and Bubares the son of Megabyfius, and Artachaus the son of Artaxas, both Persians, were appointed, to overlook the workmen, by whose industry at last that neck of land was cut through, and the sea let in, so broad, that two great ships with their oars out, might therein meet, and pass without falling foul each of other, [Id. ib. cap. 22, 23, 24.] And another part of the army was occupied in making a bridge of ships over the Hellespont, where the sea from Abydus to the shoare, on the other side, is seven furlongs over: and when the bridge was all made, came a mighty tempest, and brake it all down again: at which Xerxes growing mad for anger, cauled 300 tripoes to be given to the Hellespont, and a paire of shakles to be thrown into the sea, to bind and fetter it withal: as for those, who were employed in making of the bridge; he caused their heads to be smitten off: and then set others on work to make the bridge stronger, [Id. ib. from chap. 33 to 36.]

In the beginning of the spring, Xerxes with his whole army, moved from Sardes, where he had quartered all that winter, marching toward Abydus: and as he was setting forth, the sun withdrew his light; there being no clouds to cover it, but a most clear air, and the day was turned into night; at which stupendous prodigy, Pythius the Lydian being amazed, (for that it was no natural Eclipse, the Astronomical tables easily declare) besought the King, that of his five sons, who were then in his army, he would leave his eldest son, to be a comfort to him in his old age: Whereat growing into a rage, he caused that eldest son of his to be cut in two, and his whole army to march between the parts of his body, [Id. ib. ca. 37. 38. 39.]

Hermotimus, who was an Halicarnassian borne, and could do most of all the other Eunuchs with Xerxes, coming into the country of Ararne, in the province of Mysia, sent for Panionius, of the Isle of Chios (who was by his trade, a dealer in buying and selling of slaves, and by whom himself had formerly been kept, and made an Eunuch) with his wife and children to come unto him: and making the father to cut out his children's fingers, and then them to do as much to their father: he thought himself in some recompence for the wrong which had been done him in his eviration, [Id. ib. 8. chap. 105. 106.]

Xerxes his army going from Lydia to the River Caicus, and the country of Mysia, from thence came into the country, where old Ilium, or Troy, stood; and as he lay that night at the foot of the Hill Ida, there fell a terrible tempest of lightning and thunder, which destroyed many of his army: after which they came to the River Scamander, which they quite drank up; nor was it able to satisfy the men and cattle of the army with water for their thirst; when Xerxes was there, he went up to see and view the old habitation of King Priame; and there he sacrificed to Minerva of Troy, 1000 Oxen: and the Magi that attended him offered cakes to the Worthies, sometimes of that place. This done, a panic or sudden fright fell and seized upon his army by night: and he removing from thence in the morning so soon as it was light, came to Abydus, [Id. ib. 7. cap. 42. 43.]

Here a toy took Xerxes in the head, to see all his army together; wherefore sitting in a Hall, which he had caused for that purpose to be there prepared, very sumptuous, and all of fair white stone; he there looking toward the sea, beheld all his Navy, and to the land-ward, all his land Forces at once, wherein the Phœnicians garb the prize, the sea-fight: and when that fight was done, wherein the number of his men, and the King took great pleasure, both in the fight itself, and also in the number of his men, and when he beheld all the sea of Hellespont covered with his ships, and all the shoares and plains about Abydus with his soldiers; and withal considering the shortness of mans life, and that none of all those men should be alive at one hundred years end, he wept, [Id. ib. cap. 44. 45. and Valer. Max. lib. 9. cap. 23.]

Xerxes, sending away his Uncle Artabanus to be Vice-roy at Susa, and there look to his house and kingdom; prepared himself now, to pass over into Europe: so soon therefore as the sun was up, himself holding a golden vial in his hand over the sea, made his prayer to the sun, that nothing might hinder him in the conquest of Europe, till he had gone to the utmost bounds thereof: And having thus said, he flung both the vial, and a golden goblet, and a Persian cimeter, into the sea. These things thus done, he sent his horse and foot to pass over the bridge on the right hand, which was toward Pontus; but over that on the left hand, which was toward the Egean-sea, he made all the bag and baggage, servants, and carriages to pass: spending eleven whole dayes, and as many nights in the transportation. When all was over, the Navy fell down out of the Hellespont westward, to a place called Sarpedons Foreland. His land army passing thence, past Chersonesus to Agora, turned aside to a place called the Black Bay: where a river of the same name, or Black water, was not able to make all his army drink. Having passed this River, the army held on their march westward, till they came to Doriscus, which is the name both of a sea-coast or shoar, and also of a spacious field in the country, of Thracia, which the great River Hebrus runneth thorough: and there they camped, [Id. from the end of chap. 52. to the beginning of 59.]

The Navy coming to this place, and being halted a shoar, Xerxes would needs again take a muster, first of his land Forces, and then of his sea. Of his Foot, Herodotus reckons 170 myriads, or 1700000 men, [chap. 60.] and of his Horse, besides Camels, and Chariots, 8 myriads, or 800000 horse, [chap. 87.] Among the Commanders of his Foot, he mentions two sons of his, begotten of his Queen Artistona, (whom I conceive to have been Esther) and of them he makes, the one called Arsamenes, Commander of the Ethiopians, to the southward of Egypt, [chap. 69.] and the other, named Gobryas, Leader of the Maryandeni, and Ligyes, and Syrians, [chap. 72.] Diodorus Siculus reck- oneth of his foot Forces 80 myriads, or eight hundred thousand men; not coming to

Herodo-

Herodotus his number of them by one half: and yet the number which Diodorus attributes to the Foot, that doth Ctesias allow only to the whole Army of all sorts, viz. 80 myriads, besides the Chariots. Ilocrates in his Panathenæica, saith, that in his army of Foot, there were 70 myriads; (i. e.) seven hundred thousand soldiers; which I call same number, [Elian, lib. 13. ch. 3.] of his Various History alloweth, and no more, to the whole Army. Ptolemy counts them 780000 men, [lib. 3. cap. 10.] where yet for Xerxes, Darius his army is named. Justin, out of Trogus, and Ocellus, following him, [lib. 1. ca. 10.] saies, that Xerxes had of his own subjects, seven hundred thousand, and three hundred thousand Auxiliaries from his friends, Emilius Probus, in the life of Themistocles, saith, that his Foot were seven hundred thousand men, and his Horse four hundred thousand.

His Ship for fight, were 1207, of which the Phœnicians furnished him; with 300, reckoning with them the Syrians dwelling in Palestine: as Herodotus saith, [lib. 7. ca. 89.] adding that by the name of Palestine, he meant all the sea-coast of Syria, as far as the borders of Egypt, [lib. 3. ca. 91.] which also in another place he affirmeth to have been anciently called Syria Palestine, [lib. 3. ca. 91.] and that the inhabitants thereof are all circumcised, [lib. 2. ca. 104.] for among other nations subject to the Persian Empire, the Jews also were one. And that he had of his country-men in this army against the Grecians, Josephus would faine prove out of those Verses of the Poet, [Chariots, lib. 1. cont. e. Apion.]

*His camp a nation strange to see, did follow;
Who spoke the language of Phœnicia;
And did the Hills of Solymi inhabit,
Near to a broad Lake which on both sides border:
Whose heads were rounded, and on their bald crowns,
Of a horse head the dried skin did wear.*

by which the learned Salmastius also conceives the Jews were meant: in lingua Hellenistica Officio; though Scaliger, [In notis sua ad fragmenta] and Cuneus, [lib. 2. de Rep. Hebraica, ca. 18.] and that most learned Bochartus in Geogr. Sacra Par. 2. lib. 1. ca. 6.] taketh them as understood of Solymi in Paphlagonia.

But besides these men of War, Herodotus tells us, that he had 1207. Ships of burden, some of 30, some of 50 oares a piece, besides lesser vessels, and ships to carry horses in of the number of 3000. [lib. 7. ca. 97.] Diodor. Sic. saith, there were above 1207. ships of War: for carriage of horses, 850, and 3000. ships of burden of 30 oares a piece; and the Poet Elchylus, in Perfis brings in a messenger reporting the number of those ships in this manner.

*I know that Xerxes ships a thousand were;
But full two hundred and seven ships he had,
Exceeding swift ones. So the same doth go.*

Now whether he means that the total sum of them was a thousand; and to the 207. swift ones a part of them; or whether both summes put together, make up the number of 1207, which agreeth best with the particular catalogue of the ships, which every nation contributed to this voyage, mentioned by Herodotus, and with the totals of them by him cast up, doth not very clearly appear out of the Verses themselves. Ctesias seems to favour the former opinion, and to doth Tully in the first of his Orations against Verres. Ilocrates in his Panegyric, and Panathenæica Orations, agreeth with the latter; and Lylius in his Epitaph, sets them down in a round summe, 1200. ships: adding, that there were over and above them, 3000. ships of burden: For to say with Justin, that there were ten hundred thousand ships of them, no doubt, cannot be right.

That in those 1207. ships which came out of Asia, there were 241400. men stowed, Herodotus collecteth, by placing 200. men in every bottom: besides 30 passengers in every one of them, of Persians, Medes and Saccans, which make in all 36210. men. But to the other 3000. ships of burden, he allows 240000. men, by placing in each of them, 80 persons, one with another: those which had more bearing out, those that had fewer in them. So that the whole Navy consisted of, 517610. men; to which if you add the number of the land soldiers, 1700000. Foot, and 800000. Horse, and the Arabians which had charge of the Camels, and the Lybians who intended the Waggon, amounting to about 20000. then will the whole number of them which followed Xerxes out of Asia into Greece, in all kinds, rise to the number of 2217610 thousand men, besides horse-boys and other servants, hangers-on, and besides those which were employed in furnishing the camp with corn and other victuals, [Herod. lib. 7. ca. 184.]

Xerxes marching now from Doriscus into Greece, as he came: to any country, took all that were fit, and made them serve him in the War, [Id. ib. ca. 118.] whereby his Navy grew greater by 120. ships; into every of which, putting as before 200. heads, his Sea-Forces were increased 24000. men: and Herodotus thinketh that his Army by land, was likewise increased 30 myriads; that is, 300 thousand men: though, Diod. Sic.

	 be of opinion, that they came to somewhat less than 200 thousand : and so the total of Xerxes his Army in European and Asiatic soldiers amounteth to 264,1610 men. Now the number of horse-boyes, and foot-boyes, and of hangers-on, and the tarpaulians in the corn-ships, and others, he thinks to be greater rather than less, than that of the soldiers came unto. So that if that former summe should be but doubled, the number of those which Xerxes carried by sea to Sepias, and by land to Thermopylae, would come to 528,320 men; for as for the women which baked, and whores, and eunuchs, no man can tell the true number of them : no more can he of the horses and other beasts, in drought, or burden, and Indian dogs with their keepers that followed the Gentlemen in the camp for their pleasure, so that it is no wonder, if in many rivers failed some bellies of so many as were there of all kinds to fill, [Id. ib. c. 185, 186, 187.] as Juneval saith, [Strayr. 10.] We now believe that many rivers deep, Did fail the Persian army, at a dinner.   and therefore the lesse wonder, if both Ilocrates in his Panathenaic oration, and Plutarch in his Parallels, report, that Xerxes drew with him into Greece, 500000. of men.   And yet in all this great number, was there not a man found comparable to Xerxes himself, for the beauty and goodlikenesse of his person; or one that might seem more worthy of that great Empire than himself, if we believe Herodotus, [lib. 7. cap. 187.] that as Saul among the children of Israel, [1 Sam. 10. 23, 24.] so here, Xerxes might well seem to have had, ὁ δὲ αὐτὸς μεγάλῳ, (i. e.) a stature fit for, and worthy of a crown, and yet if you speak of him as for a king, saith Justin out of Trogus, you will find cause to commend his wealth, (fore-spoken of by Daniel 11. 2.) rather than his wits, of which, saith he, there was such infinite abundance in his kingdom, as when whole rivers failed the multitude of his army, yet his wealth could never be exhausted : as for himself, he was ever seen last in the fight, and first in the flight, fearful when any danger was, but swift up with pride, when there was none.   Leonidas king of Sparta, with an army of 4000 Grecians, opposed himself against him and his whole army, consisting of three hundred thousand men, at the straits of Thermopylae in Thessaly, to called from the hot springs of water, which there do rise, as appears by the Epitaph which was made upon them, recorded by Herod, [lib. 7. cap. 228.]   Μυριάδων τρεῖς ἑκατομμύρια ἄνδρες ἔκ τε Περσῶν καὶ Σπαρτῶν πέριε, (i. e.) And yet Justin relating the same story out of Trogus, [lib. 2. c. 11.] saith, that 600 men, brake into the camp of five hundred, or as in Orosius, of six hundred thousand men. And Ilocrates in his Archidamus saith, that one thousand of them, went against seven hundred thousand of the Persians : But those whom Ilocrates calls a thousand, Justin and Orosius, six hundreds and Diodorus, five hundreds, are to be understood of those, who when the rest of the Grecians were sent away, stood it out to the last brunt, in which they all, together with their king Leonidas died; of which number, 300 were Spartans, the rest, thebians and Thebans, [Herod. lib. 7. cap. 223, 224.] for whom amends was fully made by 20000 of the enemies then slain upon the place, [Id. ib. c. 24.]   While these things thus passed at Thermopylae by land, sundry encounters and fights at sea happened also about Artemisium, a fore-land of Eubaea, [Id. ib. cap. 15.] Eurymedon, a Lacedaemonian, was chief Commander or Ammiral of the fleet, which consisted of 273 ship, besides 9 others, of 50 oares a peece, of which 127 were let out by the Athenians, and Plataneas, as Herod. saith, [ib. cap. 1.] whereas yet, Ilocrates, in his Aro-pagical oration, saith, that the Athenians furnished only sixty of them : but Emelius Probus delivers, that the whole Grecian fleet consisted of 300 saile, and that 200 of them were of the Athenians, in this Themistocles, Herodotus, Diodorus, and Probus, all say, that this was a drawn battle on either side, though Ilocrates in his Panegyric oration, and Elian, [lib. 2. cap. 25.] Varia Histor. talk as of a great blow, which the Persians received in it; yet the day when this batel was fought, is laid by Elian, to have been upon the 	 the sixth of Thargelion, which was the second month, of the spring time, with the Athenians, agree not well with the relation of Herodotus, who [lib. 8. cap. 12.] saith, that this was done in the midle of Summer, to wit, near after the end of the spring, at what time the Olympic games, in the midle of all these troubles, were kept in Greece, [ib. c. 26.] to wit, in the 75 Olympiads; wherein, besides others, Dionysius, Halicarnassensis, in his Roman Antiquities, [l. 9.] saith it was, that Xerxes made war upon the Grecian.   Four months after his passing the Hellespont with his army, Xerxes coming to Athens, found it abandoned by all the inhabitants thereof; what time Callias was Pætor, or Lord Chancellor there, [Herod. lib. 8. c. 51.] In which year also, Anaxagoras of Clazomenæ, a scholar of Anaximenes the Milesian, being but 20 years of age, was made public reader of Philology in Athens, as Lærtius, out of Demetrius Phalericus in his Catalogue of the 10 Pætors, or Lord Chancellors of Athens, in his life reporteth, Philology being then first brought out of Ionia, and planted in the city of Athens, as Clemens Alexæus, [lib. 1. Strom.] saith, to wit, at what time, Xerxes, when he had taken Athens, took also a multitude of books, which Pisistratus, and the Athenians had there stored up, and setting all the rest of the city, (save the Castle) on fire, sent them away into Persia, as A. Gellius [lib. 17. Noct. Attica.] yaluteth. In which exception yet of the Castle, I cannot easily assent unto him; since Herodotus saith plainly, that all that Acropolis or Citadel was burnt down, [lib. 8. cap. 53.] and so doth Ctesias and Diodorus Sic. further affirmed, that the Temple of Minerva, which was undoubtedly in the Castle, was then also ruined.   The further Xerxes marched into Greece, the more nations still joyined with him; the Melienes, the Dorienes, the Locri, the Boethians, Caristians, Andrians, Tenians, and sundry other : whereby it came to passe, that his forces, by land and sea, were no less, at Salamis and Athens, than when he first landed at Sepias; and came to Thermopylae, [Herod. lib. 8. cap. 66.] which those verses of Elchilus before mentioned, seem also to imply, where he tells us, that at the fight at Salamis, there were 1000. or 1207 ships of his, and that Ctesias sayes, that in that fight, the Persians had a thousand ships; not to speak of Plutarch in his discourse, De glor. Athen. (i. e.) of the glory of the Athenians, where he saith, that that victory of Themistocles at Salamis, was gotten with the losse of a thousand ships of the enemies. At which sea fight before Salamis, the Grecians fleet was far greater than when they fought at Artemisium, to wit, 380 tall ships of war; whereof there were in all but 16, from Sparta; but the Athenians had there 180, [Id. ib. cap. 43, 44, 48, 62.] And with him, for the number of the Athenian ships, as A. Gellius, [lib. 8. cap. 61.] not of Diod. Sic. [lib. 15.] where speaking of the Athenians, they say, that they had in it, 200 ships, πεντακοντα, (i. e.) fully manned and furnished, Elchilus sayes, that the whole number of the Grecian ships in the fight before Salamis, was but 300, besides ten other of an extraordinary bignesse : though Ctesias writes, that there were 700 of the Grecian fleet. There were lost in this fight of the Grecian ships, to the number of 40; of the Persian, 200; besides those which were taken with the men in them, as Diodor. Sic. [lib. 11.] hath it, whereas Ctesias reports, that the Persians in that fight, lost 500 ships. But Artemisia, the Queen of Halicarnassus, who came to aid Xerxes in this war, behaved her self most manfully in this fight; so that as in Xerxes, a man might see a womanly timourousnesse, so in her he might perceive, a most heroic courage, [Justin. lib. 2. cap. 12.] in somuch, that Xerxes himself upon this occasion was heard to say, that his men had plaid the women, and the women the men, in that service. [Herod. lib. 8. c. 88.]   And so it came to passe, that by the leading indeed of Eurymedon, the Lacedaemonian, but the sage and prudent counsell, and great prowess of Themistocles the Athenian; a victory was gotten at Salamis every way equal to that at Marathon : but in setting down the time when this battle was fought, Plutarch is found very divers and differing from himself. For in the life of Lyfander, and in his discourse, of the glory of the Athenians, he placeth it as done in the 16 day of the month Munichus, (which is the first of the vernal months, with the Athenians; but in the Life of Camillus, as on the 20 day of Boedromian, which was their third month in Summer. It is true, in the Bay of Saron, which is otherwise called, the Bay of Salamis, as [Sirabo in his eighth book] witnesseth, between the two Islands of Salamis and Egina, there was a nights fight at sea, between 10 Lacedaemonian ships, commanded by Gorgopas, and 13 Athenian ships, commanded by Eurymedon, near unto Zosteræ fore-land of the Isthmus of Attica, in the dayes of Artaxerxes memor. king of Persia, of which Xenophon, in his fifth book of his History of the Greeks, maketh mention in this wise. In a sea fight made by moon-light, Gorgopas took 4 tall ships of war, and drawing them after him, carried them away to Egina : and the rest of the Athenian fleet fled home to their port of Piræum, but because as upon the 16 day of that Lunar month among the Athenians, upon which Gorgopas let upon that small fleet of the Athenians, it happened to be the full of the moon, by the benefit whereof, the Athenian fleet saved it self, with the losse only of 4 ships; therefore did the Athenians as it seemeth consecrate that day ever after to Diana, and kept it holy-day to her honour; whereupon it was, that Plutarch con-foundeth this latter sea fight, fought at Salamis, with that other, fought in the same place, against

gainst Xerxes, in that discourse of his, of the glory of the Athenians; thorough error wrote of it in this manner: They consecrated, saith he, the 16 day of the month Munichion to Diana, because upon that day, after the victory gotten by the Grecians, the Goddess appeared full that night; out that the victory of the Greeks against Xerxes was gotten about the 20 day of Boedromion, both Plutarch in a Treatise of his, Of days, quoted by himself in the life of Camillus declareth it; and it plainly appeareth in Herodotus: for that at that time, the Eleusian Mysteries were celebrated by the Athenians, Herodotus plainly sheweth, [lib. 8. c. 25.] the chief day of which solemnity, was upon the twentieth of the month Boedromion, on which the mystic Pomp of Iacchus was openly shewed to the people, as appeareth, out of the same Plutarch, in the life of Camillus above mentioned: whence also it was, that when Themistocles would stay his country-men from pursuing the enemies, after their defeat at Salamis, when they fled, used this speech unto them: Non, sicut he, let us stay in Greece, and take care of our persons and families; and look to the tillage, and sowing of our land, seeing the enemy is quiet & at hand of it; and when the Spring comes on, then will we take a time to sail into Hellespont and Ionia. Argument sufficient, that the Persians were vanquished at Salamis, not in the beginning of the Spring; but in the latter end of summer.

After the night Xerxes put to death certain of the Phœnicians; which were the first that fled, and threatened the rest of them with punishments answerable to their desertings; for fear whereof, the Phœnicians returned that day to Attica; but the night after, they put over all into Asia, [Diod. Sic. l. 11. in the 1 year of the 75 Olympiads.] Many other ships also, fearing more the rage of the King, than the fury of the enemy, took away, every one to his own home, [Justin lib. 2. c. 12.]

Xerxes, terrified with this disaster at sea, committed his sons to Artimisia the Queen, by her to be transported to Ephesus, with Hermotimus their Governor, [Herod. lib. 8. c. 101. c. 107.]

Cleombrotus of Sparta, brother to Leonidas, which died at Thermopylae, to stop the passage against Xerxes his coming by land into Peloponnesus, caused a wall to be drawn athwart the neck of land which is called, Isthmus Corinthiacus, [lib. 8. c. 71.] but whilst he was offering of a sacrifice against the Persians, the sun in the firmament lost his light, and grew dark: whereupon he withdrew his army which was employed in that fortification, and shortly after died: unto whom succeeded his son Paulanias, as continuing the main and Tutor of Plistarchus, a child, the son of Leonidas deceased, [Id. lib. 9. c. 10. l.] But the Ptolemaic account gives us an Eclipse of the Sun of 8 digits and 32 minutes, upon the 2 day of October, after the Julian Calendar, at one of the clock 39 minutes in the afternoon, in this year.

Themistocles, to send Xerxes packing the more speedily out of Greece, sent a feigned messenger to him from Salamis, that the Grecians had a purpose to send a Fleet of Ships to Hellespont, there to burn or break his bridge; which he no sooner heard, but he provided with all speed to get him gone out of Europe into Asia, [Herod. lib. 8. c. 110. Diod. Sic. lib. 11. in 1 year of 75 Olympiads: and Plut. in the life of Themistocles.]

Resolving therefore to be gone, he sent away his Fleet from Phalerus to Hellespont, to keep the bridge there, for his passage: and himself with Mardonius, and his land army accompanying him, marched speedily towards Thessalia, [Herod. lib. 8. c. 107. 113. 115.]

Mardonius coming with Xerxes into Thessalia, chose out of all his army, three hundred thousand men, which he kept with him to go on with the conquest of Greece; and with them, because the time of the year for keeping the field was past, he wintered in Thessalia, [lib. 8. c. 113. 114.] and herein with him agrees Justin out of Trogius, [lib. 2. c. 4. l. 3.] and Plutarch in the life of Aristides, though Diod. Sic. saith, that there stayed with him no less than four hundred thousand men.

In this means while, the Lacedæmonians by the command of the Oracle at Delphos, sent a Herald to Xerxes, to require reparation of him for the death of their King Leonidas: unto whom he returned this answer: that Mardonius should pay them their due. After which, leaving Mardonius in Thessalia, he hastened away to the Hellespont; taking along with him a very inconsiderable part of his army for his guard: but left the rest to be brought after him, by Hydarnes, [Herod. lib. 8. c. 114. 115. 118.]

As for those land Forces which he left behind him with Mardonius: first a famine, then a pestilence, fell upon them; and so foule was the mortality among them, that the half-way lay strowed with the dead carcases of them, and both birds and beasts of prey, followed the army by the sent, where ever they went, [lib. 8. c. 115. Justin lib. 2. cap. 13.]

In Asia, they that were called Archæanactides, held the kingdom of Bosphorus Cimærius 40 years long, [Diod. Sic. lib. 12. l.] In 3 year of 85 Olympiads. These had their beginning from Archæanactes of Mitylene; who is said to have built Sigæum, with the stones digged out of the ruins of Troy, [Strabo, lib. 13.]

Xerxes at 45 dayes end, came to the passage at Hellespont, as saith Herod. [lib. 8. c. 115.] Emil. Probos bates a third part of that time in the life of Themistocles: where he faith, that upon the way wherein he spent six months, in going into Europe, upon the same he spent less than thirty dayes, in his return from thence into Asia.

Xerxes finding his bridge broken down with the rage of Winter-stormes; for very fear, put over in a poor filther-boat: And truly it was a thing worth to be noted, and a rare example of humane frailty and change of thing in this world, to see him he skulking in a little wherry, whom a little before, the whole Sea seemed too little to contain; and him destitute of a page to wait upon him under whose army, the very earth earl-while, seemed to groane for the burden of it, [Justin lib. 2. cap. 13.]

The land Forces also, which followed him under the conduct of Hydarnes, coming thither, and finding the bridge broken down, passed over in boats to Abydos; and there finding more plenty of victuals than they had upon their way, what with gorging themselves with meat; what with change of water, they dyed by heaps; the rest accompanied Xerxes to Sardes, [Herod. lib. 8. c. 117.]

Xerxes, whilst he was upon the way to Sardes, sent Megabysus to spoil the Temple of Delphos, but when he desired to be excused, Matarcas an Eunuch undertook it, and having done the errand he was sent in, returned to him, [Ctesias.]

News being brought to Susa, by the Courtiers which were sent, that Xerxes had taken Athens, put the Persians into such a fit of mirth, that they strewed all the streets with mirtle boughs, and burnt frankincense in them: and let themselves wholly to sacrificing, and feasting: But when the second tidings came of his overthrow at Salamis; that put them into such a consternation of mind, that every man rent his garments, and filled all places with howlings and lamentations, [Herod. l. 8. c. 99.] which mourning of theirs, Ecliyulus hath described, and let out to the life in Persia.

The fleet which remained, and the sea-men which were therein left, having waited over the land forces, out of Cherfoneus to Abydos, wintered at Cuma in Eolia, [Herod. lib. 8. c. 130.]

Artabazus the son of Pharnabazus, having accompanied Xerxes with 60 thousand soldiers to Hellespont, seeing him safely landed in Asia side, took his journey back again and staid about Pallene: seeing that Mardonius himself had taken up his winter quarter in Macedonia and Thessalia, and looked not after the rest of the army: and during his abode there, finding that the City of Poidea, with Pallene, had already revolted from the Persian, and Olynthus in termes to do the like, he clapt down before Poidea and Olynthus and besieged them both at once, and having taken Olynthus, and put all the Botician inhabitants thereof to the sword, he committed the place to the keeping of Critobolus of Torona, a Chalcedonian born, [Id. lib. 8. c. 126. 127.]

When the Persians had now lain 3 months before Poidea, a huge tide of the sea, brake in upon them, in their trenches, which made them raise their siege; yet many of them perished with that inundation; and when others sought to save themselves by swimming, the Poideans went in boats, and knockt them in the head; those that escaped, Artabazus took, and carried with him into Thessalia to Mardonius, [lib. 8. c. 129.]

In the first of the Spring, the remainder of the Persian fleet, which had wintered at Cuma, put over to the Isle of Samos, where some other of their fellows had taken up their winter quarter. The greatest part in this Navie, were Persian and Median soldiers; and to them came shortly after certain Commanders, as, Mardonius Fitz Bargeus, and Antanites Fitz Artachens, who staying there, kept all Ionia from revolting, having a fleet of 300 sail, (reckoning in the Ionians that were with them) at their command, [lib. 8. c. 130.] But Diodorus saith, that they were no less than 400 sail, which lay then at Samos, waiting the motion of the Ionians: in this 3 year of the 75 Olympiads.

The Grecian fleet consisting of one hundred and ten ships, under two Commanders, Leotychides king of the Spartans, and Xanthippus an Athenian, went to Egina, where certain messengers came to them out of Ionia; to beseech them, all delay set apart, to come and relieve them in Ionia; and with much ado, drew them as far as to Delos, thitherward, [Herod. lib. 8. c. 131. 132.] and yet Diodorus tells us, that having staid some certain dayes at Egina, they then, of themselves, sailed to Delos, with 250 tall ships of war.

Xerxes is said to have built both a Palace, and a Castle at Celene in Phrygia, Xen. in his Expedition of Cyrus, [lib. 1.]

Mardonius with his army came to Athens, not yet rehobited, ten months after it was first taken by Xerxes: and there ruined and burnt down, what ever Xerxes had left standing, and thence marched into the country of Megare, which was the farthest place that the Persians were at westward, in all Greece, [Herodotus, lib. 9. cap. 3. 13. 14.]

Whiles the Grecian fleet lay at Delos, messengers came to them from Samos, praying them to succour both themselves, and the rest of the Greek nation, which dwelt in Asia, against the Persians. Leotychides the king of Sparta, at a Council of war, resolved to set all the Greek Cities at liberty from the Persians: and they entering a league with the Samians, came with their whole fleet to Samos, and lay close under the Temple of Juno, provi-providing there for a sea fight, against the Persians, [Id. ib. cap. 89. 91. 95. with Diod. Sic. lib. 11.]

The Commanders of the Persian navy, continuing still at Samos, and hearing that the Grecians were coming against them, and finding themselves not able to match them at sea; suffered the Phenician ships all to be gone; but with the rest sailed to Micalæ, which is a fore-land, or promontory in Ionia: where the land army lay, left there on purpose for Xerxes, to keep Ionia in order; consisting of 60000 men, under the command of Tigranes, who was the tallest and goodliest man to look to, of all the Persians: There, granes, who was the tallest and goodliest man to look to, of all the Persians: There, near to the Temple of Ceres, of Eleusis, they drew up their ships, and enclosed them with a rampart, which they fortified with stones and stakes, and such materials as the place afforded, [Herodotus, lib. 9. cap. 95. 96.] and withal, sent to Sardes, and other places adjoining; for more land forces: so that they made up a body of an hundred thousand men: making provision also, of all other things necessary for the war, [Diodorus, lib. 11.]

In an encounter of the horse, near a place called Erythræ in Bootia, between the Grecians and Persians, a commander of the Persians called Masfius, but by the Greeks, Macifas, happened to be slain; for whom, great lamentation was made by the Persians, [Herodotus, lib. 9. cap. 20. 22. 24. and Plutarch, in the Life of Arifides.]

The Grecians, under the conduct of Paulanias the son of Cleombrotus, routed the Persian army at Platea: which, as Ctesias saith, consisted of one hundred and twenty thousand fighting men. Emil. Probus, in his Paulanias, saith there were of them, two hundred thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse; and Plutarch in the life of Arifides affirms, that there were noteworthily, than three hundred thousand: to which three hundred thousand, Herodotus addeth also, all the Grecian auxiliaries, which Mardonius had then with him in pay, which he guesseth to have amounted to fifty thousand, [lib. 9. cap. 31. 1. and Diodorus Siculus, to the 75 Olympiads, saith, that Mardonius, besides those which Xerxes left him, had out of Thracia and Macedonia, and other confederate places, above two hundred thousand souldiers, and that he had in all, an army consisting of five hundred thousand men: In the Grecian army, Ctesias reckons not above seven thousand and three hundred men; whereas Herodotus and Plutarch ascribe, that of the Athenian party alone, there were no less than eight thousand men: as Diodorus Siculus, Trogus, Pempeius, and Orosius, or of one hundred and ten thousand, as Herodotus, [lib. 9. cap. 29.] saies: of whom there fell in this battle, not above one thousand three hundred and sixty, as Plutarch in the Life of Arifides reports; though Diod. Sic. saith, there were slain of them in that fight, above 10000.

Mardonius the son in law, (not of Xerxes, as Emil. Probus, in the life of Paulanias hath it, but of Darius, who was father to Xerxes, as I shewed before, in the year of the world 3510. General of all this army, was slain in this fight, by a stone flung at him, by Arimnestus, or Arimnestus, a man of Sparta, [Herodotus, lib. 1. cap. 63.] Plutarch in the Life of Arifides, and Paulanias, [lib. 1.] for we may not believe Ctesias, who saies, that he was only hurt, and to got away for that time, and that being commanded afterward, to spoil the Temple of Apollo, he was there killed, with a horne of baile that fell upon him: though Justin out of Trogus, and out of Justin Orosius reports, that Mardonius, accompanied with a very small number, escaped away thence, as out of a ship-dock.

The Persian army, having lost their General, fled to a fortreffe of theirs, made up of wood, and the Grecians, having forced it, slew therein above one hundred thousand of them, [Diodorus Siculus,] so that of three hundred thousand of them, there were not left full three thousand men; besides 40000 only, which fled away with Artabazus, [Her. lib. 9. c. 69.]

Leotychides, who commanded at sea, coming to Mycale, dealt with the Ionians to fall off from the Persians, whom they served: and what with his own army, what with their help, he obtained there a most memorable victory; wherein he slew above 30 thousand Persians; besides Mardonius, who commanded them by sea, and Tigranes, who was General by land: but two other great Commanders of their fleet, Artayntes, and Ibrahimites fled; the rest that escaped, betook themselves to the tops of the promontory of Mycale, [Id. ib. from c. 97. to 104. with Diod. Sic. lib. 11.]

Both these fights fell out near to two Temples of Ceres of Eleusis, and upon the same day of the same month: that at Platea in Europe, early in the morning; that other at Mycale in Asia, later in the afternoon; and so forth winged was fame in spreading the news hereof, that at so far a distance, and in so few hours space, the report of the victory at Platea, came to them at Mycale; the same day, before they began to fight there, [Id. ib. cap. 99. lib. 1. c. 14.] though Diod. Sic. thinks (and that more probably) that Leotychides heard nothing at all of what was done at Platea, but cunningly cast abroad such a rumor among his souldiers, to put the more courage thereby into their hearts, by way of a stratagem. Now the day of these two battels [Elzan, Var. Hist. lib. 2. ca. 25.], saith, was the sixth of the month Thargelion, the 2 month in the Springs, which the Athenians; which Plutarch with more judgement saith, was in the month Bordromion, which was the 3 month in Summer; and that either upon the 3 day thereof; as [in the life of Camillus, and in his discourse of the glory of the Athenians,] or upon the fourth, as in [the life of Arifides:] and to this fight at Micalæ, was in the second year after Xerxes his first passage over into Greece, [Herod. lib. 7. ca. 80.]

cast

Hereupon all Ionia revolted from the Persian, [Herod. lib. 9. ca. 103.] together with the Eolians and Ilands bordering upon both, [Diod. Sic. lib. 11.]

The Greeks having set fire upon, and consumed the Persian ships and camps; returned to the Isle of Samos, and there entered into a consultation how to transplant all the Ionian nation (yea and the Eolian too, as Diod. hath it) out of Asia, (where they seemed to be too openly exposed to the danger of the Persian cruelty) into Greece: But the Athenians fearing least the Ionians, which were now a Colony of their own, would by this means become common to the rest of Greece; opposed it, and told them, that themselves, as tied to them in blood, would never be wanting to their defence; and therefore desired that they might continue still where they were in Asia, [Herod. ib. ca. 105. Diod. ib. in a year of 75 Olympiads.]

They of the continent of Greece, entered into a firm association and league with them of Samos, Chios, Lesbos, and other Ilanders, who had joyned in this War against the Persian; and having plighted their faith each to other with a solemn oath, to continue firm in this association, and never to break the bond now made between them: failed in a body towards Hellefpont, and in their way thitherward, came to an anchor first at a Foreland called Lectium; being there taken short by a contrary winde: but the winde coming faire again, they passed on, and came to Abydus; and when they found the bridges there already broken down, which was the principal cause of their going thither, Leotychides with his men of Peloponnesus returned home; but the Athenians with their Captain Xanthippus, and (as Thucydides saith) with their associates out of Ionia and Hellefpont, which had revolted from the Persians, passed over from Abydus into Chersonesus, and there besieged Sestos: now Artayntes, a Persian born, and a wicked man, was Governour of that province, appointed by Xerxes: and because that Town was fenced with a very strong Wall, therefore as well others of the neighbouring places; as Oebalus himself, a Persian born, who had laied up all the Flags and Streamers, and other furniture of the bridges at Cardya, left that place, and put himself into Sestos also, [Herod. ib. ca. 105. 113. 114. 115.]

Artabazus the son of Pharnaces, who with 40000 men fled out of the battel at Platea, hastened away thorough the countries of Phocis, Thessalie, and Macedonia, into Thracia; and cutting the nearest way over-land, came unto Byzantium: having left many of his men behind him in his march; which were either knockt in head by the Thracians, or died with hunger, and travel on the way: and from Byzantium he got shipping, and passed over into Asia, [Id. ib. ca. 65. 69. 76. 88.]

But those few which had saved themselves in the top of the rocks, in the Foreland or Promontory of Micalæ, repaired to Sardes, from whence Xerxes was not yet gone. In that journey, when Malyses, one of the sons of Darius Hyfates, had charged Artayntes, one of the chief Commanders of the Fleet at Mycale, among other reproachful words, that he had carried himself basely in that service, and more like a woman than a man; and was therefore assaulted by Artayntes with his naked sword: Xenagoras of Halicanassus stepped in, bare off the blow, and saved Malyses from that present danger: and Xerxes, for so saving his brothers life, made him Governour of all Cilicia, [ib. cap. 106.]

But whilst Xerxes spent his time at Sardes, he there fell desperately in love with his brother Malyses wife; whom when he had often solicited to adultery, and could not prevail that way, he thereupon married Artaynta, hers and his brother Malyses daughter, to his own son: Darius hoping to get his will of her the more easily by this occasion. Which done, and the wedding ended, he returned toward Sufa, [ib. cap. 107.] leaving part of his army at Sardes, to continue the War against the Grecians, [Diod. Sic. an. 2. of 75. Olympiads.]

3526. Xerxes in his flight burnt the Oracle of Apollo Didymus in Branchis, as he did all the other Temples in Asia, save that at Epheus; thole of Branchis having, without resistance, delivered up the treasury of their god, went altogether along with him, leaving least, if they stayed behind, they should have been punished for sacrilege and treason both. [Strabo, lib. 14. with Solinus cap. 40.] Herodotus saith that Xerxes, going from Sardes, went to Sufa: Diodorus, that he went to Ecabante, Ctesias writeth, that he went from Babylon to Persia: Arrianus in his book of Alexanders Acts, affirmeth that coming to Babylon, he there demolished the Temple of Belus, and all other consecrated places; and with them, the Sepulchre of Belus; as Strabo, [lib. 16.] saith, who also there tells us, that he took away the statue of Belus, made all of massie gold, of twelve cubits high; and when the Priests opposed it, and would not suffer it to be removed, he slew him also, as we read in Herod. [lib. 1. cap. 189.]

		While the Athenians lay at the siege of Sestos, and the Autumn coming on, could not tell it, they fell into a consultation to leave it; but the people within, were so near want for famine, that they were faine to boile their very bed-cords and eat them; so driven that Artayctes and Oebalus, with many of the Persians, gat down the walls by night, and fled; which the inhabitants perceiving early the next morning, signified the same to the Athenians, and opened their gates unto them, [Herodotus , lib. 9, cap. 116, 117.]
		When there was now a great number of prisoners taken, what at Sestos, what at Byzantium by the Athenians, and their confederates in the army; the confederates of their own accord, offered to refer the division and sharing of that prey, to Cimon, a young Gentleman of the Athenians, to be made as he should think good; and they would stand to it, who falling presently to work, set all the persons on the one hand, and all the cloaths and ornaments which they wore, on the other, and then bad them take their choice; saying, that the Athenians would content themselves, with that part which they left: their Associates, by the perswasion, of Hierophylus of Samos, chose the cloaths and ornaments, as of far greater value, than the bare bodies of the prisoners, and left the bodies, as not made for labour, to the Athenians. But soon after, the friends and kinsmen of the prisoners, coming out of Phrygia and Lydia, redeemed those prisoners at a great rate, wherewith Cimon maintained the fleet four whole moneths after, and brought more over a very considerable stock of silver and gold into the treasury at Athens. This act first gave a reputation of wit and wisdom unto Cimon among the Athenians; and they having gotten so much money by the bargain, laughed at their fellows, by whom they had formerly been laughed at, [Plutarch , in the life of Cimon, and Polyanius , lib. 1. Strabo.]
		When Oebalus had gotten away into Thracia, the Thracians, called Abstrinhi , took him, and sacrificed him to their god Pleistorus ; and put his followers, some to one kind of death, some to another. Artayctes and his followers, they seized on at Egos potamus, and carryed him prisoner to Sestos: and by the sea side, where Xerxes had made his bridge, or as others say, upon a hill near the city Madyrus , set up gibets, and there hung them up, stoning his own son first to death before his eyes. These things thus done, the Athenians returned into Greece, carrying with them besides moneys, the flags and streamers, ornaments of the bridges, which had been made over the Hellespont, purposing to hang them up as trophies in their Temples. And this was all that was done this year, [Herod. lib. 9, cap. 118, 119, 120.] Xanthippus leaving a garrison in Sestos, dismissed all his strangers, and he with his own companies returned to Athens: and so the war of the Mides, as they call it, came to an end, after it had lasted full two years, [Diod. Sic. lib. 11. in the 75. Olympiade.]
		Bagoates the Eunuch, when he had continued sitting by the tomb of Darius 7 years, died, [Ctesias]	4236.	478.
		Megabytus accused his wife Amyris, Xerxes his daughter, of adultery; who blamed his daughter for it, very sharply, [Ctesias] whilst he himself lay wallowing all the while in adultery and incest both; for turning his lewd affection now from his Brother Malfites his wife, to their daughter Artayctas, whom he had now made his own daughter in laws, he lay with her continually at Susa. [Herod. lib. 9, cap. 107, 108.]
3527.		Paulanias the son of Cleombrotus, who was sent General of the Greeks from Lacedaemonia, to free such Greek cities, as were yet held by the garrisons of the Persians, with 20 ships out of Peloponnesus, and 30 more from Athens. [Diodor. laith 50.] commanded by Aristides made a voyage into Cyprus, and there relieved many cities, which were hitherto held by Persian garrisons to their native liberty, [Thucid. lib. 1. Diodor. Sic. in the 4 year of the 75 Olympiade.]	4237.	477.
		Xerxes celebrating his coronation day, gave to his Queen Amestris, who asked it of him for a boon, Malfites his brothers wife; whose paps, nostrils, ears, lips, and tongue he presently caused to be cut off, and so sent her home again; whereupon Malfites, conspiring with his own children, purposed to get him privily away with them into the province of Bactria, wherof himself was then Governour, and to raise both them and the Sace to a rebellion against the king, and all that were in his company put to the sword, and both he and his children, and all that were in his company put to the sword, [Herod. lib. 9, from chap. 108. to 112.] And that government of Bactria, Xerxes bestowed upon his own son Hytaspes, [Diod. Sic. in the 4 year of the 78 Olympiade.]
3528.		Paulanias, after his return out of Cyprus, went and took Byzantium: and then, without the privacy of his associates in the war, sent the Persians whom he had then taken (some of them being Xerxes his near friends and kinsmen, giving it out that they were fled) home to Xerxes, safe and sound, and all this by himself he negotiated, by one Gongylus an Eretrian born, whom also he employed with letters unto Xerxes, wherein he	4238.	476.

	he desired his daughter in marriage: and in lieu thereof he undertook and promised, to bring Sparta, and all Greece, into his subjection. Glad was Xerxes at this news, and presently wrote back unto him by Artabazus the son of Pharnaces, whom for this purpose he dispatched away to the sea side; that at a shorter distance he might the more easily communicate his counsels with Paulanias: and therefore gave him the Government of the province of Dalcylis, calling home Magabates, who was Governour there before. And when Paulanias upon these hopes grew more insolent than before, and began to live after the Persian garbe, and carryed himself more ruggedly and imperiously towards those who were in league with that State, the greater part of them, and especially the Ionians, and others who had been lately freed from their slavery under the Persian, fell all to the Athenians, and desired rather to serve under them, [Thucid. lib. 1.]
3529.	Paulanias being hereof accused by the friends and associates of the Spartans, was presently sent for, to return home from Byzantium; where being found guilty and condemned for some private misdemeanors; yet was wholly acquitted from all suspicion of treason against the State: Nevertheless he was put from the Government of Hellespont; yet thither he went again without leave asking, in a ship of his own providing; to the end that under colour of prosecuting the war on the behalf of the Grecians in those parts, he might the better negotiate and drive on his own designs with Xerxes: and therefore when the Athenians would not suffer him to nestle in Byzantium, he returned not to Sparta, but staid at Colone in Troas: whereupon he was again accused at Sparta, that he held intelligence with the Persian, and that it was for no good, that he stayed hovering so long in those parts. Wherefore, being sent for again by the Ephori, so soon as he came, they threw him into prison: but upon a hearing he was again acquitted, [Id. lib.]	4239.	475.
3530.	But when the Principality of Greece, in hatred to Paulanias was taken from the Lacedaemonians, and settled upon the Athenians: they under a colour of revenging the wrong done to the several countries by the common enemy, made a tax of what monies, and what ships, the particular cities should contribute against the Persians: wherunto the cities both of Greece, and of the Grecians in Asia, readily agreed, for the common safety sake. The first tax made, amounted to 460. (not as Diodorus hath it, 560.) talents: to be laid up in the Isle of Delos, as in the common treasury of all Greece, [Thucid. lib. 1. Diod. lib. 11. Justin. lib. 16, cap. 3. Plutarch and Emil. Probus , in the life of Aristides .]	4240.	474.
3531.	Paulanias, being discovered by Argilus, his love-boy, to whom he committed his last letters sent to Artabazus, was by the Ephori thrust to death, [Thucid. lib. 1. Diod. lib. 11. Emil. Prob. in the life of Paulanias .]
	Artabazus, an Hyrcanian borne, Captain of the Guard, and one who was above all others of greatest credit and authority with King Xerxes, as his father Artaspas was before with Darius; conspiring with Mithridates an Eunuch, Chamberlaine to the King, (Ctesias calls him Spamiros or Alpamitres) who was his intimate friend and near kinsman, being let into the bed-chamber with his seven sons, all robustious young men, by night, slew Xerxes as he lay in his bed: and in the deep of the night, went speedily to Artaxerxes, told him that Darius, (who was the eldest of the three sons of Xerxes) had killed his father, that he might the sooner come to the Crown, (which Eliau. lib. 13, cap. 3, delivers, as if it had been so indeed:) but by this false tale, he perswaded Artaxerxes, to let the Kings Guard upon his brother Darius; and they slew him, [Ctesias , Diod. Justin. lib. 3, cap. 1.]
	Thus by Artabazus his means, Artaxerxes came to the Crown. Ctesias , who was a man of a milde disposition, and full of magnanimity withal: surnamed Longimanus , because his right hands was longer than his left. [Plutarch in the beginning of the life of Artaxerxes .] But the 7 first months of his reign, are by Euseb. in his Chron. attributed to Artabazus: because that for so long, he ruled all things, as it should seem, in Artaxerxes name; for though Diodorus intimates, that Artabazus himself was presently done to death, after his murders committed upon Xerxes and Darius; yet that there was some time passed between, appears by the more full narrations of the matter, both by Ctesias , and also by Justin .
	Themistocles of Athens, being suspected of the conspiracy with Paulanias for the betraying of Greece into the hands of the Persians, was searched for, and had he been taken, had out of all doubt died for it: and therefore he fled out of Greece, and came to Pydna a Town lying in the Theraic bay of Macedonia; & there finding a Merchant's ship going into Ionia, put himself aboard her. But by tempest, he was carried into the middle of the Athenian army, which lay at the siege of Naxos. But the Master of the Barque being well fed by Themistocles, lay a whole night and a day at an anchor without the Athenian Fleet; and so when the tempest was over, came safe to Ephesus, [Thucid. lib. 1. Emil. Prob. in the life of Themistocles . Polyan. lib. 1. Strabo .] Plutarch reports that he came to Cuma, and there found that many Sea Captains laid wait to take him, especially Ergoteles and Theodoros, for that Xerxes had promised 200. talents to who-whoever should bring in his head : and therefore, he conveyed himself privily from thence, and came to a little town called Egas in Eolia : and there lay close for a few days, in the house of one Nucigenes, a very wealthy man in those parts, and one who was very well acquainted, and familiar, with divers of the kings nearest attendants : Diodorus calls him Lythibis, and says further, that he was a man of so very great wealth, that when Xerxes passed that way, he feasted both him and all his army, in a very bountiful manner. By this good Host's means, he was put into a close waggon, such as the kings, and other great men's chariots used, among the Persians to be carried in : and that he came safe into Persia, both Plutarch and Thucydides agree ; though Thucydides only saith, that he went allo the way from the sea side into Persia, in the company of a certain Persian : now Herodorus tells us, that from Ephesus to Sardes, it is 3 days journey, and from thence to Susa 3 months, [ib. 5. c. 50, 53, 54.]

Artabanus purposing now to destroy Artaxerxes, as he had formerly done his father and brother ; disclosed his intention unto Megabyzus, whom he knew to be discontented, for the jealousy he had conceived of his wives disloyalty, Amytis, sister unto Artaxerxes himself : and they swore secrecy each to other : but Megabyzus, presently went and disclosed the matter to the king ; who thereupon put Artabanus to death, and then also came to light, his practices concerning the eunuchs, who was of counsel with him in both, was put to a most bitter death, by certain racks, and other engines in a boat (described more at large by Plutarch, in the life of Artaxerxes) [Ctesias.] For Megabyzus, Justin puts Becabazus, as consort with Artabanus in this plot ; and sets out the manner of Artabanus his death in this wise. Artaxerxes, saith he, fearing the number of Artabanus his children, commanded all the army to be ready in the field the next day, for that he would take a view of them, both how many they were, and also how every man could stand to his arms, wherefore, when Artabanus was there present in armor, Artaxerxes said, that his own corslet was a little wash the stiffest for him, and that he would change with Artabanus : and when Artabanus at his command, had put off his corslet, Artaxerxes ran his naked body thorough with his sword, out of which measure of his corslet, we may well learn, by the way, that Artaxerxes, was not at this time to very a boy or child, as Justin makes him, but that he was at mans estate ; and so old, as that the Scripture tells us, that in the seventh year of his kingdom, he was grown a father, [Ecce 7. 25.]

After Artabanus his death, there was a battail fought between his friends, and the other Persians, wherein three of his sons were slain ; and Megabyzus, on the other side, sorely wounded, whereat both Artaxerxes himself and his sisters, Amytis, Megabyzus his wife, and Rhodogyne, and his mother Amestris, much grieved, and hardly at length was Megabyzus recovered by the great skill and industry of one Apollonius a Phrygian, or Chirurgeon, of the Isle of Cos : But hereupon all Bactria revolted from Artaxerxes, and another Artabanus was there made Governour, between whom and them, a field was fought, where they parted upon even terms, so saith Ctesias : where yet those words, ἐν δὲ τοῖς ἰσχυροῖς ἀνέστη Ἀρταβάνος or ἀνέστη Ἀρταβάνος, are ambiguously spoken ; for either it may be meant, as I have here expressed it, according to the construction thereof made by Hen. Stephanus ; that there was another Artabanus made Governour of Bactria, in stead of the former, or that there was at this time another Artabanus, formerly Governour of that province, differing from him that was lately put to death ; if we take the latter sense, then this revolt of the Bactrians must be referred to a later time ; but if the first, then to the present. For that at this present, Hytaspes, Xerxes his son, was Governour of Bactria, we learn out of Diodor, Sic. and that he was the middle brother between Darius, and Artaxerxes, we find in Ctesias : and every man may think, that it stood with a great deal of reason, that Hytaspes seeing his younger brother Artaxerxes preferred before him in the kingdom, would stir up, not only the Bactrians, whose governour he then was, but also all his other friends, for the recovery of his right.

Eutolius in his Chron. noteth, that in the fourth year of this 76 Olympiade, (upon which we now are) it was, that Themistocles fled to the Persians, which surely well enough with that which is delivered by Thucydides ; who placeth the coming of Themistocles to Artaxerxes, between the siege of Naxos, and that famous victory gotten over the Persians, at the mouth of the river Eurymedon by Cimon the Athenian ; and withall, maketh the beginning of the reign of Artaxerxes, to fall in with the same time, for he saith, That Themistocles sent letters to Artaxerxes, πρὸς Ἐκαστὸν αὐτοῦ, (i. e.) when he was come newly to the crown, wherein he both craved his favour, and offered him his service against the Greeks : from whence we may fully discern the true beginning of Artaxerxes his reign, which was almost full nine years sooner, than it is commonly laid to have been.

Plutarch out of Phaniass reports, that Themistocles was brought to Artaxerxes his presence, by Artabanus, a Colonel ; and out of Eratosthenes that he obtained this favour at that Colonels hand, by the means of his Lie-by ; which was a wench of Eretria : but doth doth not explain, what Artabanus this was : whether he, who affecting the kingdom, was slain by Artaxerxes ; or that Arabanus to whom Xerxes, seven years before, when he went into Greece, committed the Government of his kingdom. For if he mean the first, then Themistocles his coming to Artaxerxes, must needs be within the first seven months after his coming to the crown ; according to Euseb. his account : but if any other, than his coming to the king, might also have fallen upon any other month of the same first year, which will very well also suit with that place of Thucydides above mentioned ; where he saith, that he was brought to Artaxerxes, when he was newly come to the crown. Now that it was the office of the Colonel, or Chiliarch, being the second officer in the kingdom, to bring such as were to be admitted to the presence of the king, appeareth plainly by Emilius Probus, in the Life of Cimon ; and by Elian, [ib. 1.] Varus H. for. [cap. 31.]

When Themistocles, was thus graciously received, and welcomed by the king, a new danger grew upon him by the means of Mandane a daughter of Darius Hytaspes, for the having lost all her children in the sea-fight before Salamis, and not being able to prevail with the king, tried and solicited all her friends and great men about the Court, and at last stirred up the common people it self, to be revenged of this Themistocles, for the hurt he had done them in that battle. And when they all in a hurry came flocking into the Court, Artaxerxes told them fairly, that he would refer the whole matter to the judgment of his Lords : and so, by appointing a long time for the preparing and hearing, and determining of this great cause, he found the means to deliver Themistocles, out of the peoples hands, for the present, [Diod. Sic. lib. 11.]

In the second battel, between the Persians and the Bactrians, by reason of a strong tempestuous wind, sitting in their faces, Artaxerxes got the victory of them, and reduced them wholly to his subjection, [Ctesias.]

Themistocles, when he had spent a whole year in learning, as well as possibly he could the Persian tongue, and withall, was grown perfect in the lawes and customs of the country, and then coming to his trial, did not only quit himself from all objections made against him, but grew moreover into such favour with the King, as no Grecian was ever able to before : for he not only used to carry him abroad with him a hunting, but also to call him to his private delights and recreations at home, in so much, that he was admitted to the presence of Amestris the kings mother, and converted familiarly with her. He bestowed on him also, a Persian wife, of noble parentage, excellent for beauty, and goodness of disposition ; besides servants to attend upon him, cupboards of plate of all sorts, and all other things, not only for his necessary use, but even for delight and pleasure, [Thucydides 1. lib. 1. Diodorus Siculus, lib. 11. Plutarch in the Life of Themistocles.]

When Demaratus the Lacedemonian, who returned out of Greece with Xerxes, was fallen into the kings high displeasure, for that he came riding into Sardes in his Chariot, wearing his turban upright, upon his head, in a kingly fashion, upon the mediation, and entreaty of Themistocles, he alluaged his anger, and grew friends with him again : [Plut. in Them. with Sen. lib. 6. de Benefic. 31.]

Themistocles being made Governor of the province of Magnesia, returned into Asia ; [Thucid. lib. 1.]

In his return, he escaped a great danger, intended toward him, by the lying in wait of Epyxius, a Persian, Governor of the Upper Phrygia, and the Pisidians, and he escaped it by the forewarning of Dindymene, the mother of the gods, in a dream which he had, as he lay sleeping at noone : in memory whereof, he built her a Temple at Magnesia : and made his own daughter Mucispolena to be consecrated Priestesse to her, [Plutarch in Themistocles : or, as some will have it, his wife ; as in Strabo, [ib. 14.]

But that Themistocles might appear in Asia, with the greater lustre, the king gave him, besides the government of the province of Magnesia, the very city of Magnesia, upon Meander, which paid the king yearly, fifty talents, to find him bread for his Table ; and Lampachus in Hellepont, to buy him wine to his meat ; and Myus, at the mouth of Meander, for his second course. Neanthas Cyzicenes, and Phanias and Athenues, [ib. 1. c. 17.] added to Cities more, in the country of Troas, to wit, Perceotes and Palecepheus, to furnish him with cloaths, and carpets, [Thucid. 1. Diod. lib. 11. Plut. and Emil. Prob. in the Life of Themistocles.]

Cimon the son of Miltiades, who was General in the field at Marathon, being now himself made General by the Athenians against the Persians, let out of the Pyrcum at Athens, with 200. fighting ships : which afterward, what out of Ionia, what out of other parts, he encreased to the number of 500, and with this Fleet he set sail for the coast of Caria : where all the sea towns, which had been at any time heretofore planted by Grecians, presently revolted to him from the Persians. There it which were possessed by the natives of the country, &c. held by the Persian garrisons, he set upon, and took them all by pure force of war. Having thus dispatched the errand he came on, in Caria, he passed into into Lycia : and in like manner took in all there too ; and when as upon their submission to the Athenian government, he demanded shipping of them, his Navy was forthwith exceedingly much encreased, [Diod. lib. 11.]

		The Persians lifted what men they could out of other the Kings Dominions, for land service ; but for shipping, they sent to the Phœnicians, Cyprians, and Cilicians. The chief Commander of all the Persian Fleet, when it came together, was Tithraustes, a bastard son of Xerxes, [Id. ib.] Ephorus saith, that he was Admiral of the Fleet, and Phereandates Commander by land : But Callisthenes saith, that Ariomandes the son of Gobryas, commanded the army, [Plut. in Cimon.]
3534.		After the Athenians had subdued Naxos, as Thucydides, in his first book teacheth us. They and their confederates under the conduct of their General Cimon, in one and the same day, put to flight the Persians, both in a sea-fight, not far from the Isle of Cyprus, and also in a fight at land, at the mouth of the river Eurymedon in Pamphylia, the 3 year of the 77 Olympiade : a. [Diod. Sic. lib. 11.] reporteth ; who was of opinion, (and so was Justin, lib. 2. in fine,) that Xerxes was yet living : contrary to what Thucydides affirmeth, who yet of all other, lived nearest to that time. And therefore Eusebius is in the righter, who placeth this great victory in the 4 year of Artaxerxes ; with this further note upon it : Cimon obtained this victory by sea and land against the Persians, near the River Eurymedon ; and so the war with the Medes ended. For from the beginning of Artaxerxes reign (as we have put it according to Thucydides his account) his fourth year fell in with the third year of the 77 Olympiade, here mentioned by Diodorus, though Eusebius misforcing the first year of his reign, with the first year of the 79 Olympiade, must of necessity in consequence thereof, have placed his 4 year, with the 4 year of the same Olympiade. But the best way will be, to set down this whole matter in order as we find it in Diodor. and Plutarch, thus.	4244.	470.
		When Cimon had heard, that the Kings Captains had taken up their Station with a great army by land, and a fleet by sea, in the coast of Pamphylia ; he to keep the sea, that they might not come within the Chelidonian Islands, went with 200. saile from Cnidus and Triopium, and came to the city of the Phœnicians, who were Grecians : and because they would not receive his Navy into their Port, nor fall off from the Persian, he fired their country, and assaulted their city. Nevertheless, at the intercession of those of Chios, who were in the Fleet, a peace was made upon condition that they should pay down ten talents ready money, follow Cimon, and partake in the war against the Persians, [Plut. in the life of Cimon.]
		Then Cimon, understanding that the Persian Fleet hovered about the coast of Cyprus ; set presently sail towards them, with 250. ships against 340. of theirs : Diod. yet presently sail towards them, with 250. ships against 340. of theirs : though Ephorus saith that the Persians were 350. and Phanodemus 600. strong : yet these did nothing worthy of so great a Navy ; but they that were next the land, abandoned their ships, and fled to land, to the army that there was ready ranged in battle array : the rest were set upon by Cimon, taken, and put to the sword, [Plutarch.] Thucydides saith that they took all the Phœnician ships, to the number of 200. and sunk them every one, [Emil. Probins in the life of Cimon] saith that, he overcame and took all the Fleet of the Cyprians and Phœnicians, to the number of 200. saile. Diodorus, that the Athenians having sunk many of their ships, took 100. with the men in them prisoners, and that the rest when the souldiers were fled out of them into Cyprus, came all empty into their hands : which yet to have been taken full of souldiers appears by those Veries, which the Athenians made and offered to their god ; found both in Diodorus, and also in Aristides his 2 Plaronic Oration.
		For these when souldiers all were kill'd at land, A hundred Ships of the Phœnicians took, All full of men.
		Plutarch also in his little discourse of the Athenian glory, saith that Cimon brought from Eurymedon about 100. ships of war of the Phœnicians. But Diodorus affirms, that he took not only more than 100. but also full 340. ships, that is, the whole Persian Navy, and 30000. men in them.
		Nor was Cimon satisfied with this victory at sea ; but presently put over with his Fleet, and set upon the land army of the Persians in Asia which he saw ranged upon the shoar, near the mouth of the river Eurymedon ; which the better to effect, he put all his own souldiers, into the enemies bottoms, which he had taken, and clad them all in Persian attire ; whereupon they conceiving them to have been their own ships, hailed them as friends : Cimon therefore, so soon as the night came on, (and it was very dark without moon-light,) landed his men, who breaking suddenly into the enemies Camp, slew all they met with, and killed one of the two chief Commanders, Phereandates, the kings brothers son, as he lay in his pavilion ; and after a while made them (all amazed as they were with this sudden onslat,) to betake them to their heels, [Diodorus.] And of this Stratagem

	Polyænus, [lib. 1.] maketh mention, saying that by a mistake, he saith, that Cimon fo landed his men in Cyprus, and not in Pamphylia; and so doth Julius Frontinus, in the end of his 4 book : where Conon is found written instead of Cimon.
	Cimon moreover took 80 of the Phœnicians ships, riding near Hydrus, and were not in the sight, nor had heard any incling of it, [Plutarch.]
3535.	This year Cimon setting saile from Athens, with four tall men of war, took 13 ships of the Persians, in the Cherstone of Thracia, and driving out thence, both Persians and Thracians, possessed the place for the Athenians ; and so wrought the matter, that in all Asia from Ionia to Pamphylia, there was not any body of a Persian army to be seen, [Plut. in the Life of Cimon.] And thence it came to passe, that Pericles, who this year began to have the principality at Athens, with 50 ships, and Ephialtes with 30 year sailing beyond the Chelidonian Islands, in the sea of Pamphylia, saw never a fail more, sailing all the way, as Plutarch out of Callisthenes reporteth : and Iocrates, in his Panathenæic, sayes, that neither a Persian man of war, durst appear nearer Greece, than the port Phœlis, nor any company of them by land, over the river Halys : yet Diodo writes, that the Persians seeing the encrease of the Athenian power fell to building of ships faster than ever.	4245.	469.
3537.	Ezra the Priest, a Scribe (or a Lawyer) skill'd in the Law of Moses, obtained a large patent, and was therewith sent by Artaxerxes the king and his seven counsellours to settle the Jewish Common-wealth, and to reform the Church at Jerusalem ; by which patent, it was again made lawfull, for all Jews that would not onely to go themselves, but also to send or carry with them what gold or silver, either the king and his nobles, or the Jews themselves would offer to their God : there were also thereby given all sorts of furniture for the Lords house, and order given to the Treasurers beyond the rivers, to supply them with all other necessities, out of the kings exchequer ; and that all that attended any way upon the service of the Temple, should be free from tribute, and all the people was suffered, to live according to their own laws, [Ezra 7. 13, 26.]	4247.	467.
	In the seventh year of Artaxerxes, the first day of the first month, Ezra, with a great multitude of the Jews, set out from Babylon, [Ezra 7. 6, 7, 9. chap. 8. 1, 14.]
	Ezra and his company spent 3 dayes at their Tents at Ahava ; till the Levites, which were wanting, came unto them : when all were come together, Ezra commanded a solemn fast to be kept, and prayer to be made unto God, to prosper them in their journey, and consign'd all the gold and silver, which was consecrated to Gods into the hands of 12 choyse men of the Priests, and to as many of the Levites, [Ezra 8. 13, 30.]
	Upon the 12 day of the first month, they removed from the river Ahava, and upon the 10 day of the 5 month, in the seventh year of Artaxerxes his reign, they arrived at Jerusalem : and there rested themselves three dayes, [Ezra 7. 8, 9. chap. 8. 30, 31.]
	Upon the 4 day of the 5 month, the gold and silver which they had brought, was weighed out, and with the other furniture was laid up, in the house of the Lord : and they which returned offered also their sacrifices unto God : which done, the kings edicts were presented to the Governours and rulers beyond the river ; who, thereupon, shewed all favour to the people, and house of the Lord, [Ezra 8. 33, 36.]
3538.	Ezra, understanding that the Israelites had entred into affinity with the heathen ; mournes, fasts, and openly made intercession to God, to avert his wrathfull indignation from them, [Ezra 9.] And when many of the people also made great lamentation for the same, Shecanias advised Ezra to move the people, that they would binde themselves by a vow to God, to put away their heathenish wives, and the children which they had by them : which was done accordingly, [chap. 10. 1.]
	Warning was given to all such, as were returned out of the captivity, that they should appear at Jerusalem within three dayes, upon a great penalty to those, which should then be found absent. Wherefore all the men of Juda and Benjamin, coming together in the court of the Temple, the 20 day of the 9 month, and there quaking, what with the horror of the thing they came about, what with the bitterness of the weather ; Ezra commanded them every male to separate himself from his heathenish wife, who readily consenting therunto ; and desiring further, that Judges might be appointed to see that order put in execution : there were forthwith appointed two out of the order of the Priests, and two adjuncts more out of the Levites to assist them, in taking the cognizance of cases of this nature, [chap. 10. 7, 13.]
	This examination held from the first day of the 10 month, to the first of the first month, and so in two months space, was all this business of the strange wives dispatched, [c. 10. 16, 17.]	4248.	466.
	Themistocles died of a naturall death at Magnesia, or as others will have it, of poyson voluntarily taken, when he saw, that he could not perform what he had undertaken to the King, for the subduing of Greece, [Thuc. lib. 1.] Cicero saith in his Lælius , that he killed himself, 20 years after the death of Coriolanus ; which according to Dionysius Halicarnassensis his reckoning, falls in just with the 3 year of the 78 Olymp. upon which year there there is this note put by Eusebius in his Chron. Themistocles , saith he, whom his own worth had made the conqueror, his country's injuries sufficed made the General, of the Persians: Nevertheless, that he might keep himself from going in hostile manner against it, he is appointed to offer a sacrifice, at which, taking a bowl full of the bulls blood, he drank it off, and so fell down, as a noble sacrifice of piety, dead before the Altar, which is memorable a departure of his out of this life wrought this effect, that Greece should never need another Themistocles after him. Against which manner of his death, yet Tully in his Brutus , makes Pompo Atticus to argue in this wife: For as you now, saith he, tell us a tale of Coriolan , so Clearchus and Stratocles do the like of Themistocles ; for of whom Thucydides , who was an Athenian himself, and nobly born, and an excellent man, and who lived not long after him, saith only that he died, and that he was privately buried in some place in Attica , and that there was some suspicion, that he made away himself by poison; of him these men write, that when he had sacrificed a bull, he took of the blood of him in a basin, and quaffing it off, fell down dead in the place. Though indeed before the writing of this History by Thucydides , the Athenians themselves had heard it from Aristophanes , in Equitibus ; which Comedy he wrote and taught in Athens, the 7 year of the Peloponnesian war, when Stratocles was Pretor, or L. Chancellor of Athens, that he died with drinking of bulls blood.

3544.	Inaros the son of Plammeticus king of Lybia (not a Lydian as Ctesias hath it) going from Maraca, a City bordering upon Pharus, turned away the greater part of Egypt, from the obedience of Artaxerxes; and being made and proclaimed king by them, sent for the Athenians, from Cyprus, who by chance were there at that time, implored in a war, with two hundred sail of ships, partly of their own, partly of their allies and friends, [Thucid. lib. 1.]		4254. 460.
	Artaxerxes hearing of the Egyptians revolt, presently gathered an army out of all his dominions, and rigged up a Navy, sparing for no pains nor cost therein, Diodorus Siculus , 2 year, 79 Olympiads, for running here in Thucydides his more exact account, by two full years.
	Artaxerxes purposed to go himself in the head of this army into Egypt: but upon his friends dissuasion, he gave that off, and sent his Brother Achemenes in that voyage with 400 thousand foot, and 80 sail of ships, [Ctesias], and Diodorus agreeth with him for the sending of Achemenes General in the Egyptian war: but saith that he was Darius his son, and Artaxerxes his own great Uncle; and he gave him 300 thousand horse and foot, wherewith to go upon that service; meaning hereby Achemenes the son of Darius Hytaspes, and Astolus , unto whom Xerxes had formerly committed the kingdom of Egypt, which himself had subdued, to be governed, [Herodotus , lib. 7. cap. 7. & 97.]
3545.	Achamenes , al. Achamenides , coming into Egypt, late down with his army upon the bank of the river Nile; and having refreshed his army a while, after their long march, prepared to give them battle: They on the other side, having gotten together what forces they could make out of Egypt and Libia, lay still, waiting for the coming of the Athenians, [Diod. Sic.]
	The Athenians, coming from sea; and entering the mouth of the Nile, quickly made themselves masters of the river, [Thucid.] Inaros, together with Chariam ty, who was Admiral of a fleet of 40 ships, sent from Athens, got a victory at sea; wherein of 50 Persian ships, they took 20. with all the men in them; and sunk the other thirty, [Ctesias]. But Diodorus Siculus tells us, that the whole Athenian fleet which lay before Cyprus, and consisted of 200 saile, came at this time into Egypt; not forty ships only, as Ctesias saith.
	Inaros, with his own Egyptians, and this supply of the Athenians, fought also a battle with the Persians by land: wherein for a while the Persians, by reason of their overpowering multitude, had the better; but when the Athenians came and made a strong impression on them, and made the wing which they encountered with, to retire; many of them died in the place; and the rest of the Persian army betook themselves to their heels: in which flight, there was a huge slaughter made of them, [Diodor.] for of 400 thousand men, which Achemenides brought into the field, there fell that day, together with himself, 100 thousand: for he died of a wound which he received from Inaros his own hand, and his body was sent to Artaxerxes, [Ctesias]. Herodotus also makes mention [lib. 3. c. 12. and lib. 7. c. 7.] of one Achamenes a son of Darius , and of other Persians slain by Inaros a Lybian, son of Plammitichus , in a place called Papremes .
	The Athenians following the chase upon the Persians, took two parts of Memphis, and assaulted the third part also, called the White Wall , whereto the Persians and Medes were fled, [Thucid. and Diod.]
3546.	Artaxerxes, hearing of this great overthrow, dispatched away presently, Megabulus a Persian, to Sparta, with a masse of money, to stir up the Pelopone-		4256. 458.

	Peloponnesians to a war against the Athenians, thinking that this would draw home the Athenians out of Egypt. But the Lacedaemonians would none of his money, nor yield to any of his demands: which the King perceiving, he called Megabazus home again with the monies which were left; and commanded Megabazus the son of Zopyrus to provide himself for a journey into Egypt, [Id. ib.] to which Megabazus , who was formerly General in Xerxes his army, as [Herod. lib. 7. cap. 82.] and married Xerxes his daughter Amytis : as Ctesias , the son of that Zopyrus, who recovered Babylon to Darius the son of Hystaspes : as Herod. in the very end of his third book saith.
3547.	Artabazus and Megabazus defigned Commanders for the war in Egypt, carryed with them out of their own country, horse and foot 300. thousand men, [Diod.] but Ctesias saith only 200. thousand.	4257. 457.
	When they were come into the part of Cilicia and Phoenicia, the Commanders thought fit there to rest a while, and to refresh the army after so long a march: mean while they command the Cilicians, Cyprians, and Phoenicians to rig up and provide the Navy: and they in a trice provided 300. sail of tall ships, which were forthwith furnished with sea-men and soldiers, with store of ammunition, and all things fit and necessary for a sea-fight. Diod. Admiral of which Fleet was appointed Oniscus , [Ctesias].
	In making of which preparations, and in training and exercising their men in arms, and making them apt and serviceable for the war, they spent almost a whole year; mean while the Athenians presse the siege of the Fort of White-wall in Memphis: But when the Persians within manfully defended it, and the Athenians saw no possibility of taking it by assault; yet they lay before it all this year, [Diod.]
3548.	The Persian Commanders in Asia having all things fitted, march from thence thorough Syria, and Phoenicia, with their land Army; their Navy of 300. saile coasting them till as they went: Until at last, they came to Memphis, [Diod.] where to those two hundred thousand which they brought with them, there joyned three hundred thousand more of those which Achamenides had left in Egypt. Between these and the Egyptians there was a stout battle fought, and many fell on either side; but most of the Egyptians. At length Megabazus with his own hand wounded Inaros in the thigh: wherupon he fled, and put himself into a most strong hold, called Byblus , in the Isle of Protoprotopis in the river of Nile; and with him the Grecians which were left, and not slain with Charamites their General; and all Egypt besides save only that Fort of Byblus , followed the part of Megabazus, [Ctesias].	4258. 456.
	Megabazus having driven all, both Egyptians and Grecians out of the field, and out of Memphis, and shut them up all in the little Isle of Protoprotopis ; continued the siege of them there, one year and six months. [Thucid lib. 1.]
3550.	In the 20 year of the reign of Artaxerxes, in the 9 month called Cisleu , Nehemias being then at Sufa, where the Kings of Persia used to keep their Winter-quarter: as Acheneus [Deponoph. 1. 2.] teacheth us, having received news how ill matters went with the Jews at Jerusalem, namely, that the wall thereof was broken down, and the gates consumed with fire; felt to mourning, and fasted and prayed to God, that he would remit the sins of his people, and give to himself grace and favour in the sight of the King, [Nehem. 1. 1. 11.]
	In the same 20 year of the King, in the month Nisan , when the time came that Nehemiah in his turn was to attend upon the King; (for he was one of the Cup-bearers to him) and both King and Queen, (whom I suppose to be her whom Ctesias calls Damaspia) took notice of his sorrowful and dejected looks; he opened the cause thereof unto them, and obtained from the King a grant, not only to be Governour of all Judea; but also to rebuild Jerusalem, [Neh. 1. 1. 16.] and from this time, begins the account of Daniels 70 weeks, [Dan. 9. 24. 25.]
	Nehemiah furnished now with a Commission, and equipage from the Kings (pight of Sanballat the Horonite of Moab, and of Tobia the Ammonite, the Governour of some place thereabouts; comes to Jerusalem, begins the work, and answereth them who laughed at him for undertaking so idle a business as that was, [Nehem. 11. 7. 20.]
	The Persian Commanders in Egypt, laid the channel of the river which compassed the Isle of Protoprotopis dry, turning the water another way by ditches, which they cut; and so left the Athenian ships aground: and now was Protoprotopis no longer an Island, but joyined to, and made a part of the Continent. As soon therefore as the Egyptians saw the Athenian ships, in what case they were, they took a fright, and presently, not caring what became of them, made their own peace with the Persians: and the Athenians for their parts, seeing themselves thus deserted by the Egyptians, and their ships made useless, for them all on fire, that the enemy might not gain them. The Persians therefore now passing the channel on dry foot, entered the Island, and by a fight at			land land took it nevertheless, seeing the excess of valour in the Athenians, and remembering what losses they had formerly received by them, were content to come to a fair agreement and composition with them, that they should all, (and there were six thousand of them) depart out of Egypt, with bag and baggage; and return home when they would, [Thucid. 2. d. c. 13.]

And thus the fortunes of the Athenians in Egypt, where they had spun out the war six years, came to nothing: and Egypt returned into Artaxerxes his power and obedience again, all save Amyrtaeus, who was king of those which dwelt in the ten countries of Egypt, for him they could not take in, both because of the valour of the ten it self, and also for that the inhabitants thereof were a most warlike nation, [Thucid. lib. 1.]

Eliahub, the son of Joiakim, the son of Jehu (or Jehohua) the High Priest, and the rest of the Jews, every one in his place, set in hand very stoutly with the building of the wall of Jerusalem, [Nehem. 3.] beginning on the fourth day of the fifth month Ab. as is gathered out of chap. 6. 15. 16.

Sanballat and Tobias, with the Samaritans, and other enemies of the Jews, first fell a laughing and scoffing at this new work: but when they saw the wall half up, they left their mockings, and laid their heads together, and consulted how to destroy the builders, which when Nehemias understood, he first praised to God, and then began to order his men, all in a military way; and to put by the purpose and practise of their enemies, [chap. 4. 16.]

Nehemias, upon the complaints and outrages of the people, taketh an order to have them all freed, the slaves of their bondage, of their debts; and those that had pawn'd or mortgaged their lands or goods, of their forfeitures; and himself to give an example in so good and charitable a work, released his own debts, and all engagements of lands or goods made unto him, and aided the poorer sort of publique taxes, and contribution, and gave liberally of his own unto them that wanted, [chap. 4. 16.]

But Nehemias was not onely in danger from Sanballat, and other enemies abroad, but also from false prophets and false brethren at home, which sought to hinder the work no less than the other did. All which difficulties well overcome, the wall in fifty two dayes was finished, to wit, upon the 25 day of the sixth month called Ethl. do, their enemies at home and abroad, what they could to the contrary, [chap. 6. 16.]

The dedication of the wall was performed with much celebrity, and great joy, [Neh. 12. 27. 43.]

Then did Nehemiah take into consideration the several offices belonging to the house of the Lord, appoints Governours over the city, and orders the guards thereof; and calling their congregation together, takes a notice of all that had returned out of the captivity, that out of them a number might be selected, to people and store the city now it was built, with inhabitants: all which, every one according to his ability, made their several offerings unto God, [Neh. c. 7.]

When 50 sail of Grecian ships were sent into Egypt, to serve in their room, who had been there so long already, it fell out, that they knowing nothing of what had happened to their country men there, came to anchor at Mendesium, which is one of the mouths of Nilus. There as they lay, the Persian sat upon them from the land, and the Phenicians by sea, and destroyed the greater part of them; few escaped to carry news into Greece. And even of that great army which was there before, few returned into Greece again, but were lost as they passed thorough the deserts of Lybia, to get unto Cyrene. And this was the end, which that great voyage of the Athenians into Egypt came unto, [Thucid. lib. 1.]

In the feast of Trumpets, the first day of the seventh month, when all the Jews came together at Jerusalem, the Law of God was by Ezra read and expounded to them, at the hearing whereof, when they were all sorely grieved and fell a weeping, they were heartened up by Nehemiah, Ezra, and the Levites, and by them perswaded to keep that feast, with merriment and joy of minde, [Nehem. 8. 1, 2, 12.]

Upon the second day of the same month, Ezra was consulted withall, by the Elders of the families, and by the Priests and Levites, concerning certain doubts arising upon the reading of the Law, and it was enjoyed them to keep the feast of Tabernacles, [Nehem. 8. 13, 14, 15.] abroad in the fields, and in booths made of boughs, according to the Law, [Lev. 23. 40.]

Upon the 15 day, and the six dayes following, the feast of Tabernacles was celebrated with great care and devotion, and for seven dayes together, the law of God was read in their ears, and the eighth day also was kept very solemnly, according as was prescribed, [Levit. 23. 36.] Neither was there the likeness of Tabernacles kept from the dayes of Josua the son of Nao, unto that time, and there was great joy made at it, [ib. 17. 18.]

Of which the Jews in their greater Chronicle, [chap. 30.] speak in this manner: [It was, he said, that he compared the return of the children of Israel into the land, in the dayes of Ezra, with that of their first entering into it in the dayes of Josua: and as in the dayes of Josua they were bound to victory, to the years of Shemita, or Remission, and to Jubilees; and to the halloving of their walled towns: so now in their return in the time of Ezra, they were in like manner obliged to the Law of Tithe, of the years of Shemita or releasing, of Jubilees, and to the halloving of their walled Cities: and they joyced greatly before the Lord.]

Upon the 24 of this month, the Israelites which returned, separating themselves from all strangers, made publick profession of their repentance, [Nehem. 9.] and renewing their covenant with God, bound themselves to the observance of the Law of God and of his Worshipp, [chap. 10.] and in special of that Law, [Levit. 25. 4. Deut. 15. 1, 2.] concerning the tillage of their land, and exaction of debts: and of letting their land rest every seventh year, [Nehem. 10. 11.]

The chief Heads of the people seated themselves all at Hierusalem; the rest cast lots, according to which every tenth man, should inhabit and have his dwelling in the holy City, [Nehem. 11. with 1 Chron. c. 9.]

Megabyzus, leaving Sartamah Governour of Egypt, returned to Artaxerxes with Inarus, and certain of the Grecians in his company; having given them his word, that they should have no hurt done unto them; which Artaxerxes himself carefully observed and performed toward them, though grievously incensed against Inarus for having slain his brother Achamenides. Inasmuch, that when his mother Amyrta (instead of which, the name of Amyrta is here crept into Ctesias) desired vengeance to be taken of Inarus, and the Grecians, and even of Megabyzus himself; her son in law the King, denied her request, [Ctesias.]

The Athenians and Cimon their General with a Fleet of 200. sail of their own, and their confederates into Cyprus: of which sixty went away into Egypt to Amyrtaeus, who continued still in the fenny country of Egypt: the rest besieged Citium a City in Cyprus, [Thucid. lib. 1.] At this time Artabazus and Megabyzus commanded the Persian Army; the first of which Artabazus lay with the Fleet consisting of 300. sail, about Cyprus: the other with his land Forces, which amounted to the number of 300. thousand men, remained in Cilicia, [Diod. Sic. lib. 12. in the 3 year of 82 Olympiade]

Cimon sent certain messengers to the Temple of Ammon, to consult the Oracle there, about some secret matter, [Plutarch in the life of Cimon.]

In the siege of Citium in Cyprus, (as Thucydides saith) Cimon died; either of a natural disease (as Emilius Probus hath it) or, as accidents of a wound which he received in a fight against the enemy. Being ready to depart this life, he advised those that were about him to conceal his death, and to get them gone with all the speed they could. And it fell out, that neither friends nor foes knowing any thing of his death, all the Greek army returned home safe, under the conduct, (as Phancemus speaketh) of Cimon when he had been a whole month dead; But they who were sent to consult the Oracle, having received no other answer, but that Cimon was already with him: returned to their fellows in Egypt, and understood by them that Cimon died, at that very time, when that answer was made unto them, [Plut. in the life of Cimon.]

When the Grecian army returned out of Egypt, they which lay before Citium in Cyprus, being sorely pressed with famine, raised their siege from thence, and sailed to Salamis in the same Isle: where they fought with the Phenicians, Cyprians, and Cilicians, both by sea and land. In the sea-fight, they sunk many ships of the enemies Navy, and took a hundred bottomes, with all the soldiers and Mariners in them: and the rest they pursued as far as unto Phenicia itself: But the Persians with such of the ships as were left, fled into Cilicia, where Megabyzus with the army lay. And the Athenians making thitherward with all possible speed, landed their men upon the open shoar, and set upon the enemy. In which fight, Anaxicrates who commanded the Fleet, behaving himself in most manifold wise, died a most noble and heroic death. The rest having gotten the victory, and made a great slaughter of their foes, returned to their ships; and came home all in company with those, which were upon their way returning out of Egypt, [Diod. Sic. in the 3 and 4 year of the 82 Olympiade,] as he stands corrected out of Thucydides. But Elian writeth, that the Athenians lost in Egypt 200. tall men of War, and in Cyprus, 150. with all their tackle, ammunition, and furniture, in them, [Elian. Variar. Hist. lib. 5. cap. 10.]

Artaxerxes, hearing of the loss of his men in Cyprus, advised with his Council concerning this war; and in the end it was resolved, that it was for the good of that kingdom, that peace should be made with the Grecians. Therefore the King wrote his letters to the Captains and Commanders in Cyprus that they should at any hand, and upon any terms come to a treaty, and conclude a peace with the Grecians. Hieronon Artabazus and Megabyzus dispatched away messengers to Athens, there to treat of a peace; and when the Athenians had consented to the conditions by them proposed, they also sent

At which time also the men of Argos, sent their messenger Sula, to know of Artaxerxes, whether he thought the league and friendship which they had heretofore made with his father Xerxes, did continue still; or whether they were held by him as enemies. To whom Artaxerxes returned this answer, that the league continued by all means, and that he held no City more friend to him than that of Argos was, [Herodotus, lib. 7. cap. 151.] The peace between the Athenians and their confederates on the one side, and the Persians on the other, was concluded on, upon these conditions, That the Grecian cities, in all Asia, should enjoy their own liberty, and rights. That no Persian Governor, should at any time come within three dayes journey of the Sea: that there should no ship of war, of either side be found riding out, between Phaelis, and the Cyanean Iles: or as Plutarch expreth it, That the King should not have any beaked ship, or man of war surging in all the sea, between the Cyanean, and the Chelædonian Islands. Now when the King and his Council of war had subscribed to these articles, then the Athenians also, took their oath, that they would not in hostile manner invade any of the kings Provinces, [Diod. ut sup.] It is said also, that they built an altar in memory of this peace, and that they heaped many honours upon Callias, who had been the contriver and procurer of it, [Plut. in the life of Cimón.] Artaxerxes tired out with the importune sollicitation of his mother, which for five years space he continually used unto him, at length gave up Iuaroos the Egyptian, king, and the Greeks that came with him into his hand; whereupon the Queen caused the body of Iuaroos to be so racked, and stretched out, and wreathed several wayes, that he hung upon three several crosses at one time: as for the Grecians the caused fifty of them (for he could catch no more) to have their heads smitten off. [Ctesias.] Thucydides saith that Iuaroos king of Lybia, was taken by treachery and crucified; yet Herodotus telleth us, that his son Thammyras, for the favour of the Persians, held the Principality in Egypt: which his father had held before him, [lib. 3. c. 15.] Megabyzus, being sorely grieved for the death of Iuaroos and those Grecians, asked leave that he might go to his own government in Syria: and had under hand sent away thither, the rest of the Grecians which had elapsed; and he following after, so soon as he came thither revolted from the king: and gathered an army of 150000 men, [Ctesias.] Against Megabyzus was sent Oñiris, with an army of 200 thousand men: they fought and in the night, Oñiris wounded Megabyzus with a dart in the thigh, two inches deep: and he likewise wounded Oñiris with a dart, first in the thigh, and then in the shoulder: with which Oñiris fell from his horse: but Megabyzus took him about by the middle, and faved him, many of the Persians fell: and the two sons of Megabyzus, Zopyrus and Artipylus, fought valiantly that day: so that Megabyzus had the better of it, and having gotten in the end a full victory, had great care of Oñiris and sent him to Artaxerxes, who demanded him at his hands, [Ctesias.] Against Megabyzus was sent another army, whereof was general Menofstanes, or Menofstas, son to Artarius, Governor of Babylon, and brother to king Artaxerxes; who met and fought, and Megabyzus wounded Menofstanes in the shoulder: and also in the head: yet was neither of those wounds mortal: but upon those wounds received, he and all his whole army left the field and fled, and Megabyzus obtained a most glorious victory, [Ctesias.] Artarius, first by messengers, then Artaxerxes the Eunuch, a Paphlagonian born, and Amestris, the Queen mother, perswaded Megabyzus, to come to an agreement with the king: and with much ado could Artarius himself, and Amytis his wife, and Artaxerxes, who was now 20 years of age, and Petisaf, Oñiris his son, prevail with him to come unto the king: and when he was come, the king sent him word, that he freely pardoned him all his by-past offences. But when a while after, the king went a hunting, and there a lion set upon him, and Megabyzus, seeing the lion raised upon his hinder feet, slew him with his spear; the king growing wroth with him, because he had done it: yet for he himself had given the lion any blow, commanded his life was spared, and he sent away upon the intercession of Amestris, &c. Amytis &c. others his life was spared, and he sent away and confined to a certain Island called Cirra, in the read sea: Artaxerxes also, the Eunuch, for having oft-times spoken liberally to the king, on the behalf of Megabyzus was banished into Armenia, [Ctesias.] Herodotus, when he had read his books at Athens, before the Council there; was much honoured for them, as saith Euseb. in his Chron. where Scaliger noteth, that Herodotus wrote his books, before his going into great Greece: not in great Greece itself, as some imagine, following herein Pliny, and we shall see more in the year subsequent. 	But I observe, that in these his books, mention is often made of the Peloponessian War; both in [the 7 book cap. 137. and in the 9 book cap. 72.] In the former of which is related a thing done in the 3 year of that War; and in the later, a thing acted in the 19 year thereof at Decelæa: full 33 years after the time assigned by Euseb. to the reading of his books at Athens. See more after in the year 3596. and 3597. In the first year of the 84 Olympiade, when Praxeles was Prætor or L. Chancellor of Athens, 12 years before the Peloponessian war began: the Athenians sent a Plantation or Colony of theirs into Great Greece, to rebuild a certain decayed City there, called Thurii: which Colony was carried thither by Lylas, a youth, at that time, of 15 years of age, and no more, [Plutarch and Dionysius Halicarnassensis in the life of Lylas the Orator]. And Herodotus being then 41 years old, who though he was born at Halicarnassus in Caria; yet obtained he the surname of Thurius afterward Δῖα νομῆσαι τῶν τῶν Θουρίων, (i.e.) because he was one who had his part in carrying that Colony or Plantation to Thurii: as Strabo saith in his 4 book. Now this 84 Olympiade fell in with the 310. year of the nativity of Rome, according to Varro's account. In which year Pliny saith, that Herodotus compiled his History at Thurii in Italy, [lib. 12. cap. 4.] as we touched in the precedent year. In this year all wars were laid asleep throughout Asia, Greece, Sicily, Italy, Gaule, Spain, and almost all the World over, [Diod. Sic. 3 year of the 84 Olympiade]. Nehemias, when he had governed Judea 12 years; (i.e.) from the 20 year of the reign of Artaxerxes, to the 32 of the same; returned to the King, [Nehem. 5. 14. and chap. 13. 6.] In his absence Eliashib the Priest, which was over the Chamber of the House of God, having contracted affinity with Tobia: had prepared him a fair chamber in the court of the temple: in which chamber, were formerly wont to be laid up and kept the hallowed Gifts and Tithes. And the son of Joiaad the son of Eliashib the High Priest, (who was a different man from Eliashib, of whom I spake before) became son in law, and had married the daughter of Sanballat the Horonite; which disorders, with sundry others which had crept in, in his absence, Nehemias upon his return to Jerusalem with a new Commission, quickly redressed, and severely punished, [Nehem. 13.] Megabyzus when he had lived now full five years in banishment; fled out of the Island where he was confined, and faining himself to be a Pilgras, (i.e. a Leper in the Persian language, and one to whom no man might approach) came home to his own wife Amytis: and what by her, what by Amestris the Kings mother, was in the end reconciled to the King: who thereupon made him sit at table with him, as he had done in former times: and when he had lived 76 years he died; for which the King grieved very sorely. [Ctesias.] In this year began a war between the Samians and Milesians, about the city of Priene, (i.e.) the sixth year in the beginning thereof, (Thucydides hath it) after the 30 years peace and league made between the Athenians and Lacedæmonians: and in the 4 year about the middle thereof, of the 84 Olympiade as Diodorus noteth. Now Priene was a City in Caria, which the Samians and Milesians, each laid claim to as their own: the Milesians finding themselves too weak at blows drew unto their party some of the Samians, who desired an alteration of things in their own State; and with them repaired to Athens, and there complained of the injurious carriage of the Citizens of Samos: whereupon the Athenians sent unto them, requiring them to shewface their armies, and to come and debate the matter in difference, before them at Athens. Which when the Samians refused to do, Pericles prevailed to have open War proclaimed against them: and all this in favour of his wench Aspasia, that famous Courtian, and one whom he doted on, not so much for her beauty, as for her wit; and because she was the daughter of one Axiochus, who was a Milelian borne. The Athenians therefore sending a Fleet of 40 sail, under the command of Pericles, easily took the City of Samos, and changed the Aristocracy thereof into a democratical kind of Government. But presently after, Pericles was returned from Samos, there arose among them a terrible sedition: some striving to maintain the new establishd popular Government, and others holding that the old Aristocratical was the better. They therefore who disliked the Democratical, conspiring with the chief men of the city, sent into Asia to Pissuthnes the son of Hyllaspes Governour of Sardes, and having made a confederacy with him, obtained of him a company of 700. soldiers; with which putting over in the still of the night into the Isle of Samos: they there joynd with other of their conforts, who attended their coming, and lo altogether surprized and took the Town, and professing themselves open enemies to the Athenians, took the whole Garrison of them that there was, with the Captain and Officers, and sent them all for a present to Pissuthnes: which done, they forthwith march against Miletus, having drawn the inhabitants of Byzantium also into their confederacy against the Athenians.	4270.	444.

		The Athenians hearing of the revolt of Samos, dispatch away thither sixty sail of ships well furnished; whereof sixteen went partly towards Caria, to encounter the Phœnician fleet in those parts, and partly into Chios and Lesbos, to take in aides from thence, the other 44 vessels continued with Pericles the Ammiral and his 9 colleagues. The Samians hereupon recall their 20 sail of ships, which they had sent all full of soldiers to assault Miletus, and joining to them 50 sail more, fought with the 44 ships of the Athenians, near an Island called Tragia, and had there the worst of it. From whence the Athenians, having a supply of 40 sail more from home, and 25 more by way of aid from Chios and Lesbos, went and landed with their forces, in the Isle of Samos, and getting the better of it there also, they possessed themselves of the Haven, and having drawn a treble ditch about the city by land, they barred up the Haven with their ships. A few days after, Pericles understanding by letters out of Caria, and Caunus, that the Phœnician fleet, was coming towards him, to the relief of Samos, he, leaving a part of his army to maintain the siege, took with him 60 sail out of the Navy; and went to encounter them, with all the speed he could possibly make, and with him went Setagoras with five ships of Samos, and others, to meet with the Phœnician Navy. The Samians taking advantage of the absence of Pericles, by the perswasion of leading of Melissus, the son of Ithogenes; a singular Philosopher, suddenly sallied out upon the Athenian camp, which was neither fenced nor manned, as it ought to have been; and having sunk the ships which kept the Haven, fought with the land forces in the open field, and routed them; and hereby, having an open sea, for 14 days space, they freely imported and exported, what they would, without impeachment. Pericles, hearing what had befallen his men at Samos, made back thitherward, as fast as conveniently he could, encountered his fleet; and when Thucydides, Agnon—and Phormio, were come to him with 40 sails, and Clepomenus and Anticles, with 50 ships more from Athens; and those of Chios and Mitylene had sent him 30 sail, with these great forces, he set upon Melissus, and overthrew him with frequent assaults on every side: in so much, that some say, those engines of Battie, as Rams, and Vines, and Galleries, were there first invented, by one Artemon, of Clazomena: which Artemon the Engineer, Ephorus the Historian doth unskillfully confound with Artemon Periphrastus, of whom Anacreon the Poet, in his verses (recited by Athenæus lib. 12.) maketh mention, [Thucid. lib. 1, Diad. Sic. in the 4 year of 84 Olympiade, and Plut. in the life of Pericles.] 3565. After 9 months siege, the Samians gave up the town, which was forthwith dismantled, they gave hostages also for their fidelity in time to come, they gave up all their shipping, and paid for the expense of the war, according to an entailment then made. But Pericles, seeing the Master of the ship wherein he was, overtroubled therewith, cast his cloak over his eyes, and asked him whether he were afraid at that or whether he thought it portended any great matter or no; and when he said, no: why, replied Pericles, what difference is between this covering of the sun, and that, save only, that, which causeth this darkness; is greater than my cloak? [Plutarch in the life of Pericles:] and thereupon entered into a discourse concerning the eclipses of the sun and moon, and their motions, by which they come, according as he had heard and learned from his Master Anaxagoras; and periwaded his fellow citizens, not to trouble themselves, with a vain and needless fear, [Valer. Max. lib. 8, cap. 11.] And that this year also, upon the 3 day of August, at 5 a clock in the after-noon, the sun was eclipsed at Athens, to about the quantity of 10 digits, the Astronomical account plainly demonstrates.

Lycicles, as he went from place to place to gather moneys, at last going from Myus, thorough Caria, the Carians, and Anzita rose suddenly upon him out of an Ambuscado, and slew both him, and the greatest part of his army, [Thucid. lib. 3.] Aicles commander of the Lacedemonian fleet, coming to the foreland of Myonessus, in the country of the Teii, put to death there the greatest part of the Greeks, whom he had taken prisoners out of Asia: but when he was come to Ephesus, some messengers sent unto him, by the Samians, which were of the Anzita, told him that he took a wrong way to deliver the Greek nation out of servitude and thralldom, if he purposed to destroy such, as neither ever bare arms against him, nor were his enemies; but only were forced to pay contribution, to the Athenians: whereupon he spared the rest, and let them go. A new broile rising between the old citizens, which dwelt in the bafe town of Notium, and those which had newly fled thither, these confiding in the power of such Arcadians, and other barbarians as Pisisthnes, the Governor of Lydia had sent them, drew a wall round about the upper town, for a fortification against the bafe town, and confederating with those Colophonians, who dwelling in the upper town, took part with the Medes, made one Common-wealth with them. But the other side sent for Pachetes, a captain of the Athenians to come and help them; who when he came, desired Hippias, whom Pisisthnes had made captain of the Arcadians in the fort to come forth to a parlee, covenanting with him, that if they could not agree, he should return fat: and found into the fort again, whereupon he came forth: but so soon as he came, Pachetes took, and committed him to safe custody, yet without manacles or fetters; and setting presently upon the fort took it, and put all whom they found therein to the sword, as well Arcadians as Barbarians; and last of all, to keep his word with Hippias he let him come safe and found into the fort; but so soon as he was come, laid hold on him again, and shot him to death with arrows, so he restored Notium to the Colophonians, save to those, who had taken part with the Medes. Afterward the Athenians sent a plantation thither of their own, and governed the place, according to their own laws, gathering together as many of the Colophonians out of all parts, as they could find to inhabit it, [Thucid. lib. 3. Polyæ. Strateg. lib. 3.] Artaxerxes sent Artaphernes, a Persian Ambassador, with a letter written in the Assyrian language, to Lacedemon: wherein, among other things signified to them, that he knew not what they would have, nor what their meaning or intention was; for that they had sent unto him a multitude of Ambassadors: but no one of them agreed with another; wherefore if they would have him to understand their minds, they should send some men of their own unto him, with the bearer thereof, [Thucid. lib. 4.] Artaxerxes, in the interim died, and his son Xerxes succeeded him, only for one year, [Diod. They therefore hearing that the Mitylenians purposed to fortifie Antandrus; gathered an army of their confederates, and set sail thitherward; and when the enemy fallied out from thence, foiled them in the field, and gat the Town again. But Lamachus who was gone into Pontus, coming into the mouth of the river Caleces, (which Diodorus calls Cachetes) in Heracleotis, leaving their ships at an anchor, there went and spoiled all the country about Heraclea, which in favour of the Persian, had refused to pay contribution to the Athenians. But when upon the falling of a great raine the river (wol), and ran with a mighty current, and drave their ships upon the rocky shoar, he there wholly lost his Fleet, and a great part of his army besides. Wherefore when by sea he could not, having lost his ships, and by land durst not with so small a company return home, thorough to many fierce & warlike Nations as lay in his way; they of Heraclea, taking this occasion to gratifie them rather than to be revenged of them, and thinking the spoil of their country well bestowed, if they might thereby purchase them for friends, which were before their foes, sent them away fairly, with all manner of provision for their journey homeward. So Lamachus, with the company which he had left, went over land thorough the country of the Thracians, which dwelt in Asia side, and came safely to Chalcedon, [Thucid. lib. 4. Diodor. lib. 12. Justin lib. 16. cap. 3.] When Xerxes, upon a Festival day had drunk himself stark drunk, and was laid asleep in his chamber, his brother Secundianus, begotten upon Aloguna, a Babylonish woman, and Pharnacys an Eunuch, came in upon him, and murdered him, [Ctesias.] Secundianus, who had a long time born a grudge to Bagoras the Eunuch, picking a quarrel with him for burying his fathers body without his advice taken therein, commanded him to be stoned to death: which act of his the army took very ill; and although he bestowed large monies among them, yet what for this, what for the murder of his brother, they ever hated him, [Ctesias.] Ochus, whom his father Artaxerxes had made Governour of Hyrcania, being sent for by his Brother Secundianus to come unto him, sent word he would, but came not; and this he often did: but at length, gathered a mighty army, and intended for the kingdom. Artabarius who was General of the Horle to Secundianus, fell over unto Ochus: and Artaxanes the Governour of Egypt did the like. Artaxotes also, out of Armenia came unto him in person, and whether he would or no, set the Cidaris, (i. e.) the Crown upon his head, [Ctesias.] Thus Ochus was made King, and called himself from thence forward Darius: and by the advice of Paryfatis, his wife and sister, tried first what he could do with his brother Secundianus by fair words and oaths: But Menolthanes, who was the greatest man with him among all his Eunuchs, was earnest with him not to believe his oaths, nor have any treaty with faithlesse men: yet Secundianus, came to a treaty, and was there laid hold on; and being thrown into a heap of ashes, there died, [Ctesias.] of which kind of punishment, see more before, in the year of the World, 3485, 6, and in 2 Maccabees, cap. 13. 5, 6. When Scundianus, al. Pisuthnes the Governor of Lydia, revolted from Darius; and therefore a mapudnes, Spithradates, and Pharnices, were sent against him. And Pisuthnes went to meet them, having with him Lycon an Athenian, with such Grecians as he had under his command: But the Kings Commanders bribed Lycon and his Greeks, and drew them off from Pisuthnes, and then drew in Pisuthnes himself, upon promise to bring him safe to the King, which they did. But he secretly bad, away with him to the Alps-hap: and befellow his Government upon Tisaphernes: and Lycon, for a reward of his treachery, had whole Cities and Countries bestowed upon him.

In the 19 summer of the Peloponnesian war, when Nicias would have drawn off his army in a night from before the walls of Syracuse in Sicily, there suddenly appeared an Eclipse of the Moon, about ten of the clock at night, in the month Metageirion; upon the 27 of August, according to the Julian Calendar; at the sight whereof he was so affrighted, that he forbore drawing off, for that time, and by a little more delay used thereupon, he lost himself and his whole army; Thucyd. lib. 7. Polyb. lib. 9. Diod. Sic. Ant. 4. 91. Olympiade, Plin. lib. 2. cap. 12. Plutarch in the life of Nicias, and in his book, De Superstitione.

The winter following, two Governours of Darius, upon the sea coast in the lesser Asia, Tisaphernes of Lydia, and Pharnabazus of Hellepont, seeking to recover the old tribute from the Grecian Cities lying within their severall Govern-

Governments, which the Athenians had of late forbidden them to pay unto the King, dealt with them under hand, to fall off from the Athenians: and withal soliciting the Peloponnesians in general to make a fresh war upon the Athenians, moved the Lacedæmonians in special to confederate and joyn in armes with the King against them: when the Athenians power was thus weakened in Asia; upon whom Pylarchus had founded all his hopes, Tisaphernes fought by all means how to get A-morgæ, a bawford son of Pylarchus, who had taken up arms in Caria, into his hands; and as he was commanded, to fend him alive or dead to the king. But finding at this present, that the Citizens of Chios and Erythræ, were ready to revolt from the Athenians, he sent his messenger with theirs to Lacedæmon, there to negotiate the matter; by the joyned advice of both, [Thucid. lib. 9.]

At the same time Calligæus and Timagoras the one of Megara, the other of Cyzicum, each banished out of his own country, came to Lacedæmon, sent indeed by Pharnabazus, who had entreated them, during the time of their exilement, but in the name of the inhabitants of Cyzicum: to get shipping of them, to carry into Hellepont. And when the messengers of Pharnabazus and Tilaphernes, made each of them his suit a part from the other, the Lacedæmonians were thereupon extremely divided among themselves: some advising that Ionia and Chios should first be helped; other that Hellepont: but in the end, the Perition of Tilaphernes and the Chii carried it; and the rather, by the help of Alcibiades, who standing at that time a committed man at Athens, lived at Sparta, in house with Endrius, one of the Ephori, his fathers old acquaintance, wherefore having made a confederacy with the Chii and Erythraens, they presently ordered 40 saile of ships to be sent away to their succor. But Calligæus and Timagoras, who were there in the behalf of Pharnabazus, and the men of Cyzicum, would contribute nothing toward the setting out of this fleet to Chios; nor would lay out the 25 talents which they had brought with them to hire ships for themselves that way; because they had a purpose shortly to prepare a fleet of their own. [44, 46]

In the so famous of the Peloponnesian war, Alcibiades an Athenian and Chalcidæus a Lacedæmonian, were sent by there off from the Athenian party: and coming speedily to draw with them by such perfidiousness as they used, they prevailed first with the Chians to revolt from the Erythreans openly to revolt from the Athenians: and then going with three ships to Clazomenæ, draw them also over from the Athenian party: and those of Clazomenæ, putting over presently into the continent adjoining, there built a strong fort, that if need were, they might there have a place to retire unto out of their poor Island: and in like manner all that revolted from the Athenians, fell in hand presently, with fortifications, and other preparatives for the war. [Thucyd. lib. 8.] with fortifications, and other preparatives for the war, (Thucid. lib. 8.)

Strombichides, a Commander of the Athenians, coming with 8 ships to Samos, and taking with him one more from the cities, failed to Teus, and perfwaded them, not to enter into any practice against the Athenians. Chalcides also came thither with 25 ships, and failed to Teus, and he, perfwaded them, not to follow the Athenians, but to fail of ships; and had with him some force companies of the Clazomenians and Erythraeans. The Teians, though at first refused to receive those force, yet when they saw the Athenians fled and gone, took them in: who having a while expected the return of Chalcides from the chafe of the Athenians, and he not returning they of their own heads, threw down the wall which the Athenians had made to the landward, with the assistance of certain others which came to help them, under the command of Tages Tiliaphenes his Lieutenant. Chalcides and Alcibiades, having pursued Strombichides, as far as to Samos, taking with them 20 ships more from Chios; failed to Miletus, and by the means of Alcibiades, who had great acquaintance with the chief men there, perfwaded them also to fall off from the Athenians; and when the Athenians followed them thither; but were kept out by the Milesians, they retreated to an Island called Ladasyne over against Miletus. (Thucid. lib. 8.)

After this revolt of the Milesians, the first association of the Lacedaemonians and the Persians was concluded and made, by Tissaphernes and Chalcideus, upon this condition, that what ever cities the Persians did then hold, or heretofore had held, should continue still in their power. [Ibid.]

The Chii therefore preletely to know how the squares went at Mileus, and with all to induce other cities to the like revolt, from the Athenians, bent their course with ten ships to Anza, a city in Caria : but being called back by Chalcidiceus, because Amorges Piffureshis his sonne, was drawing down thitherward, with his land forces, they came to a place, called Dio-bieron, a small town, in Ionia; where, geyping a fleet of 61 saile of the Athenians, sent from thence under the command of Diomedon to joyn with Thrallicus, they dispersed themselves, and one ship of them came to Ephesus, the rest to Teus; but four of them fell into the Athenians hands: yet nothing but the bare hulls, for the men were got to land, the rest of the ships came safe to Teus. After this when the Athenians were gone to Samos, the Chii pursued their purpose, with the remainder of their Fleet and Forces, and drew over to their party Lebedus and Eras, cities of Ionia. [1*b*.]

After the Foot companies of the Chii, were departed from Teus, Tissaphernes, coming thither with his army, pulled down what was left of the walls of Teus, and departed: and no sooner was he gone, but Diomedon, with ten sail of Athenians came thither, and agreed with the Teians to receive him too: and going from thence to Eras, when he had tried, and could not force it, went his way. [1*b*.]

The Athenians, having taken the Fort, which the Clazomenians had built in the Continents, made them go back again into their own Island, all save the heads of that revolt, who went to Daphnus: and so the Clazomenians returned into the obedience of the Athenians. [1*b*.]

In the same Summer, the Athenians with 80 sail which lay at Lada against Miletus, landing at Panormus, and lighting there upon Chalcideus, the Lacedemonian slenderly accompanied, slew him, and all that were with him; and returning thence the third day after, erected a Trophie in memory of what they had there done: which the Milelians, as set up by those who had not mastered the country, demolished. [1*b*.]

In the end of that Summer, the Athenians with 1500. Coraletes, and 1000. men out of Argos, and as many of their other confederates, with 48 ships, commanded by Phrynichus, and Onomacles, and Saronidas, sailed into Samos first, and from thence set sail for Miletus; and landing there, late down before it with their army. Against them went out 800. of the Milelians themselves, all Coraletes; and Alcibiades, with those companies which Chalcideus had brought out of Peloponnesus, and certain companies of foreign nation which followed Tissaphernes, and Tissaphernes himself with his Horse. The Argivi which led the Van in the wing where they were, trusting over much to their valour, were wholly routed by the Milelians, whom they vilified and contemned as being but Ionians, and lost 300. upon the place: yet the Athenians had the better of the day: and therefore setting up a Trophie in the field, let themselves to besiege the city, seated as it was, in a peninsula or neck of land: but when news was brought that a Fleet out of Sicily and Peloponnesus was upon the sea thitherward, by the advice of Phrynichus, they drew off, and returned to Samos. [1*b*id.]

The Fleet when it came, with the ships of Chios which had formerly been beaten with Chalcideus by the enemy, at the entreaty of Tissaphernes, set upon Jalos: where Amorges the half-son of Pistuthnes, (who had revolted from the King) then kept himself. The Peloponnesians under the command of Astyochus the Ammiral, to whom Theramenes a Lacedemonian had brought that Fleet, and the Syraculans (who made principal proof of their valour in this service under their General Hermocrates) setting suddenly upon the Jasiens, who thought they had been friends, surprised them, and took the city. The Peloponnesians having therein taken Amorges alive, delivered him up to Tissaphernes, to send him to Darius, if he pleased. The city Jalos it self, which long peace had made to abound with all plenty, they sacked, and made a vast booty of it: The companies which Amorges had there in pay, they saved, and because most of them were Peloponnesians borne, they lifted them among themselves: but the Town it self they gave over to Tissaphernes, with all the persons thereof, bound and free, taking for every head of them half a crown; and returning from thence to Miletus, they convoyed Pedartius, who was sent by the Lacedemonians as Governour to Chios, overland, with the companies belonging to Amorges, as far as Erythæ, and left Philippos, Governour of Mileus. [1*b*id.]

The Winter following Tissaphernes, having put a Garrison into Jassos, came to Miletus, and there according to promise made at Lacedemon; paid them and their fellows, the monies which were due, which was a drachma of Athens, upon every head; and agreed with them for a standing pay, in time to come. [1*b*.]

Astychus the Ammiral of the Lacedemonian Fleet with ten ships of Lacedemon, and as many of Chios, having in vain for a while besieged the city Preleum, put over to Clazomenæ, and there commanded such as favoured the Athenian party to leave the place, and go and dwell in Daphnus: which was the command also upon them laid by Tarnes Lieutenant of Ionia; which when they refused to do, he set upon the Town; being but an open bourgade: yet not being able to carry it by assault, he left it and went his way: But meeting with a strong wind at sea, he himself came safe to Phocæa and Cuma, but the rest of his ships, were driven ashore upon the Isles lying before Clazomenæ, Marathusa, Pera, and Dymitia: where they lay 8 dayes for the violence of the tempest; and there spent and spoiled what they pleased of such goods as the Clazomenians had transported thither for fear of the war; and the rest they put aboard their ships, and carried away, and came to Astyochus at Phocæa and Cuma. [1*b*id.]

The same Winter, Hippocrates of Lacedemon, setting sail from Peloponnesus with ten ships of the Thuriens, commanded by Dorieus and two others in commission with him, and one of Laconia, and another of Syraculæ, came to Cnidus, which had now revolted revolted from Tissaphernes, whereof so soon as the Miciens heard, they presently sent unto Hippocrates, by all means to leave one half of his ships in garrison at Cnidus, and to go with the rest, and surprize certain ships laden with Marchandise from Egypt, lying at Triopum, which is a foreland of Cnidia; and the Athenians hearing thereof, went from Samos, and surprized the six ships which lay at Triopium, as a garrison to the places, but the Mariners were got out of them, and lo left them nothing but the hulls: and then coming to Cnidus, missed but little of surprizing it, at the first onset, being but an open bourgade without walls; but being put off for that time, their purpose was, to try again the next day: but the Cnidians having cast up some works about the place that night, and they which were forced a shoate at Triopium, coming thither also, the thing grew harder to do now, than it was before, wherefore having waited the country, they returned to Samos. [1*b*id.]

When the league concluded between Chalcideus, and Tissaphernes, was judged at Sparta, not to be right, and such a little on the Lacedemonians side, another form was drawn up, between the Lacedemonians and their confederates on the one side, and Darius and his sons, and Tissaphernes on the other, in clearer terms than the former was, and subscribed, in the presence of Theramenes of Lacedemon, after which Theramenes, having given up the charge of the Navy to Astyochus, put himself aboard a little Skiff, and went his way. [1*b*id.]

The buinels, which Pharnabazus, (who was Governour for the king in Hellespont) had sent Caligæus of Megara, and Timagoras of Cyzicum about to Sparta, was there granted, according as he desired, and 27 sail of ships were sent under the command of Antithenes a Lacedemonian, in the depth of winter from Peloponnesus into Ionia. The Lacedemonians also sent 11 Commissioners of theirs (whereof one was Lycas, the son of Areteilaus) to be of counsel with Astyochus, in the management of this war, one of their instructions was, that when they came to Mileus, they should send of these 27 ships, all or some, more or less, as they should see cause into Hellespont, to Pharnabazus, and make Clearchus Commander of those they thought fit to send, and further, that, if they saw cause, they should remove Astyochus (who was drawn in to some suspicion upon Pedartius his information by letters against him,) from the charge of the Navy, and put Antithenes in his room. Now these Commissioners looting from Mælea, a port in Peloponnesus, came first to the Island of Melus; and from thence fetched a further compass about, that they might go in the less danger of the enemy, and landed at Caius in Asia. [1*b*id.]

Astychus coming to Cnidus, halted from thence to meet with the Athenian fleet, which waited for the Peloponnesian ships coming from Caius, where they were safely arrived: and meeting with them, they fought, where the Athenians gave at first the enemy a blow, but receiving a far greater one in the second fight from them, they retired, and came to Halicarnassus: and the Peloponnesians as conquerors, returned to Cnidus. The Athenians after this, came to an Island called Sima, where they had received their overthrow; with all their fleet, and yet durst not attempt any thing upon the Lacedemonian navy, which lay at Cnidus, but taking in onely some tackle and furniture from Sima, and having done something against Lorymæ, in the continent, they returned again to Samos. [1*b*id.]

When all the Peloponnesian Navy was come together at Cnidus, consisting in all of 94 ships, the 11 Commissioners debated with Tissaphernes of matters already transacted, if they found fault with any thing therein, and how the war for the future might be carried on, for the best advantage on both sides, but especially Lichas, considering what had passed, said, that neither of the two leagues, no, nor that which was made with Theramenes, was as it should be, for that it was a thing not to be endured, that the king should hold all those countries; which he or his ancestors had held, for by this reason, said he, all the Islands, and all Thrasy, and Locri, and consequently, all Bæthia, must all fall again into the kings power, and the Lacedemonians, instead of freeing the Greek cities, must help to enslave them to the power of the Persian more than ever; and therefore, that they must fall to a new draught & form of a league between them, or vacate this, and never ask nor receive Stipend more of the king of Persia, by virtue of this that was already made; whereupon Tissaphernes growing into choler, brake up the treaty, and went his way. [1*b*id.]

Now when letters came from the Peloponnesians to Astyochus, that he should make away Alcibiades, for that they had him in suspicion, and he was a professed enemy to Agis the king of Lacedemon, Alcibiades getting an inclining thereof, withdrew himself secretly, and fled over to Tissaphernes, and persuaded with him not to make such large allowance of Stipend to the peloponnesian Navy; but rather hold matters in such a balance, that neither they might subvert the state of the Athenians, nor the Athenians theirs; and so when they had wearied and worn out each other with a war, both in the end might easily be brought into the kings subjection. Hereupon Pisander and ten ten other Ambassadors with him, sent by the people of Athens, to treat with Tissaphernes and Alcibiades upon such terms as to them should seem meetest for the Commonwealth, and benefit of both, of whom Alcibiades in Tissaphernes his name made such vast demands, as though they yielded to many of them, yet were they fain at last to break off without doing any thing, for he demanded that they should surrender into the kings hands, all Ionia, with the Islands adjacent therunto: and when they had yielded thereunto, then he demanded, that the king might make what ships he would, and where he would, and that he might passe and repasse by their coast as often, and with as many ships in a fleet as he pleased. But then the Athenians conceiving these demands to be intolerable, and themselves abuled by Alcibiades, brake up in a rage, and returned to Samos, [Ibid.]

After this, toward the end of this winter season, Tissaphernes went to Canus, purposing to recall the Lacedemonian Commissioners back to Miletus, and to make them take their pay again, upon any conditions, least they should turn flat enemies against him: when they came, he paid them down all their arrears: and made a third league with them: which began thus,

In the 13 year of the reign of Darius, when Alcibiades was Ephorus, (i.e.) agreements were made, in the field of Meander, between the Lacedemonians, and their confederates on the one side, and Tissaphernes and Hieramenes, and the Jonnes of Pharnacius on the other, concerning the affairs of the king, and of the Lacedemonians and their confederates, to wit, That what country farther in Asia is the kings, that let him hold still, and of his own country, let him dispose as he will, &c. But concerning the payment of their yearly stipend it was thus agreed, That Tissaphernes should pay the fleet that then was there, till the kings own ships came, and after they were come, then the Lacedemonians and their confederates, should maintain their own navy if they would, but if they would rather have a stipend for it, then Tissaphernes should furnish it: but with conditions, that upon the end of the war, they should refund all the money, which they had received, [Ibid.] from whence we may gather the full meaning of what Justin, [lib. 5. c. 1.] more concisely hath delivered, Darius the king of Persians, saith he, making a league with the Lacedemonians by Tissaphernes his Governor of Lydia, provided to bear all the charge of the war.

In the very beginning of the summer following, which began the 21 year of the Peloponnesian war, Dercylidas, a Lacedemonian, is sent from Miletus over-land, with a small company into Hellepont, to stir up the city of Abydus, which was a colony or plantar on of the Milesians to rebel against the Athenians: whereupon that city first, and two dayes after Lampacus, fell off from them to Dercylides, and Pharnabazus.

Upon the first news whereof, Strombychides let saile out of Chios, with a fleet of 24 Athenian vessels, and came to Lesbos; and when the Lesbians made a rally to encounter him, he routed them, and took the town at the first assault; being but an open bournade, and having settled matters there, went to Abydus, but being there manfully repulsed, he put over to Sestos, and there placed a strong garrison for the defence of all the Hellepont, [Thucyd. lib. 8.]

The whole Navy of the Athenians coming together at Samos, they there entered a covenant with the Samians, to joyn in the restoring of the Populor estate in Athens, and to abolish the Junto or Government of 400 newly there erected, and bound themselves with solemn oath for performance hereof; and appointed Thralybulus and Thralyulus for captains in this action; they consulted also of calling home Alcibiades, hoping by his means, to draw away Tissaphernes from the Lacedemonian party, and to gain the kings favour and assistance to themselves, [Id. ibid.]

Among the sea-men of the Peloponnesians, which were at Miletus, there grew a grudge and murmuring against Tissaphernes, and Astyochus both; against Astyochus for that he, when as heretofore they were strong in shipping, and the Athenians weak, would never fight with them at sea, nor to this day would, though it were known well enough unto him, what division there was among the Athenians; no, nor would ever so much as draw the Lacedemonian Navy into a body; and against Tissaphernes, for that he cared not to find for the Navy of the Phœnicians, according to his promise, nor payed them their stipends, but when pleased himself; and then but by halves neither: when therefore they cried out to put the matter to a bataille; Astyochus and his confederates, commanded the Milesians to march over-land, to the fore-land of Micalæ, whiles they went about by sea, with their whole fleet, consisting of 112 ships, to the same place. But when the Athenians, which lay at Glaucia, under Mycale, with eighty two ships, saw their fleet coming, they presently weighed anchor, and highed them away as fast as they could to Samos: yet when Strombychides with his fleet, hearing thereof, halted him to come to meet them at Hellepont, the Peloponnesians withdrew and returned to Miletus. And the Athenians, having now 108 ships together, all strong and well provided, followed them home to Miletus, and there going on land, ranged their army in the open field, but seeing that the Peloponnesians would not

not come forth, they took sea again, and returned to Samos without stroke striking. After which, the Peloponnesians, seeing they were not able to deal with the Athenians, with all the force they could make by sea, and not being able of themselves to pay so many seamen, especially when Tissaphernes, was so sparing and backward, in sending in their stipend, according to agreement: they sent away Clearchus with 40 of their ships into Hellepont, to Pharnabazus, who both desired their coming very earnestly and promoted them pay very liberally, and many good offices besides, if they pleased to come, [Id.]

Thralybulus, going to Tissaphernes, brought over Alcibiades with him to Samos, where the army made him one of their chief commanders; and indeed committed the whole charge of things to his ordering: who being thus made, in a sort, General to the Athenian army, halted back presently to Tissaphernes, that he might seem to communicate in all counsels with him; and handled matters so cunningly to his own advantage, that he could make the Athenians afraid of Tissaphernes, and Tissaphernes of them, at his pleasure; [Ibid.]

And moreover wrought this effect in the Peloponnesians which lay at Miletus, that he set them further out with Tissaphernes, than they were before, so that they began now to mutiny again, not only against him, but also against Astyochus: whom they charged of collusion with Tissaphernes for his own gain and advantage sake. And in this mangling it fell out that the Mariners of the Syracusan and Thurian companies cried, gels, and demanded pay of Astyochus in a very fawcie and mutinous manner; and when he again answered them somewhat roughly, and with some menacing termes withal, and offered to bastinado Darius, who commanded the Thurian squadron (though the Greek scholiast of Thucidides, understands hereby, Hermocrates, commander of the Syracusan squadron) for upholding his maistrers, they crying, One and All, ran in upon him; and had, no doubt, there made an end of him, had he not ran and saved himself at an altar there by. The Milesians also, making a head, got secretly into the fort or citadell, which Tissaphernes had built, and turning out the soldiers that were there in garrison, took it into their own hands: which was very well liked by the rest, save only by Lychas the Lacedemonian, who said that the Milesians, and the rest under the kings dominion ought in duty to obey Tissaphernes so long as he governed so moderately as he did; and until the war should receive a happy end, [Ibid.]

Whiles they were busie in this alteration, Pindarus arrived, sent from Lacedemon to succeed Astyochus in the Admiralty or command of the Navie; and he took it upon him, upon the surrender of Astyochus. When Astyochus took shipping to returne home to Lacedemon, Tissaphernes sent a messenger of his own along with him, one Gauletes, a Carian born, but one that could both the Greek and Persian tongue; who was both to charge the Milesians for surpring his citadell, and withal to clear him from those false aspersions, which the Milesians, and Hermocrates the Syracusan had cast upon him, for he well knew, that they would along too, and accuse him for conspiring with Alcibiades against the Lacedemonian state; and for fcklenesse of minde toward them.

Tissaphernes seeing the Peloponnesians bent against him, (among other things, for suffering Alcibiades to return to his own again) as one who now openly favored the Athenian party against them, went to Aspendus, where the Phenician fleet, consisting of 147 sail of ships, was now arrived to purge himself, as he thought: and took Lichas the Lacedemonian along with him, leaving his Agent Tamos with them to see the stipend duly paid to the Peloponnesian Navy, which yet was but so performed by him: moreover the Peloponnesians at Tissaphernes his request, sent Philippos a Lacedemonian, with two tall ships to Aspendus, there to take a view of the Phenician fleet. And Alcibiades, understanding that Tissaphernes was at Aspendus came with 13 sail to Canus first, and then to Phælis, promising every where to his friends huge supplies and aides in all kinds, and when he was returned to Samos, he informed them there, that he had wrought matters so, as that the Phenician fleet should not assist the Peloponnesians, and that Tissaphernes was now become more friend to the Athenian than ever: for true it was, that Tissaphernes met with the Phenicians at Aspendus, but would not let a saile of them go to the Peloponnesians; putting them off with this idle excuse, that there were not so many ships come to him, as the king had commanded: whereas indeed his purpose was to hold both parties of the Greeks in suspense; and by siding with neither, to make them waste and consume one another, [Id.]

The Junto or Government of 400 at Athens was dissolved, and 5000 put in their places; who by an Act of theirs, ratified, and confirmed the recalling of Alcibiades home, into his country, [Ibid.] and by the same order, was he joyned in Commission, though absent, with Thralybulus, and Theramenes, and by their valour, and vertue, the Athenian state, was in short time, much reformed and brought into better order than erst it was, [Emil. Prob. in the life of Alcibiades.]

Whiles

Whiles the Peloponnesians linger out the time at Miletum, none of those, whom Tissaphernes, when he went for Apudus, had left behind him, took care to pay the Navie, nor did Tissaphernes himself, or the fleet which he promised, come at them: and both Philippos, who was sent with Tissaphernes to Apudus, wrote to Mindarus, who had the charge of things belonging to the Navie, and so did Hippocrates from Phaelis, that he should not look for any supply of ships, or any thing else that good way from Tissaphernes his hand: But on the contrary, Pharnabazus, who served the kings, in the parts of Hellespont, shewed them all the favour and friendship, that could be imagined: For he both solicited their coming, and of his own accord, moved all the Greek cities within his Province, to fall off from the Athenians (which Tissaphernes would have seemed to do too) hoping hereby to have encreased his own power. Mindarus, being nettled with this newes, made ready in an instant 70 ships; and gave the word, on a suddain to be gone, to the end, that there might no tidings thereof be carried to Samos, where the Athenians lay; and presently weighing anchor from Miletus, ran a freight course to Hellespont; and Thratyllus hearing thereof, followed him from Samos, with 55 saile [Thucid. lib. 8.]

Mindarus and the Syracusan Squadron had a fight at sea with Thratyllus and Thratybulus, at a fore-land of Cynos-tema (a place known by old Hecubaes tombe) where after a sharp bickering on both sides, the Athenians went away with the victory, having had 15 of their own ships sunk, and taken 21 of their enemies: which sea-fight is more fully set forth by Thucid. in his 8. book, and by Diod. Sic. 2. year of 92 Olympiades.

The 4 day after this fight, the Athenians having used all possible diligence, in repairing their fleet, set saile from Sestos to Cyzicum, which had revolted from them, and having elapsed 8 ships at Harpagium and Prapus, which came from Byzantium, set upon them, and having beaten those who defended them from the shoare, took the ships into their own possession: and going on their way to Cyzicum, took that also, being then but an open bourgade, and squeezed a great summe of money out of them. [Thuc. 8.]

Alciabides setting out from Samos with 20 ships, exacted great summes of money out of them of Halycarnassus: and then waiting the country of Coos, fenced the town of Coos, with a wall; and the winter now drawing on, returned with a great prey to Samos [Id. ib. Diod. 2. year of 92 Olympiades.]

Astacus a Persian borne, and Lieutenant to Tissaphernes, having conceived secret deadly hatred against the men of Delos (who being driven out of their old habitation, dwelt at Aratmyrium) coming that way, sent for all the chief men among them, as friends and confederates, to come and serve the king in his wars, and upon a time, seeing them altogether at dinner, closed them round with his souldiers, and they with their darts flew them every man, [Thucid. ib.]

Those of Antandrus in Eolia, fearing lest Astacus should serve them with the same fauce, and impatient of those taxes which he had laid upon them, sent for certain Peloponnesian souldiers, from Abydus, and drawing them privily over the mount Ida, received them into their city, and turned the garrison of Astacus out of the Castle there, [Id. ibid.]

Tissaphernes returning from Apudus into Ionia, and being much moved with this last attempt at Antandrus, and with other like a. Miletus and Cnidus (for there also the inhabitants had turned out his garisons) thought himself much wronged by the Peloponnesians: wherefore fearing worse matters from them, and troubled moreover in his mind, lest Pharnabazus, in a shorter time, and with far lesse charge in paying them, should seem to have gone further against the Athenians than himself had done, he purposed to go in person to the Peloponnesians in Hellespont, both to expostulate with them their fact in turning his Garrison out of Antandrus, and also to clear himself, in the best manner he could, of those imputations which they laid upon him, concerning the Persian fleet and other things: and as soon as he was come to Ephesus, he there sacrificed to Diana, [Id. lib. 8. in fi.] Here ends the History of 48 years after, [Diod. 2. year of 92 Olympiades.] Theo-pompus we have not, the later we have, but in the head: for besides the proeme of his History, we want his whole two first years of it to wit, from the end of the summer of the 21 year of the Peloponnesian war, where Thucidides left, to the end of the 23 summer of the same war.

Olthe 300 ships sent back into Phenicia, Tissaphernes purged himself to the Lacedemonians, saying that he had received advertisement, that the coast of Phenicia was in danger to be assailed both by the Arabians, and also by the king of Egypt (meaning K. Amyrtus) [as Diod. Sic. lib. ii. 3. year of the 93 Olympiades.] whereas Thucid. taught us, that there came but 147 ships to Apudus out of Phenicia, and that they were all sent back again by Tissaphernes; contrary to his promise made.

There was this year another sea-fight, between the Lacedemonians, and Athenians, at Cynos-tema aforesaid; which was described by Theo-pompus, as a certain nameless greek writer saith, in the life of Thucid.

Thymochares, coming to Athens with a small company of ships, presently the Lacedemonians and Athenians had another sea-fight, wherein the Lacedemonians, under the conduct of Hegelandridus, gat the victory, [Xen. in the beginning of his History of the Greeks.]

Not long after Doreius of the Isle of Rhodes, Ammiral of the Thurian Fleet, our of Italy, in the beginning of Winter, setting out from Rhodes with 14 sail of ships, went to the Hellespont, there to joyn with Mindarus: who lying at Abydus, did there attend the coming of all the friends and confederates of the Peloponnesian name and nation. And now was this Doreius come as far as Sigum, a Port in Troas, when the Athenians lying at Sestos, having knowledge of his being there, and whether he was going, went toward him with 20 ships: but Doreius hearing of their coming, fled from thence, and drew up his ships upon the Rhætan shoar; and having therelanded his men, with the help of the men of Dardania, they defended both themselves and their ship too, in spite of the Athenians: who seeing at last they could do no good upon them, came back to Madyrus, to the rest of their army. Mindarus seeing this fight, who at that time happened to be at old Troy, sacrificing to Minerva, went speedily with 84 ships to the Foreland of Dardania, to relieve Doreius, and to save his ships; where he found also the land Forces of Pharnabazus ready to assist the Lacedemonian Navy against their enemies. Against whom the Athenian Fleet consisting of 74 ships came forth, close to the shoar of Abydus, and there began the fight. Mindarus having under his command 97 ships in all of his own, besides those of Doreius, he placed the Syracusians in the left wing; himself took charge of the right: on the other side, Thratybulus had the right wing, Thratyllus the left. The fight continued doubtful from morning to the evening: when upon the sudden Alciabides came stemming in with 18 fresh ships which came from Samos towards Hellespont: upon fight whereof the Lacedemonians fled towards Abydus. And the Athenians, following them close, took ten of their ships; and then a great storm of wind arose, so that the Athenians could not do as they would have done in the chase, and so the Peloponnesians escaped: all safe to shoar, and fled to Pharnabazus his land army that was thereby; and Pharnabazus himself during the fight, rid his horse into the very sea, up to his saddle-skirt, and there fought, and commanded his men both Horse and Foot to do the like. The Peloponnesians also themselves, locking the ships close together, and making one bulke of them, fought against their enemies from the decks close to the shoar: but the night drawing on, the Athenians with 30 empty ships which they had taken of their enemies, and taking with them such of their own as had been hurt and either battered or bilged in the fight, returned to Sestos: and the next morning so soon as it was light, gathering what spoiles they could get together of their enemies wreck, they erected a Trophy: and then leaving 40 sail to guard the Hellespont, they disposed of the rest, some here, some there, to gather up their tribute monies: yet one of their chief Captains, Thratyllus, sailed back to Athens, there to let them know what a victory they had gotten, and withal to desire a supply both of men and shipping for the carrying on of the war in those parts. [Xen. Hellen. lib. 1. Diod. Sic. lib. 13. Plutarch in the life of Alciabides.]

Mindarus, about the first watch of the night, came back to the sea side, and gave order for the curing of his ships which were hurt and broken in the fight: and sent in all haste to Lacedemon for fresh supplies, both by land and sea. And whilst these things were in providing, his purpose was to joyn his land Forces with Pharnabazus, to take in the tributary cities of the Athenians, that were in Asia, [Diod. ib.]

Meane while came Tissaphernes in Hellespont, and Alciabides thinking to magnifie himself after to great and glorious a victory achieved against the Lacedemonians, came a land unto him with rich presents, and a princely traine. But Tissaphernes, who was already ill spoken of at Lacedemon, and fearing least some information would be made against him to Darius, laid hold on him, and put him in irons at Sardes: pretending, that such was the Kings command, to shew, that he reckoned the Athenians for his open enemies. But within a month after, he with one Mantheus, a Carian borne, and a fellow prisoner of his, gat horses, and by night stole away to Clazomenæ; and gave out, that it was with Tissaphernes his privy and consent, [Xen. Hellen. lib. 3. Plutarch in Alciab.]

Mindarus with 60 sail of ships, in the later end of Winter, went to Cyzicum, and joyning with Pharnabazus his land army, took the place by force; and against him with 86 ships went Alciabides, Thratybulus, and Theramenes; and routed him first at sea, and then in a second fight at land; in which Mindarus himself, bravely fighting, died. The Syracusians, seeing no means left to escape, set their own ships on fire. The rest of the Fleet came all entirely into the Athenians hands, who carried them all away to Preconessus. This fight is more amply described [by Xenophon Hellen. lib. 1. by Diod. lib. 13. by Plutarch in the life of Alciabides, and by Polyann. strateg. lib. 2.]

The next day the Athenians sailed from Preconessus to Cyzicum, where they were received received into the city; which was abandoned by Pharnabazus, and the Peloponnesians, [Xenoph.] and there they erected two Trophies; the one for their victory at sea, in the Isle of Polydorus, the other for that at land; where they first put the enemies to flight, [Diod.]

Alcibiades staying at Cyzicum 20 days, and having gotten a vast summe of money out of them, departed without doing them any other harme: and returned to Pæconneus, [Xenoph.]

The Commanders of the Athenians, which remained behind at Cyzicum, came at length to Chalcedon, and there walled Chrysopeia, and made it a place where to gather a role or tribute of every bottom that passed by out of Pontus, [Xen. Hellen. lib. 1. Polyb. lib. 4. pa. 312. and Diod. 4 year of 93 Olympiade] leaving there a Garrison, and a Fleet of 30. ships, under the command of Theramenes and Eubolus; both to keep the Town, and also to watch what ships came in and out at the mouth of Pontus; and to do what other mischief they could to the enemy, [Xenoph.]

The Athenians also intercepted certain letters, written Laconically, or concisely, from Hippocrates, Mindarus his Lieutenant to Lacedæmon, to the Ephori there, of the losse they had sustained at Cyzicum: in this wise Εἴπον τὴν κατὰ Μινδαρὸν δὲ Λακωνικῶς: νοση δὲ τὸ ἄσπετον: ἀπορροήσας τὴν γὰρ δόξαν. (1.) Allis lost: Mindarus is dead; our men starve: we know not what to do; [Xenoph. and Plutarch.]

The Lacedæmonians hereupon sued for peace, which they opposed, who lived by the war; [Justin. lib. 5. cap. 4.] For though the more moderate sort of the Athenians were inclinable enough to peace, yet they who made their advantage of these combustions, chose rather to continue the war: especially one Cleophon, who was a principal Leader of the people; He, when he had spoken many things proper enough to the purpose then in hand, ἡμῶν τε τὸν πόλεμον καὶ τὴν πόλιν ἡμῶν ἀσθενέστατον ὡς οὐδὲν τὸν πόλεμον ἐκ τῆς πόλεως ἡμῶν ἀσθενέστατον, as Diodor. Sic. elegantly expreth it: (1. c.) He made the people proud, by recounting to them the greatness of their good success; as if Fortune did not use to bestow her favours in the war by turns; Now this Cleophon, (though to his own confusion, as appeared afterward) was by his occupation of this war, (though to his own confusion, as appeared afterward) was by his occupation a Lute-maker; and one who, as every man knew, had been a slave and kept in irons; yet afterward by his munificence and largesse, grew so bold, as openly to profess, that he would with his own hand, cut off that mans head who ever he wares, that should offer to speak any more of a peace: as Eschines hath it in his Orations De falsa legatione, (1. c.) of a false Embassy.

The Peloponnesians, and their confederates the Syracusians, as many as had escaped alive out of the fight, betook themselves to Pharnabazus, [Diodor. lib. 13.] whom Pharnabazus courteously entertained, and with many words of comfort told them, that for the losse of a few wooden ships, they should not let fall their courage, seeing the king had wood enough in his Dominions to build more ships: withal, so long as the men were safe: and withal gave them every man a new suite of cloaths, and two monthes pay beforehand: and moreover arming the Mariners, placed Garrisons all along the sea coasts of his Government; and assembling all the Commanders of Cities, and Captains of every ship, gave them order to build as many new ships at Antandrus, as they had lost of their old; and gave large allowance of monies to go in hand therewith; and allowed them timber out of the mount Ida, as much as they would for that purpose: which done, he presently sent to relieve Chalcedon, [Xenoph. Hellen. lib. 1.]

While this Navy was in building, the Syracusians, joyning with the inhabitants of Antandrus, built a wall about the Town, and made it a most strong place of defence; in requital whereof, the Antandrians made the Syracusians free of their City, [Xenoph. ib.]

The Captains of these Syracusian companies, being all condemned to exile, by their country-men at home; Their General Hemocrates, accused Tisaphernes at Lacedæmon, and found credit in all that he said; not only upon the testimony of Astyochus, but even for his own words sake: whereupon he returned to Pharnabazus, and without asking, received from him a large sum of money; wherewith having procured men and ships, he returned into his own country, [Xenoph. ib. with Diodor. 4 year, Olympiade 92.]

Paraspiddas, being condemned to exile at Sparta, because it was conceived, that by his plotting with Tisaphernes, he had procured all that favoured the Lacedæmonian party, in a tumult there raised, to be turned out of the Isle of Thalus: Cratesippidas was sent to take charge of the Navy in his room at Chios, [Xenoph. ib.]

He with 25 sail of ships, trifled away the time about the coast of Ionia, but did nothing worth the speaking of for a long time; yet afterward, being furnished with monies monies

nies by those that were banished out of Chios, he brought them home again, and thrust 600 of the contrary faction out; who possessing themselves of Aracneum, a most fortified place in the continent, over against Chios, made dayly incursions from thence upon them, [Diod. ib.]

In the 93 Olympiade, wherein Eubotas the Cyrenian won the prize in running, when Archippus was Ephorus at Lacedæmon, and Euctemon, was Prætor, or L. Chancellor at Athens, there was a new game set up, of a race to be run, by a brace of Mules; in a Coach, called Ξυρούς, or ορούς, as Xenophon (Hellen. lib. 1.) of which besides Diod. Sic. lib. 13. and Pausan. lib. 1. Ellias, Julius Africanus also in Catalog. Stadiocarum maketh mention, adding moreover, that in the same Olympiade, Polydamantes the Scotian, won the prize at wrastling, being the same man, whom Darius Nothus, by express messengers, with large gifts and promises drew to him at Susa, where he flew three of the kings guard, which is called the Immortal Guard, of which you may see more in Herod. lib. 7. cap. 83. which all at once ran in upon him, as Pausan. in his later book Eliacor, sheweth, who also in the same book speaketh of Eubotas, (surnamed Stadæonicus, who when the Oracle of Ammon had foretold, that he should win the prize at running, he caused his own statue to be made before-hand; and coming afterward intended to win the prize, was proclaimed to have won it, and dedicated his statue in testimony thereof, all in one day.

In this year also, the Medes which had fallen off from Darius the king of Persians, submitted themselves again to him, as Xenophon testifieth, [Hellen. 1.] Herodotus also, in the first of his History, [cap. 130.] relates, how the Medes revolted from Darius, and that upon an overthrow received, they returned to his subjection: who because he makes mention both of the war at Decelæa, [lib. 9. cap. 71.] which was waged the fifth year before, and of Amytraus his son reigning after him, [lib. 3. cap. 15.] (of whom I shall speak more in the year following) hence I gather, that he either wrote, or at least revised his History, in the very later end of the Peloponnesian war.

In the beginning of the Summer, Thrasyllus at Athens, taking command of the ships committed to his charge, with five thousand seamen, all armed in fashion of targeteers, which he was to joyn with those other targeteers, which were there before, came to Samos, where having staid three dayes, he put over to the coast of Pygega, in Ionia, and having first wasted the country thereabout, he came at last with his army before the wall of the town it self, and when some succours came from Mileus, and fell upon the Athenians, who were but slightly armed, and busie in gathering the spoile of the country, the rest of the Athenians coming to relieve their fellows, put all the Milesians, (as we escape) to the sword, and having got together, 200 of the bucklers, of them that were slain, erected a trophy of them, and the next day failed to Notium, and there providing themselves of necessaries, went to Colophas, which presently yielded to them. The next night they entered into Lydia, when their corn was almost ripe, and set many villages on fire. But whiles they were scattered here and there, and minded nothing but their boot-haling, Stages, a Persian, (the same Stages, as it should seem, which I mentioned before in the year of the World, 3592, out of Thucydides) fell upon them with his horse, and took one prisoner, and few eleven of them, [Xenoph. Hellen. lib. 1.]

Tisaphernes understanding that Thrasyllus was ready to set sail for Ephesus, so surpriseth, gathered together all the strength he could make, and sent about horsemen into all parts, to command men to come in and defend Diana of the Ephesians, Thrasyllus, when he had spent 17 dayes in Lydia, set sail for Ephesus; landed his coxleers at Corellus, but his horse, his Targeteers, and other Soldiers all, he set on shoat near to a bog on the other side of the town, and so soon as it was light, drew up to the town in two companies: against whom, they of the town, with such aids as Tisaphernes had sent them; set first upon the coxleers which were at Corellus: whom when they had routed, and pursued to the sea side, and killed some ten of them they speedily returned, and set upon them which were placed near the bog: where having put the Athenians to flight, and slain 300 of them upon the place, they there erected one Trophy, and another at Corellus. But of their aids, they highly rewarded the companies of the Syracusians, and Selinuntians, because they had carried themselves of all others most valiantly in that service; promising such of them, as would be denised in their city, freedom from tax and tallage for ever, [Id. ib.] Plutarch also in the life of Alcibiades, maketh mention of a Trophy of brass there set up in corn of the Athenian nation.

The Athenians, having upon a truce received the bodies of their slain, and buried them at Notium, failed away to Lesbos and Hellepont. And when they at Methymna, a city of Lesbos, they there elapsed twenty five sail of the Syracusians, with whom they had had to do at Ephesus, passing by, they set upon them, and took 4 ships, with all the men in them, and routing the rest, pursued them as far as Ephesus. Thrasyllus sent all the prisoners which he had taken to Athens, saving only one Alcibiades an Athenian, and cousin german to Alcibiades, and a banished man also, as the other was, and him he there put to death: and then set sail for Sestus, where the army lay; and from Sestus the whole army put over to Lampacus; and withal, the Winter which they reckon from the beginning of Autumn, came on. But when Alcibiades at Lampacus, would have drawn his whole army of all sorts into one indistinct body, his own old soldiers refused to be ranked and mingled with those who had served under Thrasyllus. We said they, who have ever been conquerors, so be forced with those that were beaten and routed but the other day. [Xen. Hellen. 1.]

When Alcibiades and Thrasyllus his companies wintering altogether at Lampacus (Diodorus his copies have it Labdacus) had fortified the places, in a military way; they then went to besiege Abydos: which when Pharnabazus came with a very great army to relieve, he was there fought withal by the Athenians, overcome, and put to flight. And Alcibiades had Pharnabazus himself in chase, with his Horse, and 120. Corslets following him; and gave him not over till late in the night. Upon which victory so gotten, the whole army grew friends, and willingly cohabited each with other, without distinction: and so returned triumphantly into their Camp whence they set out.

The next day Alcibiades set up a Trophy; and went and wasted Pharnabazus his province, with fire and sword, without any opposition; but all the Priests which he took, he sent away ransom-free, [Plutarch lib.]

The Lacedemonians finding themselves aggrieved with Tissaphernes his delays, and puttings off, sent Boeotus and others with him Ambassadors unto Darius; who easily obtained of him all that ever they demanded, [Xen. Hellen. lib. 1. 7.]

In the same Winter, Alcibiades and Thrasyllus his companies, making their several inroads upon the countries belonging to Darius; in the Continent, made infinite havoc there, [Id. lib.]

Darius gave his son Cyrus the younger, being then not above 16 years of age; as being born after his father came to be King, (as Ctesias affirmeth, and Plutarch also in the life of Artaxerxes) charge over all the sea coast, with the title of Satrapes, (i.e.) Prefident or Governour of all those countries: and withal made him Generalissimo of all those, whose Rendezvous or place of assembling was wont to be in the plain of Caïstus in Lydia: with this charge, that he should joyn with the Lacedemonians in making war against the Athenians, [Id. lib. and in Exped. Cyri. lib. 1. in initio.] And Jesui, [lib. 5. cap. 5.] out of Trogus, saith, That Darius King of Persia made his younger son Cyrus Governour of all Ionia and Lydia; and that it was he who raised the Lacedemonians to the recovery of their former fortunes. And Diodorus saith expressly, that Darius sent his sonne Cyrus to this very end, that in pursuing the war against the Athenians, he should relieve and set up the Lacedemonians, [1 year of the 93 Olympiads] and he also very well saith that Cyrus was made, ἑξῆς τῶν ἐπὶ Δαδῆτιος ἐπὶ ἑξαυτῶν: (i. e.) Commander over all the Governours by the sea side, 2 year of the 94 Olympiads, and (in the 2 year of the same Olympiads) that he was made, ἡνὶ Δαδῆτιος ἀσπασμῶν ἡγούμενος: (i. e.) He was made Commander in chief, over all the Provinces lying upon the sea coast: For it is manifest, that both Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus, though both Satrapes and Governours of their several provinces, yet were both under him and his command.

We read in Euseb. his Chron. that after Amyrtaeus of Sais, Nephertites the King of a new Dynastie or Principality, succeeded in the kingdom of Egypt: whereas we find, [in Diodorus, 1 year Olympiads 95] that next before Nephertites or Nepherites, Plampitichus (descended of the race of that old Plammitchus; whom Manetho placeth in the 26 Dynastie or Principality, which was also of the Saïtes) reigned in Egypt. So that a man may well doubt, whether this were not Psautris the son of Amyrtaeus, which by the favour and help of the Persians recovered his fathers kingdom, as [Herod. lib. 3. c. 5. reporteth] but of the number of this and other Egyptian Kings reigns, we have already spoken in our Egyptian Chronology.

In the year when Pantacles was Ephorus in Sparta, and Antigones Prator or L. Chancellor in Athens, in the beginning of the Spring, next going before their coming into their offices: the Athenians with all the power they could make, sailed into Proconessus: and removing from thence, encamped before Chalcodon, [Xenophon, Hellen. 1.] Diodorus saith that they went to Theramenes, who at that time lay before Chalcodon, with 70 sail of ships, and 5000. men, [1 year 4. Olympiads 91.]

The Inhabitants of Chalcodon, hearing of the approach of the Athenian army, sent away all their goods to the Thracians of Bythinia, their next neighbours. But Alcibiades hearing thereof, went with all his Horse, and a part of his Foot, and demanded all those goods of them; threatening force, if they refused to deliver them: and so having gotten them, made peace with the Bythinians, and returned to his Camp before Chalcodon: and drew a wall of timber-work before the City athwart the neck of land from sea to sea: which when Hippocrates the Lacedemonian Commander saw, he drew out all his forces, and fought with Thrasyllus, upon equal terms for a great while, till at length, Alcibiades coming in with his forces, both of horse and foot, Hippocrates was laid dead upon the place, and then his men were fain to fly back into the city. But while the fight continued, Pharnabazus, with all his army, coming another way without the timber wall, fought by all means to have broken in, and to have come to the rescue of Hippocrates, but failing thereof, wheeled about, and retired to Heracleum, or the Temple of Hercules, which was in the territory of Chalcodon, where his own camp lay well entrenched, [Xenophon lib. 1. and Plutarch in the Life of Alcibiades.]

After this Alcibiades went into Hellepont, and Cheronefus, to gather moneys: and the rest of the Commanders, (though Diodorus saith, only Theramenes) came to a composition with Pharnabazus, concerning Chalcodon, that he should give them 30 talents, and should convoy the Athenian Ambassadors safely to the kings presence; and by solemn oath they covenanted each with other, that the men of Chalcodon should pay the Athenians the same tribute they did before, with all arrears: and that in the mean time, the Athenians should not offer to molest them of Chalcodon, till the returne of their Ambassadors from the king, and Alcibiades at his return, sending two Commissioners from Chalcodon, and Pharnabazus two more from Cryopolis, did not only interchangeably swear performance of Covenants on the publick behalf, but they themselves plighted their faith each to other solemnly, upon the same terms, [Xenophon.]

These things thus done, Pharnabazus presently returned; willing the Ambassadors, which were to go to the King to meet him at Cyzicum: now the Ambassadors sent from the Athenians to the king were these, Dorabius, Philodices, Theogenes, Euryptolemus, and Manitibemus, unto whom were added of the Argivians, Cleistratus, and Pyrrolochus: and some Ambassadors also from the Lacedemonians, as Pasipadas, and others: all these took their journey to the King; to whom Hermocrates also, who stood now a banished man from Syracusa, joyned himself, and Proxenus his brother, [Id.]

Whiles Pharnabazus was taking care for the conveying of these Ambassadors, there came unto him from the other side of the water, Clearchus, a Lacedemonian Commander, partly to receive moneys for the pay of their army; and partly that he might gather into a body the ships, which lay scattered, some at Antandrus, some in Hellepont, and some in other places; hoping thereby to work some mischief, upon the confederate places of the Athenians: and in special thereby to draw off their forces from before Byzantium. But in his absence from thence, Byzantium was betrayed and given up to the Athenians, [Id.]

As these Athenian Ambassadors were upon their way to the King, there met them the Lacedemonian Ambassadors, Boeotus, and the rest returning from the Kings; and Cyrus himself then going to his charge, as Governour over all the sea coasts of those parts: whom when they saw they laid suit unto him, was, that they might proceed in their journey to the King; if not, that they might return safe home again: but Cyrus commanded Pharnabazus, either to deliver up those Ambassadors into his hands, or at least to send them home again; as being no ways willing, that the Athenians should come to the knowledge of what was then in hand against them, whereupon Pharnabazus held the Ambassadors still in suspense, sometimes telling them, that he would carry them on their way to the king, sometimes that he would send them home again; and so held them on by the space of three years (or rather, indeed of three months) and in the end, by Cyrus his leave, dismissed them to return to their own home, [Ibid.]

Alcibiades taking with him 20 ships from Samos, sailed into the Bay of Ceramus in Caria, and having there gathered 100 talents in money, and withal, taking the pillage of no less than 200 vessels, which he had either rifled or sunk, came to Athens; where being declared General of all their armies, with full and absolute power to command, and having received 200 talents, as Lyfias, in his oration, against his son Alcibiades sheweth) out of the treasury of the city, he presently raised an army, of 1500 corslets, and 150 horse, with 100 sail of ships, [Xenophon, Hellen. 1. Diodorus lib. 13. Jesui lib. 5. cap. 4. 5. Plutarch and Emil. Probos, in the Life of Alcibiades.]

Satyrus the Son of Spartacus, held the kingdom of Bosphorus Cimmericus, by the space of 14 years, [Diod. year 4. Olympiads 98.]

The Lacedemonians, when Cratespides their Admirals time was out, sent Lysander to succeed him in that charge: He, when he came to Rhodes, having there gathered the fleet together, sailed therewith into the Isle of Cos, and to Miletus, and from thence to Ephesus, with 70 sail of ships, and there stayed, till Cyrus came to Sardes, [Xenophon, Hellen. 1.] And when he found Ephesus pliant to him, and wholly addicted to the Lacedemonian party, and much grieved with the Persians carriage, and fallen to decay,

decay, by reason that the Persian Governours lay commonly at Mileus thereby, and drew away all the trade and traffick from them, to that city; he therefore took up his standing quarter there, commanded all marchants to unloade there, made sundry Docks, and caused all ships for the Navy to be there built. By which means he procured in short time, their port to be filled with ships, their exchange with Merchants, and their shops and ware-houses, with all kind of wealth. [Plutarch, in the Life of Lyfander.]

Lyfander being certified, that Cyrus was come to Sardes, went thither to him, in company with the rest of the Commissioners from Sparta, where he charged Tisaphernes very heavily; for that, when he had command from the king to support and help the Lacedemonians what he could; to beat the Athenians out of the sea, he on the contrary by Alcibiades his procurement, grew remisse, and cold that way, and by keeping back their pay from the mariners, utterly destroyed the Lacedemonian Navy, and Cyrus of himself was willing enough to receive any information against Tisaphernes, who had otherwise no goodness in him; and was ever a back friend to Cyrus himself: and the more Lyfander put on the young man to be doing, the forwarder was he to promise, that all should be done; adding still, that it was his fathers command it should be so; and assured him, that there should be no want, neither of payes nor monies on his part, for that service he tailed the pay of th. Mariner and sea Soldier, from 3 Soles by the day to 4, he payed the whole army, what ever was in arreare: advanced a whole months pay before hand; paying down to Lyfander 10000 Darics for this purpose, and by this means put heart and courage, more than ever, into his own seamen, and left the Athenian fleet empty almost of Mariners, for the most part of them, for greedinesse of better pay, left the Athenians, and went unto Lyfander, and them, for greedinesse of better pay, left the Athenians, and went unto Lyfander, and those which staid, grew idle and careless in the service, and mutinous and troublesome dayly to their Commanders. [Xenoph. Hellen. 1. Diodor. lib. 13. and Plut. in the life of Lyfander.]

When the Athenians heard this, with heavy hearts, and by the setting on of Tisaphernes, they dispatched away Ambassadors to Cyrus; but Cyrus refused to admit of them to his presence, though Tisaphernes himself spake for them; and told him, that what he did, he did upon the advice of Alcibiades, whose counsel it ever had been, to hold the Grecians in a balance, and let neither side overtop the other, but suffer them to continue the war, and thereby to waite and consume one another to nothing. [Id. ibid.] And although the Peloponnesians were thus borne up by the Persian bags, yet the Athenians held it out 3 whole years against them. [Thucyd lib. 2.] And who can wonder if at last the Athenian state was sunk, and came to naught, seeing that the power of all the East joyned to their destruction. [Justin. li. 5. cap. 1.]

Lyfander, when he was returned to Ephesus, there rested him for a while; and in that time drew up 90 of his ships, which were fore bruited; and made them fit again and serviceable for the sea. [Xenoph. Hellen. 1.] He sent also for the chiefeft, and most powerful men out of every adjoining city; made a confederacy with them, and assured them, that if things forced out in this war, as he hoped they would, he would make every one of them a Prince in his own city: whereupon they were lo to let a gog, that every man was ready to do more, than Lyfander himself could with reason require of them; and so came to be abundantly provided of all things necessary for the war in a trice, and sooner than he could have imagined. [Diod. l. 13.]

When Alcibiades had heard, that Thralybulus was gone out of Hellespont to fortify Phocaea; he set saile and went unto him: leaving the fleet in the mean time, under the charge of Antiochus with a strict command, that he should in no wise, offer to stir out, nor fight with Lyfander in his absence. But Antiochus, with his own vessel, and one other of Notium, as Xenophon and Plutarch say, (for Diodorus saith, that he drew out ten of the choicest ships he had) would needs go himself to Ephesus, and there skir along before the very noses of Lyfanders ships. Then Lyfander put out at first with a small company of ships, and pursued him; but when more and more came to the help of Antiochus, Lyfander drew out his whole fleet; and the Athenians did the like on their side, from Notium and other places: but when they came on, here and there in a confused manner, they quickly lost 15 of their best ships, and the rest saved themselves by flight; and Antiochus himself was slain in the fight. Lyfander erecting a Trophy at Notium, returned with the ships which he had taken to Ephesus, and the Athenians that were left, to Samos, where Alcibiades hearing what had passed, went with his whole fleet before the port of Ephesus, and there ranged it, in battle array. But Lyfander not stirring (for indeed his number was far inferior to that of the enemies) Alcibiades returned to Samos, from whence he came. [Xenoph. Hellen. 1. Diodor. lib. 13. Plut. in the lives of Alcibiades and Lyfander.]

Alcibiades putting to sea again from Samos, failed to Cuma; where laying many false calumnies to their charge; he took a multitude of them prisoners, and brought them a board his own ships: but when the Cumeans ran all presently to armes, and stood stood upon their guard; and fell withal upon their enemies: Alcibiades for a while, bare the brunt of their assault; but when the country there about came in also to their help, Alcibiades returned the prisoners which he had taken, and was faine to flee to his ships for a safeguard: yet this defeat sticking in his stomach, he presently sent for more help to Mitylene; and drew his men forth in battalion before the walls of Cuma, and dared them to come forth: But when no man stirred, he drew his men back to Mitylene having first ravaged and wasted the country round about.

The Cumeans sent presently to Athens, and there brought their action; and put in their bill against him in forme of Law: for that he had waited and spoiled, a considerable city, and country thereabout, which had no wayes offended them. And the way once opened, sundry other complaints came in against him, of foule misdemeanors in that kind: And some also of the Garison in Samos, which bore him a grudge, stole over to Athens, and informed against him: and openly charged him before the whole assembly of the people, that he plaid false, and did but collude with the Lacedemonians; & had private intelligence and correspondence with Pharnabazus, upon a sure hope given him, that if they prevailed, he should be made Prince and Sovereign of Athens. [Diod. lib. 13.]

3598. The Cumeans therefore on the one side, and Thralybulus in the behalf of the armies on the other, accusing him of many pranks, played by him in his government, there were presently sent away Conons, and nine other Commissioners assistants with him, to succed Alcibiades in the charge of the Army: which he hearing of, got presently and privately away in a single ship; and went to his own lands and castles, which were in the Cheritonius of Thrace. [Diodor. lib. Xenoph. Hellen. 1. Plutarch in the life of Alcibi.]

Lyfander, lending for such out of the cities adjoining, as he knew to be blades, and had good hearts and head-peeces of their owne, bad them make every man, what friends he could, and set up for himself: assuring them as before, that as soon as the Athenians were down, he would dissolve the popular governments in all those cities, and that they should be every man a Prince in his own country. [Plut. in the life of Lyfander.]

The moon was eclipsed in the evening. [Xenophon Hellen. 1.] 15. April, according to the Julian Calendar, about 3 houres after sun set; as the Astronomical account sheweth.

When Priyas was Ephorus at Sparta; and Callias, Pretor or L. Chancellor in Athens, and Lyfanders year of command was out, Callicratidas was sent to succed him in the charge of the navy; and so far as he was a man whom Lyfander had, he surrendered the ships to him indeed, as he could do no less; but of the monies which he had received from Cyrus to pay the Navy withal, what was remaining unpaid in his hand, that he all returned to Cyrus again at Sardes, bidding Callicratidas, go aske it of Cyrus if he would have it, and see how he could get monies to pay the Navy: whereupon Callicratidas was forced out of pure necessity, to make a journey into Lydia, to Cyrus, and there desired to have pay for the Navy. But being none of the greatest Courtiers, grew quickly impatient of attendance, and that thus he was put off and delayed from day to day; and saying that the Greeks were come to a faire passe, if they must now stand crouching for pay, to a company of barbarians, gave over his suit, and came his way. [Xenoph. Hellen. 1. and Plut. in the life of Lyfander.]

Callicratidas sailing to Mileus, got monies of them there; and going from thence to Chios, had the Castle of Delphinium, which was kept by five hundred Athenians, delivered up unto him: which he brake downe; and having there gotten about a mark sterling, for every mariner, went to Teos, where slipping into the towne by night, he sacked it; and came to Lesbos, where he took Mithynna the chief City of the Isle: Conon the Athenian made what haste he could to come to their rescue, but came too late; wherefore, finding all lost there, he began to fly away; but Callicratidas with his fleet of one hundred and seventy ships, pursued him; drew him to a fight, and overcame him. In which fight, Conon, having lost 30 saile of his ships, fled with the 40 that were left, to Mitylene. But Callicratidas followed him, and there blockt him up by sea and land: and whilst he lay there, monies came to him, sent after him by Cyrus. [Xenoph. lib. Diod. l. 13.]

The Athenian Navy consisting in all, of one hundred and fifty saile, drew forth, to come to the rescue of Mitylene: and Callicratidas, leaving Eteoncius, with fifty ships to continue the siege, with the other one hundred and twenty, came to the Islands called Arginae, which lye between Malea, and a bay of Lesbos, and Catanis, a foreland in Asia, and there, manfully fighting, was slain; the Athenians got the victory, but lost twenty and five of their ships in the fight, with all the men aboard them, save some some few, which swam a shore, and the Peloponefians having lost seventy and seven ships, fled away to Chios; but the greatest part of them retired into the Countreys of Cuma and Phocæa, [Id. ib.] and that this fight at Arginusæ, was made, when Callias was Pretor, or L. Chancellor at Athens, the third year of the ninety third Olympiade, besides Xenophoa and Diodorus, Athenæus also in his fifth book, de prosp. affirmeth.

Cyrus put to death his two own cousin Germans, Autobezaces and Mitreus, the sons of Darius his fathers sister: for that when they met him, they had not pulled in their hands within their sleeves; an honour which was never wont to be done, but to the king himself; which when Hieramenes and his wife, the parents, as it seemeth, of them that were to put to death, heard, they told Darius, that it was a shame for him, to wink at so foule a fact of his son: whereupon Darius sent for his son, to reparaire to his presence, pretending that he was sick, in his Camp at Thammeria, in the Country of the Medes, whither he was gone with his army against the Cadusians, a bordering Nation, which had newly revolted from him, [Xenophon Hellen. lib. 2.]

The Lacedæmonians which were scattered in the countreys of Eolia and Ionia, met together at Ephesus; and thence sent messengers to Lacedæmon, to let them there know, how things went with them in Asia; and to desire that they might have Lyfander again for their General, a man of whom they had had to good proofe, in the year before: in which request, Cyrus also joyned with them; but because by their Law, the same man could not be twice Ammiral of their Fleet, therefore they gave the title of Ammiral to one Arachus, but committed the whole power for the management of the war unto Lyfander, under the name of his Lieutenent. Lyfander therefore coming to Ephesus, sent to Exconicus to come unto him with his ships from Chios; gathering also out of Peloponessus, and other parts, all the ships that ever he could make, and did not only reparaire those which he had, but also built new ones, in the port at Antandrus; [Xenophon. lib. 2. Diodorus in the third and fourth years of the ninety third Olympiade; and Plutarch in the life of Lyfander.]

Lyfander made a journey to Cyrus, and desired money of him, as before; which having, though with much difficulty, gotten (for Cyrus made it appear unto him, that by reason of his former liberality that way, moneys went very short with him) he forthwith appointed sea captaines over every fighting ship, and payed every mariner his due to a lashing, [Xenoph. Hellen. 2.]

The Carthaginians having taken Gela in Sicily, took the statue of Apollo, which was in his temple in the suburbs of the city, all of brasie, and of a vast bignesse, and sent it to Tyrus; [Diad. year 4. Olympiade 93.]

Cyrus, having received his fathers message, as afore said, sent for Lyfander, to come unto him at Sardes, willed him by no means to fight with the Athenians at sea, till he had gotten a far greater fleet of ships than now he had; promising at his return to bring with him a very great Navy, from Phenicia, Cilicia, and other parts thereabouts, and then commended the care of all the cities of his own Government to Lyfander, and for such tributes as belonged peculiarly to himself, he assigned them all over unto him, and what was left of that, bad him take it to himselfe, [Xenophon Hellenic. 2. Diodorus, year 4. Olympiade 93. Plutarch in the life of Lyfander.]

Then took Cyrus his journey toward his father, taking Tissaphernes, as a friend, along with him, and three hundred Grecians, all Confelethers, commanded by Xenophon of Arcadia, [Xenophon de Exped. Cyri, lib. 1. pag. 243. and 254.]

When Cyrus was gone, Lyfander having paid his army, went with his fleet to Ceramium, a bay in Caria; and coming with his army, before a town called Cedreæ, a place confederate with the Athenians, the next day he took and sackt it, and made the inhabitants thereof (who were no better than a kind of half barbarous people) slaves: to dooth Xenophon relate this matter in [a Hellenic.] but Diodorus [year 4. Olympiade 93.] thus, Lyfander (saith he) with a great number of ships, setting upon Thalus, a City of Caria, confederate with the Athenians, took it by force, and cut the throats of all the males there, not under age, to the number of eight hundred; and selling the women and children for slaves, laid the City flat smooth with the ground; where, instead of Cedreians, the word Thasians is put; which were the inhabitants of an Isle called Thalus; far off from thence, and who after the defeat of the Athenians at Egos Potamos, and final ruine of that state, were not taken by force, by Lyfander, but surprised by a trick or slight of his, as we may easily learn out of a broken passage of [Emil. Probis, in the life of Lyfanders], and the full relation of the thing, by [Polyænus, lib. 1. stratagem.]

At Miletus, certain men being desirous to abolish the popular government there used, brought it to passe by Lylanders help, thus. At first, in the Feast of Bacchus, they laid hold on those which were most against their faction in their own houses, to the number of 40, and cut their throats. Afterward again, in a full market, they seized on 300, more of the richest of the people, and cut off their heads: whereupon, some of the principal of the people that were left, fearing what might befall themselves, to the number of a thousand, and no lesse, fled to Pharnabazus, the Persian Governour in those parts; who entertained them very kindly, and giving every one of them, a Stater of gold, gave them Claudia, which is a Castle of Claudia (shall I say of the Island Claudia mentioned Att. 27. 16?) for a place to dwell in, [Diodor. year 4. Olympiade 93.]

The Athenians set sail from Samos, and came to Chios and Ephesus; and having wasted the Kings countreys thereabouts, prepared themselves now for a sea-fight: mean while Lyfander sailing from Rhodes, and leaving Ionia on the right hand, went up with his Fleet to Hellepont, to see that no shipping should passe that streight; and withal to reduce such Cities as had revolted from them in those parts; [Xenoph. Hellen. 2.]

Lyfander going from Abydus, came with his Fleet to Lampacus, a confederate city with the Athenians; and thither repaired also the men of Abydus by land, and such others as were under the command of Thorax, a Lacedæmonian Captain: and setting upon the city, took it by force, and sacked it, being rich, and full of corn and wine, and all other provisions: but sent away the Athenian Garrison that was there; according to his word, suffered all freemen there to enjoy their liberty, and having given the spoile thereof to his souldiers, he left the place it self entire to the inhabitants, [Plut. in the life of Lyfander.]

The Athenian Navy, which consisted of 180 sail, was wholly surprized and taken by Lyfander at Egos-potamos, in the streight of Hellepont (of all which number, scarcely ten escaped) with 3000. souldiers, besides their Commanders, [Id. ibid.]

Conon their Captain seeing the Athenian State here utterly lost, and fearing the cruelty of his Country-men, if he returned to Athens, came with nine ships onely to Abairides a Forland of Lampacus: and taking from thence some principal masts of Lylanders ships, sailed away to Euagoras King of Cyprus, with whom he was formerly of good acquaintance: sending away nevertheless a Post-barque to Athens, to let them know what had befallen him at Egos-potamos, [Id. ib. with Iserat, in his Euagoras: Aristot. lib. 2. Rhetor. Justin lib. 5. cap. 6. and Aristid. in Oration. Rho diaca.]

Lyfander having rifled their Camp, carried away the ships, and prisoners, and spoils, and all, with the sound of Pipe and Flute, and Triumphant Songs, to Lampacus. And the same day sent away Theopompus, who had been a Milesian Pirate, with the news of this victory to Lacedæmon; in a most choice ship with pennants hung out, and streamers, and all other magnificent attire; which journey he went in three days, Philocles the Captain, and the Athenian prisoners to the number of 3000. Adimantus onely excepted, had all their throats cut, [Xenoph. Diador. Plutarch.]

Lyfander, having set all things in order at Lampacus, sailed to Byzantium and Chalcedon, both which opened their gates unto him: sending away the Athenian Garrisons in both places, upon his word. They who had formerly betrayed Byzantium to Alcibiades, getting away, went first into Pontus, and from thence came afterward to Athens, where they were all ended. And Lyfander leaving Schenelaus a Lacedæmonian for Governour, both of Byzantium and Chalcedon, returned to Lampacus, there to repair his Navy, [Xen. Hellen. 2.]

Lyfander turning out of every City, such as favoured the Athenian party, and destroying every where, Democracies, and all other forms of Government whatsoever; left them onely, such as at Sparta were called Harmolite; (i.e.) Moderators, to govern them: and dividing each City into ten Wards or Companies, chose out of them ten special men, to whom he committed the sovereignty over all, into which number he chose none any where but such as either had been formerly obliged to him, or would now take an oath to be his: and having by this means erected a Decemvirate, or a Government of Ten men in every City, held them all at his own devotion: and did all himself, [Plut. and Emil. Probis, in the life of Lyfander.]

Lyfander, having spent some short time in ordering this businesse, sent word to Sparta that he was ready with 200. sail; with which, together with Agis and Paulanias the Spartan Kings, he forthwith came to the siege of Athens, hoping in a short time to take it: but finding that they defended themselves beyond his expectation, he himself returned into Asia; where he abolished all Republicks, or Democracies, and established every where his Decemvirates, or Government by Ten men: putting many to death every where, and making the rest to get them packing into other places. And whereas at Miletus, his friends to whom he had undertaken to assist them in suppressing the Democracy there, had already upon a second advice, fallen to an accord with the adverse faction; he most cunningly, and most perfidiously withal, so wrought the matter, that he delivered no less than 800. of the Democratical party to be murdered by those which stood for an Aristocracy in that city. [Plutarch ib.]

The Athenians being so besieged by sea and land by the Lacedemonians, obtained at last peace upon certain articles: But upon the 16 day of Munition the Attic month (the 24 of April, according to the Julian Calendar) as Plutarch in his life reporteth; he told the Athenians, that they had broken the articles; in that they had not demolished their walls within the ten days limited to them to have done it in: whence it is gathered, that that peace or agreement was made upon the sixth of their month Munition, (i. e.) upon our 14 of April: wherewith ended the Peloponnesian war, when it had lasted 27 years: as [Thucydides in his 5 book.] telleth us.

Shortly after this peace, Darius King of all Asia, when he had reigned 19 years died: whose eldest son, and successor, Artaxerxes, reigned 43 years, [Diodor. Sic. year 4. Olympiad 93.] But Ctesias who was Physician to this Artaxerxes, saith, that when Darius Ochus died at Babylon; there succeeded him Artaxerxes, begotten by him upon the body of Parysatis, before he came to be King: and that coming to the crown, he altered his name to Artaxerxes: who for the greatness of his memory was surnamed Amnemon. To which also, as I conceive refers that relation of [Athenians, lib. 12. Deipnosoph.] where he saith, that Ochus when he lay a dying, was asked by his eldest son, by what wisdom and policy he had maintained his State so many years; to the end, saith he, that having learned by you, I may follow your steps therein: and that his answer to him was, that he had done it, by doing right to God and man. For although Darius Ochus was often urged by his wife Parysatis, who ever loved her younger son Cyrus more than the elder; to follow the example of Darius Hytaspes, and leave him to succeed him in the kingdom, who was first born after he came to be King; and not him that was borne before: yet would he never hearken to her therein: But by his last Will, gave the kingdom to his eldest son Artaxerxes, and to his younger son Cyrus, all those Cities and Territories, which he had at that time under his Government in Asia, [Plutarch in the life of Artaxerxes, Justin, lib. 5. cap. 11.]

So soon as Artaxerxes came to the Crown, by the perfidy and importunity of Statyra his wife, he took Vadiastes, who had murdered Terituchmes, her own brother, and husband to Amistis, who was Artaxerxes his own sister, and caused his tongue to be drawn backward out of his pole, and there to be cut off: and made Mithridates or Mithridates his son, who had preserved the city Zaris, to the son of Terituchmes, Satrape or Governour in his room, [Ctesias.]

When Artaxerxes went to Palsargada, where according to the custom, he was to put off his own Robe, and to put on the Robe which old Cyrus wore, before he came to the Crown; and was there inaugurated according to the ancient Regal Ceremonies by the Priests of Persia: Tissaphernes brought him the Priest, who had instructed his brother Cyrus in his childhood, according to the custom of his country, and taught him the principles of the art Magick, who was in that regard the more easily believed; when he accused Cyrus for having a plot, when Artaxerxes should be putting off his own Robes, to set upon him, and to murder him in the very Temple, [Plut. in the life of Artax.]

Artaxerxes hereupon caused his brother to be laid hold on, purposing to put him to death; and put him in chains of gold, for the reverence he bare to the Regality of his blood: but when he was to be killed, his mother caught him about the middle, and then casting her hair about his neck, and tying it to her own, with many tears and lamentations made, at length procured his pardon; and obtained him to be sent again to his command in Lydia, and other (see Towns in Asia) [Id. ib. with Xenoph. in Expedition, Cyri. lib. 1. Justin, lib. 4. cap. 4. Oti. and Ctesias.]

Alciabides tearing the power of the Lacedemonians, who commanded all now by sea and land, withdrew into that part of Bithynia which belonged to the Thracians; and carried thither with him a great mass of silver and gold; yet left he a far greater quantity of both behind him in the Castle where he was. But the Thracians there, so soon as they perceived the wealth which he had brought, devised how to catch him, and to get his money to themselves: yet him they mislead, for he had conveyed himself privily away to Pharnabazus in Phrygia: whom he so caught, and enamoured with his gentle behaviour, that no man was so inward with him, as Alciabides was: whereupon he gave him the Castle of Gryniun in Phrygia; whereof he made fifty talents a year in tribute, [Plut. and Emil. Prob. in their lives of Alciabides.]

The Lylandrian Feast, and Games, were instituted in honour of Lylander: wherein, when Antimachus and Niceratus, contended in Poetry; Lylander gave the Garland to Niceratus: and when Antimachus took that so to heart, that he burnt his own Poeme; Plato being then but a youth, cheered him up, and told him, that ignorance hurt hurt only the ignorant themselves, as blindness did the blind, [Plut. in the life of Lylander, with Diodor. 4. year 93. Olympiade out of Apollodorus.]

In the 22 Olympiade after the taking of Athens by Lylander, wherein Crocinus a Theffalian, was the prize in running, which is counted the 94. Olymp. Xenophon saith that there was an Eclipse of the Sun, [Hellen 2.] which the Astronomical account sheweth to have fallen upon the 3. of our September in the forenoone.

When Cyrus was gotten back again safe into Lydia, remembering how he had been shackled by his brother, he began to cast about, how he might hereafter keep himself out of his brothers danger, and withal, if it might be, how to make himself king in his room. Therefore he lifted as many Grecian soldiers as possibly he could; and under this and that colour, gathered a great army of several nations, that with them he might come upon his brother as unprovoked as might be, [Xenoph. Exped. Cy. lib. 1. Plutarch in the life of Artaxerxes.] He sent also unto Lylander a ship, made all of gold and Ivory, of two cubits high; congratulating him thereby, for the great victory he had gotten by sea, which Lylander laid up in the treasury of Brindas, and Acantians, [Plutarch in his Lylander.] And when Lylander came to him at Sardes to deliver him a present from all the confederate cities of sundry things (among which perhaps was that jewel or neck-lace, which Ethan, [Var. Hesper. lib. 12. cap. 1.] saith, was sent unto him from Scopas the younger, out of Theffaly) Cyrus also, to welcome him, shew'd him his Orchard, which he had laid out and planted with his own hand, and entertained him with such discourse of husbandry, as is set forth by Xenophon in his Oeconomies in the person of Socrates.

Among the Persians, Satabarzanes accused Orontes; for keeping company with Parysatis the Kings mother: whereas other while he had ever lived in a fair reputation of chastity, therefore was Orontes put to death; and Parysatis grew discontent with her son, and caused Mithridatis, Terituchmes his son, to be made away by poison, [Ctesias.]

Alciabides having learnt, that Cyrus intended to make a war against his brother, and that the Lacedemonians had a hand therein; he had purposed to halt away to Artaxerxes, to make him the first discoverer of this treason, hoping by this means, both to procure a benefit to himself, as Themistocles had done before him; and withal, by the kings help to free his country of Athens from their Lacedemonian bondage. In this mean while, Critias, one of those 30 Tyrants, whom Lylander had set over the Athenians to rule them, gave him notice that unless he took order, he would be made away, all would come to nothing, that he had done at Athens, neither yet did Lylander do any thing hereupon, until a cipher was brought him from Lacedemon; commanding him expressly, to dispatch him: whereupon Lylander sent to Pharnabazus, to let him know, that unless he forthwith delivered up Alciabides into his hands alive or dead, the league made between the king and Lacedemonians could not stand, but all would break out again; and hereupon Pharnabazus sent Sufamitres his Uncle, and Magesus, (whom Emil. Prob. calls Bagoas) to murder Alciabides, whiles he was in a certain place in Phrygia called Melissa, situate in the mountain of Elophos, and was preparing for his journey toward the king.

The people of the country whom they had hired to do the deed, durst not attempt it by sword or handy strokes: but in the dead of the night, laying a great deal of wood round about the house, wherein he lay a sleep, let it on fire; and when Alciabides had gotten through it, and was elcapping away, they shot their darts and arrows at him, and to kill'd him, and carried his head to Pharnabazus; the rest of his body, a sweet heart of his, wrapped in her own gown, (which a little before he had dreamt, he was wrapped in) and buried in the same fire which the house was burned with; making him as fair and as honourable a funeral, as the time and place, and her present ability afforded, [Ephorus lib. 17. cited by Diod. year 1. Olym. 94. Ariflor. Hesper. Animal, lib. 6. cap. 29. Cic. lib. 1. de Divina. Valer. Max. lib. 1. cap. 7. Justin, lib. 5. cap. 8. Athen. Deipnosoph. lib. 13. Plutarch and Emil. Prob. in their lives of Alciabides.]

Clearchus a Lacedemonian, bearing himself for a Tyrant of Byzantium; and being overcome by his own people, led by Pantocheas, stole away by night, and came into Ionia; where growing into familiarity with Cyrus, whose mind was at that time he wholly set upon making a war against his brothers, wrought so far upon him, that he was made by him General of all his forces: for finding him a man of a haughty spirit, and a courage apt to embrace any employment: he gave him 10000 daries, with which he raised forces, and marching out of Chertolensis made war upon the Thracians, that bordered northward upon Hellefpont: which because it seemed for the advantage of the Grecians, therefore did the cities of Hellefpont contribute willingly to the maintenance thereof: so that these forces were maintained under hand for the use and service of Cyrus, [Xenophon de Expedition. Cyri. lib. 1. Diodor. year 2. Olympiade 94.]

[Diodor.] But how Cyrus gathered his army, and with them marched up against his brother; and how the battle was fought between them; and how Xenophorus perished in it, and how those Grecians that were with him came back again safe to the sea, (i.e.) into Asia the little) Themistogenes of Syracusa hath delivered, saith Xenophon, in the beginning of the third book of his Greecian Historie; with which place of Xenophon we are to compare that saying of Plutarch, in his book, [de Gloria Atheniensium] where he saith, ὁμοῦ καὶ τοῖς λαοῖσι γενέσθαι ἀρχαίαν καὶ ἐμπειρίαν, καὶ ἀνὰ στρατὸν καὶ ἐν πολεμικῇ τέχνῃ, καὶ ἐν τῷ πολέμῳ καὶ ἐν τῇ μάχῃ, &c. (i.e.) Xenophon wrote a history of himself; setting down how he played the Captain, and what feats he did, and then made as if Themistogenes of Syracuse had written it; giving away the glory of this writing to another man; that the things therein written of himself might finde the more credit in the world. And another place in Suidas, where he sheweth, Νόβας δ' αὐτοῦ τινε εἰς τὴν Σούδαν· οὕτως

ὁ δὲ τῶν ἀδελφῶν τῶν κατὰ τοὺς αἰῶνες, &c. (i. e.) That the Expedition of Cyrus, which commonly goes with Xenophon's History of the Grecians, and some other Pieces concerning his own country, were all of Xenophon's own writing: For indeed, these books of the Expedition of Cyrus, went heretofore with the rest of his Grecian Histories. In the end whereof, he plainly says, that the writer thereof, was present in all that Action: and therefore the work it self, which is full every where of Xenophon's worthy acts therein, is attributed to him; not only by Plutarch, but long before him by Cicero, Dionysius, Hæcæanæus, Hermogenes, Laertius, Athenæus, and (not to speak of our Divines, Eusebius, and Jerom) by Arianus of Nicomedia; who also had the surname of New Xenophon put upon him, as we read in Photus and Suidas: both because he comprised the discourses of his matter Epictetus in 4 books, as Xenophon had done those of his master Socrates, in the like number; and also, for that as Xenophon had written, that Expedition of Cyrus in 7 books, so he had written the Expedition of Alexander in as many: though he in his Anabasis, or Expedition of Cyrus, because that hath a brief Proem to every book, but none to the book in general, as Laertius hath observed; whereas this in every book, have the sixth, maketh a transition, by way of an epilogue or summary of the precedent books, which because Xenophon useth not in his, with some other occurrences in those books which relish not altogether of Xenophon; therefore I rather conclude to think, that these books were of Themistogenes his writings, and not of Xenophon's. However, following the authority of those ancient Worthies, I have all along cited him by the name of Xenophon, as they have done before me.

Now of those five heads, mentioned by Xenophon in his said 3 book Hellenicæ, and said to have been written by Themistogenes, the four first are wholly comprised in the first book of this Anabasis, or Expedition of Cyrus. 1. The gathering of his army. 2. Their marching into the Upper Asia, and coming to the place where they fought. 3. The manner and issue of the fight it self: and 4. The fall of Cyrus in that battle.

For Cyrus moving from Sardes, (where Xenophon met him being sent for from Athens by Proxenus the Boeotian, and there lifted himself for the action, as we find in the 3 book) came to Celæne in Phrygia, and there stayed 30 days: in which time Clearchus, and other Greek Commanders came from divers parts, and by sundry ways unto him: and thereupon a general muster, were found enrolled, eleven thousand Corleleers, and about two thousand Targateers.

From Celæne Cyrus came with this army to the bank of Cayster, where he received money from Epixax: Synefist, the King of Cilicia his wife, (with whom Cyrus was thought formerly to have been too familiar) and therewith paid his army (with whom he was then 3 months behind, at which they much repined) four full months wages. Epixax came five days before Cyrus to Tarsus in Cilicia; and by her persuasion, her husband Synefist, coming thither also to him; gave him a vast summe of money toward the relief and maintenance of his army: And both Ctesias and Diodorus add, that Synefist, like a wife man, supplied Cyrus and Artaxerxes too, with necessaries for the war. For having two sons, he sent one of them to Cyrus with a competent number of men for his service, but had sent away the other privily beforehand to Artaxerxes, to let him know, that having such an army come upon him, he durst not but keep fast with Cyrus, and openly joy in him, nevertheless that he continued a true servant in heart to Artaxerxes, and would fall over to him so soon as he could take out his opportunity. Cyrus stayed 30 days at Tarsus, where the Grecian companies told him plainly, they would march no further. But Clearchus by his wisdom took them off from that mood; and so they came to Issus, which was the utmost city of Cilicia, where Cyrus his fleet met him bringing him 700. Diodorus saith 800. Corleleers: which the Lacedæmonians had sent him under the command of Chirofophus; and there also 400. Corleleers, which had formerly served Artaxerxes under their Captain Abrocomus, came into his Camp: but Abrocomus himself, leaving Phœnicia with 300. thousand men, marched away to Artaxerxes, though he came not to him till five days before the fight: so that by his abandoning the place, Cyrus passed the gates, or streights of Syria, and so came without stop or hinderance to the place where the fight shortly after was; having made in all from Ephesus to that place, 93 stages or dayes journey, and in them marched 535 Parasanges, which make 1609.5. furlongs.

The place where the fight at last was, was called Cynaxa, and is 500. furlongs from Babylon: from whence, whereas it is said in the 2 book of the Expedition of Cyrus, that the fight was 300. furlongs from Babylon. Jacobus Capellus thinks it should be read, from Susa. In the army of Cyrus there were reckoned of the Grecians, upon the point of 13 thousand men (though Justin, lib. 5. cap. ult. says, there were not above 10 thousand) of which there were 10 thousand 4 hundred Corleleers, 2500. Targateers; and of other nations 100 thousand, and near upon 20 hooked chariots. Of Artaxerxes his part; there were 900 thousand men, and 15 hundred hooked chariots: but but Ctesias Cnidius, who was in the battle, quoted by Plutarch, and Ephorus, cited by Diodorus, say there were in his army but 400 thousand only. In the fight there died of Artaxerxes his side 15 thousand, as Diodorus saith of the other 3 thousand: but Ctesias in Plutarch affirmeth, that the number of the slain given in to Artaxerxes, was not above 9 thousand; but that in his judgement, there could be no less than 20 thousand lost that day. But whatever the number was, this battle was fought the 4 year Olympiade 94. when Xenæus was Pretor or L. Chancellor in Athens, one year before Socrates was there put to death; as [Diogenes Laertius reports in the life of Socrates.]

In this fight the two brothers met, and Artaxerxes was first wounded thorough his coat of armour; which wound Ctesias saith that himselfe did cure. But Cyrus carried on with this good successe against his brother, spared for no danger and so was slain by an unknown hand in the battle. Artaxerxes spent his rage upon the dead body of his brother, levering his head from the body of him, and cutting off the hand that had wounded him from his arme, and carried it about in a triumphant manner: which his sorrowful mother, coming her self to babilon, with much adoe got together, and carrying his reliques to Babylon, there bestowed burial on them. This encounter of the two brothers, is more amply delivered by Plutarch, out of Ctesias and Dionon.

The King coming to rife his Camp, there found and took Cyrus his Concubine, a woman so much renowned for her wit and beauty, [Xenoph. lib. 1. Exped. Cy.] She was a Phœcian, born in Ionia, the daughter of one Hermotimus, called at first by the name of Mitro: but afterward by Cyrus (because she seemed nothing inferior to Aspasia the Miletian, who was Pericles his Mistress, of whom I spake before, in the year of the World 3564.) Aspasia. Artaxerxes was wonderfully desirous to get her into his hands; and when she was brought bound unto him, he grew exceedingly wrath with those which so brought her, and laid them in irons for their pains: and ever after esteemed her above all the Harlots he kept, (which were in number 360. all choice beauties) and most doted on her, [Plut. in the lives of Pericles and Artaxerxes, Eliax. Var. Hist. lib. 12. cap. 2. Justin. lib. 10. cap. 2.]

The Grecians, on the other side, not knowing what was befallen to Cyrus, kept on fighting still, and in their quarter beat Tissaphernes, and all his power; in which quarrel yet of the Grecians there were not in all, above six thousand, as Isocrates tells us, in his Panegyric: adding, that they were none of the choicest Grecians neither: but the meer refuse of them, and such as could no longer live at their own homes: and these now in a strange country, forsaken of their fellows, betrayed by their companies, and bereft of their Captain, whom they followed to this war. But the King coming with the maine of his army to the rescue of Tissaphernes, fell upon their Camp and rified it, which yet they returning from the pursuit of Tissaphernes, recovered and beat the King out of it again; and lodged therein that night, supperlesse for the most part that night, as well as dinnerlesse the day before. And here ends Xenophon's first book of Cyrus his voyage.

The second book sets forth, how these Grecians under the command of Clearchus their Leader, intended to return home again: and how Tissaphernes promising to convoy them back with his own forces; and to be himselfe their guide on the way: and breaking this promise and league and oath made unto them, procured Clearchus, with Proxenus, Agias, and Socrates, Colonels, and 20 more Captains of companies, and 200 common souldiers, to be murdered. Ctesias also in his Persian History, (which the author of this book of the voyage of Cyrus had undoubtedly read) had formerly told us, how cunningly Tissaphernes, by the means of one Menon a Thessalian borne, and by his juggling, and by his swearing and forswearing had gotten Clearchus, and to the rest above mentioned into his hands, and sent them away fast bound in irons, to the King at Babylon; and how Ctesias himself, who was Physician to Parylatris the Kings mother, did by her means do many good offices to Clearchus, while he lay there in prison: and how the King at her sute, had promised and sworn too, that Clearchus should have no harme: and yet nevertheless, how the King afterward by the means and instigation of Statyra his Queen, caused Clearchus and all the rest of the Commanders, Menon onely excepted, to be butchered; and how all the rest of the bodies were thrown out and devoured by wilde beasts and birds, onely the body of Clearchus was covered with a huge sand-hill, cast up over it by a mighty winde, and so preserved. [Ctesias in the Collections of Photus, and Plut. in the life of Artaxerxes.]

In the third book, and the four following, is declared how the rest of the Grecians, who kept themselves out of Tissaphernes his clutches, returned into their own country: and how the souldiers by the persuasion of Xenophon, having lost their old ones, chose them new Captains to command them, (of whom Xenophon himself was one, chosen in the room of Proxenus) and by their conduct, passed thorough so many Countries of the enemy, and endured so much cold in the Winter season, and infinite other miseries and dangers, and thorough them all came safe home at at last: the summe whereof is to be found in [Diodorus Siculus, in the History of year 4. Olympiade 94.] to which a man may adde, what is in Iocates his Paegyric.

Artaxerxes, for his good service in this way bestowed upon Tissaphernes all the Governorments which his brother Cyrus held, besides what he had before. [Xenoph. Hellen. lib. 3. Diod. year 4. Olympiade, 94.] and having heaped many other large gifts and favours upon him: gave him above all, his own daughter to wife; and used him ever after as his most confident friend and servant. [Diod. ib.]

The Carian, who wounded Cyrus in the thigh, so that thereof he died, Parysatis, the kings mother caused, after ten dayes torment, his eyes pulled out, and boyling lead powred in at his ear-holes, to be done to death. Mithridates, who gave Cyrus his first wound, and in his cups afterward, bragged that he had killed him, was put between two boats, and there lay 17 dayes, and until he was eaten out with wormes: as for Bagabaz, Artaxerxes his Eunuch, who at his command, had cut off Cyrus his head, and right hand, Parysatis was him of the king at Dice, and having gotten him; caused him to be dead alive; and then his body to be laid athwart three crosses, and his head skin to be hung up by it; and then Parysatis, at the humble suit of the king her son, left off mourning for Cyrus, [Ctesias, and Plutarch in the life of Artaxerxes.]

Parysatis, caused the Queen Statyra, hir daughter in law, to be poisoned in this manner, Statyra had a maid servant about her, which was all in all with her, called Gingis or Gigis: whom Dinon saies to have been a voluntary instrument in her death: Ctesias, that her hand indeed was used in it, but against her will: him which gave the poison, Ctesias calls Bellitara, but Dinon, Melanias: There is a little bird in Persia, called Rhintaces, or Rhindaces; which hath no excrements at all; but all her gurs are fully suit with fat: one of these birds, Parysatis, as she late at table with Statyra, took and cut in two with a knife, which was poisoned on the one side, gave the one halfe, which was toward the poisoned side, to her, and the other the rook and ate her self: as Ctesias thinks: But Dinon saith, that not Parysatis her self, but Melania her maid, carved to her with a poisoned knife; but when the Queen died in extreame torments after it, the king suspected his mother for it, as one who knew well the cruelty and implacable disposition of her nature; and caused her servants and carvers to be questioned, and had to the rack about it. But Parysatis kept Gingis a long time in her own chamber; and though the king required her, yet would he not give her up to justice, till at last, Gingis her self desiring the might scale to her own lodging by night, Artaxerxes took her, and punished her as a poisoner. As for his mother, he neither did, nor said any hurt to her: but when she asked leave to retire her self to Babylon, he gave it her; but told her withal, that while she lived, he would not come there, [Plutarch, ibid.]

Aristo, with some others, surpris'd the city of Cyrene: and in the tumult, slew 500 of the principal men of the inhabitants, of the rest, the better sort elcaped by flight. These associating to them, some 3000 of the Messenians, whom the Lacedemonians at this very time, had turned out of their country, came into the open field, against those, who had possessed themselves of their City. In the fight there was a great slaughter made of the Cyrenians on both sides, as for the Messenians, there were scarce any of them left, yet when the fight was ended, the Cyrenians came to an agreement between themselves; and taking an oath each to other, never after to remember by-past injuries, lived in good correspondence each with other, in the Government of their Commonwealth, [Diod. year 4. Olymp. 94.]

Tissaphernes (for whom Pharnabazus is by error crept into Diodorus) being sent by Artaxerxes, to take charge of all the governments in the lesser Asia, would have drawn into his hands all the cities of Ionia also, [Xenoph. Hellen. l. 3. Diod. year 1. Olymp. 95.]

Now when, upon his coming, all the petty Governors and Cities, who had any ways adhered to Cyrus, grew afraid what would become of them, they all, by their particular messengers, sued to Tissaphernes for his favour; but he that was the chieft of all, Tamos the Egyptian, of whom I spake a lile before, Governor of Ionia, putting himself, with all his treasure, and sons, all save Gaus, (who became afterward the kings General) aship-board, went with his fleet into Egypt, to Plammyticus the king there, bearing himself bold, upon the many good offices, which he had formerly done unto him; But Plammyticus, casting off all respects of gratitude, for courtesies received, and pity towards a poore suppliant at that time, butchered him and all his children, onely to possesse himself of the ships and treasure, which he had brought; [Diodorus, ibid.]

The

The Grecians (of whom I spake before) departing from Trapezus, which was the first city of Grecians which they came unto, and is situated upon the coast of the Euxine sea, in the country of Colchos, after three dayes march, came to another Greek city, and in the same country of Colchos, and a sea town, as the other was, called Ceraluina, and there they stayed ten dayes, and multered their men, whom they found to be 8600, which were remaining of the 10000, which they carried out; the rest were lost either by the enemy in the battle, or by the snow, or other sickness in their return: from thence they went thorough the countries of the Molynæcori, the Chalybes, and Tybaretians, and came to a Greek town called Colyora, a colony of the Synopians, eight, or rather, as the order of the history implyeth, five months after the fight in the country of Babylon, having made from thence to this place, 12 stages, or dayes journey, and marched 620 parafangs, 18600 furlongs; and there they stayed 45 dayes, [Exped. Cy. lib. 3.]

During their abode here, they made their provision, partly out of the market of Colyora, and partly by such booties, as they got out of the countries adjoining of Paphlagonia; and on the other hand, the Paphlagonians, if they found any of them stragling from the camp, did as much by them; until at length Coryllas, who was governor of the Paphlagonians, let all things straight between them. Afterward these Grecians getting shipping from those of Heraclea, and Synope, came to Harmone a port town of Synope, where they stayed five dayes; and from thence to Heraclea, a plantation of the city of Megara, made in the country of the Myriandeni, and came to a Peninsula, or neck of land there, called Acherusia: here they divided themselves into three companies. The Arcadians, and Achæans, which made above 4500 men, all corseletters and foot, having gotten shipping of the Heracleans, put themselves speedily aboard; that coming unawares upon the Thracians which inhabited Bithynia, they might get the greater spoile of them, and landing at the port of Calpe, (which is in the middle of their sea coast) by night, went to the next towns and villages, six mile up into the country. But these Thracians thus provoked, flew upon them, and slew many of them; for one regiment of them, with their Colonel Smicratus, was quite cut off, and of another company of theirs, there were slain to fly to a hill for safeguard; captain Hegelandrus that elcaped; the rest were slain to fly to a hill for safeguard; where they were pretently close besieged, Chirolophus with 1400 corseletters, and 700 targateers, (which were themselves Thracians, and had followed Clearchus in that voyage), went from Heraclea all along the country on foot, and when at length he came into Bithynia, growing there somewhat sickly, he got shipping, and came with his men late to Calpe. And Xenophon with his brigade, consisting of 17 hundred corseletters, and 800 targateers, and some 40 horse more or lesse, came by sea into a country which parts thole Thracians of Bithynia from the country of the Heracleans; and from thence marching thorough the body of the country, came and rescued those, who were besieged in the hill, by the Thracians; and so at last came all together unto a body in the port of Calpe, [Ib. lib. 6.]

There died Chirolophus, and in his place, was chosen to succeed, Neso, of an Asian born; who when he law his company miserably oppress with hunger and other wants, gathering together, to the number of two thousand men, went a foraging all over the country of Bithynia: these first Pharnabazus let upon with his horse, which he lent to help the Bithynians; and withal, that with their further assistance, he might keep these Grecians from falling upon his government of Phrygia. These horse at first onset, slew of the Grecians no lesse then 500, the rest flying to a hill for safety, were by the coming of Xenophon rescued from the enemy, and so all returned safe to the camp before sun-set. But when Spithridates and Rhathines, came with more companies to succour the Bithynians, the Grecians obtained there a notable victory of them, and in memory thereof, erected a Trophy upon the place, and then returned to their camp by the sea-side, being distant some 7 or 8 miles from thence. After which victory lo gotten, their enemies provided for their own indemnity, by driving their cattle, and carrying away their families and goods, from thence into remoter parts. But when the Grecians, having passed quite thorough Bithynia, found nothing to relieve themselves withal in the parts where they were, they returned back a day and a nights journey, into Bithynia again, and there found and brought from thence store of prisoners, and sheep and other provisions for their own support: and six dayes after came to Chrysolopolis, a city of the Chalcidians, where they stayed seven dayes; and there sold the booty which they had gotten, [Ibid.]

Pharnabazus fearing least these Greeks would make war upon his country, wrought so with Anaxibius, the Lacedemonian Ammiral, that he transported them all out of Asia to Byzantium: And then Anaxibius returning from thence with Xenophon into Asia, had word sent him to Cyzicum from Aristarchus the new Governour of Byzantium, that Polus was appointed Ammiral in his place, and that he was onward of his his way, as far as Hellepont: and therefore failing from thence to Paros, he sent to Pharnabazus, and demanded the money which he had promised him for transporting the Greeks out of Asia: which not obtaining, he dealt with Xenophon in all haste, to carry them back again into Asia. But Pharnabazus prevailed to far with Aristarchus the Governor of Byzantium, that he brake the neck of that design; whereupon Xenophon was fain to put himself in pay under Sentes the King of Thracia: the winter not being yet over, and the cold so violent, that many of the Greeks lost, some their noses, some their ears thereby. [Id. lib. 7.] And Diodorus tells us, that part of these Grecians returned into their own country: but that the greatest part of them followed Xenophon into Thracia, to the number almost of 5000. [year 1. Olympiade 95.] whereby it appears, that the number is mistaken in him, where he says, that there came to Chryopolis onely 3800. men. [year 4. Olympiade 94.]

The Ionian and other Greek cities throughout Asia, partly out of a desire of their own liberty, partly for fear of Tissaphernes, because they had ever preferred Cyrus before him, refused to admit of him; and dispatched away their messengers to the Lacedemonians, praying them, that since they were the Princes and Protectors of all Greece, they would not neglect nor abandon them, being Greeks, though dwelling in Asia: but would take order, that their country might be kept free from devallation and spoil, and themselves enjoy their liberty as others. [Xen. Hellen. li. 3. Diodor. Sic. year 1. Olympiade 95.]

This petition was very welcome to the Lacedemonians, who, according to the manner of men, the more they had, the more they would have; and not content to have doubled their estate by the accession of the Athenian power, affected now nothing less than the sovereignty and dominion of all Asia. [Justin. lib. 6. cap. 1.]

The Lacedemonians therefore, promised them aid at first word: and forthwith sent to Tissaphernes, to pray him not to make war upon the Grecian Cities that were in Asia. But he beginning with the city of Cuma, walked all the Region belonging thereto, and carried many prisoners from thence, and then came with his army, and fate down before the city it self: but because the Winter coming on, he could not take it for the present, he set a great ransom upon the prisoners, and so for that time brake up his Siege. [Diodor. ib.]

Hereupon was Thimbron sent into Asia with an army; wherein were 1000. new made citizens of Laconia; 4000. of Peloponnesus, and 300. Athenian horse, who had formerly served the 30 tyrants of Athens: such as the City had rather should be wasted away, and spent in foreign services, than be kept at home to do greater mischief. And to these Thimbron, when he came into Asia, added many more taken out of the cities of the country, [Xenoph. ib.] for at Ephesus, what out of the confederate cities, what out of other places, he lifted 2000. and having now an army of 7000. men, he marched some 15 miles further into the country, and at his first assault took Magnesia a city of Tissaphernes his Government. And from thence went to Tralles a city of Ionia, and began to besiege it; but because the situation of it was very strong, he left it, and came back to Magnesia; which was no walled Town: and therefore leaving it soon as he was gone, Tissaphernes would take it again, he removed it to a hill thereby called Thorax. And then fell to wasting of the enemies country, and thereby exceedingly enriched his army. But hearing that Tissaphernes was coming down upon him with an army of Horse, he retired to Ephesus. [Diodor.] For not being able to encounter his horse, he durst not keep the plain; thinking it enough if he were able to keep the countries, where himself was, from being harrowed and wasted by the enemy.

When as now the Grecians under Xenophon had served Sentes three months in Thracia, there came unto them Charminus and Polyneus sent from Thimbron, to tell them, that he had great need of their help in Asia against Tissaphernes: and that he would give them a Darius every man by the month for his pay: to every Captain of a company, two Darius, and to every Colonel four. But when Xenophon told them, that for his part, he was purposed to be going home into his own country; the chief of all the army came unto him, and humbly and earnestly besought him not to leave them until he had carried them from thence, and delivered them into Thimbrons hand: wherefore he went aboard with them, and passed over to Lampacus; where he met and conferred with Euclides, the Philiassian Poet. Then passing thorough the territory of Troas, they came to Pergamus; where Xenophon was entertained by Hellas the wife of Gongylus of Eretria, and her two sons, Gorgius and Gongylus: by whose advice and counsel, when he had gone about to entrap and take Afidares the Persian, but had failed thereof, and not without great danger to himself and all his company: at length by chance his soldiers lighted on him, took him with his wife and children, and horses, and all that ever they had; which was exceeding much: and presently after came Thimbron to them, and received the army from Xenophons hand; and and mingling them with the rest of the Grecians in his army, he presently led them against Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus, [Exped. Cy. l. 7.]

And here end the seven books of the Expedition of Cyrus, the writer whereof, whatsoever it was, was present in this whole Action, and concluded his book, with this Epilogue. The Kings Commanders in the countreys which we passed through, were these, Artimius of Lydia, Articamas of Phrygia, Mishridates of Lycania and Cappadocia, Siemesis of Cilicia, Dernes of Phenicia and Arabia, Belesis of Syria and Assyria, Rhoparas of Babylonia, Arbaces of Media, Teribazus of Phasis and Iberia, the Cardachi, the Chalybes, the Macrones, the Colchi, the Moynacis, the Cati, and the Tybareni had no Governors, but were all free people: Coryllas was President of Paphlagonia, Pharnabazus of Bithynia: Sentes was king of the Thracians, in Europe side. The whole voyage, going and coming, was 215 stages, 1150 parasanges, and 3425 furlongs, or rather 34500. allowing thirty furlongs to every parasange, the whole time of their going and coming, αβαβαις & αβαβαις, was one whole year and three months.

Thimbron growing strong with this new access of forces received from Xenophon, durst now pitch down his camp, in the fields, before Tissaphernes his face: and took Pergamus into his hand, upon a voluntary surrender made unto him: so did he Tenthrania and Halifarnia, which were commanded at that time by Eurythenes and Procles, the descendants of Demaratus of Lacedemon, Gorgius also and Gongylus, the two brothers before mentioned, had already joyned with him; whereof the one held Gambrius and Palegambrius, the other Myrina, and Grinium: and Thymbron himself took in other weaker places by plain force, [Xenoph. Hellen. 3.]

Thimbron, when Larissa, a town in Asia called Egyptia, would not open her gates besieged it; but whiles he lay before it to little purpose, there came letters to him from the Ephor at Sparta, that leaving Larissa, he should march away into Caria: and he was now onward of his way thither as far as Ephesus, when Dercylidas, an excellent Engineer, and for his wit surnamed another Silypius came to succeed him in the charge of the Army. And Thymbron returning to Sparta, was there accused by sundry confederate Cities, for suffering his army to plunder them, and was therefore banished the City, [Id. ib. Diod. 2 year of the 95 Olympiade.]

Mania a woman of Dardania, but of a manly spirit, and one who after the death of her husband Zenis, had very happily managed the government of Eolia, under Pharnabazus, and had taken in sundry sea townes, as Larissa, Hamaxitus and Colone, was most treacherously murdered by her son in law Midias, when he self was upward of forty years of age, and her son of the age of seventeen, was murdered with her, and that done, he seized upon the two strong townes, Scephis and Gergitha, wherein she had principally laid up her treasure, the rest of the townes, the garrisons that were in them held good for Pharnabazus: whereupon Midias sent unto Pharnabazus, his messengers, with great presents, desiring that he might hold the whole government of those parts, upon the same termes, that Mania did: but all in vaine; for Pharnabazus returned him answer, that he should never enjoy himself more, if he left that number of his, committed upon Manias unrevenge. [Xenoph. ib. with P. l. 1. 8. in Ionia, or Phania, for so by misprinting, is Mania there called.]

Dercylidas, when he saw, that he had to do, with Pharnabazus and Tissaphernes both, two great commanders, and both borne up with mighty armies; but saw withal, that they were at variance between themselves, cloied with Tissaphernes, and made peace with him, [Id. ib. with Justin lib. 6. cap. 1.] where yet Dercylidas is put for Dercylidas.

Dercylidas, having first conferred with Tissaphernes, marched fairly, and without any spoile of the country, into Eolia, which was under Pharnabazus his Government, unto whom he bare also a particular grudge, for an affront received from him, whiles he commanded at Abydus, under Lyander: and in a trice possessed himself of Larissa, Hamaxitus and Colone, which submitted to him of their own accord (where by the way it is to be noted, that Diodorus Siculus, instead of Larissa, hath Arisba, and proceeding on, he took in Neandrus, and Ilium, in the same manner; nor did the Cocylis stand out at all against him: Cebrene also, a very strong and fortified City, for fear of an assault, which they saw ready to be made, yielded to him: whereupon, leaving a good garrison there, he marched forthwith, with the rest of his army to Scephis and Gergithe; where when Midias, who feared no less the very inhabitants of the place, than he did Pharnabazus, coming forth upon hostages taken, to a parly, and beginning to treat of an association of arms against a common enemy, Dercylidas laid hold on him, and told him plainly, that there was no hope of any friendship between them two, unless he would presently set all the citizens of those places which he held, at liberty, to live each of them according to their own laws. And thereupon marching into Scephis with him, and there having done sacrifice to Minerva, and turning out Midias his soldiers, he persuaded the inhabitants of the place, to maintain their liberty: now they had had it restored to them. And from thence going to Gergithe with his army, when Midias desired that he would at least leave him that city, but could not be heard; he commanded to open the gates, and Dercylidas entered that likewise, and finding there the moneys which Menia had laid up, sufficient to maintain an army of eight thousand men, for all most a whole year, he took that into his own hands, and sent back Midias, to live a private life at Sceplis. And to Xenophon tells us, that in eight dayes space, he took in nine several cities. And Diodor, the 2. year of the 95 Olympiade, writes that, what by plain force, what by tricks, he possessed himself in a very short time of all the cities, and country of Troas.

There was a quarrel grown between Artaxerxes, and Euagoras the king of Salamis in the Isle of Cyprus, who had turned out from thence, him that was the Lord of the place, and one whom Artaxerxes wished very well unto, called Abdemon Thyrsius, or, as Theopompus, in the Excerpta Philippin, 176, calls him, Abdymon Cityceus. This quarrel therefore was now compoled between them two, by the mediation of Conon the Athenian, who had sometime lived with Euagoras, and of Ctesias the Cnidian, who had long lived in the Court in Persia, upon condition, that Euagoras should pay a certain tribute to Artaxerxes, and a present also was sent to Saribarzanes; Ctesias also sent letters to Euagoras, to make an attornment with Anaxagoras a king of the Cyprians; which with others of like kind, written by Euagoras and Conon, Ctesias hath all inserted into his History of the Persian affairs.

Dercylidas having gone thus far in these parts, sent to Pharnabazus, to know whether he would have war or peace, and Pharnabazus, being afraid what might befall upon Phrygia, where himself did constantly dwell, and which bordered upon Eolia, which was now all in Dercylidas his hand; desired a truce, [Xenophon Hellenic, 3.]

This truce concluded, Dercylidas marched away into that part of Bithynia, which the Thracians held, and there wintered; which Pharnabazus liked well enough of, because the Thracians of that countrey made often irrodes upon Phrygia and Dercylidas plundering that part of Bithynia, at his pleasure, wanted no provision for his winter quartering, [Id. ib.]

Certain Odrylian horse to the number of 200, and 300 targateers, being sent from Senthes King of Thracia, to aide Dercylidas, upon their first coming, went a foraging into Bithynia, and were there almost all cut off. But afterward keeping themselves close with the Lacedemonian army, they waited the borders and territories of the Bithynians very sorely, [Id.]

The spring coming on, Dercylidas removed out of Bithynia, and came to Lamplacus, where he understood by three Ambassadors come from Sparta, that his command was continued to him for another year. The same Ambassadors also, by command from the Ephori, told the army there, that in former time the souldiers had been extremely injurious to their allies and confederates, and commended them, for their good behaviour; that way: whereunto answer was made by him, that commanded those who had formerly followed Cyrus in his wars, that the souldiers were still the same, but that different Commanders, had caused a different behaviour in them. This done, Dercylidas sent away the Ambassadors from Ephesus to take their journey thorough the Grecian cities and countries in those parts, telling them how glad he was, that they should find them all in so peaceable and flourishing a state as they should do, [Id.]

When the Ambassadors were gone, Dercylidas sent again to Pharnabazus, to know whether he would have the last winters truce to continue, or whether he would have war. And when he desired the continuance of the truce, he passed forthwith with his army over the Hellespont, and came into the Cheronefus of Thracia, which contained 37 furlongs, all which he enclosed with a strong wall. This work he began in the spring, and finished it before the beginning of Autumne, [Id. ib. with Diodor, Sic. year 2. Olympiade 95, where, contrary to his custom, he delivers the gests of two years in one discourse.]

Conon the Athenian wrote his letters from Cyprus to Artaxerxes, concerning his own affairs, which he desired to be presented to him, either by Zenon of Cretes dancer, or by Polycerius of Mendes a Phytian, or in their absence, by Ctesias, who was likewise a Phytian. It is said, that this letter coming to Ctesias his hand, he added thereto of his own, that he prayed the king, to send Ctesias unto him, as a man very necessary for the kings service, in those parts, especially in matters belonging to the sea. But Ctesias himself writes, that the king of his own accord, sent and employed himself in that service, [Plutarch in Artaxerxes], which letters of Conon to the King, and to himself, as also the speech which he used to the King ament that matter, he hath inserted into his own History: where he relates also, how, when at the same time the Lacedemonians had sent Ambassadors to the King, he committed them to custody; and kept them there.

Pharnabazus

4316. 398.

Pharnabazus having made truce with Dercylidas, took a journey to the king: and there charged Tissaphernes before him, for that when the Lacedemonians had sent an army into Asia, he had not only not opposed them, but had moreover maintained them there at the Kings charge; telling him that it was a shame, that the Kings war should not be pursued to an end, but bought out; and that his enemies should be bribed with money, and not beaten out with arms; and perswaded the King to furnish out a fleet, and make Conon the Athenian, Ammiral of it. By whose perswasion, together with the advice of Euagoras the King of Cyprus, the King presently commanded 500 talents to be configned into Pharnabazus his hand; and commanded him to commit the charge of the Phenician fleet unto Conon, and to make him commander in chief, over all his maritime affaires, [Diod. year 2. of the 95 Olympiade, with Isocrates in his Euagoras: and in his Oration ad Philip, and Pausanias, in Atticis, and Justinus, lib. 6. cap. 1.]

Pausanias returning from Court, having conferred with Conon, about what course to be held, made him Ammiral of the seas: making him many large promises on the Kings behalf: Conon taking the charge upon him, but not fully furnished with a fleet, took 40 ships, which he had then ready, and with them sailed into Cilicia, and there provided to begin the war, [Diod. 3.]

Ctesias being sent away by Artaxerxes to the sea side, went from thence first into Cnidia his own country, and from thence to Sparta, as himself saies, toward the end of his History; which as Diodorus saith, he ended with the third year of this 95 Olympiade.

Dercylidas returning out of Cheronefus into Asia, going in progresse over the cities, found that the banditoes of Chios, had possessed themselves of Atarne, and from thence making sundry irrodes upon Ionia, lived upon the spoile thereof; and although the town it self was strong, and well provided of victuals, yet he went and laid siege thereto, and continued before it, full eight moneths space, [Xenophon, Hellenic. lib. 5.]

In the end, when they were forced to render themselves, he committed the keeping thereof to one Dracon of Pellene; but himself, having furnished that place with ample provisions, that he might have it for a sure retreat, if need were, went to Ephesus, [Id. ib.]

When the Ambassadors from Ionia came to Sparta, and there declared, that if Caria, where Tissaphernes constantly resided, were invaded, they conceived that Tissaphernes would quickly grant them leave to live according to their own laws, the Ephori wrote to Dercylidas, that he should march into Caria with his army, and to Pharaces their Ammiral, that he should saile with his fleet, into those parts also, [Id.]

The same time also, Pharnabazus went to Tissaphernes, partly for that he was the chief General, partly to let him know, that he for his part was ready to joyne with him in making war upon the Grecians: and therefore first took him along with him into Caria, to settle matters there; and having put garrisons there, returned with him into Ionia. But Dercylidas hearing that they had paised the river Meanders, and having conferred with Pharaces, and shewed him, that he feared least Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus, would both fall down with their armies into Ionia, being now destitute of garrisons, put over the Meander likewise, [Id.]

In the Persian army there were 20000 foot and 10000 horse; but Dercylidas was not in all above 7000 strong, [Diodor. 2. year of the 95 Olympiade.] And now as many soldiers as were there out of Peloponessus, stood firme, and prepared to fight: but as many as were there out of Priene and Achilium, as likewise out of the Isles, and other townes of Ionia, partly threw away their armes into the cornie, which was then in great store, growing in the fields lying upon the Meander, and ran away partly when they came to fight, shewed well enough that they meant not to stand to it: yet Tissaphernes, remembering how the Grecians which were in Cyrus his army, had plaid the men in that fight against himself, and imagining that all Grecians would prove like them, durst not set upon them, as Pharnabazus would have had him: but sending to Dercylidas, told him that he desired to come to a parly with him, whereupon, upon hostages interchangeably given and taken, they fell to treat of a peace; Dercylidas demanded, that the King should suffer all the Grecian cities to be free, and enjoy their liberty: Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus, that the Lacedemonian forces should withdraw out of the countreys of the kings dominions, and their commanders out of the cities, and the truce was to continue, till Dercylidas could receive an answer from Sparta thereupon: and Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus from the K. and to both armies drew out of the field, the Persians returning to Tralles, the other to Leucophris, [Xen. & Diod. ut supra.]

Now a certain man called Herodas, of Syracuse in Sicily, living at that time with a master of a ship in Phenicia, perceiving sundry ships of war daily drawing thither; others a rigging, a rigging, others upon the stocks, and a Navy of 300, sail providing, put himself aboard the first ship that he found bound for Greece; and coming to Sparta, informed them, what a Fleet was there in providing; but whether bound, or for what purpose he said, he could not tell. The Lacedæmonians were much troubled hereat: And Agæilaus one of their two Kings, being put on by Lylander, offered himself to go in person with an army into Asia against the Persians: and to take with him 30 men of Sparta, whom they should chuse by their advice, to manage that war. The first of whom was Lylander, who hoped by this occasion to restore again the Decemvirates thoroughout all the cities in Asia, which himself had heretofore set up: and which the Ephori afterward had abolished, commanding every city, to live according to their own laws. So Agæilaus taking with him 3 thousand of the new made Citizens of Sparta, and 6 thousand out of their confederate cities, with as much provision as would serve for six months, loosed from Geræum, a Port in Eubæa, with all the Forces that he could there make, and came to Ephesus; and that so speedily, as he landed there before ever Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus heard of his setting forth: whereby it came to passe, that he found them there, all as unprovided, as himself could wish, [Xenoph. Hellen. lib. 3.] And in his Oration, of Agæilaus, with Plutarch and Emil. Probos, in their several lives of Agæilaus, and Pausa, in Lacedæmon: who yet layes, that he landed first at Sardes.

And now having raised 4 thousand soldiers more at Ephesus, he drew into the field with 10 thousand foot, and 4 hundred, or (as the Latine translation hath it) 4 thousand horse: unto which were joynd a rabble of others, which followed the Camp for pillage, being no fewer in number, than the army it selfe, [Diod. year 4. of the 95. Olympiade.]

Tissaphernes hereupon, sent to him to know what was the cause of his coming into Asia: and his answer was, that he came to restore the Grecian cities there to their liberty and freedom. Tissaphernes hereupon desired him to forbear for 3 months, that he might send to the King, bearing him in hand, that he nothing doubted but all should be to his content. Agæilaus hereupon, sent Heripidas, Dercylidas, and Migtalus to him, to take an oath of him, that he meant no guile, but would do what possible he could to procure the peace which he had promised: & they on Agæilaus his behalf took an oath, that Tissaphernes performing on his part, they would inviolably keep the truce on their. But Tissaphernes, not regarding his oath taken, sent to the King to encrease his army. And Agæilaus, though he knew well what he intended, yet kept the truce made on his parts, [Xenoph. Hellen. lib. 3. and in his book of Agæilaus; with Plutarch and Emil. Probos, in Agæilaus.]

Whiles Agæilaus lay still at Ephesus, all things grew to a confusion in the cities; because neither the Democratical government was observed with the Athenians, nor the Decemviral, which Lylander had set up, was observed among them; all became suitors to Lylander, a man well known among them, that he would obtain of Agæilaus for them what they desired. Hereupon it was, that Lylander had ever a great court of attendants and suitors about him: so that Lylander now seemed to be King, and Agæilaus a private man. This was a web in Agæilaus his eye, and therefore he began first to take the administration of matters out of his hand, and to lessen his authority: then sent he him on an errand into Hellepoint; where when Lylander found that Spitheides, a Persian, (Plutarch calls him Mithridates) was over-born by Pharnabazus, he desired to speak with him, and upon conference perswaded him, with his children and such wealth as he had, and 200, horse, to fall off from Pharnabazus; and he presently leaving, what he had said at Cyzicum, with his long came unto him, and he carried them with him to Agæilaus; who was glad to see him, and by him informed himself to the full, how things stood with Pharnabazus, [Xenoph. Hellen. 3. and in his life of Agæilaus and Lylander.]

Tissaphernes having gotten fresh supplies from the King, grew high, and proclaimed open war against Agæilaus; unless he would presently leave Asia. Agæilaus was glad hereof, and bad his men provide themselves presently for the war: and withal sent to the Ionians, Eolians, and them of Hellepoint, to send him to Ephesus all the strength they could make: and Tissaphernes supposing that he would march into Caria, went himself with his army into Phrygia; and falling suddenly upon the cities there, gat a vast sum of money and other provisions out of them, and so came safe and without any stop, near to Dalcylitum: where his horse, scouring the country before the army, were met with by the horse of Pharnabazus, and routed; and in that encounter lost 12 men, and 2 horses. But when Agæilaus with his foot came to their rescue, the Persians on the other side retired, having lost one of their men, [Xenoph. Hellen. 3. and in his Agæilaus, with Plutarch and Emil. Probos in their Agæilaus lives.]

Agæilaus having spent the greatest part of that Summer in plundering of Phrygia and the countries adjoining, and enriched his army; toward the Autumn returned to Ephesus.

Ephesus, [Diodor. year 1 of the 96 Olympiade:] and there spent that Winter, [Emil. Probos, in his Agæilaus.]

Nepherus, or Nephertites reigned in Egypt 6 years.

The Lacedæmonians sent to him, to joy in with them in armes against the Persian; but he instead of that, sent them tackle and furniture for 100 ships of war, and 30 thousand bushels of wheat, for a present, [Diodor. year 1 of the 96 Olympiade.] Juitin calls him Hericion, and so doth Orofius; treading all along in his steps: and relates the matter in this manner. The Lacedæmonians, said he, crave help by sea of Hericion, by their Ambassadors: and received from him 100 ships of war fully furnished, and 600 thousand bushels of wheat, [Justin lib. 6. cap. 2. and Orofius lib. 3. cap. 1.]

Pharax, Ammiral of the Lacedæmonian Fleet, setting sail from Rhodes with 120 ships, came to Safanda a Castle of Caria, distant from Canus 150 furlongs: and weighing again from thence, set upon the Town of Canus, and upon Conon the Athenian, who there lay with his 40 ships. But when Artaphernes and Pharnabazus, came with a huge army to the relief of Canus: Pharax raised his siege, and returned with all his Fleet to Rhodes. After this, Conon gat together to the number of 80 ships, and with them sailed toward Cheronefus. And at the same time the Rhodians keeping out the Peloponnesian Fleet, revolted from the Lacedæmonian State: and received Conon with all his Fleet, into their Port and City. And it fell out, that the Egyptian Fleet, knowing naught of the alteration there made, came boldly to an anchor under the Island with all their loading of wheat, sent to the Lacedæmonians: where Conon with the Rhodians setting upon them, took and brought them all, with their men and loading, into the Port, and stored the place with corn, [Diodor. year 1 Olympiade 96.] but the soldiery mutined against Conon, because the Kings Officers defrauded them of their pay: who therefore asked their pay the more boldly, because they were employed in so great a service, under so great a Commander as Conon was, [Justin lib. 6. cap. 2.]

Agæilaus, knowing well that there was no dealing with the enemy in a Champion Country without sufficient horse, let himself to raise Troops on all hands; and therefore gave order throughout all the confederate cities, that such of them as were rich and had no mind to serve themselves, should send him in every man a horse, with a rider on him in his stead. And the Spring coming on, commanded all his army to come together at Ephesus: and there trained all sorts, both of horse and foot, with great care and diligence to make them fit and ready for the war. And during such preparation, made the City of Ephesus seem more illustrious than ordinary, as being the very shop, and as it were, the work-house of so great a war, [Xenoph. Hellen. 3. and in his Agæilaus: and Plutarch and Emil. Probos, in the same mans life.]

And now a whole year was spent since Agæilaus came from Sparta, and the 30 Commissioners allotted for his Council returned to Sparta; of which Lylander, as I said before, was the prime man, and 30 others were sent in their rooms, of which Heripidas was chief. Of these Agæilaus chose Xenodorus, and one more, to command the Horse, and Scythes to command the Foot of the new made Citizens of Sparta, which were all Corcetes, and Heripidas to lead them who had served under Cyrus; and Migdon, them which were sent in by the Cities of Asia. And gave it out that he would march out-right into the strongest part of the enemies country, to the end they should all arme and prepare their minds for a hot encounter. And Tissaphernes conceiving that he had given this out of purpose to amuse him a second time, and to keep him at home, marched directly into Caria, commanding his Horse to stay behind, and keep in the plain of Mæander: But Agæilaus did indeed, what he had said, and fell on with his whole army into the country of Sardes. And when he had marched 3 dayes and saw no enemy appear, he gathered there a huge flock of all kind of provisions for his army. On the 4 day the enemies Horse came in fight, and finding the Grecians scattered abroad, and busie about the plunder of the country; fell upon them, and slew a great part of them. To whose rescue when Agæilaus came, and considered with himself, that the enemies Foot was not yet come up, and that himself was ready at all points, he set upon the enemy near the River Pactolus, and there gat a great victory of them; and possessing himself of their Camp, and having all now both friends and enemies goods in his hands, he found there among other riches, amounting to above 70 talents of money, and all his camels, which he afterward carried with him into Greece. But Tissaphernes lay all this while at Sardes: and was therefore blamed and accused by the Persians, as a defertor, and a plain betrayer of them.

So Xenophon: But Diodorus, sayes, that Tissaphernes was present in the fight with 10 thousand Horse, and 50 thousand Foot: and that Agæilaus, coming down from the hill country of Sipalus, and over-running all the plain about Sardes it self, wasted all, and destroyed among other things a goodly Park or Garden of Tissaphernes his own, enclosed and set with all sorts of trees and other things for pleasure, infinitely lumptuous, and of most exquisite workmanship and beauty. And that turning from thence, he lent Xenocles with 14 thousand men, to lye in ambush midway, between Sardes and Tybarnus, to intercept certain Persians, which were to passe that way; and that fighting a second time with the Persians, he overcame them again, and flew upward of six thousand of them; and took a great multitude prisoners, and seized on their camp, stored with infinite riches: and that after all this done, Tildaphernes his brother, and Ageilaus returned to the sea side with his army. Paulanus also in his Laconica, writeth, that Ageilaus fought with Tildaphernes in the champion country of Hermus; and there overthrew not only the horse, but also the foot army of the Persians, which was the greatest number that ever they had in one body, next that of Xerxes, which he passed into Greece; and that other of Darius, which he carried into Scythia. But his best relying upon Xenophons credit in this point: who was not only Reader to Ageilaus, (as Cicero to Cicero affirmeth), at leastwise, was very intimate and familiar with him, (as Emili. Pro. sayes in the Life of Ageilaus, and D. Genes Laertius, in the Life of Xenophon reporteth) but was also with him in all this service to Asia: and the next year returned with him into Greece.

in Asia; and the next year returned with him into Greece. Conon, Ammiral of the Persian fleet, having often solicited the King, by his letters for pay for the Navy, and doing no good that way, he sent to accuse Tisaphernes of treason to him himself; Pharnabazus also putting him forward to accuse Tisaphernes of treason to the King; wherefore committing them both in charge of the Navy to Hieronimus and Necoemus (both of Athens) in his absence, he sailed into Cilicia, and from thence came to Thapacum in Syria, he put himself into a barge, and to came down the river Euphrates unto Babylon: Then addressing himself as the manner was to Tithrautes the Chiliarch or chief Cornet, who holds as I said before, the first place next the King, he flew him thus in his way, and that he desired to speak with the King. But when he could not be admitted to the presence or speech with the King without adoration, (such solicitation first used to him, he was fain to do his business with him, by entreaty of letters and messengers; whereby yet he so far prevailed, that the King declared Tisaphernes to be a Traitor to him; and bad Conon to take charge of the war against the Lacedemonians, and to make paymaster of the Navy, whom ever he pleased to nominate to that office. And to be highly rewarded for his service, was dispatched away to the sea-side, with power to command what shipping he thought fit of the Cypriots and Phenicians, for the guard of the sea against the next summer, and Pharnabazus was assigned to him, for an Assistant or Coadjutor, as himself desired, [Diodor. year 1, of the 96 Olympiade, Justin lib. 6. cap. 2. Emil. Pro. in the Life of Conon.]

As concerning the Cypriots, it is to be observed; that in the very time, whilst there passed courtfeits and pretens interchangeably between Artaxerxes and them, the King intended war against them, ten whole years before it came to an end, eight whereof he spent in meer preparations making for it; as we shall hereafter, when we come to the fourth year of the 98 Olympiade, out of Diod. Sic. speaking of the issue of that war, of which 8 years it seems that fix were spent, at what time locates matter is his Panegirical oration, whereby speaking of those many vain attempts made upon Euagoras in Artaxerxes, he useth these words; He made, faith he war upon Euagoras, who was Lord both of one poor city in Cyprus, and one who had formerly rendered himself unto him, and became his vassal, and lived in an Island, and had suffered a great loss at sea; and had become three thousand targets to maintain his state without it; and yet, thus weak as he is, the king hath not been able to have his will of him, though he hath now spent fix whole years in war against him.

Parysatis the Queen-mother, egging the King on against Tissaphernes, for the hatred which she bore him for her son Cyrus his sake, he committed the charge of that war to Tithraustes, giving him letters to the cities and Commanders in those parts, whereby he commanded them all to do what ever Tithraustes commanded. [Died, year 1. of the 98 Olympiads.]

Hegvæ him also at his departure two several letters to Tithaphernes himself, willing him to go on with the war against the Lacedæmonians; and one in special to Arius the Commander of Larida, requiring him to be assisting to Tithraustes, in the making away of Tithaphernes. Those Tithraustes delivered to him loon as he came to Colofia in Phrygia: and Arius having read them, sent presently to Tithaphernes, praying him to come to Colofia, there to consult about the Kings affairs, especially concerning the war against the Grecians: whereupon he fearing no hurt, left his army at Sardes, and came with all speed to Colofia, with a troop of 300 Arcadians, and Milesians in his company, and took up his lodging in Arius his house; and there going into a Bath, layed aside his word: there Arius with his servants seized on him, and clapping him into a close Coach, sent him away prisoner to Tithraustes; who carrying him as far as to Celæna, there cut off his head, and sent it to Artaxerxes: and Artaxerxes bad carry it to his mother : who was exceeding glad at the sight thereof ; and no less were all the Grecian women, whose husbands had followed Cyrus in his war, and were afterward by his treachery cut off, when they heard thereof; Diod. lb. Polyæus stratagem. lib. 7. Xenoph. Hellen. 3. and in his book of Agesilaus, and Plut. in the lives of Artax. and Agesilaus.

Tithraeaus sent messengers to Agefilæus, to let him know that the Author of this late war, Tithraephernes, had suffered his due punishment for it ; and that the King now thought it great reason, that he should withdraw himself with his army, out of Asia : and to leave the cities there, to the use of their own laws, paying the King their former tribute : And when Agefilæus answered him that he could not do so, without the consent and order of his country, which had employed him ; at length they came to this agreement, that he with his army should withdraw into Pharnabazus his Government ; receiving for the entertainment of them, 30 talents, until he could receive an answer from Sparta, what he was to do : so saith Xenophon [lib. 3. Hellen.] Diodorus only writes, that Tithraeaus having drawn Agefilæus to a party, made a truce with him only for 6 months : and Xenophon in his book, written of the praises of Agefilæus, adds further, that when Tithraeaus offered him a great summe of money, if he would withdraw out of the Kings territories, Agefilæus answered him in this wise, Tithrauste, said he, he hold it with us, more honour for a General, to enrich his army, rather than himself, and to take spoils from his enemies, rather than rewards.

And Whiles Agæias was upon his march towards Phrygia, which was of Pharnabazus his command : he received a Scytale, or letter, from the Magistrates of Sparta, that he should take charge of the Navy, as well as of the land army, and to make Ammiral thereof, whom he thought fit, whereupon, he in a short time, what by the publique contribution of the cities, what by the beneficence of private men, who were desirous to gratifie him in his own person, made up a Navy of 120 saile : and gave the command of them to Pifander, his wives brother, a man desirous indeed of praise and honour, and of courage enough, but not much skilled that way. [Xen. 3. Hellen. Plin. in his Agæias, Pausan. in his Laconica.]

Plunder being dispatched away to the Navy, and himself holding on his way into Phrygia. Tithraustes perceiving that Aggeilius had no meaning to leave Asia; but rather conceived great hopes of vanquishing the King there, lent him five talents of Rhodes (for so Plutarch also calls him in his Laconical Apophthegms, however the name of Hermocrates be crept in, in his life of Artaxerxes) into Greece; with gold, amounting to the quantity of 50 talents of silver: whereby it came to passe, that the chief Cities, being bribed, conspired together, and raised a common war on the behalf of the Athenians, against the Lacedaemonian party, [Xenoph. ibid. Plut. in his Artax. Paulianus in his Laconica and Metecica.]

3610. Agelliaus therefore entering into Phrygia, which was of Pharnabazus his Government, about the beginning of Autumn, burnt and spoiled all that country; taking in all the cities thereof, either by force or volun- tary surrender, and then by the perswasion of Spithridates, marched into Paphlagonia, to move them to a revolt from the Persian:
And Cotsy the King thereof, who was formerly feint for by Artaxerxes, but would not go, now confederated with Agelliaus, and he by Spithridates his perswasion, left there a thousand horse, and two thousand foot to assill him; and he, to recompence Spithridates in some sort, for his service, before he went thence, procured Cotsy to take his daughter to wife, [Xenophob. lib. 4. Hellen. and in his Agelliaus: And Plutarch likewise in his]
For Agelliaus was ever very desirous to requite his friends, as appears by that Epistle Laconically written and attributed to him: Nicias εἰ ποτε μὴ ἀδελφὸς εἴς τὸν ἀδελφὸν ἔσῃ; ἀδελφ. πᾶσι τοῖς ἀδελφοῖς. (i. e.) If Nicias hath not done you wrong, forgive him: if he hath, forgive him for my sake; however forgive him. [Plutarch in his Agelliaus, and in his Laconical
Apophthegmes,]

Leaving Paphlagonia, he marched to Dalcylum: where Pharnabazus his Palace was; and round about him many townes, large and full of all provisions, and there wintered; and partly from thence, partly from other parts adjoyning, maintained his army, [Xen. ib.]

my, [Xen., iv.]
 Then, when his soldiers went a foraging, and sometimes not so warily as they should have done, encountering their enemy, because hitherto they had never been discredited by them, Pharnabazus by chance fell upon them with two hooked chariots, and one four hundred men, as they were out of order, following their pillage. But the Grecians eluding him, rallied themselves in a body, to the number of 700. Phar-nabazus presently turning his hooked chariots in the front, followed them with his horse, and bad them drive in upon the middle of them; and when the chariots had broken in upon, and disordered them, his horse fell on, and slew to the number of one hundred of them: the rest fled back to Agefilaus, who was not far off, with his Coriesels.

Three or four dayes after, Spithridates found that Pharnabazus lay with his arm in a spacious bourgade called Cais; about 160 furlongs from thence, and advertised Heripidas, chief of the Council of war, thereof. He presently prayed Ageilaus to give him two thousand Corselets, and as many Tartagars; and so many horse as would voluntarily go with him, though there went not with him indeed a moitie of any kind. But he, setting out, with those which he had, so soon as it grew dark, came upon Pharnabazus: in the very dawning of the day, and slew the Mylians, who happened that time: to be upon the guard: then the whole army took a fright, and fled, and he entered their camp, and there got a rich booty, together with Pharnabazus his own pavilion, and all his rich furniture and wealth therein; for he for fear of the Grecians, like the Scythian Nomades, removed his camp hither and thither, never staying long in any one place: his chief care being, that the enemy might not know where to find him. And here Heripidas, making too too rigorous an enquiry and search after the spoils which was taken, let commanders with their souldiers on work, and strip Spithradates and his Paphlagonians of all that ever they had gotten in the pillage of the camp: upon which abuse, they all the next night, took what was left, and got them away to Sardes, unto Artax, who had himself formerly revolted from the King, and served against him; nor was there anything in all this journey into Asia, that more troubled Ageilaus than this departure of Spithridates, and Megabates his son, whom Ageilaus exceedingly loved, and of these Paphlagonian forces, [Diod. lib. 4. ibid. and Plutarch in his Ageilaus.]

Afterward Ageilaus and Pharnabazus, coming to a party, by the means of one Apollonophanes of Cyzicum, who was a common friend to both, they fell to treat of an agreement. Pharnabazus (as Xenophon hath it in his oration concerning Ageilaus) openly professed, that unless the king would make him absolute and sole Commander of the army, he would revolt from him: but if he might command all, then he would maintain the war against Ageilaus, as long as he could: and Ageilaus told him, that he would depart out of his territory, with all the speed that might be, and so long as he could find a work elsewhere, would not trouble him: and so soon as Pharnabazus was gone, his son begotten upon Pharypyra came running to Ageilaus, and entered into a league of friendship with him, and in assurance thereof, they gave gifts each to other, as pledges of love between them, [Id. ib.]

And now the spring came on, and Ageilaus came into the plaines of Thebes, and pitched near the Temple of Diana Alstyria, and there gathered exceeding store of wealth on all hands; and provided himself to march into the upper countries; nothing doubting but that all the regions which he left behind him, would fall off from the Persian. [Xenophon, lib. 4. Hellen.] and now the fame of him grew marvelous great in Persia; having spent two full years in that war, [Plutarch, in his Ageilaus.]

The Lacedemonians having now gotten certain knowledge, that the Persian monkeys flew about in Greece, and that the principal cities there, considered for a common war against them, dispatch't away Epicidas to Ageilaus: to call him home to the defence of his own country. Hereupon Ageilaus, though much troubled that he was thus taken off from so great a design, as he had then in hand, yet thought fit to obey their commands, [Id.] and wrote back to the Ephori this Epistle, which Plutarch inserteth among his Apophthegmes.

Ageilaus to the Ephori, greeting: we have subdued a great part of Asia, and routed the Barbarians, and provided great store of armies in Ionia. But because you have set me a certain day, within which to return unto you, I will obey your commands, and peradventure be back before that day: for I am King not for my self, but for you, and our confederates: for a king is then a true King, when he is commanded by the laws, and Ephori, and the other magistrates of the city.

It is said also that he told his friends merrily, that the king had driven him out of Asia thirty thousand Archers; meaning, that Timocrates his Agent, had bestowed to many thousand golden Darters, which were stamped with Archers upon them, among the leaders of the people in every city, to raise a common war against the Spartans, [Plutarch in his Laconical Apophthegmes, and in his Artaxerxes.]

Ageilaus returning, left Enxemus behind him to command in chief; and with him 4000 souldiers: to assist the Ionians if need should be. And to the end he might carry back with him a sure and sufficient army; he made promise of great rewards and honours to those cities and commanders, who should send him in the best horse and foot, and best furnished; and thereby put them into an emulation each with other, who should do best in that kind, [Xenophon, Hellen 4.]

361.

Xenophon, when he was to return with Ageilaus into Boeotia to make war against the Thebans, left half the gold which he had gotten in his voyage with Cyrus at Ephesus, in the hands of one Megabyzus, treasurer of the Temple of Diana there; for he foresaw that going now with Ageilaus he should undoubtedly hazard himself in a barrel: which accordingly fell out afterward at Coroniza. Wherefore he left order with him, that in case he escaped alive out of that battle, then he should restore him the money deposited in that Temple; but if he miscarried, then he charged him to consecrate it all to the goddess Diana: and of the other half, he sent offerings to Apollo at Delphos; [Expedition, Cy. lib. 5. and Diod. Laertius in Xenophon's.] But Ageilaus himself consecrated a tenth of all that he had gotten in his two years wars in Asia, to Apollo at Delphos; which came to upward of 100 talents, [Xenophon, and Plutarch, in their several lives of Ageilaus.]

Ageilaus having passed the sea at Hellepont, received news of the victory which the Lacedemonians had gotten near Corinth; and thereupon sent back Dercylidas into Asia to inform the Ionians of it; thereby to hearten them the more, in continuing firm to the Lacedemonian party, [Xenophon, Hellen 4. and Plutarch in his Ageilaus.]

About this time it was that that famous sea-fight was made at Cnidus, (and under the hill called Dorius, as Paulan says, [in the 2 book of his Eliaca] reporteth, when Eubolus, or Eubolis was L. Chancellor at Athens, who began his office there, in the very entrance of 3 year of 96 Olympiade, as Lyfias, a very good Author in his Oration concerning the acts of Aristophanes affirmeth.

The Commanders of the Persian Fleet lay near to Doryma, in Cherfonesus, with more than 90 sail of ships; Pharnabazus commanded the Phoenicians, and Conon the Athenian, the Grecian Squadron of them. But Pilander, (for whom Periarachus falsely pur, by Diodorus) the Lacedemonian Ammiral, setting sail from Cnidus with 80 ships, came to a place called Phyliscus in Cherfonesus: and going from thence, lighted upon a part of the Kings Fleet, and at the first encounter had the better of it: but when the rest of the Kings Fleet came in to their rescue, and the friends of the Lacedemonians shifted for themselves, and fled to land, Pilander with his ship fell in upon the thickest of the enemy; slew many of them; but died himself manfully in the fight. Then did Conon with his men pursue the Lacedemonians hotly to land, and took no less than fifty of their ships: the rest fled and returned safe to Cnidus, [Xenophon, Hellen. 4. Diodorus, year 2 of the 96 Olympiade, Justin lib. 6. cap. 3. Emil. Probus in the life of Conon.]

When Ageilaus was now ready to invade Boeotia, news was brought him of this great overthrow of the Lacedemonian Fleet, and therein of the death of Pilander his wives brother: and at the very instant, the Sun was eclipsed, and looked like a half-moon, [Xenophon, Hellen. 4. and Plutarch in his Ageilaus] which fell upon the 14. of our August, as appeareth by the Astronomical accounts, in the year 394 before the birth of Christ.

After this great victory at Cnidus, Pharnabazus and Conon went about, and cast the Lacedemonian Governours and Garrisons out of all the Islands and Sea Towns; making them believe, that they would never put any Citadels upon them: but that they should thenceforth live according to their own laws, [Xenophon, lib. 4. Hellen.] and hereupon, first the Col, then the Nisaeans, and then the Teians, and those of Chios fell off from the Lacedemonians. Then they of Mitylene, of Ephesus, and Erythrae, did the like: and in an instant, all the rest of the cities fell a madding against the Lacedemonian Government; whereof some casting out the Lacedemonian Garrisons, set up for themselves, and maintained their own State. Others gave themselves up into Conons hands: and from that time forward, the Lacedemonians lost the sovereignty of the seas, [Diodorus, year 2. Olympiade 96.]

Dercylidas, an old enemy of Pharnabazus, being at this time at Abidus, would not out thence, as others did out of their commands; but having made a grave and pious Oration to the inhabitants, held them firm and constant to the Lacedemonian party: and when other Commanders which were cast out of their several places, repaid nothing, they entertained them lovingly there; and such as came not of themselves, they invited to come. And when a multitude of them were come together, Dercylidas put over to Sestus on the other side, and there entertained all such as were driven out of their commands on the European side, and put the like courage into their hearts, as he had done to the rest in Asia side: telling them that in Asia it self, which from the beginning belonged to the King, sundry places, as Temneus, no great Town, and Ege in Eolia, and other places held still their own, and would not stoop to the Kings obedience, [Xenophon, Hellen. 4.]

Pharnabazus purposing to go for Ephesus, delivered over to Conon 40 ships; and had him meet him at Sestus. He himself sent Minatory letters to both places, telling them, that unless they rid their hands of the Lacedemonians, he would hold them for his mouth of the river Eurymedon, and they contributed, according to his command; but when that notwithstanding, some of his company went up into the country, and there plundered their goods: the men of Aspendus, growing into choler thereupon, watched their opportunity, and falling upon them, slew many of them, and among the rest, Thralybulus himself, as he lay sleeping in his tent, which strook the Athenian captains with such a fear, that they presently got them aboard, and failed to Rhodes: and the Athenians sent forth with Argæus to succeed in Thralybulus his room, [Xenoph. Hel. 4. Diodor. year 3, Olympiade 97.]

4. Diodor. year 3; Olympiad 97.
The Lacedaemonians, though they had little reason to find fault with Dercylidas his doings, yet they sent Anaxibius to succeed him in the government of Abydos, a man, borne up by the favour of the Ephoroi, and one that promised to do wonders, if he might be furnished with men and money: wherefore they gave him 3 tall ships of war, and money to hire and pay a thousand sea soldiers more. He therefore coming to Abydos, raised land forces with the monies which he brought, and by that means drew off sundry cities of Eolia, from Pharnabazus his party, and wasted the enemies country, and then getting 3 ships more, he annoyed and troubled the Athenians, which used upon that coast, and if he happened to light upon any of their ships (fraging, he took and brought them to Abydos). [Xenoph. Hellen. 4.] He was recovered from Corinth with

The Athenians hearing thereof, sent Epipharcus (lately returned from Corinth) with 8 ships, and 12 hundred targeteers, to maintain what Thralylubus had gotten, and seduced in those parts, against Anaxibius, and comming into Cheroneus; he for his part, and Anaxibius for his, let up a company of Pirates, and land robbers, to carry on the war for them, (Id. ib.)

3616. Anaxibius with his hired bands, and his own country-men and 200 men out of Abydus, all Coriethes went to Andarus, and was there very kindly received and entertained.
 Mean while Epiphates disposed certain ambushments for him, in the passages of the mountains, against he should return from thence to Abydus. The vessels which he wasted him over, in the night season, he caused to row up the Hellespont, that men might conceive him to be aboard them, and that he was then going, as at other times he used to do, to collect monies : wherefore, when the men of Abydus, who led the Van, came into the plaine which lieth near to a place called Cremastes, (where there are also gold mines) and the rest were coming down the steep of the Hill, and Anaxibius himself, with his Laconian companies following them, Epiphates with all his men, rose out of their ambushment, and set upon them. Anaxibius finding himself thus entrapp'd, fought manfully and died, and with him 120 other Lacedaemonians, governors of several cities, which were then come unto him : the rest fled, and Epiphates pursued them to the very gates of Abydus, there perished of the rest some 200, of Abydus it self almost fifty, all Coriethes, and then he returned into Chertionelis, [ib.
 4. 126. 6.]

Hierax being sent to succeed Teleutias, in the command of the fleet, he returned home; leaving an incredible desire of him in the hearts of the fouldiers, [Xenophon Hellen. 5.]

3617. Shortly after they sent Antalcidas to succeed Hierax in that charge, supposing that therein it should exceedingly content and please Tiribazus : and he coming to Ephesus, left Nicholochus his Lieutenant there; and he with Tiribazus went together to the King, to conclude the peace which was then in agitation, [Xen. lib. 5. Hel. Dod. year 2.

Nicolochus, to secure Abydus, set sail from Ephesus, and by the way landed at Tenedos, waited their country, and wrong out of them a large proportion of money, and then went on his journey to Abydus as he intended : mean while the Athenian Captains, which were at Samothrace, Tius, and other places near adjoining, hastened to come to the relief of Tenedos. But, finding that Nicolochus was lately arrived at Abydus, they went out of Chersonesus with 32 sail of ships, and befieged him as he lay at Abydus with 25 ships. [Xenoph. Hellen. 5.]

Chabrias was openly sent by the Athenians to the aide of Euagoras, with 800 Tartar-gateers, and ten tall men of war, and left not the place till he had subdued the whole Isle; whereby the Athenians got a great reputation in the world, [Id. ibid. and Emil. Prob. in the Life of Chabrias.] of the Embassy sent from the Cypriots to the Athenians for their aide, Lyfias the Orator, in his oration upon Aristophanes, maketh mention, mention.

Ataraxes, who could never before abide a Lacedæmonian, but would ever lay, (ταῖς Διωνυσιαστικαῖς) that they were the most impudent of all men living, yet feeling Anticla dance the Leonicas, and the Calicratidas, before him, fell infinitely in love with him : and as he sat at supper, lent him a garland wrought of roses and facon from his own head, dip all in a most costly ointment, to wear for his sake : whereunto he answered, Sir, laith he, I take, and thank you for this noble gift and favour : but the perfume of of the ointment in it, mays the natural sent, and fragrancie of the flowers, [Plur. in his Attax. and in his Pelopidas, and in his Sympot. lib. 7. quef. 8. Athenæus Deipnof. lib. 2. Elia. Varia, Hiltor. lib. 14. c. 39.]

Tinibazus returned from the king and Antalcidas with him; having made a firme league and affociation of armes, in case the Athenians and their confederates, would not partake in that peace, which he had propounded. Pharnabazus being sent for, went to the king, being then in the upper Asia, and there he married the kings daughter, [Xenoph. Hellen. 5.]

Antalcidas, preferring upon his return, hearing that Iphicrates and Dioximus befieged Nacolicus in Abidus; with all his fleet, went thither by land, and putting, to sea by night, gave it out, that he was sent for to Chalcedon, but falling into the port of Abydos, he there lay close: four Captains there were of the Athenian party, who hearing that Antalcidas was gone to Chalcedon, purposed to follow him upon the trade-way to Proconessus. But Antalcidas loo soon as they were passed by, came back to Abydos; and by a stratagem, laying 12 principal swift ship; in an Ambushment, intercepted 8 ships, which Thrahybulis the Athenian brought out of Thrace, and thought to have joynd with the main body of the Attic fleet: [Id. ibid. Polyanius, lib. 2. Stratag. in Antalcida.]

Antalcides having received 20 sail of ships from Syracuse and the parts of Italy, which were brought him by Polyxenus, and others, as well out of Ionia, from Pharnabazus, as out of those parts which belonged to Ariobarzanes, his old friend, had made up a fleet of 80 sail, and was absolute master of the sea: and thereby forced those ships which coming out of Pontus, were bound for Athens, to turne their course to some port or other, of the Lacedæmonian party; and there to discharge, Xenoph. ib.

When Tiribazus had summoned all to come in, that would subscribe to the forms of a peace propounded by Artaxerxes; all the Grecian Cities, by their Ambassadors, readily came in: unto whom he shewing the kings seals affixed to the instrument, he caused it to be read as followeth.

The King Artaxerxes thinks it reason, that the cities which are in Asia, as also the Islands of Glazconce and Cyprus should be his, and under his command: And all other Cities of Grecians, as well small as great, should be free, and live every of them according to their own laws, except Lemnus, and Imbrus, and Scirus, which as heretofore, so now also, the Athenians shall hold and possess. And as for them which shall not receive this peace, them will I, together with those who shall embrace it, pursue with an open war, by land and by sea, with ships and with mo-people will join them in the struggle for an empire, or, γὰρ ἂν ἀνάβῃ [εἰς, with μῆτις and πῶς money-making]. When the Emperor returned at their invitation he had reported every bit of them to his own people, although he grieved them to see the Greeks of Asia, for which he Agellias had so bravely fought, thus cowardly betrayed into the Kings hand, for which he grieved them, and he grieved them for the loss of the empire, and he grieved them for the deeds they nuff, they submitted therunto, and accepted of the peace; [ἔπειτα 1b. ἔπειτα in Panathen. Diod. year 2, Olymp. 98, Platarch in Agell. and Aristoxen.] and in his Laconic Apophthegm. Attitudes in his Lemnic. 1, x and 2,.] which peace was published as [Polyl-lik. 1, x.] having observed, 19 years after the sea fight at Egospotamos, and sixteen years before the battle at Leuctra in Boeotia.

When this peace was thus made, Agelæus, as Xenophon says, was an earnest man to see it observed, and the Lacedæmonians made themselves very severe guardians, and defenders of it in Greece. And Artaxerxes wrote a particular letter to Alcibiades, which he sent by a Persian in company of one Callias a Lacedæmonian, wherein he offered him both hospitality and friendship. But Alcibiades accepted neither, but bad the Kings messenger tell this matter, that he should not trouble himself to write letters to him; for if he continued a good friend to the Lacedæmonians, he would not fail to continue the like to him; but if he endeavoured any ill to them, he should not think that any letters of his, should work him over to his friendship. [Plut. in his Lacedæm. Apophthegmes.]

In those articles of Antalcidas his peace, formerly related out of Xenophon, where he could not be ignorant of the particulars thereof, we find that not all the Islands bordering upon Asia, but two of them only, were given up to the King, (though Plurarch in the life of Ataxerxes, seems to have been of another mind,) and those were Clazomene and Chios (which as I flew before, in the year of the World 3504, 3505, was then an Island,) and Cyprus: the tenor of this peace, now drew Chabrias from thence; when he had indeed already subdued it wholly, and reduced it to the obedience of Euagoras as I flew before, in regular warfare, Euagoras armed almost every man in the Isle, and mulctured a huge army against Ataxerxes: and now Ataxerxes having made a final peace with the Grecians, commanded all his forces to provide themselves for the conquest of Cyprus, Diod. 2 year. Olympiade 98.]

3618. Artaxerxes now drew forth three hundred thousand foote; and furnished withal 300 faile offhips, against Iuagoras King of Cyprus: General of his foot he made his son law Orontes; Ammiral of his fleet was Tiribazus, who taking each his charge a Phoea and Cumæ, sailed first to Cilicia, and from thence, went and landed in Cyprus where where they very vigorously put on the war against Euagoras: and he for his part procured himself supplies of all kinds from the Egyptians, Tyrians, Arabians, and others, enemies to the Persian State: so that he made up a Fleet of 90 sail; of which number, 20 were from Tyre, the rest were his own: and of his land souldiers 6 thousand of his own, and his auxiliaries from other parts, a far greater number. And so having money enough to pay them, his army grew exceeding great, [Diod. lib. 15, year 3. Olympiade 98.]

Euagoras set on work certain Pirates, of whom he had good store at his command, to fall upon the enemies vessels of loading: of these they took some, sunk others, and the rest durst not put to sea for fear of them. Whence it came that victuals presently failing in the Persian army, some of the hired souldiers killed their Commanders: and a mutiny grew over all the army; so that with much ado could the Coronels at land, and Gaos the chief Officer at sea quiet them: wherefore the whole Navy in a body were fain to set sail for Cilicia, and from thence brought their store of provision for the Camp. But Acoris King of Egypt suffered not Euagoras to want either for corn or money, and all other provisions, as much as he wanted, [Id. ibid.]

Euagoras finding that his Navy was far too weak for the enemies, furnished out 60 ships more of his own, and besides them had fifty more sent him from King Achoris: so that now his Fleet was 200 fighting ships. And at his first encounter by land, had the better of the enemy: and routed them again at sea, falling suddenly upon their Fleet, as they were failing to Citium, sunk some of them, and took others; which he found scattered from the body of the Navy. But when the General of the Persian Navy, and the rest of the Commanders had recollected themselves, the fight then grew hot and fierce between them, wherein Euagoras at the first had again the better of it. But when Gaus fell on with all his might, and fought himself very manfully, Euagoras his men fled, with the loss of many of his ships. The Persians therefore having gotten this victory, assembled both their land and sea Forces together at Citium: where fitting themselves with necessaries, they went joyfully to besiege Salamis it self the chief city, both by land and sea, [Id. ibid.]

Teribazus immediately after the fight, put over into Cilicia, and went to carry Artaxerxes news of the victory: and Euagoras leaving Salamis to be defended by his son Pythagoras, (Protagoras perhaps, of whom I formerly made mention out of Isocrates, in the year of the World 3613.) and committing the charge of the whole Isle to his charge, got out by night with 10 ships only in his company, and sailed into Egypt. Where he periwaded Acoris, with all the power he had to make a war upon the Persian, [Id. ibid.]

Euagoras returned into Cyprus, but with far less store of monies than he expected: and when he there found Salamis Strongly besieged, and himself abandoned by his confederates, he was fain at last to send to Teribazus, and to treat with him about a conference. Teribazus who commanded over all in chief, made answer, that he would admit of the motion, provided that he would surrender all Cyprus into the Kings hand, save onely Salamis, and pay the King a tribute for that too; and be at his command as a liege vassal ought to be to his Lord and Sovereign. These conditions, as hard as they were, yet was Euagoras fain to submit unto; for he said, he should be subject to him, as one King to another; not as a slave to his master: and yet this would not content Teribazus neither, [Diodor. year 4. Olympiade 98.]

But Orontes the other Commander in chief, envying the honour of Teribazus, sending away privily letters to the King, his father in law, among other matters, laid to his charge, that he intended a rebellion; and that under hand he had confederated with the Lacedemonians, and used all means, to oblige to himself, all the principal Captains and Commanders of the army. To all which the King giving hasty credit: gave Orontes a commission to seize on his person, and to send him to him, [Id. ibid.]

Orontes, fearing Teribazus, seized on him by this wile. There was a house which had a great vault in it: over this vault he set a bed not corded, but covered over with tapestry, and many costly coverles: then desired Teribazus to come unto him, pretending a conference about some urgent matters; and Teribazus coming in, late him down upon the bed, and thorough that fell into the vault: and being there caught, was sent away fast bound in chains to the King, [Polyan. stratag. lib. 7.]

Orontes now commanding all in Cyprus, when he saw that Euagoras had taken fresh courage, and endured the siege more stoutly than before; and his souldiers repining at Teribazus his misfortune, received no commands, and left the siege: admitted Euagoras to a peace upon such terms as Teribazus had propounded to him: to wit, that paying a yearly tribute to the King, he should continue King of Salamis, and as a King should be obedient in all things to the King. And to this war of Cyprus, which lasted ten years, whereof yet the far greatest part was spent in preparation making, and two years onely in the war it self, came to an end; and the King having columed 50 thousand thousand talents in it, when all was done, yet Euagoras in the same state he was in, when the war began, [Isocrates in his Euagoras, Diad. year 4. Olympiade 98.]

Gaus, Vice-Ammiral of the Navy, and son in law to Teribazus, fearing least, as a man privy to Teribazus his designs, he might perchance be made away for company, bethought himself of falling off and revolting from the King. And having wealth and souldiers enough, and the chief Captains of the Navy wholly at his devotion, confederated forthwith with Acoris King of Egypt, and the Lacedemonians, to make a war upon Artaxerxes, [Diod. ib.]

Artaxerxes following herein the example of Cambyses, [Herod. lib. 5. cap. 25. Valer. Max. lib. 6. cap. 3.] caused certain of his Judges to be head alive, and their skins to be hung over the Judgement seats, that they which late therein, knowing what hung over their heads, might be the more careful to do justice unto his people, [Diodorus ibid.]

Artaxerxes leading with him an army of 300 thousand men against the Cadusia a people lying between the Euxine and the Caspian seas, [Diodor. Olymp. 98. year 4. Plut. in Artaxerxes.] In this war there fell many a Great man on either side, but among others of that of the Kings party, one Camillares, a Carian born, a stout and a valiant man, whom the King had made Commander of that part of Cilicia, which his next to Cappadocia, inhabited by the Leucolyrians, and in honour of him, the King made his son Datames governour in his room, who also did the king singular service in this war, [Emil. Prob. in the Life of Datames.]

Artaxerxes with his army in this war, was brought to such extremity, that hardly could a man buy an Asses head for 60 Drachmes: and was relieved by Teribazus, who lived then a poor neglected and contemptible gentleman in the army, in this manner. There were at that time two Kings of the Cadusians, and they held their camps apart. He therefore making the King first acquainted with it, went himself to one of them, and sent his son privily to the other; and each of them deceived his man: periwading him, that the other had underhand sent to Artaxerxes, to make a peace with him for himself, and to leave the other out. Hereupon, each sent his Ambassadors, the one with Teribazus, the other with his son to the King, and he made peace with both, and so the war was ended, [Plut. in Artaxerxes.]

Upon this, the King referred the cognizance of Teribazus his cause to three honourable persons, before whom he made his innocency to appear, and withall his services to the King, to have been so great, that they all absold him, and the King ever after held him in very high esteem, and heaped great honours on him: as for Orontes, he was condemned for a false accuser, thrust out of the Kings favour, and held for an ignominious person ever after, [Diod. year 4. Olympiade 98.]

Whiles Gaus was in Cyprus, the Grecians which there served under him, wrote letters against him into Ionia; and to find out who they were, and what they wrote, took this course: he provided a ship, and fitted her with Mariners, and the master gave it out, that he was going for Ionia; and lured out the time, to get as many letters aboard, as possibly he could, and at last let out: but turning short, came back into a creek, not far from the place whence he went: thither Orontes went on foot; and causing all the letters aboard to be delivered into his hands, read them; and finding who they were that had written against him, he put them all to death with torments, [Polyan. Stratag. lib. 7. in Gaus, in which whereof, it is miswritten, Alas and Glori.]

Gaus, when he had stirred up both the Egyptians and Lacedemonians to engage in a war against the Persian, was killed, I know not how, nor by whom, and so went not on, with what he had intended. But after his death, Tachos, going on upon his grounds, got an army, and built him a town upon a high hill, joyning upon the sea, called Leuca, where also he built a Chappel for Apollo: but he coming also to die shortly after, the Clazomenians, and they of Cuma, fell to strife about the possession of it, and the Clazomenians made the more halt, and got it; and so all rebellions in Asia were laid asleep: the Lacedemonians also, Gaus and Tachos, both being now dead; cast off all care of Asia, and would have no more to do with it, [Diodorus year. 2. Olympiade 94.]

When Pharnocratus was Lord Chancellor of Athens, in the moneth Possideon, in the 366 year of Nabonassars account, on the 26 day of the Egyptian moneth, Thoth, in the entering upon the 23 of our Decemb. five hours and an half after midnight, there was a small eclipse of the moon observed at Babylon, [Hipparch. in Ptol. in his great Syntax. lib. 4. cap. ult.]

In the same mans time, in the moneth Scirophorion, and in the same year of Nabonassars, on the 24 day of the moneth Phamenoth the 18 day of our June, ending 5 hours and one half before midnight, there was another Eclipse of the moon observed in the same place, [Id. ib.] patched away to him Pelopidas of Thebes it self, Antiochus the Pancratiast of Arcadia, Archdamus of Eleus, a Town in Thrace, with one other out of Argos: which coming to the Athenians ears, they dispatched away also their Ambassadors to the King; Timagoras and Leontes. And among them all Pelopidas appeared most honourably in the kings eye, and next him Timagoras; and were of all others most honourably entreated by him, [Xen. Hellen. 7.]

Imenias of Thebes joynt Commissioner with Pelopidas in this Embassage, when being brought by Titraustes the Chiliarch, to the presence of the king, he was bid to prostrate himself before him: let fall his ring before him; and presently falling all along, took it up again: and fo being conceived to have done it to the king, obtained whatever he asked of him, [Plut. in Artax. Elia, Var. Hist. lib. 1. cap. 21.]

Timagoras the Athenian sent a letter of intelligence at the same time by one Barbaris his Secretary, and had for his pains a thousand Daries; and had moreover a rich supper sent him to his lodging: whereupon the kings brother Oitanes, laid unto him; Remember Timagoras this supper; for it is not sent you, for any small purpose: which sounded rather as an upbraiding of some treason to him, than any congratulation of the gift, so sent unto him, [Plut. ib.] It is said also that the king gave him 80 Cows, which because he was sickly, should afford him milk upon his way homeward: and a costly bed and furniture, with some servants to make it, because the Grecians skilled not of such matters: and moreover, caused him to be carried all along to the sea side in a Lictor, because of his infirmity; giving those which carried him 4 talents for their pains, [Id. ib. and in his Pelopidas] But [Athena. lib. 2.] having told us that this Timagoras, after his prostration to the king, was used with great honour by him, adds only, that the King sent him some dishes from his own table. As for that costly bed and furniture, and men to make it, as if the Grecians knew not how to make a bed; sent by Artaxerxes, he says it was to one Timagoras of Crete, or Eutimus of Gortyna in Crete, as Phanius the Peripatetic calls him.

Pelopidas, being so gracious with the king, got letters from him, wherein the king commanded that Melicene should be exempt from the Lacedemonian jurisdiction: and the Athenians required to draw up their ships: and if they obeyed not, proclaimed open war against them both; and if any city refused to follow him in this war, then that city was first of all others to be made an example. And when Leontes spake openly and said, that it was time for the Athenians to look them out and provide new friends instead of the king: Artaxerxes had added, that if the Athenians did not like it, they should come and shew cause, why not, [Xen. Hellen. 7.]

When the Ambassadors came home, the Athenians took Timagoras, and for his prostration to the King, struck off his head: taking it amiss that the glavering flattery of one citizen of theirs, should subject the whole honour of the Athenian State to the domineering power of the Persian: so says, [Valer. Max. lib. 5. cap. 3.] Where I know not by what mistake, Darius is crept into the text instead of Artaxerxes. Others say it was, for his base acceptance of the Kings gifts: of which a man may see more in, [Plutarch in his Artax. and Pelopidas.] But Xenophon says, that he was accused by Leontes his colleague: for that he would not so much as keep in one lodging with him, and communicated all his counsels with Pelopidas: which no doubt was the chief cause of his being put to death.

The Thebans summoning all the cities of Greece to hear the Kings letters read, and they being publicly read by the Persian that brought them, who first shewed them the Kings seal, put to them; they required all, who would be friends to the king and the Thebans, to take an oath for the observance of the contents of those letters. But when the Legats first, and afterwards the Cities themselves, refused that oath: all that Embassage to Artaxerxes, and the principality and sovereignty of Greece to much affected by Pelopidas and the Thebans came to naught, [Xen. Hellen. 7.]

Jubilee 22.

Artaxerxes sending an other Embassage into Greece to require them to put an end to these wars and to make a peace among themselves; in the end, prevailed with them, [Diodor. an. 3. Olymp. 103.]

Endoxus the Cnidian, surnamed Βροδὸς, Endoxos: (i.e.) the famous, was in his prime at this time. He going into Egypt with Chrylippus a Physician, carried with him letters of commendation from Agefilaus to Nectanabis: and he commended him over to the Priests there: where being upon a time with Iconuphi of Heliopolis, (whom Clement Alexan. in the first book of his stromata, calleth Comuphis) Apis came, and all belived his cloak: whereupon the Priests laid presently, that he should grow very famous, but should not be long-lived: as Phavorinus in his Commentaries saith. He having stayed in Egypt one year and four months, having himself all over, to his very eye-eye-brows, wrote the Oliberis, as some report, of which we in our discourse of the Macedonian and Asian year, [cap. ult.] have said somewhat. From thence he is said to have travelled to Cyzicum, and Propontis, and to have spread his philosophy in those parts, and so to have come to Mausolus, [Diog. Laertius in his Eudoxus.] others say, that this Eudoxus went in company with Plato in Egypt, and they both converted 13 years space, with the Priests there, as we read in Strabo, [lib. 17.]

At Heraclea in Pontus, when the common people there, desired all bills and bonds to be cancelled, (i.e.) all debts to be released, and all lands to be cast into a hutch porch and equally shared among them, the better sort, sent both to Timotheus, Prince of Athens, and also to Epaminondas, of the Thebans for help against them; but failing of their hope, they sent for Clearchus home, whom they had formerly cast in to exile, and prayed his aide to repulse them, [Justin lib. 16. c. 41.]

Clearchus, supposing the diffention of the people, to be a fit occasion for him to attain to the sovereignty of the city, dealt secretly with Mithridates King of Pontus, who was in hostility with his country, and agreed with him; that being called home into his country, he should deliver the city into his hands, and hold it afterward as government under him. And having let a time, when to deliver the city into Mithridates his hand, took him, when he came about it, and all his friends that came with him prisoners, and wrung a great mass of money out of them, and to let them go: and then, as he made himself an unexpected enemy of a friend to him, so instead of maintaining the rich mens cause against the people, he made himself a patron and leader on of the common sort against them; and did not onely incense the people against them, but fell to exercising of acts of tyranny and cruelty upon them. For when the people had put the supremacy, and all power into his hands, he cast 60 of the chief of them (for the rest were fled) into prison, and having first taken away their goods, then put them all to death likewise, [Id. ib.] and letting Dionysius the Tyrant of Syracuse before him for a pattern in all things to follow, he held the space 12 years, [Diodor. year 1. of the 104 Olymp. with the Collections of Photius in his Biblioth. out of Memnon the Historiographer of Heracles, num. 224.]

Tachos, whom Polyanus [lib. 7. Stratagem.] calls Thamos, Aristotle [lib. 2.] of his Oeconomicus Taos, and Julius Africanus, Teos, reigned in Egypt, two years.

With this year Xenophon concludes his 7 books of his Grecian history, and Anaximenes Lamproclatus the first part of his: where beginning from Heracles, that is, the generation of the gods; and beginning of man kind, he endeth with the battle of Mantinea, wherein Epaminondas was slain, comprehending in 12 volumes, almost whatever passed among either the Greeks or Barbarians, [Diod. year 2. 104 Olympiade], and in the second part he sets down all the gests of Philip of Macedonia and his son, Alexander the great, [Paula. 2. of his Elieca.]

When Mithradates king of Pontus was dead, Ariobarzanes, the Governor of Phrygia under Artaxerxes, seized on the kingdom of Pontus, and held it by the space of 26 years, [Diodorus year 3. Olympiade 104. and year 4. of Olympiade 110.]

Clearchus the Tyrant of Heraclea, when he found that the chief men and Aldermen of Heraclea, which were fled from thence, stirred up all the neighbouring cities and states against him, he manumised and set at liberty all their servants, and gave them their masters wives and daughters in marriage, threatening those that would not, with death: that hereby he might make those slaves the more sure and trusty to himself, and the more deadly enemies to their masters. But when the women reckoned these dolefull marriages to be worse than death it self, many of them before their marriage, many after, having first murdered their new husbands, flew themselves: at last they came to a battle, where the Tyrant getting the victory took the chief men and Aldermen prisoners, and led them in triumph thorough the city, in sight of all the people, and then laid some of them in irons, others upon the rack, others he put to death, leaving no corner of the city free from sight and sense, of his cruelty, [Justin lib. 16. cap. 5.]

The Lacedemonians fell flat out with Artaxerxes, for that professing himself to be their friend and confederate, he had yet commanded them to part with Melicene out of their hands, and to make the Melienians a distinct member, in the league and confederacy of Greece, [Xenoph. in his Agesilanus, and Diod. year 3. Olymp. 104.] and with them joynt Ariobarzanes, the Governour of Phrygia, who, as I said before, upon the decease of Mithradates, had seized on and possessed himself of the kingdom of Pontus. [Diodor. ib.]

Autophrades the Governor of Lydia, besieging Ariobarzanes in Aflos, a city of Troas, for fear of Agefilaus, who being now old, came into Asia, onely to raise money for his country, brake up his siege, and fled; and Corys, who before Sestus, which which was at that time under Ariobarzanes his command, brake likewise up his fleet, and gat him packing. Mausolus also, which besieged Atius, and Sestus, both with an hundred ships by sea; not thorough fear, but upon persuasion drew off, and returned home with his fleet: and furnishing Agefilus with monies for his countries use, sent him lately away, [Xenoph. in his Agefilus.] Of which Ariobarzanes, and of his being besieged by Autophradates in Adramytium, [Polyenus also lib. 7.] maketh mention.

Mausolus, calling his friends together, bare them in hand, that Artaxerxes, unless he satisfied him forthwith with an excessive summe of money, would deprive him of his principality, which he held by inheritance from his father: which they believing, brought him, in an instant an infinite summe of money, [Polyenus lib. 7. stratag.] compared with [Aristot. in his Oeconomies]; which having once fingered, he was so far from giving it to Artaxerxes, that therewith he confederated presently with those Governours and Captains which then were up in armes against him; for there rebelled at this time against him, of the Ionian nation, all Lycia, Pfidia, Pamphilia, and Cilicia; and besides these, the Syrians and Phoenicians, and almost all that border upon the Aiatick sea; Tachos also king of Egypt, proclaimed open war against him, and was busie every where in building of ships and raising of forces; especially out of all parts of Greece, and got the Lacedemonians themselves to confederate and joyn with him, [Diod. year 3. Olympiade 104.]

All these rebelling at once against Artaxerxes, he lost one half of his revenues coming into his coasts. And the remainder sufficed not for the necessary use of the war, considering that he wasto maintain a war all at once, against the king of Egypt, and all the Grecian cities and countries in Asia; against the Lacedemonians and their confederates; to wit, all the Lords and Captains which held the Maritime towns and regions in all Asia under their command, [Id. ib.]

The king of Egypt sent for Agefilus to come unto him, promising to make him General of his army, [Xenoph. in his Agefilus.] And he being sent thither by his country, laid out the monies which Tachos had lent him for himself, in levying soldiers for his service. And having stored his ships with men, and taking along with him 30 Spartan Commissioners for his Council of War, went with a thousand Corselets into Egypt, [Plut. in his Agefilus: and Diodor. ut sup.] When the report of his landing came to the Courtiers eares in Egypt, happy was he that could first lend in presents to him; but when they came, and saw no attendance about him, onely a decrepit and wearisome old man, lying along upon the beach, sloven-like, and of a small stature, in a coarse shredbare cloak, they contemned and scorned him; and much more did they loath his fordid and insulfe behaviour, when they saw, that of those rich presents and provisions of diet which were sent in to him of all sorts, he would take some meale, and a veale perhaps, or a gosse for himself, and throw away the dainties and sweet meats, and precious oylments to his souldiers, [Plut. and Emil. Prob. in his Agefilus.] The King of Egypt himself also, performed not with him, nor made him General of his army, according to his promise, [Xen. in his Agefilus.] Deriding him for the smallness of his stature: and said, that he weened the old Proverb was true, The hills were great with young, and were delivered of a mouse: which when Agefilus heard, he said in a rage, I will one day send a Lyon unto him. [Athenae. lib. 14. with Plutarch.]

Chabrias the Athenian, was not sent by publick authority, as Alcibiades was, but upon the persuasion of Tachos, served him as a private man, [Diod. and Plutarch.] Who when he saw the King in some distress for want of money, advised him to take up what monies possible he could of the richer sort of the country, and promise them payment out of his yearly revenues: and by this means, he gathered an infinite sum of money without wrong to any, [Polye. strat. lib. 3.] and Aristotle [2. of his Oeconomies.] reckons up a great many the like shifts: that he made for the getting of monies, at this time.

They which rebelled in Asia, made Orontes the Governour of Mysia their Commander in chief: who having received monies enough to pay 20 thousand hired souldiers for one whole year; took first those who had contributed these monies and sent them prisoners to Artaxerxes; and then betrayed sundry other cities and castles, and companies of hired souldiers, to such Lieutenants as the King had sent into those parts, [Diodor. year 3. Olymp. 104.] of this war managed by Orontes and Autophradates and other Captains of the Kings, [Polyenus lib. 7. stratag. maketh also mention.] But for as much as Diodorus assures us, that in the last year of Artaxerxes Mneemon, both Autophradates and Orontes, and other Commanders, fell all off from him; we must of necessity conclude, that Autophradates stood for his son Artaxerxes Ochus, and that it was Orontes which made the war against him.

Artabazus who commanded Artaxerxes Mneemons army, falling upon Cappadocia, Datames the Governour of that Province, met him with a strong body of horse, and 20 thousand foot, of mercenaries; but then Mithrabarzanes his father in law, and General of his horse, stole away from him by night with all his horse, and fled to Artabazus, and truly he and they, had their wages well payed them for such their treachery, for it tell out, that they were let upon, and hewed in pieces, by both the armies, both that to which, and that from which they fled: and Diodorus addeth, that Artaxerxes being informed, that Datames had brought him this nootie, by putting a trick upon him; made all the haste he could to rid his hands of him, and that shortly after, he caused him privily to be made away: but it appears out of Emil. Prob. that Datames lived long after this: Whole actions, as he acknowledges them to have been carried all along in an obscure way, so he saies, that himself was the more inquisitive and diligent in searching out and describing the concavities of them: which he doth in such wise, as a man may easily discern, that what he did was all in Artaxerxes Ochus his time.

and

Rhecomithres was sent by the united Lords into Egypt; where having gotten 500 talents, and 50 tall ships, he returned with them to Leucas in Asia: and having sent for many of the principal of them to come thither to him, he laid hold of them, and sent them all away prisoners to Artaxerxes; and by this act of his, reingratiated himself with the King, who was formerly displeased with him, [Diodorus year 3. Olympiade 104.]

Tachos, having now fitted himself with all things necessary for the war, gave the command of the 10 thousand men, which he had hired out of Greece to Agefilus; but his fleet consisting of 200 saile, to Chabrias (which with what care and cunning he furnished with rowers, [Polye. lib. 7. Stratag.] sheweth) and his foot army consisting of 80 thousand Egyptians, to N. tanabes, his, or rather, his brother or sitters son, for the word σύντροφος in the Greek signifieth either, but reserved to himself the oversight and generalship of all. And although Agefilus persecuted him, to carry on this war by his Lieutenants, and to stay himself in Egypt; yet he would not, [Diod. ib.] nevertheless, Agefilus, beneath himself, and contrary to his own humour, attended him by sea into Phoenicia, [Plutarch in his Agefilus.]

Whiles the Egyptian fleet, lay in Phenicia, Neftanabus was sent to take in some principal cities of Syria; where having compacted with him whom Tachos had left for Governor of Egypt in his absence, he proclaimed himself King of Egypt; and drew the commanders of the army by large gifts, and the souldiers by no lesse large promises, to side it with him against his father, [Diod. ut su.]

Tachos being now utterly deserted, both by his own subjects, and also by Agefilus, whom he had formerly offended by that base jest put upon him, fearing the worst, fled thence to Sidon in Phenicia, and from thence, to the King of Persia, as besides Xenophon and Plutarch, Theopompus and Lyfias of Naucratis, in his affairs of Egypt, both cited by Athenaeus [in his 14 books, 4 chapter.] report. Diodorus and Elian say further, that he was very graciously entertained by Artaxerxes, though I cannot believe Diodorus in this, that Artaxerxes presently made him general of all the forces which he had then raised to make a war upon Egypt, and that with them he returned into Egypt, and was there reenthroned by Agefilus, neither yet, [Elian, lib. 5. Var. Hist. c. 1.] where he telleth us, that having formerly used to live frugally at home, he now dined with overgorging himself with excess of diet, after the Persian manner, seeing that Lyceus or Lycus, whom I mentioned before, teacheth us that his Egyptian diet was far more sumptuous, than that of the Persian was, [credyd Athenaeus, lib. 4. cap. 10. Deip.]

After this, another set up himself against him in Mender, with an army of 100 thousand men, [Plut. in his Agefilus.] So when there were now 2 Kings in Egypt, Agefilus followed him whom he saw most to favour his Country men the Lacedemonians, [Xen. in Agefilus.] and that was Neftanabus; with whom he endured a strong siege in a Castle. But when Neftanabus grew impatient of being thus shut up; and would needs hazard himself upon a battle, Agefilus left him, and stayed behind in the castle, till the whole Castle was quite surrounded with works, and the enemy about them, all save a little space, where there was yet a passage left: then sallied he out at that narrow passage, and made his way through with a great slaughter of the enemy, having their works at his back, so that they could not enclose him round, [Plut. in Agefilus. Polye. stratag. lib. 2. with Diod. year 3. Olymp. 104.] where yet he hath by mistake Tachos, instead of the King of Mender.

As for the other King, which bare a hatred to the Greek nation, Agefilus overthrew him in a fight, and took him prisoner: but restored the other to his kingdom: and made him a firme friend to the Lacedemonian State, [Xenophon in Agefilus.] Though Emil. Prob. attribute this restitution of the King, to Chabrias; the reason whereof was, because it was indeed done by the joyned work of the Lacedemonians, and Athenians. Now from this time to the putting of Neftanabus from the kingdom, Diodorus reckons 12 year; which was indeed the true terme of his reign, and took many along with him out of Judea to serve him in his war in Egypt: as we gather out of Aristeas, in his book of the Septuagint Interpreters; where also, in the Epistle of Ptolemaeus Philadelphus, to Eleazarus, it is said, that many of the Jews were carried away into Egypt by the Persians, whilst they have the sway there. Which saying of his, is to be referred to this time of Artaxerxes Ochus; as is also that place in Justinus where he saith, [lib. 36, cap. 3.] if there be any truth in either of them, That Xerxes was the first of the Persians, that subdued the Jews.

While Salamis was besieged by Phocyon and Euagoras, all the rest of the cities submitted to the Persians, only Protagoras King of Salamis held it out against them, wherein Euagoras his care was, to be restored to his fathers kingdom in Salamis. But some having done him very ill offices, and laid great accusations to his charges, with the King, he seeing the King to favour and help Protagoras against him, gave off all hope of prevailing in that suit: and went and cleared himself of all imputations before the King; which he did so well, that the King bestowed a far better Dynasty or Principality upon him in Asia. And Protagoras at last voluntarily submitting to the King, held the kingdom of Salamis quietly ever after, [Diodor. year 3 Olympiade 107.] But this Euagoras of whom we now speak, it seems, was the grandchild of an other Euagoras, who died 24 years before, by his son Nicoteles: for that Euagoras the elder, had a son Nicoteles, who succeeded him in the kingdom of Salamis; and another called Protagoras, appeareth out of Hecataeus; but this younger Euagoras who succeeded Nicoteles, seems to have been put from his kingdom by Protagoras, which was his Uncle. But having, as was said before, a greater thing than Salamis bestowed on him by this Ochus, by his misbehaviour therein used, he was fain to flee again into Cyprus; where being taken, he was put to death as a malefactor, [as Diodorus saith.]

Eusebius in Chron. sheweth that in this 3 year of the 107. Olympiade, Ochus making Nectanebus to flee into Ethiopia, possessed himself of all Egypt: And that in him was destroyed the kingdom of Egypt; and that here was the period of Manethos Commentaries concerning the affairs of Egypt: and in what manner Egypt was taken in by Ochus, Diodorus in this year doth at large deliver: the summe whereof is this.

Ochus after the destruction of Sidon, and when his auxiliary forces were come unto him from Argos and Thebes, and the Grecian Cities in Asia were come unto him, uniting all his forces, he marched to the Lough of Sirbonis: where a great part of his army perished, being swallowed up for want of guides in those bogs there, which are called Barathra. From thence he marched to Pelusium, the first mouth of the River Nile: held by a Garrison of 5 thousand men, commanded by one Philophron. Here the Grecians encamped close to the city: the Persians lay 40 furlongs off. Here Ochus divided the Greeks into three brigades; every of which was to have two Commanders, the one a Persian, the other a Grecian. The first brigade was of the Bactrians, commanded by Lachetes a Theban, and Rosaces a Persian, Governour of Ionia and Lydia. The second was of the men of Argos, commanded by Nicofraus a Grecian, and Aristazanes a Persian. The third was by Mentor, who betrayed Sidon, and Bagoas an Eunuch of Persia. To every of which Grecian brigades thus commanded, there were added also sundry companies and troops, and sea Captains with their squadrons of ships; on the other side, Nectanebus had in his army 20 thousand auxiliary Grecians: and as many to his aide out of Lybia and out of his own country of Egypt, 60 thousand men, called Warriors, with an exceeding great multitude of river boats, fitted to fight in the river Nile, if need should be: when as therefore he had furnished every place with reasonably sufficient Garrisons, himself, with 30 thousand Egyptians, and 5 thousand Grecians, and one half of his Lybians, kept the passages which lay most open and easiest for invasion.

Things therefore thus ordered on both sides, Nicofraus who commanded the Argivians, having gotten for his guides certain Egyptians, whose children and wives were kept for hostages by the Persians, with his part of ships put over one of the ditches or cuts of the Nile, the most out of fight that might be; which the next Garrisons of the Egyptians perceiving, sent no less than 7 thousand men, commanded by Clinius, of the Isle of Coos, to cut them off. In that encounter, the Grecians of the Persian side, slew of the other, upward of 5 thousand men, with their Commander Clinius: which slaughter of his men coming to Nectanebus his ears, he with the army which he had about him retired presently to Memphis to make that sure: mean while Lacrates, whom he commanded the first brigade of the Grecians, halted to set upon Pelusium, and having drained away the water that ran under Pelusium, by a ditch that he cut, and raised a mount upon the very channel of the old River, there planted his batteries. The Grecians within, who had till then manfully maintained the place; hearing now that Nectanebus had left the field, and was retired to Memphis, fell a treating with their enemies enemies about a composition; and when Lacrates had told them, and bound it with an oath, that the town being surrendered, they with such things as they brought out with them should be all sent away into Greece, they gave up the Town unto him.

Mentor who commanded the third brigade, when he saw that all the cities were manned with two forts of people, Grecians and Egyptians, he called a brute to be cast abroad, that Artaxerxes his purpose and resolution was to deal most graciously and well with those, who willingly submitted to him; as for the rest, they must look to fare no better than Sidon had done. Whereupon the Grecians and Egyptians: every where strove who should be first and forwardest to give up their Towns and places to the Persians. And first Bubastus, then all the rest of the cities, upon such terms as they could get, came all in, and submitted to the Persian.

Mean while Nectanebus being at Memphis, and hearing how all the cities fell off, one after another to the Persian, despairing of better fortune, gathered together what treasure he could, and fled with it to Ethiopia, thus [Diod. year 3. Olymp. 107.] Others report, that having his head, and in a disguised habit, he got him to Pelusium, and from thence as a passenger, went to Philip King of Macedon, at Pella. [see the Exceptions, Barbaro-Latina, published by Scaliger, pag. 58, the Chronicle of Alexandria, al. Fasti Sicili, published by Radertius, p. 393. Cadenus in the Basile Editions, p. 124, and Glycas, p. 195. out of Plutarch-Calisthenes his fabulous history of the Gifts of Alexander.]

Artaxerxes Ochus, having thus possessed himself of all Egypt, dismantled all the principal cities in it, and spoiling their temples, got from thence an infinite mass of treasure: he took away moreover all their records and writings out of their most ancient temples, yet these the Priests bought again, and recovered by a great sum of money given to Bagoas the Eunuch for them, [Diod. ut supra.] Ochus also is said to have derided their ceremonies, and their god, Apis, [Severus Sulpicius in his sacred History, lib. 2.] And because the Egyptians, for his dull behaviour and spirit, called him an ass; he violently took their god Apis, and sacrificed him to an ass, [Elia, Varia, Histor. lib. 4. cap. 8.] and not that only, but he gave order to his Cooks to cut him in pieces, and dress him for dinner to be eaten, Suidas in Ochus.

After this, Ochus rewarding his Grecians by whom he had brought this great work to pass, with wealth and honour, every man according to his desert, he sent them all away to go every man for his own country, and leaving Pharendates for his victory and government of Egypt, he himself, being full of glory and spoils, after so great a conquest made, returned to Babylon with his army, [Diodor. year 3 Olympiade 107.] whither he carried also prisoners a great many of the Jews, sending most of them into Hircania, bordering upon the Caspian sea: For so Georgius Syncellus, out of Julius Africanus reports in this wise: Οχους δ' ἡγεμόνηται αὐτῷ, &c. (i. e.) Ochus the son of Artaxerxes, making a journey into Egypt, led away certain Jews captives: whereof he placed some in Hircania near the Caspian sea, and the rest in Babylon it self, where they continue unto this day, as many Greek writers report.

Hecataeus Abderia also, in his first book, de Judaicis, cited by Josephus, in his 1 book contra Apionem, talks of many a ten thousand of Jews, carried away to Babylon, but of their carrying from thence into Hircania, Paulus Orosius writeth in this wise, [l. 3. c. 7.] Ochus, saith he, who is also called Artaxerxes, after his great and long war in Egypt was ended, carried many of the Jews, and commanded them to inhabit in Hircania, near the Caspian sea; where they continue to this day, in a wonderful increase of their stock and lineage, and, as is thought, will one day break out from thence into some other quarter of the world. Which opinion yet, as it seemeth, had no other ground but that Apocryphal of Esdras lib. 4. cap. 13. 40. — 46. concerning the ten tribes carried away by Salmanasser, and that of the Jews, concerning certain Hebrews shut up I know not where, and of a river Sabbation. As for that which Petrus Venerabilis in his Special. Histor. lib. 30. cap. 89. reports, of those ten tribes Bellovacensis in his Special. Histor. lib. 30. cap. 89. reports, of those ten tribes, shut up afterward more close than before within the Caspian mountains, these things agree nothing at all with Josephus, whom he allegeth for his author; but rather with the writings, of that false or supposititious Corion, and Methodius, and even with those fictitious relations of the Mahometan Arcoran it self, concerning Alexander.

Ochus having rewarded Mentor of Rhodes, with 100 talents in money, and very rich furniture for a house, made him over and above, Præfect, of all the Asiatic shore, with full and absolute power to suppress all rebellions which should happen to arise in those parts; which great grace and favour he so well used, that whereas Artabazus and Memnon who had lately made war upon Ochus (of which fee before in the year of the world, 1648, 1651.) and being now driven out of Asia, were fled to Philip King of Macedon, and lived with him; he got both their pardons of the king, and sent for them both to come unto him, with all their families: for indeed Artabazus had by Mentor

		Mentor and Memnon's sister, eleven sons and ten daughters: with which for numerous a progeny, Mentor was exceeding much delighted, and raised the sons, every of them, as he grew up, to places of Government in the Army, [Diodorus year 4. Olympiade 107.]				as also Dionys. Halicarnas. in his Epistle to Ammaeus aforementioned. There is also extant in Laertius an Epigram of Aristotles, making upon Hermias his Slave at Delphos to this purpose.
		Mentor drew Hermias, Prince, or Tyrant, of Atarne, who was in rebellion against Oechus, and had many strong Cities and Castles under him, to a party, upon promise made him that he would procure him the Kings pardon, but having gotten him gotten him into his fingers, he laid hold on him, and having gotten his seal ring, dispatched away letters presently in his name, requiring the Captains and Garrisons every where of his dominion, to surrender and give up their several places, to the bearers thereof: which was forthwith done accordingly, [Id. ibid. and Polyanius Strateg. lib. 6.] And in like manner did he with all the other Rebels of the King: partly by force, and partly by tricks and policies, he brought them all into the Kings subjection against the King ever now and then, hired souldiers out of Greece, and ordering all matters committed to his charges, with great judgement, valour and fidelity to the King, [Diod. year 3. and 4. Olymp. 107. and Demosthenes in his Oration, contra Aristocratem.]				Here did the King of Persia slay Contrary to Joves law or reason, Not by force or bloody fray, But by a friends detected treason.
3556.		When Spartacus the King of Bosphorus Cimmericus was dead, his Brother Parylades succeeded him in the kingdom, and held it 38 years, [Diod. year 4. of 107. Olympiade.]	4366.	348.	3660.	Which I therefore thought fit to insert in this place, that no man might gather that Aristotles was any way consenting to his death out of those words of Tertullian, where he saith, Aristotle made his friend Hermias shamefully to leave his place.	4370.	344.
		In the 1. year of the 108 Olympiade, when Theophilus was L. Chancellor in Athens, Plato the Philosopher, founder of the old Academia, died; as Hermippus in Laertius, Dionysius Halicarnasensis, in his Epistle to Ammaeus concerning Demosthenes, and Athenicus, [lib. 5. c. 13.] report, of whom that saying of Numenius the Pythagorean goes, reported by Helychius the Milesian, (on Numenius) that what ever he said of God and the world, he stole it all out of the books of Moses. Whence came that famous saying of his, reported, not only by Helychius, and his follower Suidas, but, even long before them, by Clement Alexandrinus, [Stromat. 1.] ἡ γὰρ ἀποστολή, ὅτι, for what is Plato, but Moses put into good Greek? and that he translated many things out of Moyses his books into his own writings, Aristobolus the Jew, mentioned before in the year of the world 3479, saith, so that I shall not need for this purpose to vouch the authority of Justin Martyr, Clement of Alexandria, Ambrose, Theodoret, Johannes Philoponus, writing upon the Hexameron, and other Christians.			3664.	Idricus, Prince of Caria (whose wealth is so much celebrated by Isocrates in his Oration to Philip of Macedon) died: unto whom his, both wife and sister, Ada succeeded, and held that Principality 4 years, [Strabo, lib. 14. Diodor. year 1. Olymp.] For in Asia it was grown an usual thing after the time of Semiramis, for wives to succeed their husbands in their kingdom, [Aria in Exped. Alex. lib. 1. pag. 24.]	4374.	340.
		After the decease of Plato, Aristotles the latter up of the Sect of the Peripatetic Philosophers, travelled to Hermias the Eunuch and tyrant of Atarne, of whom I spake in the year going before, with whom he lived and conversed three years, as Laertius in the year of Apollo's his Chronicle, and Dionysius in his fore-cited Epistle to Ammaeus testifies; and Strabo [lib. 11.] tells us, that he lived at Atarne, which was under the dominion of Hermias, and of which mention is made, [Arist. 20. 13.] by reason of that affinity which he had contracted with him: for he married Pythiades the adoptive daughter of Hermias, and either his sister, (as we find in Ensch. de Preparat. Evangel. lib. 15.) though Aristotles the Peripatetic (as he said in Ensch. de Preparat. Evangel. lib. 15.) That for the love which he bare Hermias in his life time, he married her after his death; and whilst he remained in Asia, he conversed with a certain Jew, a man of great learning and temperance withal, which was come from out of the upper Asia to the sea side, and there Aristotles, with sundry others addicted that way, were his auditors, and heard him discoursing in the Greek tongue, as Clearchus of Solos a principal Scholar of Aristotles, cited by Josephus, [lib. 1. contra Apionem.] in his 1. book of Somno, (c. 4.) of sleep, reports. So that perhaps to this Jew it is that the Peripatetic lost of Philosophers owe so many good sayings of theirs, so consonant to the words of Moyses and the Prophets: as our Clement of Alexandria affirms they are, out of Aristobolus, aforesaid, and a great maintainer of that way, [lib. 5. Strom.]			3666.	Pexodarus the youngest son of Hecatomitus, turning his sister Ada out, held that Principality 5 years, [Diodor. year 4. Olymp. 109.] Leaving her but one only town to live upon, called Alinda.
3558.		Satyrus, Prince or Tyrant of Heraclea in Pontus, giving up all into the hands of Timotheus, eldest son to his Brother Clearchus, was shortly after taken with a most grievous and incurable disease, by a Cancer grown in his groin, and which never left eating inward still it had consumed him, after he had lived 65 years, whereof he spent 7 in the Government of Heraclea, [Joannem in Excerpt. c. 3.] and Timotheus forthwith took his younger brother Dionysius into the consorship of his Principality, and designed him withal for his successor in case he should dye, [lib. c. 4.]	4368.	346.		But Pexodarus sent for Oromobates a Persian Lord to make him his Consort in the Dynality of Principality of Caria; and gave him his daughter Ada to wife, [Aria. lib. 1. Strabo lib. 14.]
3559.		Memmon of Rhodes, a commander of the Persians aforementioned, under a colour of friendship, sent for Hermias the Eunuch, Tyrant of Atarne to come unto him; and when he came, seized on him, and sent him prisoner to the King: who presently took and hanged him. But the Philosophers whom he had sent for to be about him, as Aristotles and Xenocrates, a Chalcedonian in Bithynia borne, got away, and escaped out of the Persian dominions, [Strabo lib. 13.] But Aristotles when he had lived with him 3 years, went to Mytilene, what time Eubolus was L. Chancellor at Athens, this instant, year 4. of the Olymp. 108. as Laertius out of Apollodorus his Chronicles reports:	4369.	345.	3668.	Philippus King of Macedon besieged Perinthus a Town in Thraci, lying upon Propontis, with an army of 30 thousand men, thoroughly provided of all sorts of armes and engines of battery, and so incessantly playing upon the walls, that he gave them no time of rest or intermission. The King of Persia growing jealous of this mans daily growth in the World, gave order to his Commanders and Governours in Asia, that they should send to relieve Perinthus, all that possible they could, which accordingly they did, [Diodor. year 4. Olymp. 109.] which was the thing, that Alexander alleged to Darius, as one of the principal causes why he invaded Asia, in his Epistle to him, [Aria. lib. 1. pag. 41.]	4376.	338.
					Artaxerxes Oechus, having now reigned 33 years, fell sick; which Bagoas the Eunuch and chief man about him, as Chiliarch of the Kingdom, seeing, gave him poison, and rid him out of the way; using therein the help of his Physician, [Diodor. year 3. of the 104. Olympiade: and year 2. of the 111. Olympiade: Severus Sulpitius, Histor. Sacra lib. 2.] For being an Egyptian born, he hated Oechus, for killing their god Apis, that he not only revenged that scorn, (as Sulpitius saith) put upon his nation, by killing the King; but also when he was dead, cut his skull all in gobbets, and threw it to the cats to eat, and instead thereof, put I know not what else into the coffin to be buried for him, at the time of his funerals; and of his thigh-bones made beds and handles for swords, thereby representing the propensity of his rancour, whilst he lived, to blood and slaughter, [Elian. Varia. Histor. lib. 6. cap. 8.] And (as one that could do all in all in the kingdom,) when the father was dead, he let up his youngest son Arsen, and made him King, and withal, put to death all his brothers, that the young King having none left to help him, might be forced to cleave to the latter to, and rely the more upon him, [Diod. year 3. Olymp. 109. and year 2. Olymp. 111.]
					3667.	Timotheus the Tyrant of Heraclea in Pontus, died 15 years after his father Clearchus, [Diod. year 3. Olymp. 110.] This man, for his great goodness sake, was not called any more a Tyrant, but Euergetes and Soter : (i.e.) a gracious Lord and Saviour. His body was honourably enterea by his brother and successor Dionysius: with iusts, and tilings, and wrestlings, and enterludes of all sorts: some of which were performed then presently, as the time would afford; others afterward, but with greater pomp and magnificence than the former, [Joannem in Excerpt. cap. 4.]	4377.	337.
					3668.	At a general assembly of all Greece at Corinth, Philip King of Macedon, was made General of all the Grecian Forces, with absolute power over them, to make war against the king of Persia: whereupon he presently made infinite preparations for it; and having selected a certain number of souldiers to be levied upon every city, returned into Macedon, [Diodor. year 4. Olymp. 110.]	4378.	336.
						The next Spring, Philip sent three of his Captains into Asia, Parmenio, Amyntas and Attalus, with a part of his army, to infect the kings countries there, and to let at liberty the cities of the Greeks, [Justin. lib. 9. cap. 5. Diod. year 1. Olymp. 111.]

Bagos, whose hand had been so much used that way, went now about to make away Darius also, by a poisoned potion; but the matter being discovered to him, he sent fairly for him, and when he came, entreated him to drink it off; which when he refused, he caused it to be poured down his throat, [Diodorus year 2, Olympiade 112.] but told the people that he had slain him in defence of himself, [2. Philip, king of Macedonia, whilst he was celebrating the marriage of his daughter Cleopatra, with Alexander the king of Epeirus, at a place called Egwas, was murdered by Paulanias, the Ion of Cerales, of Orestis, a Town and County in Macedonia, [Diodor. year 11. Olympiad 111. Justin lib. 9. cap. 6. Joseph. lib. 11. cap. 8.] But Alexander in his Epistle to Darius, says, that his father was murdered by Artabazus, son of work, and hired by Darius thereto, with an infinite sum of money, as in 2. Curt. lib. 4. cap. 1. and in Arrian. lib. 2. cap. 41.

A little before Philip was thus slain, Neoptolemus a Tragedian is reported by Diod. [lib. 6.] to have sung an ominous song before him; which very long was afterward again sung before Caligula the Emperor, the very day wherein he was murdered, as Suetonius in his life reporteth. Musæus, faith he, the Stage-player, sung and acted this very long, which heretofore Neoptolemus the Tragedian, did in a play wherein Philip the king of Macedon was killed: which part of the Laus History, Iolephus as it cometh next, the well understanding, [lib. 19. Antiq. c. 1.] after he had spoken of this Musæus, and the song which he sung, laying ἄλλοις ὁμοίως ὁμοίως κινῶναι ἐν αὐτῇ τῇ ἰστορίᾳ, ὡς ὁ ὁμοίως αὐτῇ μῦθος, which Rufinus renders thus in Latin, and I to this effect in English: The Stage-player danced the fable of Cynarus, wherein both Cynarus himself and his daughter Murtha were both slain: draws in as if the killing of them both had fallen out, upon the same day, thus, ὁμοίως τῇ δ. Sec. It goes for current, faith he, that the murder of Caligula was acted upon the self same day, whereon, Philip, the son of Amyntas king of Macedon, was slain, by one of his friends, Pausanias by name, as he was going into the Theatre. And to some men place both these murders upon the 24 day of our January. But the time of *Philip*s death, will best be known, by the time of Alexander his succeeding him in his kingdom.

kingdom. After the death of Philip, when Pythodemus, as Ariarius or Pythodoros, [Diod. Sic. year 1. Olympiad 115.] calls him, was L. Chancellor in Athens, Alexander being then 20 years of age succeeded him, as Plutarch, and our of Trogius, Justin, write. And although Ariarius, in the beginning of his History of Alexander, saith, that he was about 20 years old when, after his fathers death, he took his journey into Peloponnese, which may seem in some sort to abate of the precise number of 20 of his age, yet, to speak nothing of that interval of time, which might pass between his fathers death, and and his journey thither) the exact account of his then age, appears from the time of his death: mentioned in the end of the late history, where it is said that he lived 32 years, 8 months, and that of them he reigned 12 years and thole 8 months, for subtracting 12 years and 8 months out of the total above mentioned, there remain 20 entire years; without addition or subtraction either of year or month: & thence it appears that Philip died in the end of the Macedonic month Dæis, by his own Ephemerides (which I shall in due time publish to the view of the world) I therefore gather, and from thence conclude, that Alexander began his reign, about the 8 month before that 1. of the month Diu, and in consequence thereof, that Philip was murdered about the 24 of Septemb, in which month of ours the month Diu began, as I have made appear in my discourse of the solar year of the Macedonians and Asiaticks, rather than the 24 of December.

3669. The alexander coming to Peloponnc, and treading in his fathers steps, summoned all the cities of Greece to Corinth, & was by the general suffrage of all the Grecians there, laying the Lacedemonians only, made General and Captain in his fathers stead, to go against the Persians, [Justin lib. 11. cap. 2. Diodorus lib. 17. Arrianus lib. 1. pag. 1.]

From thence returning into Macedon, in the very first of the next spring, he made an inroad through Thrace, upon the Illyrians, and the Thriballi, [Aria, lib. 1.] where in a pitch field upon the bank of the Danow, he overthrew Syrmus, the King of the Triballi, [Plut. in Alex.] mean while, tidings came to him, that the Athenians, Lacedæmonians and Thebans, were all fallen over to the King of Persia's side : and that the Author thereof was Demosthenes the Orator, having been bribed thereto, by a vast summe of money from the Persians, and that he, in an Oration made, had assured them that Alexander was quite broken and overthrowen by the King of the Triballi, [Justin, lib. 11. cap. 2. with Eschines in his Oration cont. Ctesiphontem.] And the Athenians further, by certain Legates of theirs, and Demosthenes his Epistle by them sent unto him, solicited Artalus, one of the 3 Captains, sent by Philip into Asia, to revolt from Alexander, as the Greeks had done, and made a new Decree, to vacate that former order of theirs, whereby he was made General of Greece, [Diod. year 3. Olym. 111. with Demosth. his Oracion for Ctesiphon.]

Memnon the Rhodian Commander, being sent into Phrygia with 5 thousand soldiers, passing the hill Ida, set suddenly upon the city of Cyzicum: but missing of his purpose, waited their terrific all over; and returned laden with a vast spoil from thence. [Diod. ib.]

When Pexodarus was dead, his son in law, Orontobates, by the authority of the Persian King, succeeded in the Principality of Caria, [Strabo, lib. 14. Arrian, lib. 1. pag. 24.]

pag. 24.) Alexander having mastered those barbarous people, turned himself towards Greece, which was then all in a combustion, and in his way, made the Theffalians his friends, and passed the straits of Thermopylae, and won them of Ambracia to him by his kindness; then passing with his whole army into Boeotia, and camping before Cadmea, which was held by a Garrison of Macedons, the Athenians sent their Legates to ask his pardon, and he gave it them; but when the Thebans refused it, being offered to them, he fell roundly to work, and besieged their City, very strongly, [Diod. year 2. Olymp. 3. 1. 1. Plut. in Alexan.]

He sent also Hecataeus, with an army into Asia, to apprehend Aetolus; but Aetolus, having recollected himself, sent the letter which he had received from Demetrius, to Alexander, with a very exact and serious excuse and justification of himself: Nevertheless Hecataeus following his commission, and getting him into his hand, sent him packing into another world; and to the Macedonian army which was in Asia, grew quieter, and free from mutiny any further. (Diod. ib.)

Parmenio, who stood ever truly affected to Alexander, took Grinnum by force, and sold away all the townsmen thereof for slaves: from thence he went and besieged Pitane, but Memnon approaching, so frightened the Macedons, that they raised their siege.

Callas, with an army composed of Macedons, and other hired companies, fought with the Persians in the country of Troas, though far inferior to them in number, and was there beaten, and fain to retire to Rheum, [Ibid.]

Alexan-

The year of the World.	202	The sixth Age of the World.	The Julian Period.	The year before Christ.	The year of the World.	The Persian Empire.	203	The Julian Period.	The year before Christ.
		Alexander at a common Council of Greece, being chosen General a second time, against the Persians, went to visit Diogenes the Philosopher there, [Plutarch in Alexan.]			4380, 334.	stroyed Lampacus with the inhabitants thereof; for that they had already revolted, or were thwedy suspected of a purpose to revolt to the Persians: And when he law Anaximenes the Historian, a man very well known to him and to his father before him, coming to him, and supposing what his errand was; he sware first and said, what ever he desired of him, that he would not do : Then quoth Anaximenes, Sir, I beseech you to destroy Lampacus. And Alexander being lo caught in his own net by the wit of the man, though much against his will, yet spared the place, and went his way, [Valer. Max. lib. 7. cap. 3. Pausan. in his Eliaca, lib. 2. Suidas, in the words, Anaximenes.]
b.		Then returned he into Macedon, [Arria, lib. 1. pag. 111.] where in a town called Dios, as he was wholly taken up with thoughts of subduing Asia: in his sleep the likeness or resemblance of the High Priest of Hierusalem appeared to him, who bad him be courageous and bold, and speedily with his army to put over into Asia, and that he would be his conductor in the conquest of the Persian Empire; as he himself reports in [Iosephus, lib. 11. of his Antiquit. cap. ult.]				Alexander, having with much difficulty and danger passed the River Granion in Phrygia, fought a pitched field with the Persians in the plain of Adrastia, Justinus and Orosius say, that there were at that time in the Persian army, 60000 Foot, and 20000 Horse: Arrianus somewhat probably adds, that there were over and above of hired souldiers, little lesse than 20000 Foot: But Diodor. is more cautious than so, and sayes, that his Horse was above 10, and his Foot under 100 thousand men: of these there fell in that battel 20000 Foot, and no lesse than 2000 Horse, and above Diodor. reports, that they lost 10000 Foot, and no lesse than 2000 Horse, and above 20000 taken prisoners. Arrianus his account is, that there were slain of the Persian Horse in the chafe, 1000, but that their foreigne and hired souldiers were almost all cut off; and 2000 taken prisoners. Not to speak of Orosius, who out of all reason sayes, that there were upon the point of 400000 slain, [lib. 4. cap. 1.]
c.		In the very beginning of the Spring, therefore Alexander, setting forth from his own home, after 20 dayes march came to Seltus: and from thence put over with his army into Asia, [Arria, lib. 1.] (Eumenes being then L. Chancellor at Athens) eleven years before he died: as Clement of Alexandria observes out of the most ancient Chronologies, [lib. 1. Strom.] to wit, the third month before Ctesicles, came to be Lord Chancellor or Prætor there: in which time, it is, that Diodor. Sic. placeth his passage into Asia; whom Zosimus following as it seemeth without scruple, [lib. 1. Histor.] saith, that he passed not into Asia, till the third year of his reign; when as indeed it was in the second: to wit, [year 2, running Olymp. 111.]				In this fight Alexander who wore that armor which he had taken out of the Temple of Palas at Ilium, had his head-piece cut quite in pieces to his very hair: and of his men were missing, as Pararch out of Aristobulus, who was in it reports, 25 Horse, and 9 Foot. But Justin and Orosius deliver, that besides those 9 Foot, there were slain 120 Horse. But according to Arrianus, there fell of Alexanders own Troup, at the first encounter about 25, all Macedon; whose Statues were all cast in brasse by Lyfippus, and of the others, 60 Horse, and of the Foot, about some 30, all which Alexander the day following caused to be entered in their arme, with all Funeral rights and obsequies. This great and memorable victory, and which opened him the way to the Empire of all Asia, was gotten in the month Desius with the Macedonians, upon the 6 of Thargelion with the Athenians; that is, upon the 20 of our May, [year 2, Olymp. 111. yet running]; as we have already delivered in our discourse of the Macedonian and Asiatic Solar years, [cap. 1. pag. 4. s. 11.]
		Leaving therefore Antipater, behind him, to look to matters in Europe, with 12 thousand Foot, 1500 Horse. Alexander himself, with 60 sail of ship, put over to Troas, [Diodor. ut. sup.] but gave order to Parmenion, to transport the greatest part of his Foot and Horse from Seltus to Abidus: which accordingly he did, with the help of 160 men of War, and a multitude of other ships of burden, [Arria, lib. 1.]				Alexander, having a little refreshed his army, marcht forward thorough Lydia, and came to Sardes; which was voluntarily surrendered to him, by Mithrenes, or Mithrenes, the Governour, with all the provisions and treasures therein, [Diodor. Arria.]
		Concerning the just number of men which he carried with him into Asia, even they who were present at it, do not well agree among themselves. In [Polybius lib. 12, cap. 66, in fi.] Calisthenes is reported to affirm, that he had 4500 Horse, and 30000 Foot. In Plutarch, in that discourse of his of Alexanders fortune, Aristobulus is alleged to say, that of Foot he had 30 thousand, of Horse 4 thousand. Ptolemei the son of Lagos, King afterward of Egypt, agrees to the 30 thousand Foot, but sayes there were 5 thousand Horse: But Anaximenes of Lampacus, raises the numbers of both; and sayes, there were 40 thousand Foot, and 5 thousand Horse. In the number of 4 thousand Horse, Livie lib. 9. agreeth with Aristobulus: and Diodorus, [lib. 17.] Justin [lib. 11, cap. 6.] and Orosius, [lib. 3, cap. 16.] all with Calisthenes for the number, 4 thousand 5 hundred Horse, though Arria, lib. 1. saith, that he had above 5 thousand; and even in Diodorus himself, the particulars call up, amount to 5000 one hundred Horse: but in the number of 30000 Foot, he concurs to a hair with Calisthenes, Aristobulus, and Ptolemei. Livie sayes there were more than 30, Arrianus, that there were not much more than 30000 Foot. To these Justinus and Orosius adde 2000 more: But that number of 40000 Foot which Calisthenes and Anaximenes speak of, Julius Frontinus assigneth to his whole army, thus. Alexander of Macedon, with 40 thousand men, all old souldiers, trained up under his father Philip, set upon the whole World; and slew an infinite number of his enemies, [Frontin. Stratag. lib. 4. cap. 2.]				Then going to Ephesus, he there abolished the Oligarchie which he found there, and instituted a Democratic among them: and assigned all the tributes which were formerly paid to Darius, unto Diana. The Ephesians cryed out for justice against those who had robbed the Temple of Diana, and demolished the Statue of Philip, which was there set up: and drew Syrphaces, and Pelagon his son, and the children of Syrphaces his brother, and stoned them to death, [Arria, lib. 1.] Moreover they enlarged and beaused the Temple it self which was burnt down by Erostratus upon the night in which Alexander was born: appointing Democrates the Architect to oversee the work; whom Alexander afterward appointed to order the building of Alexandria in Egypt; as Julius Solinus, [cap. 40.] writeth: whereof Artemidorus speaketh in [Strabo lib. 14.] saying that Alexander promised to make the Ephesians allowance for the cost they had already been at about it, and to adde more thereto if they would suffer himself to be repared the author and builder of the work: but they refused.
		For pay of his army, Aristobulus saith he took with him, but 70 talents of money: Duris saith, but 30 dayes provision: one Sicritus addeeth, that he went in debt 200 talents to pay his army, [Plutarch in his life, and in his book of the fortune of Alexander.]				Whiles Alexander stayed at Ephesus, Ambassadors came to him from Magnesia and Tralles, and surrendered their cities to him. And he sent Parmenion, with 2500 Foot of foreigners, and as many of his Macedons, and 200 Horse of his auxiliaries, to receive them. He sent also Alcimus the son of Agathocles, to the cities of Eolia and Ionia, which were hitherto held by the Persians, with no lesse numbers, than he had done with Parmenion; he every where abolished Oligarchical, and set up Democratical Governments in their cities: and gave leave to every of them to live after their own laws, and took off the tributes, which the Persian had imposed on them, [Arria, lib. 1.]
		So (soon as he touched upon the Continent, Alexander the first of all others, threw a Spear on shoar, thereby to take possession, as it were, of all Asia; and leapt on shoar, capering and tripping, all armed as he was: and offering sacrifice, he besought the gods, that those lands might willingly receive him for their King: and then went and sacrificed to the ghost of Achilles, from whom he was descended by the mothers side; and of Ajax, and other Worthies of the Greeks who died at the war of Troy, [Diodor. Iustin. Arrianus]; commending the great good fortune of Achilles in two respects. First for having to true a friend about him as Patroclus; and such a Trumpet of his praise, as Homer was, [Plut. in Alex. sic. pro. Archia Poeta. & Arria, lib. 1.]				Himself remaining at Ephesus, sacrificed to Diana, and with his whole army all in battel array went in procession to her; and the day after, with the rest of his Foot, and his Archers and Agrians, and Horse of Thrace, and aides of his confederates, and his own Troup, with three other, he went to Miletus, [Id. ibida.] for thither the Persians, which escaped out of the fight at Granicus, were fled with their Generall Memnon. [Diodor.] But three dayes before their coming thither, Alexander
		When he came into Ilium, he sacrificed to Pallas of Troy; and hanging up his own armes in her Temple, took from thence in lieu of them, some other armes out of the chancel there, which had remained from the time of the Trojan war, [Diodor. Arria.] and when among other reliques they shewed him Alexanders or Paris his Lure, or Harp, he said, he would have thanked them, if they could have shewed him that of Achilles his; whereunto he had sung the praises of famous men, [Plut. in Alex. Et. s. Variat. Hist. lib. 9, cap. 38.]
		From Ilium he went to Atripe, where his whole army, having passed the sea, was encamped. And the next day, passing by, first Percoia, then Lampacus, he encamped at a River called, Proflattum, [Arria, lib. 1.] He had once a purpose utterly to have destroyed

Alexander had sent Nicanor, with 160 ships to possess himself of Lada, an Island lying over against Miletus, and had put into it 4 thousand men, Thracians, and other nations, so that the Persian fleet consisting of 400 sail, coming thither afterward, was fain to get them going to the mount of Micalé, [Arrianus.]

Alexander falling to work, and besieging Miletus, both by sea and land, and having battered their walls; in the end, they gave up the place and themselves, in all suppliant wife unto him. Three hundred Mercenary Greeks, which had fled from thence into a little Island thereby; Alexander took and lifted them among his own companies. He gave the Milesians life and liberty: as for the Barbarians there found, he either slew, or sold them all for slaves, [Diodorus year 3. Olympiade 112. Arria. lib. 1.]

Alexander dismissed his fleet of 160 ships (which yet was in all consisting of 182 bottoms, as Justin. lib. 11. cap. 6. says) keeping only one score of the Athenian vessels, to carry his engines of batterie in, from place to place, as occa on required, [Id. ibid.]

Memnon of Rhodes, sending his wife and children to Darius, as pledges of his fidelity, was made General of all his army, [Diod. lib.]

Alexander marched away with his army into Caria, and where ever he went, he proclaimed liberty to all cities of the Greeks; every of them to live after their own laws, and tribute free: giving it out every where, that he undertook not this war, but for the liberty of the Greeks, against the Persians, [Id. ibid.]

Whiles he was upon his way, Ada met him; Pexodarus his brother had put from the Principality of Caria; and gave up into his hands, her city Abinda, the strongest place in all Caria; desiring to be restored to her Grand-fathers kingdom: promising further, to do him service, in taking in the rest of the forts and cities of that country, which, the said, were in the power of her near friends, and adopted the King for her which, in requital whereof, he gave her the keeping of her town Abinda, and proclaimed her Queen of Caria; bad her claim it as her own; and refused not to be called her son: Whereupon all the cities of Caria sent their Legates to him, presenting him with Crowns of gold, and offered him their service, in whatever he should command them, [Id. ibid. Strabo, lib. 14. Arria. lib. 1. Plut. in Alexander.]

Orontobates a Persian, held Halicarnassus the metropolis of Caria, ever since Pexodarus his father in law his dayes, with whom Memnon of Rhodes the Persian General, had joyned himself with all his forces. Alexander encamping before the walls thereof, began to assault and batter it in a furious and fearful manner: and Ephialtes an Athenian, behaved himself, above all other, bravely in the defence thereof. But when he and others were slain upon the breachers, then Memnon, and certain other Persian Lords and Captains, putting a strong garrison of their stoutest souldiers into the Castle, got shipping and passed over with the rest of the people, and all their chief moveables, into the Isle of Coos, near unto Rhodes. And when they were gone, Alexander casting a trench, and building a strong wall upon it round about the Castle, raised the city itself to the very ground; and leaving Garrisons there, and in other parts of Caria, three thousand souldiers of foreign nations, and two hundred horse, all under the command of Ptolemies, left the command of that whole province or country of Caria, to his adoptive mother Ada, [Diod. year 3. Olympiade 112. Arria. lib. 1.]

Alexander gave his Macedons, which had married wives a little before they lifted themselves for this journey, leave to go and spend their winter quarter with them, where they would out of Caria, appointing Ptolemies the son of Seleucus, one of the squires of his body, to be their Commander, and joyning with him Cæus the son of Polemocrates, and Meleager the son of Neopolemus, because they themselves also, were in the order of the new married men, and gave them in charge; that when they returned, they should not fail to bring again their new married fellows unto him: and withall, to raise and bring with them, as many horse and foot as possibly they could, out of the country, where they wintered. [Arria. lib. and Q. Curtius in the beginning of his 3 book.]

Alexander sent Parmenion to Sardes, making him Commander over all the horse of his confederates, and bad take with him all the Thessalian horse, and auxiliaries, and all carts and carriages that he could make, and go before him as far as Sardes, whiles himself went into Lycia and Pamphylia; that having taken in all the sea towns, the enemies Navy might prove uselesse to them. And upon his way, he took in Hyparna, a very strong Town, upon his first approach, giving the Metcenary souldiers, which were there in garrison, quarter, and leave to depart with safety: from thence marching into Lycia, he there procured those of the city Telmessus to submit upon conditions: then passing the river Xanthus, both Pinara, and the city Xanthus, and Patara, rendered themselves unto him; and so did 30 other lesser Towns, [Arria. lib.]

b.

This done, in the midit of winter he went to Mylias, in Phrygia the greater; there he made a league, with the Ambassador, which came to him from Phaelis, and the lower Lycia, giving up all their cities into his hands: and shortly after, he in person went to Phaelis; and there raised a certain strong fort, which the Pisidians had built, to annoy those of Phaelis with, [Id. ibid.]

Whiles he was in the parts about Phaelis, he received advertisement, that Alexander Acropus, whom he had made Commander of the Thessalian horse, intended his destruction, having entrusted him with that charge: notwithstanding he had been suspected, together with his two brothers Heromenes and Artobasus, to have had a hand in his fathers death. For Darius having received letters from this Alexander by Amyntas, who fled over to him, sent Asines a Persian to the sea side, under colour of a messenger to Atyfies, governour of Phrygia: but indeed, to assure this Alexander, that if he killed Alexander, the kingdom of Macedon should be his, and he would give him a thousand talents of money besides. But Asines being lighted on by Parmenion, and put to the rack, confessed all, and thereupon, was sent away with a sure guard to Alexander. The king looking well into the business, sent Amphoterus to Parmenion, with private instructions to him, to seize upon Acropus, and to imprison him, [Id. ibid.] To this it was, that Alexander had respect, when in his letter to Darius, recited by Q. Curtius, [lib. 4. cap. 1.] he thus saith: When having arms of your own, you yet go to cheapen your enemies heads; as you of late, being king of so great an army, would hire a man to take away my life, with a thousand talents; [see Justin lib. 11. cap. 7.]

Alexander going from Phaelis, led his army along by the sea side to Perga, and from thence came to Aspendus, and besieged it, being seated upon a high and cragged mountain; and had it surrendered to him: then going into Piiidia, and having tried to take in the city Telmessus; but missing of his purpose, and making a league with the Selgians, who were enemies to the Teimissians, he took Salagassa by force, having slain about 500 of the Pisidians, and lost a Captain of his own, called Cleander, with about 30 of his men, from thence he went to take in other cities of Piiidia, and some of their strong places, he took in by force, others upon conditions. After this he came into Phrygia, to the Marsh-lands of Alcamia; and at his fifth remove, he arrived at Celene, [Arria. lib. 1.]

The Castle of Celene, which a Persian Commander held with a garrison of a thousand Carians, and one hundred hired Grecians, after 60 dayes truce, (within which he expected relief from Darius) was given up into his hands, [Id. ibid. and Curtius, lib. 3. cap. 1.]

Alexander left a garrison of 1500 in Celene, and having staid there 10 dayes, he made Antigonus the son of Philippos, governour of Phrygia, and made Balacrus the son of Amyntas, Commander of the auxiliaries in his stead: he himself marched to Gordium, writing to Parmenion, that he should not fail to meet him there, [Arrianus, ibid.]

Parmenion with his army, and the Macedons which had leave to go kisse their new wives, came to Gordium accordingly, and with the army newly raised, which Ptolemus, and Cæus and Meleager commanded. That army consisted of one thousand Macedons foot, and 300 horse, of 200 Thessalian horse, and 150 horse of Elis led by Alcias of the same country, [Id. ibid.]

Memnon, whom Darius had made Admirall of his fleet, and chief Commander of all the sea-coast, purposing to carry the war out of Asia into Macedon and Greece, and having rigged'd up, and manned a navy of 300 sail, took the Isle of Chios by intelligence, and the rest of the cities and places in Lesbos, all save Mytilene, [Diod. year 4. Olymp. 111. with Arria. lib. 2. in prim.]

The Elders of Jerusalem, being offended that Manasses Jaddus, the high Priest his brother, had, contrary to their law, married a wife of a strange nation, required at last that either he should put away his wife, or not come any more at the altar. And when as hercupon Jaddus was forced to forbid him the altar, he going to Sanaballer his father in law, told him, that he loved his daughter very well, but was loth to lose his priesthood for her sake, which was an honour belonging to him by his birth-right, and was very highly esteemed by his country men the Jews. And Sanaballer answered him, that he would undertake, in case he would keep his wife, and not part with her, not only to maintain him in his priesthood; but also to make him a high priest, and Prince of all his own province, and build him a Temple on the hill hanging over Samaria, as good as that at Jerusalem, and that he would do all this by the authority of Darius the King: Manasse hartned up with these promises, continued with his father in law, hoping to get the priesthood it self, by the gift and power of Darius. Hereupon all the priests, and other Israelites, who had married strange wives refused to him: Sanaballer furnishing them with money, and lands to till, and setting forward the ambition of his son in law, all that possibly he could, [Josephus lib. 11. Antiq. cap. ult.]

Alexander

The year of the World.	206	The sixth Age of the World.	The Julian period.	The year before Christ.
		Alexander undid the Gordian knot, either by pulling out the pegg or pin in the beame, as Ariarius hath it, or by cutting it in pieces with his sword, as others deliver, [Plutarch in Alexander. Arrianus, lib. 2. Curtius, lib. 3. Justin, lib. 11. cap. 7.]
		Alexander, departing from Gordium in Phrigia, went to Ancyra, a city in Galatia; Thither resorted to him, Embassadors from Paphlagonia, and making a league with him, delivered up their country into his hands; and he appointed them one Calas, a Lord of Phrigia to be their Governour: and then having received that new supply out of Macedonia, he marched into Cappadocia: and subdued all the country on this side the river Halys, and some part of the other side likewise [Arria, lib. 1. with Curtius lib. 3. c. 3.]
		Memnon dying at the siege of Mitylene, Autophradates, and Pharnabazus the son of Artabazus, (unto whom Memnon in his death bed, had committed that charge, till Darius should otherwise dispose thereof,) took the charge upon them, upon certain agreements made between them; (elves: so then Autophradates, continued with the body of the Navy, and Pharnabazus with some certain ships, sailed into Lycia, carrying with him some mercenary souldiers) [Arria, l. 2.]
		Darius, after the death of Memnon, sent out tickers for the levying of souldiers, commanding them from all parts, to resort to him at Babylon, [Diod. year 4. Olymp. 111.] and having set up his standard there, he pitched his camp, and mustered his army, casting up a huge trench round about it, capable of ten hundred thousand armed men: & then, Xerxes like, he went to count the number of them: There were found then upon the account, 100 thousand Persians, of which 30 thousand were horse; of the Medians there were 10 thousand horse, and 50 thousand foot; of the Bactrians, (which were a people bordering upon Hircania, as Stephanus tells us) there were 2 thousand horse, and 10000 foot, from Armenia there came 40000 foot, and 7000 horse; Hircania sent 6000 to serve on horseback, the Derives (which he with 8 thousand foot, and 2 hundred horse; with these there were others, of petty, ignoble Nations, which might make up 20 thousand foot, and twice as many horse: unto all which were added 30 thousand Greeks, which served him for pay: so both Curtius summe up this army, [lib. 3. c. 4.] which comes but to 311200 men. But Diodorus says they were 400 thousand foot, and 100 thousand horse: which number, the new editions of Justin, corrected out of the manuscripts also retain: though the former old editions, together with Orosius, who follows him in every point, have only 300 thousand foot, and 100 thousand horse, and both [Arria, l. 2. and Plutarch in Alexander.] make this army of his, in a grosse summe, to have amounted to 600000 men.
		Charidemus an Athenian, a man well skilled in military matters, and whom Alexander had thrust out of Athens, went unto Darius, and advised him to withdraw himself, and to leave this army and war to the management of some General, who had given good proof of his ability that way, in former services: telling him further that an army of one hundred thousand men, whereof, one third to be Grecians were enough for this battle, by which (age and good counsel of his, he so far incensed the Lords with envy, and the King with choler, that he was presently had away and put to death for it, [Diod. ut sup. Curtius, l. 3. c. 5.]
		Darius sent Thymondas, or Thymodes, Mentors son, a forward young man, to Pharnabazus, to receive from him all the auxiliaries or hired souldiers, which Memnon had under his command, and to bring them to him, for he would use them: and put Pharnabazus himself in Memmons place, [Curtius, lib. 3. cap. 6. Arrianus, lib. 2. in prin.]
		Alexander committing the charge of Cappadocia, to Abistenes, as Curtius calls him, or, to Sabidas, as Arrianus, marched with his whole army to the gates or streights, which open into Cilicia: and being come to a place, called Cyrus his Camp, (whether from the old Cyrus, as Curtius, or from the younger, as Arrianus thinketh) distant from those gates fifty furlongs, when he there found that they were taken up, and possessed with a strong garrison of the enemy, he left Parmenion there, with his companies of foot, which consisted all of Corseslers, and he himself in the first watch of the night, taking with him his targeteers and archers, and his band of Agrians, went to set upon that Garrison which kept those streights, at unawares, which he did: and the Garrison, at the very bruite of his coming, threw away every man his armes, left the place, and fled, and Arrianus the Governour of Cilicia, waisting all the country with fire and sword, that he might thereby disappoint the enemy of provisions, gat him away from Tarsus, to the Kings, [Arrianus, l. 2. Curtius, lib. 3. c. 8.]
		When Alexander, with great speed, was come to Tarsus taking pleasure in the river Cydnus, which ran thorough the city, all hot as he was, he threw off his armor, and leapt into the cold water: thereupon he grew instantly so benumb'd in all the nerves of his his body, that he lost the use of his tongue; and so far was he from hope of recovery in time, that there was nothing but present death expected in him, [Justin, lib. 11. cap. 8.] Curtius adds that it was in the Summer season, and that the heat thereof was encreased by the intensivenesse of the Sun in the climate of Cilicia, [lib. 3. cap. 10.] and Aristobolus saith, that he fell into his disease, by over-labouring himself: reported by [Arria, lib. 2.] But one Philip a Physitian, gave him a portion, which he took, and it cured him out of hand; though Parmenion had forewarned him, that this Philip was set on work to poison him, [Justin, Curtius, Arria, Plot, and Valer. Max, lib. 3. cap. 8.]

	Ocotobates the Persian, which held out the Castle at Halicarnassus, and Myndus, and Cautus, and Thera, and Callipolis, against Alexander, was overthrown in a fight by Ptolomei and Afander; wherein he lost about 700 Foot, and 50 Horse upon the place; and had no lesse than a thousand of his men taken: and thereupon the Myndians and Caunians, and most of the place: thereabouts gave up to Alexander, [Arria, lib. 2. Curtius lib. 3. cap. 11.]
	Darius making a bridge over the Euphrates, passed it with his army in five dayes, [Curt. lib. 3.]
	Alexander sent Parmenion to possesse himself of another strait or passage, like that former of Cilicia; and which divides Cilicia from Assyria, (or Syria) and he following after him from Tarsus, came the first day to Anchialos, [Arria, lib. 2.] Thence he marched to Soli: put a Garrison of his own into the Fort there, and levied 200000 talents of silver upon the Inhabitants; for that they had shewed themselves more incalculable, and well willing to Darius than to him, [Id. ibid. Curt. lib. 3. cap. 11.] From thence he went with 3000 Macedons, all his archers, and Agrians, and set upon the hill country of Cilicia: and within seven dayes (space, what by fair means, what by foul, he took them all entire, ly in, and returned to Soli: where when he had sacrificed to Esculapin, and with his whole army had gone in procession with burning tapers in their hands, and made pastimes of wrestlings, and mulick, and other games, he gave the city leave to enjoy a Democracy, [Arria, ibid.]
	The Grecians souldiers which Thymodes received by appointment from Pharnabazus, being the chief, and almost the onely hope, that Darius had, being come unto him, were very earnest with him to retire, and keep himself in the champaign country of Melopotamia: or at least, that he would break this vast and numberlesse army of his into parts, and would not hazard all upon the chance of one battle: But Darius liked not their advice; but as if he could never make haste enough, the Winter (beginning with Autumn) now drawing on, he sent away all his monies, jewels, and precious stuffs with a reasonable guard to Damascus in Syria: under the command of Coephenes, the son of Artabazus, as Arrianus says, [lib. 2.] and he with the rest of his army marched on to Cilicia. His wife, and mother, and daughter, and little son, according to the fashion of Persia, following after the Camp, [Curt. lib. 3. cap. 13.] leaving his baggage and such people as were unserviceable for the war, at Damascus, [Diod. year 4. Olymp. 111.]
	Sanaballet, hearing of Darius his coming into those parts, told Manasses, that he would quickly perform what he had promised him of the High Priesthood, so soon as Darius returned with victory over his enemies, whereof those inhabitants of Asia made no doubt at all, [Josephus Antiq. lib. 11. cap. ult.]
3672.	Alexander, willing Philotas to bring the Horse thorough the Asian plains in Lycia to the River Pyramus, came with the Foot, and the Kings Troup to Magarius, and sacrificed to Minerva of that place, called, Minerva Magnifica, [Arria, lib. 2.]
	Then making a bridge over the Pyramus, he came to the city Mallos in Cilicia, [Curt. lib. 3. cap. 11.] where he offered to the ghost of Amphilocheus the founder of that place, as to a demy god; and when he found the inhabitants there all in sedition and distracted among themselves, he made them all friends, and released the tribute, which they had formerly payed to Darius, [Id. ibid.]
	Whiles he yet remained at Mallos, news was brought him, that Darius with all his army, were encamped at a place called Sochos, two dayes journey distant from those streights, which I even now spake of, that parted Cilicia from Assyria, (or Syria) [Id. ib.]
	From Mallos he came to Castabala an other town in Cilicia likewise. There Parmenion met him, whom he had sent to discover the passage thorough a Forest which he was to passe to come to the town of Illos: now Parmenion had withal seized on the passage or streight in that Forest: and leaving a small company to keep it, went forward and took the very town of Illos also, being abandoned by the inhabitants upon his approach. And going yet further, he turned out all those which were let to guard the inner parts of those mountains, and put Garrisons every where of his own in them; and having cleared all those parts, returned to Alexander, and made him a relation of what he daughters of Oechus, left King before Darius, and his Relict, and the daughter of Ochaeris, Darius his brother; and the wife of Artabanus, a principal man at Court, and his son, whose name was Ilioneus. There was also taken, the wife of Pharnabazus, whom Darius had made Commander of all the towns and cities lying upon the sea: and 3 daughters of Mentor; and the wife and son of that most noble Mermion; and finally was there any Noble mans house of the Court of Persia, which had not his share in that calamity. [Id. ibid.] Hermonie also in his letters to Alexander signified to him, that among the rest he had taken 399 of the Kings women, which were skilful in music: 46 weavers or knitters of crowns; 3 paffety women, 277. cook maids; 29. White meat-makers; 13. makers of drinking cups; 17. wine-cellar men, 70. apothecaries, and confectioners, 40.

The summe of ready coin there taken, was 2600 talents: in bars of silver, 500 weight: 30 thousand men, 7 thousand camels, bearing burdens on their backs, 1 Curt. lib. 3. cap. 23.] The place (which, as it seemeth, was that Cophenes, by

As for him that betrayed the place (which, as it seemeth, was that Cophenes, by whom Darius sent his treasure to Damascus,) one of his own fellows cut off his head, and carried it to Darius, [Curr. ibid.]

Alexander made Parmenion, as Curtius, or Memnon, as Arrianus, Governour of Colcholya: appointing to him his auxiliary Hortic, for the defence of that Province. The Syrians, not yet sufficiently broken with the war, could not brook this new Governour; but being quickly suppressed, they submitted themselves to all commands; [Arria. lib. 2. Curt. lib. 4. cap. 1.] and the Persian, Elcor, and others that were about Alexander lent Parmenion to seize on the Persian Fleet, and others that were about him receive the Cities of Afia, which had surrendered to him; for even Darius his own Commanders, after the battle at Issus, gave themselves up, with all their gold and treasure, into his hands. Then marched he away into Syria; where many Kings of the East came in, and submitted to him. These he entertained every one according to his defence: some he made league with; others he deprived of their kingdoms; and made Kings in their rooms. Justin, lib. 11, cap. 10.

There was one Geroftratus, who was at that time King of the Island of Aradus, and the sea coast adjoining, and of some places also lying further off into the land : which were like as other Kings of Cyprus and Phenicia had conlocated with their Fleets with Antiochus the Commander of the Persian Navy under Darius; [Arria, lib. 2, Curs. lib. 4, cap. 1.] upon his fathers absence, Met Alexander added to him the Island it self of Aradus, and let a Crown of gold upon his head, and furnished it again in the Continent, and Marathus, a rich town and a great, lying over against it in the Continent, and the city Mariamme, and whatever else belonged to his father, [Arria, lib. 2, Curs. lib. 4, cap. 1.] he marched to the city Marathon : there came let-

4. cap. 11. Having received him to grace, he marched to the city Marathon; there came letters to him from Darius, to desire him that he might ransom his captive women: to whom Alexander by another letter returned answer, and sent one Therpistus to deliver it, [Jupin lib. 11. cap. 12. Curtius lib. 4. cap. 1. Arria lib. 2. Diod. year 4. Olym. 111.] as for the Ambassadors of the Grecians, [Arria lib. 2. Diod. year 4. Olym. 111.] as for the Ambassadors of the Grecians, he willed them to be sent unto him, when he understood that they were taken at Damaleus, he willed them to be sent unto him: of which, when they came, he presently diminished the two Ambassadors of the Thebans, Theallidicus and Dionysiodorus, and Iphicrates of Athens, the son of that famous Iphicrates: But Euthycles the Lacedaemonian, he committed first to custody, yet free from irons: but afterward when all things prospered as his hearts desired, sent him away too, [Arria. lib. 2.]

him away too, [Arria, ibid.]
Alexander removing from Marathon took in the city Biblos upon conditions; and the Sidonians which had been, not long before, so terribly used by Ochus; sent unto him, and desired to be received by him in hatred of the Persians, and of Darius their King, [Id. ibid. Curr. lib. 4. cap. 2.] Stratotar that time reigned there: Now because this surrender proceeded not so much from him, as from the people of that place; therefore he took the kingdom from him, and in his room, placed one Abdomolimus, who lived by dressing a poor garden thereby, and made him King: and gave him not only the rich furniture of Stratotar's house; but added sundry other rich gifts out of what himself had taken from the Persians: with all the territories adjoining thereunto, [Curr. lib. Infin. lib. 1. cap. 10.] Plutarch in his discourse of the fortune of Alexander, calls this man Alonymus, and King of Tyre. Paphos Diodor, calls him Ballinotmus, and says, that Alexander made him King of Tyre.

Now was all Syria his, so was Phœnicia, Tyre only excepted: And Alexander with his Camp lay in the Continent: between which and the City, there ran a narrow creek of the sea. The Tyrians had sent a very massive Crown of gold unto him for a present, congratulating him thereby, for his great success; and sent him all store of provisions out of their City. He received their presents, as from his good friends; and many many gracious and friendly words to them that brought it, told them, that he had a great defence to offer to their city, and there to sacrifice to Hercules; They told him, that he was a stranger in Palæstina, or Old Tyre, in the conjunct hard by, and that it were better to offer sacrifice to Hercules upon that, as being the more ancient of the two; whereupon he flait way grew into such a cholier, that he vowed to destroy their city. It fell out, that at the same time, there came certain folest men from Carthage, to perform a yearly sacrifice there unto Hercules; for the Tyrians were the founders of Carthage; and the Carthaginians ever honoured them as the fathers that begat them. They therefore exhorted them to fland it out, and to endure the figne like men, affuring them further of speedy supplies, and aide from Carthage; for at that time, the Carthaginians were very strong at fea, [Cursus lib. 4. cap. 5. and 6. Justin. lib. 11. cap. 10.]

Thus being resolved for a war, they endured a siege of seven months long [Diod. year 2. Olympiad is 125. Ptolemy Autig. 1. Curtius lib. 4. cap. 15. Plutarch in A. Antioch.]. Their king, Zenelmus, being then absent, and gone to sea, with Aufudatus, leaving only his wife behind him in the city, [Arrianus lib. 4.] Alexander began with Palmyra, or old Tyre; and pulled that down to the ground, and sending for all the country thereabout to come in, what by them, what by his own men, took the houses and rubbish of all that city; and threw in into the sea that ran between, thinking to have made a causeway over it, to the city, which lay from the continent, four furlongs, as Diodorus saith; and with him agreeth Curtius [l. 4. cap. 5. or full 700 paces, as Pliny will have it, lib. 5. cap. 29. Diod. in sup. Curtius lib. 4. cap. 8.]

Amynas the son of Antiochus, with thole 4 thousand Greeces, which, as I said before, fled with him out of the battell at Illos, wherein Sabaces a Pertian, and Govern-our of Egypt fled, and from Cyprus to Pelusium, and there seized himself of that city, pretending that he came to the charge of it, by order from Darius, in Sabac-et his roole, because he was slain in the battell at Illos. From thence he went with his army to Memphis, at the nothewhereof, the Egyptians came in out of town and country to affilit him against the Perrians; by whose help, when the Perfians, which lay there in garrison, laid forth upon him, he routed and forced them into the city again:
but anon after, by the advice of Mazaces their Captain, seeing their enemies scattered about the country, and buile in plundering, he issued forth again, let upon them unawares, and cut both him and all his whole company in pieces, [Curs. lib. 3. cap. 22. and
ib. 4. cap. 3.]

10. 4. cap. 3.] Certain other Captains also of Darius, which escaped out of the field at Ifios, with such Persians as followed them, with other Cappadocians and Paphlagonians in their company, went about to recover Lydia. But Antigonus, who commanded there in chief for Alexander, routed them in three several fights. And at the same time, the Macedonian fleet, coming out of Greece, let upon Antisthenes, which was sent by Darius to recover the Hellespont, and either sunk or took all his fleet, [Idod. year. 1. Olymp. 112. and Curtius lib. 4. cap. 4.]

112. Alexander lib. 4. cap. 93.
 While Alexander lay at the siege of Tyrrus, he sent to Jaddus the high priest at Hierusalem demanding of him, supplies and other provisions; and withal, tribute, tribute; as was formerly paid to Darius. But when Jaddus answered that he was tied by a former oath of allegiance to Darius; and that he could not be free from that oath, he long as Darius lived. Alexander growing wroth thereat, [wrote, that as soon as he had taken Tyrrus, he would march against that city, [Josephus lib. 11. Antiquit. cap. ult.

To him also, at the very beginning of the siege of Tyrus, Sanaballat the Cuthzan, and forsaking Darius, came with eight thousand men; and being graciously received by him, he asked him leave to build a temple upon his own land, and thereot to make high priest his son in law, Manasses, brother to Jaddus the high priest at Jerusalem; and having obtained his grant, because he now grew old, he fell preletnely to work, and built a Temple, and made Manasses high priest of it, thinking hereby to leave a great honour to the posterity of his daughter, [Id. ibid.]

Alexander purposing to make a broader caulway from the continent, for his easier approach to Tyrus, cauled new engines to be made ; which being finished, he with his Targateers, and Squadron of Agrians, marched to Sidon, there to gather together, as many ships of war as possibly he could; finding it impossible to take Tyrus, so long as the Tyrians were masters at sea, [Arria, lib. 2.]

Mean while, Gerostrotas the king of Aradus, and Enulus the king of Byblus, finding that all their cities were already taken by Alexander, forsaking Antophradates, and the ships that were with him, came with their fleets to Alexander; and with them some certain ships of the Sidonians; so that Alexander had now a navy of Soli, Sidon, &c. At the same time also came to him a fleet from Rhodes, wherein there was one ship called Peripplus, and nine other; and three more from Soli and Mallus;

and ten from Lycia : and one out of Macedon, of 50 oars, whereof was captain, Protes the son of Andronicus : and not long after came to him certain Kings of Cyprus, with 120 sail, into the port at Sidon : and all upon the fame of his victory at Issus ; and report that all Phenicia was come in to him : To all these Alexander forgave their by-past errors ; for that of necessity, rather than of their own accord, they had adhered to Darius with their fleets, [Id. ibid.] And now Azelmicus also himself, the King of Tyrus, leaving Antiochades, came to his own City Tyrus, while it was thus besieged, and was therein afterward taken, as Arrianus shewes.

In mount Lebanon, whence Alexander made his provision of timber for his shipping, the wilde Arabians, setting suddenly upon the Macedons, whiles they were busie at their work, slew, upon the point, 30 of them, and carried away almost as many prisoners. Alexander leaving Perdiccas and Craterus, or as Polyzenus seems to say, Parmenion, to hold on the siege of Tyrus, went himself, with a running camp, into Arabia, [Arrianus lib. 4. cap. 8.] and that he made an excursion into Arabia, the same Polyzenus sheweth, [lib. 4. Stratag.] which Arrianus more clearly delivers, where he saith, that Alexander, with certain troupes of horse, and light targateers, and his squadron of Agrians, went into Arabia, as far as to Anti-Lebanon : and Plutarch, where he tells us that he marched, [lib. 2. cap. 10.] against the Arabians which dwell over against Anti-Lebanon.

When he was come to the mountainous country of those parts, he was then fain to leave his horse and march on foot as others did : but the body of his army, was gone a good way before, and the night grew on, and the enemy not far off, and Lysimachus, the instructor of him in his childhood, being spent in travel, and fainting, and he loath to leave him in that case ; and whiles he stood hearkening him up, and drawing him on before he was aware, he with a very few with him, were severd from the rest of his company, and was faine to passe that night in the dark, in a bitter cold frost, and in a place void of all relief : nevertheless, seeing not far off many fires made by the enemies, being of a nimble and active body, he ran to the next fire, and there killing two of the enemies that fate at it, brought away a fire-brand, and therewith kindled a fire for himself, and for the relief of those few Macedons that were about him ; which growing into a great flame, struck such a terror into the enemies hearts, that they durst not stir : and so he and his company lay safe all that night. This Plut. relateth of him, out of Charzates, a mytilenean born, and one of those who wrote the gests of Alexander.

Having now taken in all that country, partly upon amicable termes, and partly by force, he returned to Sidon, eleven dayes after he set out from thence, where he found Alexander the son of Polemocrates, newly arrived with 4000 mercenary souldiers out of Greece, [Arria, l. 2.]

His Navy being now rigged and fitted, amounting in all to 190 ships, as Curtius, or to two hundred, as Diodorus saies : Alexander, loosing from Sidon, set saile for Tyre, in very good array. Himself was in the right wing, in a Quinquere, or ship of five deck : high ; and in that squadron were also the kings of Cyprus, and the rest of the Phenicians, except only Pintagoras, al. Pythagoras ; for he and Craterus commanded the left wing, [Arria, lib. Curt. l. 4. c. 10.]

Thirty Commissioners arriving from Carthage, brought them word, that the Carthaginians, were lo embroiled with war at home, that they could not possibly lend to help him in this distresse of theirs ; nor yet did this any wayes abate or quell the courage of the Tyrians, but they sent away every man his wife and children by them to Carthage, as being by to much the better able to bear what ever should befall them, when they had ridde away the halfe-deale, and dearest part, every man of himself, out of danger, [Curtius, lib. 4. cap. 11. with Diodor. year 1. Olympiade 112. Justin, lib. 11. cap. 10.]

When Apollo had signified to sundry men in their sleep by dreams, that he would leave the city, the Tyrians, out of a foolish superstition, took good golden chaines, and bound his image fast to the foot of his shrine ; which image of his, was sent thither from Syracusa, as Curtius, or rather from Gela in Sicily, as out of Diodorus we have already observed, in the year of the world 3559, by the Carthaginians : and they fastened the chain to the altar of Hercules, the tutelar God of that city ; as if he should hold him by main strength, from going thence, [Curtius and Diodorus Ibid. and Plutarch in Alexander.]

Whiles Alexander lay at the siege of Tyre, there came Embassadors from Darius, to him, offering him 10 thousand (not as in Valer. Max. put to hundred thousand) talents for the ranlome of his mother, wife and children ; with all the countreys lying between the Hellespont and the river Halys : and his daughter withal, in marriage ; which offer of his being taken into deliberation, in a Council of his friends, it is reported that Parmenion should say, That if he were Alexander, he would not refuse those conditions :

to whom he replied, that no more would he, if he were Parmenion. But to Darius he wrote back, That he offered him nothing, but what was his own already ; and therefore willed him to come himself in suppliant like unto him, and to take such conditions as he would give him, [Arrianus lib. 2. with Justin, lib. 11. cap. 12. Curtius lib. 4. cap. 16. Plutarch in his Apophthegmes, and in his Alexander Valer. Max. lib. 6. cap. 4.]

Tyre was taken, when Anicetes, or rather Nicetes, as Dionys. Halicarnaf. in Dinarcius calls him, was L. Chancellor in Athens, in the month Hecatombæon, [Arria, lib. 2. pag. 49.] in the midst of which month, the 112 Olympiade ended. In Plutarch we find, that it was upon the 30 day of the month Loi, among the Macedonians, the 5 of Hecatombæon among the Athenians, answering to the 24 of our July, as I have shewen, in the end of cap. 5. of my discourse of the Solar years of the Macedonians and Alians.

Justin, [lib. 1. cap. 10.] sayes it was taken by treason, Polyzenus by a stratagem, [lib. 1. Stratag.] Diodor. by pure force ; and with him agree, Arria, and Curtius : and that when the enemies had gotten into the town, yet the towlmen maintained the fight, till there were 7 thousand of them cut in pieces, [as Diodorus writeth.]

Arrianus delivers, that there were 8 thousand of the inhabitants there slain, and 2 thousand more after that rage of slaying was over, hung up all along the hoar, in cold blood, as Curtius sayes : and Diodorus tells us, that Alexander caused no less than 2 thousand, all prime young men to be hanged : Justin sayes, that in remembrance of the old slaughter by them made, he caused all that were taken to be crucified : putting them to this slavish kind of death, because the Tyrian slaves heretofore making a conspiracy against their own masters, had murdered all the freemen of that city, together with their own masters : and made a Common-wealth of themselves, sparing none alive, saving one Strato an old man, and his son ; and upon him and his posterity, they settled the kingdom.

Of Alexander Justin adds this further : that he saved alive all the descendants of Strato, and restored the kingdom to him and his posterity, (meaning perhaps that Ballonymus, whom Diodorus confounds and makes all one with that Abdolomius, whom Alexander made King of the Sidonians, as a little before,) leaving the City to be re-peopled by the innocent and harmlesse inhabitants thereof, in the end, that having abolished that wicked generation of slaves, he might, in a sort, be the founder of a new and better race there : and by this means it was, that Justin out of Troguus, makes Alexander the restorer and rebuild-der of Tyre, [lib. 18. cap. 3. 4.] whereas all others make him not the founder, but the destroyer of it ; the prophetic of Elay concurring therewith, [cap. 23. v. 1.] compared with, [Maccabees cap. 1. v. 1.] For if we believe Curtius, Alexander, saving those which fled to the Temples, slew all, and let fire on their houses : if Diodorus, he made slaves of all that were not able to bear armes, together with the fœmal sex among them : there being such an infinite number of that kind there found, that though the greatest part of them were sent away to Carthage, (as before) yet the remainder was no less than 13 thousand heads ; but if Arrianus his word may be taken, he spared all that fled to the Temple of Hercules, and those were the chief of the City, with the King Azelmicus, and the Commissioners which came from Carthage, to offer sacrifice at that season of the year to Hercules, according to an ancient custom there used. The rest he sold away for slaves : the inhabitants and strangers there found, amounting to about 30 thousand persons.

Yet Curtius sayes, that the Sidonians, which brake in with the rest of Alexanders souldiers, not forgetting the community of blood that was between them and the Tyrians ; (for they were all brought thither, with Agenor, as they believed, and he was the founder of both cities) got a ship-board, and there hid and saved 15 thousand of them : and that of them Tyrus rose, and afterward grew to be a City again, [lib. 4. cap. 15.] And Strabo, [lib. 16. pag. 754.] saith, that after this vast calamity brought on them by Alexander, they quickly overcame their misfortunes ; what with their navigation, what with their purple-fishing : and Justin, that by their parcimonie and industry, they quickly recovered strength again, [lib. 18. cap. 4.] and that so quickly, that in the 18 year from thence, they endured another siege from Antigonus, then Lord of all Asia ; not levin months, as against Alexander, but full 15 months, long, as Diodorus tells us, [lib. 19. year 2. Olymp. 116.] and that they were not now content with their little city, which by Alexanders caulwayes and other works was joynted to the Continent ; but to enlarge their bounds, that in Plinies time, the very wall of their city took in 22 furlongs, and reckoning Palætyrus or Old Tyre with it, the whole enclosure came to no less than 19 miles, [Plin. lib. 5. cap. 19.]

Admetus, who first gat upon the wall, and 20 Targateers with him, were slain at the very first encounter : but in the whole time of the sieges there were lost 400 Macedons, at most, [Arria, lib. 2.]

Alexander offered sacrifices to Hercules, and went in procession with his whole host, all in arms to his Temple; he made a show also with his ships, and caused wrestling and other games of activity to be performed by torch-light. And wheresoever there was a certain Tyrian ship consecrated to his honour, which he had set upon and taken, he dedicated the same unto him again, with an Inscription importing as much, [Id. ibid.] Also he took off from Apollon's image, his golden Chain, and the Robes he was tired with, and gave it a new name, Quadrivarius, (i. e.) a friend of Alexander, or Alexander's friend; [Diodor. year 1. Olympiade 11.] And upon the very self same day and howe, that the Carthaginians had taken that image from thole of Gida in Sicilie, it was, as Timæus reports, that the Grecians offered to him that magnificent and solemne sacrifice, as if by his power and favour they had taken Tyre, [Id. year 4. Olympiade 93.]

Alexander, so soon as he had taken Tyre, marched forth with into Judea, [Enchir. Chron. with Pliny, lib. 12. cap. 25.] and subdued all that part of Syria, which is called Palestine, [Arria, lib. 2. pag. 50.] going in person against those places that would not of themselves submit, [Curt. lib. 4. cap. 17.] But when he was upon his march to Jerusalem, Jaddus the high priest, terrified with his former threats, and now fearing his rage, had recourse to God, by supplications and sacrifices for the common safety; and was by him warned in a dream, that he should make holy-day in the city, and let wide open the gates, and that he and the rest of the priests every one in his priestly raiment, and the people all clothed in white, should go forth and meet him. Alexander seeing this company coming a far off, went himself all alone to the high priest; and having prostrated himself before that God, whose name he saw engraven in the golden plate of his Miter, he first saluted him: and being demanded the reason of his so doing by Parmenon, answered that whiles he was yet a man like unto this, and thus attired, who invited him into Asia, there appeared to him all success in the conquest of it. And the priests going before, he entered into Jerusalem, and going up to the Temple, he there sacrificed to Gods as the priests prescribed him; and when they had shewed him the book of the prophet Daniel, wherein was written, that a Grecian should come and destroy the Persians, [Dan. c. 8. 7. 20. 21. and chap. 11. 3.] he made no doubt, but himself was the man designed thereby, and so forth that time dissolved the company, [Joseph. lib. 11. cap. ult.]

The day following, he assembled the people, and had them all what they would of him, and they asking nothing, but that they might live according to the laws of their own country, and that every seventh year, (wherein they were to have no harvest) they might be exempt from paying any tribute, he granted all. And when they asked further, that he would suffer the Jews, which dwell in the countries of Babylon, and Media, to live according to their own rites and laws, he answered, that he would satisfy their desires in that point also, so soon as he should have gotten those countries into his power. And when he told them, that if any of them would follow him in his wars, they should use their own rites where ever they came, many lifted themselves to serve him. And having dispatched, and settled all matters in Jerusalem, he departed and went to the rest of the cities of that country, and was joyfully received every where, [Id. ibid.]

Of Alexander's captains, Callas went and took in Paphlagonia, (which fell off from Alexander after the battle at Issus) Antigonus Lyconia, Balarus, the city of Milesus, having first overthrown Iadanes, Darius his Captain, in the open field, [Curtius, lib. 4. cap. 17.]

Alexander had given the charge of Cilicia to Socrates, willing Philotas the son of Parmenion, to look to the country about Tyre. Creto-Syria was committed to Andronicus by Parmenion, himself having a desire to follow Alexander in the war. The king commanding Hephastion, with the fleet, to scour the coast of Phœnicia; himself with his whole army, went to Gaza, [Id. ibid.] and in the siege thereof, held by a garrison of Persians, he spent two months, [Diod. year 1. Olympiade 112. Josephus lib. 11. cap. ult.]

Captain of the Garrison there was, as Josephus saies, one Babemecses, or, as Curtius and Arianus call him, Batis an Eunuch, and one very truly to his king: who having hired certain Arabians, and made good provision of corn, and other things, maintained the walls, which were hugely strong, with a small company of men within.

Alexander received two wounds at this siege: whereupon Batis falling alive into his hands, had cords or thongs drawn thorough his ankles, and was therewith tied to a Chariot, and drawn at the tale thereof with horses, round about the city: there were slain in that siege, of Persians and Arabians together, about to thousand, nor did the Macedons scape scot-free neither, [Curt. lib. 4. cap. 10.] Alexander, selling away for slaves all the women and children there, stored the place with inhabitants out of the neighbouring neighbouring parts, and made that a place of Garrison and Magazin, for himself, [Arria, lib. 2. in fo.] so that those words of Strabo, are not simply to be understood, out with reference to the former state of that city, where he saith, [lib. 16. pag. 759.] that Gaza was formerly a glorious City: but being destroyed by Alexander, remained desolate. Unless we will say that this was meant of a later Gaza, built in another place; which Jerom in his book, De Locis Hebraicis: (i. e.) of places in Judea, affirmeth in this wise, The question is, saith he, how in one of the Prophecies it is said, And Gaza shall be turned into an everlasting heap? which is thus answered, that there are scanty left to be seen, any sign of the old City: and that City of Gaza that now is, was built in another place, instead of that, which was so destroyed.

Alexander having done his pleasure at Gaza, dispatched away Amyntas, the son of Andremon, with 3 tall ships into Macedon, to bring him from thence all the flower of the youth of that country, [Diodor. year 2. Olymp. 112. Curt. lib. 4. cap. 19.]

3673. Alexander from thence marched into Egypt, as he formerly intended; and seven dayes after he left Gaza, came to a place, which from him was in after-time called Alexander's Camp, and to the city Pelusium, [Arria, lib. 3. in Pri. Curt. lib. 4. cap. 20.] and not back again from Gaza to Jerusalem, as Josephus; inconsiderately enough, affirmeth.

An infinite number of the Egyptians, expecting Alexander's coming, were gathered together at Pelusium: where for the offence taken by them of the Persian pride, avarice, and sacrilege, they willingly received the Macedons at their coming, [Curtius lib. Diodor. an. 2. Olymp. 112.]

Alexander, leaving a Garrison in Pelusium, and giving order for his ships to go up the River to Memphis, himself marched by land to Heliopolis, having the Nile all the way on his right hand; and all cities, where ever he came, opening their gates unto him, he passed the Desert of Egypt, and came at last to Heliopolis, and there passing the River, he marcht toward Memphis, [Arria, lib. 3.] Nor durst the Persians there abide his coming, seeing the general detestation of the Egyptians from them. And now he was not far from thence, when Altraces, who commanded the Garrison there under Darius met him, and delivered into his hand 800 talents, and all his masters Wardrobe; as we read in [Curtius lib. 4. cap. 20.] where yet it seems, that the name of Altraces, is crept in, I know not how, instead of Mazaces: as he himself all, [cap. 4. of the same book] calleth him: and to doth Arianus in the beginning of his 3 book, where he tells us, that one Mazaces a Persian, whom Darius had made Governor of Egypt, received Alexander into that Province, and cities thereof, in all friendly wise.

Alexander, having offered his sacrifices at Memphis, and there exhibited all games of wrestling, and other activities and musicke, to which resorted the most expert and skillfull men of all Greece to put in for the prizes in them, embarked himself, and came down the River to the sea: putting his targeteers and archers, and Agrians, and the Kings Troup, aboard the ships of his confederates, and with them came to Canopus; and there made choice of a place lying between the Egyptian sea and Mareia, or the Lough of Mareotis, and there built a city, which from his own name, he called Alexandria, [Arria, lib. 3.] and in that part thereof, which lyeth next the sea, and the docks for shipping, there was a street called Racotis, [Serabo, lib. 17. pag. 792. Panjanius, in his Eliaca, pag. 169. Tacit. Histor. lib. 4. cap. 84.]

Alexandria was built, not in the seventh, (as Eusebius in Chron. and out of him, Cyril. of Alexandria, lib. 1. coh. Iulianum, and Cedrenus affirm) but in the fifth year of his reign, and that in the very first year of the 112. Olympiads; as [Solinus hath in cap. 32.] not as, [Diodorus in the 2. and much lesse, as Eusebius in the 3.] As for the certain time when Alexandria was built, the interval of time between the taking of Tyre, and that great fight at Gaugamela, and his gifts acted in that interim, cannot but undoubtedly assure us of it: from whence, and from the fifth year of Darius, and Thoth, in the 417. year of Nabonassars account, which falls in with the 14 day of September according to our Julian Calendar, or year 1. of the Olymp. 112. yet running, Ptolemei of Alexandria, deducteth the years of Alexander, whom in the Preface of his Περσικῶν Κριβῶν: (whereof this is one) he, after the fashion of all Alexandrians, calleth Kriev: (i. e.) his founder.

Dinocrates was the man who laid out the compass and streets of this city, (whom yet Plurarch both in his life, and also in the 2 book of the fortune of Alexander, calls Stesicrates, and other books call otherwise) Dinocrates, I say, that famous Architect, whose art and industry the Ephesians used in the re-building of their Temple of Diana, who for the excellency of his workmanship, shewed therein, deserves the second place, after the founders themselves in the memory of the World, [Serabo, lib. 14. pag. 641. Pater. Max. lib. 1. cap. 4. Vitruvius, in the Preamble of his second book, Plin. lib. 5. cap. 10. and lib. 7. cap. 37. Solin. cap. 32. and 40. Ammian. Marcell. lib. 22.]

Alexander having let them on work, and bad them dispatch: took a journey to the the Temple of Jupiter Ammon, [Plutarch in his Alexander, with Arria, lib. 3.] out of an ambition, which possessed him, because he was told, that Perseus and Hercules had been there, as Callisthenes, in the History which he wrote of him, affirmeth, cited by Strabo, [lib. 17. pag. 814.]

Wherefore he went as far as Paratonium, along by the sea side, not without finding some fresh water by the way, which lay from Alexandria, 1600 furlongs as Aristobolus wrote, [in Arria, lib. 3. pag. 53.]

About the mid-way, met him Embassadors of the Cyrenians, presenting him with a Crowne, and sundry other costly things; among which were 300 horses, trained to the war, and 5 chariots drawn each with 4 horses, the choicest that might be found; which he accepted at their hand, and made amity and friendship with them, [Diodor. Olymp. 112. year 21.]

When he went from Paratonium to Melogabas, where the Temple of Hammon was, through dry and thirsty countreys, and wandered over the plains, while the wind blew at south, Callisthenes saith that he was saved from an imminent destruction, partly by a shower of rain that fell, which layd the land, and partly by a flock of crows, which led him the way, [Strabo as before.] adding further this fable to the story, that the crows oftentimes, when the men wandered out of the way in the dark, would with their cawing, call them into the right way again, [Id. Plut. in his Alex.]

Ptolomæus the son of Lagos saith, there were two dragons, which went before the company making annoise, and they led them into, and out of the Temple again: But Aristobolus, to whom most writers assent, saith, that there were two crows, which kept on still flying before the army, and that they were Alexanders guides upon the way thither, [Arria, lib. 3.]

Coming to a lough of bitter waters, as they called them, and having gone 100 furlongs from thence, and passing by the Cities, called after Hammons name, one dayes journey from thence, they came to Jupiter Hammons Grove and Temple, [Diod. in su.]

There the Priests of the Temple being suborned before hand and taught their lesson, so soon as he came to set footing within the Temple dores, came all and saluted him by the name of Hammons son, [Justin. lib. 11. c. 11.] so that now we learn by this act of Alexanders, that be the God himself never so deaf or dumbe, yet it is still, in the power either of the Priest to feigne and lye, what he will, or for him that comes to consult the Oracle, to tell what answer he would there have made unto him, and he shall have it, [Oros. lib. 3. c. 16.]

Callisthenes reports, that it was permitted to none but the King himself, by the Priest to come into the Temple, in his ordinary attire; the rest were all faine to change their vestures, and to hear the Oracle without, and that he informed the King of sundry other things by signes and tokens, onely he told him in plain termes, that he was Jupiters son, [Strabo ut supra.] yet he himself in a letter to his mother Olympias, saies, that he had received many secret and hidden Oracles there, which he would impart to her alone, at his return, [Plut. in Alex.]

He also in the same, or in some other Epistle to his mother; (which I nothing doubt was meant by Tertullian in his book of Pallo) saith, that he was told by one Leo, a principal Priest among the Egyptians, that they who were now Gods, were formerly men, and that in worshipping them, the Nations did preserve the memory of their Kings and Ancestors, [Ang. de Civit. Dei, lib. 8. cap. 5, and 27. and de Consen. Evangel. lib. 1. cap. 23. Mutinus Felix, in Oltavie, with Cyrian, in his book de Idolol. vanitate.] And when he in the beginning of his letter, had thus written to his mother, Alexander the King, the son of Jupiter Hammon, sends greeting to his mother Olympias: the very wittily in her answer thereto, told him in this wise, Now my good son I pray thee be content, and do not accuse me, nor lay ought to my charge before Juno, for she will do me some forward turn, if you in your letters make me a cock-quean to her, [M. Varro, in a book of his, entitled Orestis, vel de infania: in Aul. Gellius lib. 13. c. 4.]

Alexander having received such an answer there, as by his own confession, pleased him very well, returned from thence into Egypt, by the same way as he went, as Aristobolus saies, but as Ptolomæus, by a shorter way, to Memphis, [Arrianus lib. 3.]

When he was arrived at Memphis, new forces came to him: 400 mercenaries out of Greece, sent him by Antipater, under the command of Menatas the son of Hegesandrus, and about 500 horse out of Thracia, which were led by Asclepiodorus, and being there, he sacrificed to Jupiter, and made oblations to him, with his whole Host, all in their compleat armour, and exhibited games and pastimes, with wrastlings, and other feats of activity, and musick, [Id. Ibid.]

And moreover, commanding the inhabitants of the neighbouring townes and cities to leave their dwellings, he transplanted them into Alexandria, and stored that place place with a huge multitude of inhabitants, [Curius lib. 4. c. 21. and Justin. lib. 11. cap. 11.] calling thither also, a colony of the Jewes: whose vertues and good behaviour, he much approving, and deeming them worthy of special trust, made it a reward of their service in the war, to endow them there, and to grant them equal honours, and privileges with the Greeke: in somuch that their tribe there, went by the name, not of Alexandrians only, but also of the Macedonians themselves, [Josep. lib. 2. de Bello Judæo, 36. p. 815. & lib. 2. cont. Ap. p. 163. in the Greek and Latin Edition.]

He also gave lands to Sanabalats souldiers, whom he caused to follow him into Egypt in the country of Thebais, trusting them with the keeping of that territory in his absence, [Josephus Antiq. lib. 11. cap. the last.]

Alexander had an itching humour, to go and visit, not only the inward and more remote parts of Egypt, but even Ethiopia it self. But his present war with Darius, put him from thinking of such idle projects: wherefore he made Elchilus and Pencettes, the Macedon Governours of Egypt, with four thousand souldiers for the guard thereof: he commanded Polemon to defend the mouths of the river Nile, with 30 fial of fighting ships, [Curius lib. 4. cap. 21.] though Arrianus tells us, that he made Pencettes the son of Macareus, and Balacrus the son of Amyntas, Commanders of the fleet which he left there, and Polemon the son of Theramenes, Ammiral of the fleet, to defend the mouths of the river Nile, with all the sea lying upon Egypt: as for the civil government of the whole country, he committed the care thereof to one Dolopides, a native of Egypt, as the same Arrianus intimates.

Curius further tells us, that he left Apollonius to govern Africa, bordering upon Egypt, and Cleomenes, to gather the tributes both of Africa and Egypt, and much to the same purpose, Arrianus tells us, that he left Apollonius the son of Chariinus, to govern Libya, bordering upon the West of Egypt, and Cleomenes Arabia, upon the East thereof, in the city called Urbs Heroum, where it borders upon Arabia Petrea, with command that all his tributes should be paid in to him: but the execution of the laws, he committed to the Presidents and Justices of the Country, as in former times. In the second of Aristotles Oeconomicks is mention made of, one Κλεμένης Αλεξανδρινός, ὁ καλεῖται Σαργατῆρος, (i. e.) Cleomenes of Alexandria, Governour of Egypt, who is the same, who in Arria, of the History of Alexander, is called Εὐκράτης, Ἐκκρατίας, B. t. Fréhenfennius, a man of a quick sent in smelling out such faults, sayes, that in the orient should be, ὁ τῆς Ναυκρατίας, or Ναυκρατίας, (i. e.) one of the Naucraticus, or Naucraticus, and in the other, Ἀλεξανδρινός Αἰγυπτιακῆς ἀρχαίας, (i. e.) Commander of Alexandria in Egypt: the rest ult whereof is, that this Cleomenes Governour of Alexandria was a native of Naucratis, which was a Colony or plantation, anciently made in Egypt, by the Milesians; for that the care and charge of finishing and peopling this city, was committed to him: we may partly gather out of Aristotle, who saies, that Alexander enjoyed him, that he should furnish with inhabitants, a city near unto Pharos (as Alexandria is distant but seven furlongs by sea from thence) and should draw all the trade and traffick from Canopus thither: and partly out of Justin, who, lib. 13. cap. 1 expressly saies, that Alexander committed the building of Alexandria to Cleomenes: whereunto may be added, that which Alexander wrote unto him eight years after; wherein he commanded him to build two temples to Hephæstion deceased, the one in Alexandria, the other in Pharos, and that all bills of loading and other contracts of Merchants, should have the name of Hephæstion, inscribed on them, as Arria, lib. 7. Histor. saies, adding further, that this Cleomenes, was a most wicked man, and one that did the Egyptians a thousand injuries.

When Alexander was gone down the Nile, Hector, a son of Parmenions, then being in the flower of his youth, and a great favourite of the Kings, desirous to overtake him, put himself into a little rascall boat, whereinto also more leep, then the could carry, and to sunk, and he with her. The king was wonderfully grieved at the losse of him, and having recovered the body, made him a very rich and sumptuous funeral, [Cur. lib. 4. c. 21.] Upon the neck of this grief, came another, which was the news of Andromachus his death, whom the inhabitants of Samaria had burnt alive: and he march presently away with all the speed he could to take vengeance of them for it, [Id. Ibid.]

Alexander having made bridges over the Nile, and every reach thereof about Memphis, in the first of the spring went from thence, toward Pluticia, [Arria, lib. 3. pag. 55.] Upon his way, those who had so murdered Andromachus, were delivered into his hands, and put to death; and then he put Memnon in his place, [Cur. lib. 4. cap. 21.] And having taken the city of Samaria, he gave it to be inhabited by his Macedons; as Eulchius in his Cron, and out of him Cedrenus hath it. But the territory to it belonging, he bestowed upon the Jewes, for their loyalty to him, without paying him any thing, as Josephus reporteth out of Hecateus of Abdera, [lib. 2. cont. Apion, pag. 1063.] Yet the Temple in the mount Gerisim, escaped. And if any at Jerusalem were in danger for eating of forbidden meats, or breach of the sabbath, or such like crime, they presently flew over to the Sicheimites, laying they were falsely accused, [Josephus Antiq. lib. 11. c. ult.] and the like troubles and quarrels grew between the Jews and Samaritans, not only here, but also in Egypt, at Alexandria, by reason of their different rights and usages, according to their several Temples, as we may see in the same, [Joseph. l. 11. c. 1. and l. 13. c. 6.]

Alexander coming to Tyros, found there his fleet, which he had sent thither before him: and there sacrificed a second time to Hercules, and made enterludes, and exercises of wrestling and music, and the like, [Arria. lib. 3.] wherein the Kings of the Cyprians, had the charge of providing fit actors for them. Nicocreon, King of Salamis, furnished out Theophilus, a man very much favoured by Alexander himself: Pafitacres King of Solo, presented Athenodorus, which carried the prize from all, by the major part of voices, [Plut. in Alex.] now these Cyprian Kings had long before revolted from Darius to Alexander, and sent him shipping, when he besieged Tyre, and he from that time forward always honoured them, as they deserved, [Curt. lib. 4. c. 21.] yet of Nicocreon, it is said, that Anaxarchus of Abdera, the Philosopher, said to Alexander as he lay at supper (as Laertius hath it in his Life,) that there should also a certain Sarapaeus head have been served in there: which saying of his, caused him afterward to be put to a most miserable death.

Alexander made Ceranus of Berrhaea treasurer of Phenicia, for the gathering of his tribute there: and in Asia Philoxenus, to do the like, in the regions beyond the mountain Taurus: and put Harpalus in their room, to take charge of the moneys, which were in his own hamper: into Lydia, he sent Menander one of his confederates, to be Governor there; putting Clearchus in Menanders stead, to oversee the foreigners and in the room of Arimna, he set Alcibiades, the son of Lonicus, to be Governor of Syria, [Arria. lib. 3.]

These things, thus set in order, Alexander offered at Hercules his shrine a great vessel of gold, with thirty dithes in it: and his fingers now itching after Darius, he commanded to set forward toward the Euphrates, [Curt. 4. c. 21.]

When tidings came to Darius, that whithersoever he went, Alexander would follow him, he gave order for all Nations, though never so far off, to repair to him at Babylon: And when his army was now grown half as big again as it was, at Iliss in Cilicia, many of them wanted arms; which were out of hand provided for them, [Curt. 4. c. 22.] where the whole number of his horse is said to have been 45 thousand; and his foot, 200 thousand men: whereas it is manifest, that at Iliss, his forces in either kind, were far exceeding these in number: nor is there any doubt, but the number found in Justin, [lib. 11. c. 12. and in Orosius, lib. 3. c. 17.] comes far short of what in truth it was: 400, or 404 thousand foot, and 100 thousand horse, [Plutarch in Alex.] saith they were 10 millions; and in his Apophthegmes, 100 millions, (but no doubt false printed) that is, 1000 thousand, with whom Diodorus in some sort agrees, where he saith they were 80 times ten thousand, and no less than 30 times ten thousand horse; now Arrianus allows to the foot only, as much as Plutarch doth to the whole, both of horse and foot, that is a thousand thousand, adding 40 thousand horse over and above; though some instead of 40 thousands put there, 400 thousands, to the end, both that the number of horse, might be somewhat more proportionable to the foot, as also that the number of horse might not here seeme so far short of what it was at Iliss: whereas Curtius, [l. 4. c. 22.] sayes it was so far beyond it, besides 200 iron Chariots, and 15 Elephants, which the Indians brought him: whereas all Alexanders army, had not above seven thousand horse, and forty thousand foot in it, [Arrian. lib. 3.]

Darius moving with this vast army from Babylon, came to Nive, having the river Tigris on his left hand, and Euphrates on his right: his army filled all that huge plain of Mesopotamia, [Diodorus, year 2. Olympiade 112. Curtius, l. 4. c. 22.] and having passed the river Tigris, when he heard that the enemy was not far off, he sent Sarpacres, General of his horse, with a thousand choice men, to hinder the passage of the enemy: and gave him order withal, to burne and waste all the coasts through which Alexander was to passe: for he thought want might happily undo him, having naught else but the spoile of the country to supply him: he himself marched to Arabela; and leaving there his bag & baggage, went forward as far as the river Lycus, where he made a bridge, and there passed over his army in 5 days space, and from thence, marching 80 furlongs, he came to the river Bumelus, [Curt. lib. 4.] Arrianus saith that he pitched his camp at Gaugamela, by the river Bumelus, for so he calleth the place, [l. 6. p. 131.] not as in [l. 3. c. 57.] Bumadus, in a plain and open field: for there were any hilly or uneven ground there, Darius commanded it to be made all level, that it might be made the more traversable for his horse, and might lie every way more open to his view, [Arria. Curt.]

Alexander

The Year before Christ.

The year of the World.

Alexander came forward to Thapacus, a great City in Syria, in the month Hecatombeon, when Aristophanes was L. Chancellor at Athens: to wit, [year 2. Olympiade 112.] in the very entrance of that year; here the river Euphrates had a flood, where Alexander found a bridge ready made; but not thoroughly finished, nor reaching full out to the other bank. Mazaeus, whom Darius had sent to make good that passage, so soon as he heard that Alexander was coming; took him to his heels, with all his army. And when he was gone, Alexander quickly made out the bridges to the other side, and passed his army over in a trice, and then marched on toward Babylon, leaving the Euphrates and the mountains of Armenia on his left hand; but not the first way thither: because the other was, though somewhat further about, yet the more commodious for provisions of all kinds for his army, nor the heat there so violent, for them to travel in. On the way, certain Scouts of Darius were intercepted; who informed him, that Darius with all his army, was upon the bank of the river Tigris, to stop him from passing there: and that his forces were far more numerous now, than when he fought with him in Cilicia: But Alexander hereupon going thither, found neither Darius, nor any man else there, [Arria. lib. 3.]

Alexander therefore passed the river Tigris, and though there was no man to hinder him, yet not without much difficulty and extreme danger, by reason of the violence (swiftness) of the river; yet gat he over safe and sound, and lost nothing, save only a small quantity of his stuff and baggage, [Id. ibid. Diodorus, year 2. Olymp. 112. Curt. 4. c. 23.] Now from the passage over the Euphrates, at Thapacus, to this his passage over the Tigris, Eratosthenes reckons the way to be, 1400 st., 2400 furlongs, [Sirab. lib. 2. pag. 79. and lib. 16. pag. 746.]

Alexander removing his camp, from the bank of Tigris, led his army thorough the country of Assyria: having on his left hand the mountains of Sogdiana, and Tigris on the right. The 4 day after his passage over the Tigris, Mazaeus sent out a thousand Horse against him; Alexander sent to encounter him Aristo, who commanded the Horse of Paeonia; who singling out Sarpacres, the Commander of that Troup, ran him with his Spear, full in the throat; and when he with that wound fled away, he pursued him thorough the midst of the enemies, and unhorsed him; and do he what he could do for himself, took off his head, and brought it with him, and threw it down at Alexanders foot; and Sir, said he, in our country, such a present uth to be rewarded with a cup of gold; to whom Alexander smiling, answered, yea, with an empty one; but I will give thee one full of wine, [Arria. lib. 3. Curtius lib. 4. cap. 23. Plutarch in Alexander.]

Alexander camped there 2 dayes, and gave order to remove the next. But the Moon falling into an eclipse in the first watch of the night, at first lost onely the brightness of her light; but anon after, all the face of her seemed to be over-cast and covered with a colour like blood: and the whole army considering what they were then going about, began first to be troubled, and afterward terrified at the sight thereof, [Curt. lib. 4. cap. 23. and 24.] Ptolemy hath rightly observed and said, That the Moon eclipsed at Arabela, in the 2 hour of the night, and was then seen rising in Sicily, [lib. 2. cap. 70.] but Ptolemy in his Geographie, [lib. 1. cap. 4.] not so right, where he sayes, that the eclipse in the 5 hour of the night, and was seen at Carthage at the 2 hour of the night. And rightly also saith Plutarch, that the eclipse in the month Boedromion, μηνὸς τῶν Μηνῶν τῶν Βοηδρομιωνίων (i. e.) about the beginning of the mysteries at Athens, to wit, in the full Moon, of the very middle of that month; at which the Great mysteries of Athens begin to be celebrated and continued certain dayes after. As for this Eclipse, the Astronomical account sheweth evidently, that it fell upon the 20 day of our September.

Alexander, to hearten up his soldiers minds, which appeared much to be dejected at this sight, consulted with the Egyptian Soothsayers there present: and their answer was, That the Sun was the Grecians, or was the Predominant in Greece, and the Moon in Persia; and that therefore as often as the Eclipse, it portended ruine and destruction to those nations whose the was [Curtius, lib. 4. cap. 24.] Alexander presently offered sacrifices to the Sun, and Moon, and Earth: because they all three concur in the making of an Eclipse of the Moon: And Aristander, who was the Kings Soothsayer, declared openly, that that Eclipse portended all good and happy success to Alexander, and the Macedons, and that there should be a bare fought that the very month; and that the sacrifices then offered, did foretell and assuredly promise a victory thereunto Alexander, [Arria. lib. 3.]

Alexander perceiving the minds of the soldiers raised to a height of hope and confidence; thought fit to use this pang or fit of the rs, whiles it was upon them; and therefore gave order to march on the second watch of the night following, having all the way the Tigris in the right hand, and the Gordian mountains on the left. The next morning, himself with a small Troup of his own, fell upon about a thousand Persian scouts, of which some he slew, and the rest he took prisoners; and then sent some of his own company forward to discover: willing them also to quench the flame of such Towns and Villages, as the country people had set on fire: for they running away from the enemy, had set fire on Barnes and Reeks of corn, which taking in the tops, had not yet burnt down to the ground; so that the Macedons hereby saved a great quantity of food for themselves: and Mazens, who before had set fire on what he pleased, all at leisure, the enemies now coming on so fast, fled away at last, and left all standing as it was, for the enemy to take, [Curt. lib. 4. cap. 24.]

Alexander understood now, that Darius was not above 150 furlongs off, and therefore having store enough and enough of provision in his Camp, he there staid four days, [Id. ibid.]

3674- During which time he intercepted certain letters of Darius, by him sent to solicit the Grecians in his army, to murder or otherwise to betray him, [Id. 4. cap. 25.]

Staïra, Darius his wife, weary of this long travail, and vexation of mind, cast the child of which she went, and died; whereat Alexander shed many a tear, and caused a most sumptuous funeral, sparing for no cost, to be made for her, [Id. ibid. Justin. lib. 11. cap. 12. Plutarch in Alex. and lib. 2. de form. Alex.]

Tirus or Tyriotes an Eunuch, whilst others were busie about the funeral, stole away, and carried tidings of her death to Darius: who though at first infinitely perplexed and troubled at it, yet when he understood of Alexander's respect, ever had unto her, and that chaste behaviour towards her, he lift up his hands to Heaven, and praised the gods; that if it were so resolved, and no remedy left for him, yet none might fit in Cyrus his throne, but to just an enemy, so merciful a conqueror, as this Alexander was, [Curt. and Plutarch ibid.]

Darius to overcome with his great clemency, and chastity used toward his wife, he thought himself again of trying for a peace, and to that purpose sent ten of the most principal men about him, to offer him new conditions; and withall, sent him 30 thousand talents for the ransom of his mother and two daughters: and to offer him his other daughter Sepina, or Statopna, or Sartinia, or Statira (for by all these names she goes, in the several editions of Curtius) to wife, [Curt. 4. cap. 16.] and what ever lay between the Hellepont and the Euphrates for a dowry: unto whom Alexander made this answer: That he always found Darius by his moneys, soliciting sometimes his souldiers to revolt from him, sometimes his nearest friends to murder him; and therefore was resolved to pursue him to the death, not any longer as a noble enemy, but as a malefactor and a poisoning murderer: and that whatever he had already lost, or yet remaining in his hands, was but the reward of war, that war should fet the bounds of their two kingdoms, and each should have, what to morrow-dayes fortune should allot him, [Curtius, lib. 4. cap. 26. Justin lib. 11. cap. 12. Diodorus year 2. Olympiade 112.]

The Ambassadors thus sent away, told Darius, that he must fight: whereupon he presently dispatched away Mazens before him with 3000 Horle, to stop the passages where the enemy was to come; and with the rest, he marched after in good array 10 furlongs, and there made a stand, and expected the coming of the enemy. Alexander leaving all his luggage within his trenches, with a reasonable guard to keep them, set forward to meet the enemy, [Curt. ib. cap. 26. & 27.]

When at the very instant, a sudden Pannic fear fell upon his army; the reason was, for that the Heaven, (it being then the summer season) seemed to sparkle and shone out like fire, and they imagined that they saw flames of fire issuing out of Darius his Camp. Alexander by sound of trumpet signified to them, that all was well, and gave order to the Antesignary, (i. e.) those that stood next before the standard, in every company, to lay down every man his arms before his feet, and should give the word to those that followed them, to do the like: which done, he shewed them there was no cause of fear, and that the enemy was yet a far off: so to lengthen they recovered their spirits, and took up both their arms and courage again: yet for more surety, he thought fit there to make a stand; and to fortify his Camp for that present, [Id. cap. 28. Polyæ. Stratag. lib. 4.]

Alexander, drawing out all his forces by night, set forward about the second watch, purposing to fight, as soon as it was open day, [Arria. lib. 3.]

The next day, Mazens, who had taken up his standing with a choice company of horse, upon the rising of a hill, whence he might take a view of the army of the enemy, left the place, and returned to Darius, and no sooner was he gone, but the Macedons took it, both because of the advantage of ground, and also for that, from thence they might discover and have a full view of all the enemies forces, which were ranged in the plaine, [Curt. lib. 4. cap. 29.]

Alexander

Alexander commanded his Mercenary souldiers of Paonia to march in front: he drew his Phalanx, or Squadron of Macedons into two wings, both flanked with Horle, [Id. ibid.] the Camps were distant one from the other, about 60 furlongs. And now the army of Alexander was come to certain hillocks, from whence they might discern the enemy, when he advised with his Captains whether his main battell should presently from thence fall on, or make a stand there right, until he had better viewed the ground whereon they were to fight: most were of opinion for the former; Parmenion was for the latter, which Alexander himself approved of, [Arria. lib. 3.] Relieved therefore to encamp upon one of those hillocks; he gave order forthwith to put upade in ground and to entrench there, for the present: which being quickly done, he went into his own pavilion, and from thence took a view of the army of the enemy ranged beneath him in the plain, [Curt. as before.]

Mean while the horle-boys, and other tag rag, that followed the Camp, fell in sport to skirmish among themselves: Captain of the one side they called Alexander, and Captain of the other, Darius. Which when Alexander heard, he bad the rest forbear; and the two Captains onely to try it out between themselves. He himself help Alexander on with is armor; and Philotas Darius with his: all the army beheld while they twofought: as upon a prognostick of the event in the fight and war it self. It fell out, that he which played Alexander, foiled and overthrew him which played Darius; and had for a reward, 20 townships, and the honour of wearing a Persian garment bestowed on him, [Eratosthenes, in Plus, in his Alexan.]

Alexander's friends came now unto him, and complained of the souldiers, that talking among themselves in their tents, they were resolved to take all the spoile to themselves, and to bring nothing into his Treasury: Whereat Alexander smiled, and said, Very good news, my masters: it is that ye bring me; for I see by this they mean to fight, and not to flee. Many of the common souldiers also in a humor, came unto him, and bad him be of good cheer, and not be afraid of the multitude of his enemy: for that they should not be able to endure the very first noise or shout of them; for that in this place doth year 20 signify, not the smell of them, or of their arme-pics, as Xenander rendered it, [Plut. in his Apophthegmes.]

The eleventh night after the Eclipse of the Moon, and when the two armies lay in fight each of other, Darius kept his men in their arms all night, and took a view of them all by torch-light: so that all the plain lying between the mountain Niphat and the Gordian hills shone with torches. But Alexander, whose his army took their rest, was up with his Southlayer Aristander before his pavilion, busie in certain arcane and secret rites and ceremonies, and offered sacrifice to Apollo, [Id. in Alexan.] or as Curtius expresth it, Aristander in a white robe, carrying bunches of Vervin in his hand, and his head covered, mumbled certain prayers, which the King was to say after him, thereby to propitiate Jupiter, Minerva, and Victoria.

When Parmenion and other his friends advised him to set upon Darius in the dead of the night, thereby to conceale from his souldiers flight, the terror of the fight in so great a disproportion of numbers in the two armies; his answer was, that he was not come thither, to steal a victory, [Plut. Curt. Arria.] And Darius on the contrary, fearing least some such attempt should be made upon him, and knowing that his Camp was no better rampiered than it should be; kept his men up all night in armes: which for want of sleep the next day when they came to fight, was the chief cause of their overthrow, [Arria.]

Alexander, troubled in his thoughts, with the expectation of what was then in hand, slept not all night, till toward the mornings, and then fell into to deep a sleep; that when it was day all abroad, they could not wake him. And when his friends asked him what made him sleep so soundly, answered, it was Darius, who by gathering all his forces into one place, had eased him of thinking how to follow him intoundry oother countries, [Diod. year 2. Olymp. 112. Justin lib. 11. cap. 13. Curt. lib. 4. cap. 33. Plut. in Alexan.]

This battel was fought by Alexander, saith Justin, [lib. 11. cap. 14.] in the 5 year after he came to his Crown: to wit, in the very end thereof, and beginning of the sixth, though Jerom upon 11. Daniel, not so considerably writeth, that he overcame and slew Darius in the 7 year of his reign. Arrian saith, this battel was fought, when Aristophanes was L. Chancellor at Athens, in the month Pyanopsion; and that to the foretelling of Aristander was fulfilled, when he said, that in that very month, wherein the Moon was eclipsed, Alexander should both fight with Darius, and also overcome him, [Arria. lib. 3. pag. 63.] And truly in that, both he and also Diodorus do say, that it was fought in the year, when Aristophanes was L. Chancellor at Athens, there do well: whereas Dionysius Halycarnass, placeth it in the year following, when Aristophanes was L. Chancellor there, by an easie mistake of the name, as in his Epistle to Ammæus: nor was Aristander out, when he foretold, that Alexander should gain that great victory over Darius, in that very

Among others who entertained Alexander in this city, were the Chaldeans, who discoursed to him concerning the course and motions of the Stars, and fatal alterations of the times, [Curt. lib. 5. cap. 3.] From whom Callisthenes one of Alexander's followers, received the observations of the Heavenly bodies for 1903 years (pace) and transmitted them to Aristotle in Greece, as I mentioned before, in the year of the World 1771. out of Porphyrie.

Alexander himself also consulted with the Chaldeans: and by their advice, sacrificed to Belus: and whatever they prescribed him concerning the reparation of the Temples there, that he did. And thereupon, commanded the Babylonians to repair the Temples which Xerxes had formerly demolished; especially that of Belus, seated in the heart of the City: and commanded forthwith the rubble to be carried away, [Arria. lib. 3. pag. 63. and lib. 7. pag. 159.] which it self was to great a work to do, that it took up 10 thousand mens labour for two whole months, to clear the place where the Temple stood, [Strabo, lib. 16. pag. 738.] But when Alexander commanded all his army to help to carry away the rubble, the Jews only refused to set hand to that work; for which Hecataeus of Abdera, who was then with Alexander, saith, that they endured many a blow, and many other grievous inconveniences, till Alexander himself hearing their reasons, dispensed with them therein, [Josephus cont. Apion. lib. 1. pag. 1049.]

Alexander wondered at nothing more in those parts, than at a hole in the earth in Ecbatana, or rather in Batana, as other copies have it (for Batana, which is a city placed by Stephanus Byzantinus near the Euphrates, and not Ecbatana, the Metropolis of Media is here meant) where flames of fire continually break forth as out of a fountain, and a living spring of Naphta rising not far from that hole, where the fire breaketh forth; of the effects of which fiery nature here made known to Alexander, [Plutarch, in his life] speaketh more at large.

Alexander, commanding Bagophanes, (who had surrendered the Castle of Babylon) to follow him, committed the keeping thereof to Agathon, of the town of Pydina, with 700 Macedons, and 300 Mercenary souldiers: and made Mazzus, who delivered that city to him, Governour of all the Province of Babylon; setting Apollodorus of Amphipolis, and Menetes of Pella in Macedonia, to be Commanders of the Militia in that, and all the other Regions southward as far as Cilicia: and for that purpose left with them, 2 thousand souldiers, with a thousand talents of silver, to raise Mercenary souldiers with. He appointed Alcibiades Philotas his son, to gather up his tributes in those parts; and sent Mithrines, who gave up the city Sardes to him, to be Governour in Armenia, [Diodor. Arria. Curtius.]

Out of the monies which he found in Babylon, he gave to every Macedonian Horseman, 6 pound; to every stranger 5 pounds; to every Foot souldier, that was a Macedon, 2 pounds, to every stranger 2 moneths pay, [Diodor.] An Attic ounce, or pound, contained an hundred Drachmaes; which Curtius confounding with the Roman Denarius, saith, he gave to every Macedonian Horseman 600 Denarii, and to every stranger 500, and to every Foot souldier 200. [lib. 5. cap. 6.]

And now was Alexander upon his way from Babylon, when Amyntas the son of Andromenes, came to him with a supply of men sent by Antipater Governour of Macedonia; of these there were out of Macedonia it self, 500 Horse, and 6 thousand Foot: out of Thrace, 600 Horse, and 3500 Foot: out of Peloponessus, 4 thousand Foot, and 380 Horse; as Curtius, or little lesse than a full thousand as Diodorus hath it: and along with them went the children of fifty the principal Nobles of Macedonia, to be Squires of the body to the King, [Diodor. and Curtius.]

Alexander having received this supply, went onward of his journey: and in six dayes march, came into a country called Sitacene, but by Curtius Savapene; and because this country abounded with all things necessary for the life of man, therefore he made stay there many dayes; where taking an exact trial, of every mans prowesse and dexterity in the feats of Chivalry, he gave those eight, which were judged to excell the rest, every man to have the command of a thousand men. Then divided he his whole army into so many Brigades; for before that time, they went by 500 in a company, nor were those places formerly given upon trial made of their virtues, as now. And whereas before, the Horse of every Nation served together, apart from others; now making no difference of Nations, he appointed them Commanders, such as were most expert in the war of what nation soever. And having reformed the martial discipline of his army in many points, so as the whole body thereof fell into a great liking of the Head, and ready in all things to serve at his command: he then put forward and went on upon his intended journey, [Diodor. and Curtius lib. 5. cap. 6.]

And now drawing near to Sufa, there met him on the way, the son of the Governour of Sufa, with a Post, and letters from Philoxenus, whom Alexander immediately after the battel at Arbela, had dispatched away to Sufa: The effect of which letters, was this; that that the inhabitants of Sufa had given up the city to his dispose; and that all the treasure there, was reserved safe for him, [Arria. lib. 3.] and the same was delivered to him by word of mouth by the son of Abulites, the governour of the place, whether of his own accord; or whether, as some would have it, by Darius his command; to the end, that whilst he busied himself there about those money matters, himself might have the more time, to raise a new war against him, [Diodor. and Curtius lib. 5. cap. 7.]

The King entertained the young man with much grace and favour; and using him for his guide, came to the river Idaspes, al. Choaspes, which runs with a delicate, but violent stream. Here Abulites himself met him, with a princely present, among which were certain Dromedaries, or running Camels, of an incredible swiftnesse, and 12 Elephants, which Darius had sent for out of India, [Curtius lib. 3.]

Upon the day, after he left Babylon he came to Sufa, and having there made his entry, he received 50 thousand talents of silver, with all other the Kings wardrobe, and other furniture, [Arria. lib. 3.] and as much more silver in lows, saith Curtius; but Diodorus reckons upward of 400 thousand talents of silver, and gold in fowles and wedges, and 9 thousand talents coined into Daries, there found, Plutarch mentions 40 thousand talents in ready coine, and five thousand talents worth of Hermionick scarlet, which had been laid up there 190 years before, and yet lookt as fresh, as it did the first day it was laid up.

There again did Alexander offer sacrifice, according to the Macedonian manner, by torch-light, and exhibited gymnick pastimes and exercises, [Arrianus.] Then fate he him down in the royal throne of Persia, far higher than for the proportion of his body to sit on; and therefore, when his feet would not reach to the step by which he mounted it, one of the pages took the table, whereat Darius used to eat his meat, and put it under, for a footstool unto him: which Philotas perceiving, perswaded him to take it for a signe of good luck unto him, [Diodor. and Curt. lib. 5. cap. 7.]

As for robes, and other purple stuff which was sent him out of Macedon, with those which wrought them, he sent it all to Darius his mother Syfigambes, whom he respected in all points, and honoured as a son should do his mother: adding wishal in his message to her, that if she liked those works, she should do well to let her young nieces to learn to work them; whereat when he understood that she was not a little troubled in her minde, he went himself, and excused the matter to her, by his ignorance of the Persian manners of doing in that kind, and comforted her again, [Curt. lib. 5. cap. 8.] and so left her, and Darius his two young daughters, and his little son Ochus at Sufa, and departed; leaving some to instruct both her and them in the Macedonian language, [Diodor.]

And so himself went forward toward the utmost bounds of Persia, leaving Archelaus with a garrison of three thousand souldiers to keep the city, and Xenophilus to manne the Castle, and Callicrates to gather up his tributes. But for the civil government of the province of Sufa, he committed it to Abulites, who had given up all unto him, [Curt. lib. 5. cap. 8.] But sent back Menetes to the sea side, and made him governour of Phoenicia, Syria and Cilicia, [Arria. lib. 3.]

Alexander, in four dayes march, came to the river called Pafitigris: and having passed it, with 9 thousand foot, and 3 or 4 thousand horse; went into the country of the Uxians, bordering upon the province of Sufa; and tuning out into the principal part of Persia, between which and that, there is a narrow passage: Madates was governour of this country, who had married Syfigambes her sisters daughter.

Alexander gave Tauron 1500 mercenaries, and upon the point 1000 Agrians, and bad him with them to set forward as soon as it grew dark, and following his guides, to go, by such by-ways and secret passages as they should shew him, and advance as far as to the city, which himself purposed to besiege. He then taking with him the Squires of his body and his Targateers, and some 8 thousand other souldiers, set forward at the third watch at the same night, and by break of day, came to those streights, which opened into the Uxians country, and having passed them, came and fate down before the city. The Uxians seeing themselves hem'd in on all parts with a siege, sent out of the Castle there 30 men in suppliant wile, to crave his pardon; but that would not doe: yet at length having received letters of request from Syfigambes, he did not onely pardon Madates her kinsman, but restored all as well prisoners, as those who had voluntarily submitted to him, to their pristine liberty, and left the city untouched, and their land all over tribute free, [Curtius lib. 5. cap. 9.] For Arrianus reports out of Ptolemaeus Lagi, that at Syfigambes her entreaty, he left them indeed their lands to till, but put a yearly tribute upon them, of 100 horses, and 500 beasts for carriage, and 3000 sheep; for this whole relation, is diversely made by Diodore, Curtius and Arrianus.

Alexander, having subdued the country of the Uxians, laid it to the Province of Sufa, and parting all his forces between himself and Parmenion, commanded the luggage, and the Thessalian Horse, and confederates and foreign mercenaries, and the coelestials, to go with him through the champion country; but himself taking with him the Macedonian Foot, and the Horse of his confederates, and light Horse, which he lent before him to discover, with the quadron of Agrians, and archers, went by the side of the mountain, which run all along in a ridge as far as unto Persia. Clement's lib. 5, cap. 10. Arria, lib. 3.

Upon the fifth day after, as Diodorus and Curtius say, he came to the streights of Perfa, called the Sulian Pyles, or Gares. These Ariobarzanes the Persian kept with 25 thousand Foot, and 300 Horle, as Diodorus saith; or with near about 4 thousand Foot, and 7 hundred Horle, as Arrianus: And he there repulld Alexander with losse and shame, and made him retreat 30 furlongs off from that passage: But at last, having taken a certain shepherd prisoner, who was borne of a Persian mother, but begotten by a father borne in Lycia: and being by him guided thorough narrow and craggy by-paths, and over certain snowie mountains, he routed the enemy, and opened a fair and free passage thorough those streights. Yet Ariobarzanes with some 40 Horles, and 5 thousand Foot, brake thorough the army of the Macedons, to get into Laughter, as well of them, as of his own men, heading by all means possible, to get into Persepolis, which was the Metropolis or Head City of that kingdom; but being kept out there, and the enemy following him at the very heels, he fell back upon them, and in a second fight, wasby them cut in peeces, with all that followed him: all which is more fully related by Diodorus, Curtius, Arrian, Plutarch, and Polyenus, lib. 4. strag. 1. and is thus followed by Curtius, Arrian, and Plutarch, lib. 4. strag. 1. and is thus followed by Curtius, Arrian, and Plutarch, lib. 4. strag. 1.

more fully related by Diodor, Curtius, Arrian, Ptolemaeus and Strabo. As he was now marching forward toward Persepolis, letters met him from Tiridates, Darius his Treasurer in that place, throwing him the inhabitants of Persepolis hearing of his approach, were all fled, leaving him to fall upon the Kings treasure, and to share it among themselves. He then sent his army to follow him to make all possible haste to prevent his return. He then leaving his Foot to come after, travelled all night with his Horse. He then being already tired with so long a journey, and came by break of day to the river Araxes; and there making a bridge, passed over with his army. Diodor, and Curtius lib. 5, cap. 11.

lib. 5, cap. 11.] And now he was come within two furlongs of the City, when about some 8 hundred (for so Diodorus, Justinus, and Suidas, in the word Alexander, report, not 4 thousand, as Curtius) poor Grecian slaves, following one Euctemon of Orama in Eolia, came forth as humble suppliants to meet him. These were such as the former Kings of Persia had taken in the wars, and made slaves of them; and in case of cruelty, had hitherto kept alive, some their Feet, some their hands, some their eares, and other their noses cut off, branding them all with letters or other marks in their faces, as he law. These beought him, that as he had done Greece, to he would now vouchsafe to deliver them from the slavery of the Persian cruelty; they desired him rather to lay them out, and bestow a convoy with them into Greece, they desired him rather to lay them out, and bestow some lands among them there right; least that, in case they were, they should not prove a comfort, but an abomination to their friends and kinsfolks, at home. The King approving their motion, gave to every of them, 3 thousand Drachmaes, (which Curtius in this place also renders, by the word Denaries) and 5 sutes of raiment for a man, and as many for every woman, and two yoke of oxen, and 500 sheep and 50 bushells of wheat, whereby they might go in hand to till and sow the land, which he had laid out for them: And moreover, exempted their land from paying all manner of tribute, and left them to protect them, and to see that no man should wrong them, [Diodoro and Curtius, ib. cap. 2, with Justin, lib. 11, cap. 14.]

The next day, calling together all the Commanders, and Captains of his army, he declared to them, that this City Persepolis, the Metropolis of Persia, had ever been most outrageously bent against the Grecians, and that therefore he was resolved to give the plunder of it to the souldier, all save the Kings Palace; whereupon there presently followed a huge laughter of the prisoners which they had taken. And this he avowed as his own act in writing, thinking it to be for his honour, that he commanded them, as enemies to be butchered. Plutarch says, that he found treasure there, equal to that at Sula. Diodorus writeth, that coming into the Fort or Citadel, he found therein 1200 thousand talents, reckoning the gold after the rate of the silver; which is the same summe which Curtius haib, lib. 5. cap. 13.

When Alexander first lay down in Persepolis, upon the Royal Throne under a golden Canopy, Demetrius the Corinthian, and an old friend of his, and his fathers before him, is reported to have fallen like an old man a weeping, and to have laid withal, That those Grecians lost a great pleasure, who died before that day, and lived not to behold Alexander sitting in Darius his Throne; [Plut. in Alexan.]

Alexander left the keeping of the Citadal or Castle of Persepolis to the keeping of Nicarchides

Nicarhides, with a garriſon of 5 thouſand Macedons, Tiridates alſo, who delivered the treaſure to him, held the ſame ſtate and office, which he had under Darius; and leaving there a great part of his army and ſtuff, committed the keeping of the city to Parmenion and Craterus himſelf, with a thouſand horſe, and light armed foot, went to viſit the inner parts of Perſia at the riſing of the ſeven ſtars: and although he was intolerably vexed with ſtormes, and other tempeſtuous weather upon the way, yet he went through to the place, which he intended: by the way, he came to a place all covered with ſnow, and frozen over with ice: But he, ſeeing his ſouldiers at a ſtand, leap off his horſe, and went himſelf on foot over the ice and ſnow: The country people, which dwelt ſcattered in cresses and cabans, when they ſaw troops and companies of the enemy, fell on killing ſuch of their children and other, as were not able to go with them, and fled all to the wild woods and mountains, covered with ſnow: But ſome of them, being drawn to a parley, they by little and little, laid a ſide their fright, and ſubmitted to the king, nor did Alexander ſuffer any hurt to be done unto them: [Curt. 5. c. 14.]

At length, having wafted the country of Persia all over, and taken sundry townes thereof, he came into the country of the Mardi; a warlike Nation, and far differing in behaviour from the Persians: which yet Alexander took in, and returned to Persepolis, the thirtieth day after he set out from thence; then he fet him to bestow his rewards upon his Nobles and others, to every man according to his deserts: giving away almost what ever he had there gotten (Id. Ibid.)

This journey of his, taken, as I laid before, about the rising of the seven Itars, Curtius only deficiencies, whereas Plutarch saies that, because the winter now grew on, to give his army some ease, he therefore [spent 4 months in Persia, now Pliny lib. 18. cap. 31.] tells us, that the Athenians began their winter upon the Ides of November, when the seven Itars set: But the course of times, reckoned from the battle at Gaugamela, when that Alexander could not come to Persepolis before our December: others also call a doubt concerning the Mardis themselves: for Curtius tells us, that he subdued them not till after the death of Darius, [lib. 6. cap. 9.] unless we will distinguish the Mard of Persia (mentioned by Herodotus lib. 1. cap. 12, 5, and by Nearchus in Strabo lib. 11. pag. 524, and Arrianus in his Indica, pag. 196.) from those Mards, which bordered upon Hircania: neither doth that Curtius, where he saith that he gave away almost all that he got at Persepolis: for he speaks expressly of that, and not of what he got at Palargadia (as we flew before, in the year of the world 3669, our of Jacobus Capellus) well agree, with that which himself delivered in the very end of the next precedent chapter, where he saith, that Alexander commanded Hories and Camels to be sent for from Babylon and Susa, to carry along those one hundred and twenty thousand talents which he found in this city, which we may compare with that of Strabo, [lib. 15. pag. 731.] where he speaketh in this wise: All the moneys of Persia (saith he) he carried off of Susa, which is self was full of treasure, and rich stuffe: It is delivered for certain, that whae ever he got in Babylon, and in Darius his Camp, and never came into this country, in Persia it is self and Susa, where were found 40 thousand talents: some say, 50 thousand. And with that in Ides of November, where he saith, that when he was foretold to lose the money there gotten, upon the necessary uses of his wars, and purposed to send part of it to Susa to be laid up there in bank, yet was he faine to get a multitude of horses, both of draught, and carriages, and 3 thousand Camels with pack saddles from Babylon, and out of Medopotamia: to carry his treasure to appointed places and Plu. moreover tells us, in Alexan. lib. 1. that his moneys and stuffe from thence taken, wanted 10000 yokes of mules, and 5000 camels, to carry them away.

Darius, staying a while at Ecabaran in Media, gathered together, those which were left of the overthrow, and furnish them with arms again, that had lost their own in the flight: he sent also for new supplies out of the neighbouring nations of his dominions: he also sent to the Governors and Officers in Bactria, and other countries, to continue firm in their allegiance to him; [Diader. in the 2^d part of his 17 book;] and his purpose was that, if Alexander stood hankering about Sufa and Babylon, he would stay in Media, to see whether they who were about him, might not happily raise some new commotions; but if he found that he purposed to pursue him, then to retire to Parthia and Hircania, and even into Bactria if left: and by wafting all the countries as he went, to leave Alexander no possibility of following him, for want of forage: wherefore he sent away before him, all the women, and other baggage and baggage, and carriages whatsoever to the Caspian Gates, in expectation, how things might go. Arria. lib. 3. And when he had gathered together, (said at Ecabaran) in expectation, how things might go, Arria. lib. 3. he sent away before him, all the women, and other baggage and baggage, and carriages whatsoever to the Caspian Gates, in expectation, how things might go. Arria. lib. 3. And when he had gathered together, (said at Ecabaran) in expectation, how things might go, Arria. lib. 3.

Alexander made a feast for his victories already gotten, and offered magnificent sacrifices to his gods; and feasted his Nobles, with a most lumpsuous banquet; with flocks of whores and curtlans among: every one with her ruffian: Among these there was one Thais, an Athenian borne, and a sweet-heart to Prolomæus Lagi, his son; at whose drunken motion, Alexander, no less far gone in wine than the herself was, commanded all Persepolis, both City and Castle, to be set on a light fire, with caroling, and instruments.

This City of Rages (mentioned Tobit. x. v. 14. and 4. v. 1.) is but one dayes journey from the Calpian gates, or streights, to a man that would ride Alexanders pace; but Darius was already passed them; and many of those which set out with him were, in his journey slip away from him; and gone every man to his own home: and many of them also rendered themselves to Alexander upon the way, [Arria. ibid.]

Alexander, growing out of all hopes of overtaking Darius, rested him there right, five dayes; and having refreshed his army, made Oxylates a Persian born governour of Media, whom formerly Darius had committed to prison in Susa, purposing to have had his head, [Id. ib. with Curt. lib. 6. cap. 2.]

From hence Alexander went with his army into Parthia: and the first day he encamped near the Calpian gates: but the next day he entered the gates or streits themselves, and passing thorough them, came into places, well inhabited. And when he had given order for provisions to be brought into him, (for he was informed that he was to go thorough countries, where no such provision was to be had) he sent Coenus with the horse and some few companies of foot abroad to forrage, [Arria. ib.]

Mean while Bagithenes a great man in Babylon, came out of Darius his Camp to him; by whom he understood for certain, that Darius was not yet laid hold on, but was in great danger, either of death or bonds, [Id. ibid. Curtius lib. 5. cap. 24.]

Alexander hereupon made the more haist after him: and therefore not staying for Coenus his return from forraging, took along with him his fellow Cavaleers, and his want Couriers, and the Mercenary horse, led by Erigyus, and the Macedon battalion (saving such as were left to guard his treasure) with the Agrians and Archers, and leaving Craterus to command the rest, willed him to come after by more easie journeys. Travelling therefore all that night, and the next day till noon, he rested him for a while; and then travelling all night again, early next morning came to that Camp of Darius, from whence Bagithenes came unto him: and thence again setting forward, and riding all that night, and the next day till noon, he came to a certain village, where they who had the charge of keeping Darius lay the day before, as Artianus sayes, or as Curtius hath it, where Bessus laid first hold on him.

Having now rode 500 furlongs, from the place where Bagithenes first came unto him, he lighted upon one Melon, who was Darius his interpreter. He not able forthwith weaknelle to follow Darius any further, and seeing Alexander came on so fast, made as if he had fled over to him from Darius, for fear he should else be taken for an enemy: by him Alexander understood the truth of matters, how they went. But weary his men were, and rest they must: but himself making choice of six thousand horse; he took again out of them 3 hundred Dimachys, (who were heavy Carleers on their backs, yet rode on horse-back: but if need were, alighted, and served on foot, so sayes Curtius: but Arrianus lib. 3. cap. 68.) thus, when he saw, that the foot could not possibly keep pace with him, running thus on horse-back, he made about 500, of the horse-men alight, and commanded the Captains, and prime men of the foot companies, all armed as they were, to get upon them. To Nicanor, who commanded the Targateers, and Artalus Colonel of the Squadron of Agrians, he gave in charge, to follow on the way, that Bessus was gone with his men, with those, who were lightest armed: and the rest, he commanded to come after in a square battalion.

Whiles Alexander was thus busie in giving orders: Ocellus and Mihracenes came unto him; who in detestation of Bessus his fowle act, fled over to him, and told him that the Persians were not above 500 furlongs off: and that they could bring him to them, a nearer way. Taking them therefore for his guides, he set out with the first of the evening with a select company of horse, and went the way they led him, commanding the Macedonian Phalanx or Squadron to follow him, as fast as possibly they could; and now he had gone 300 furlongs, when one Bronchelus (called by Artianus pag. 67. Aristobolus) the son of Mazeus, sometimes governour of Syria under Darius, met him, and as one flying over to him, informed him, that Bessus was not above 200 furlongs before him, and that his army doubting of no danger near, marched they cared not how, and out of all order, that they were bound, as it seemed, for Hircania, if he made haist, he might fall upon them, all stragling from their colours, [Curt. lib. 5. cap. 24.]

Bessus and his conforts, finding Alexander to be now upon the back of them, went to Darius, where he was in his poor tired cart, and desired him to get to horse, and save himself by flight: which when he refused to do, Satibarzenes and Barbaentes, threw each of them his dart at him, and having wounded him in sundry parts, left him: they also houghed the horses that drew him, that they might go no further, and killed his two servants that still attended on him, [Curt. lib. 5. cap. 25. with Arria. pag. 69. lib. 3.] only his dog kept with him, [Elia. Histor. animal. lib. 6. cap. 25.]

This done, Satibarzenes and Barbaentes, with 600 horse, fled away as fast as possibly they could, [Arria. pag. 69.] And that they might not be pursued upon one and the same track, Nabarzenes fled into Hircania, Bessus into Baetria: The rest, having lost their Captains, dispersed themselves, some here, some there: only five hundred of the horse, kept in a bodie, uncertain what to doe, fight or flee, [Curtius. m. supra.]

Alexander, seeing in what confusion the enemy was, sent Nicanor to bid them stay: himself followed after; and having slain about 3 thousand of them that would not yield, drove the rest before him like to many cattle, without hurting them, and gave the word, to kill no more; and halted forward so speedily, that scanty 3 thousand horse followed him. But all the companies of the enemy that fled, fell into their hands, that came after him; so that the number of prisoners, was greater than of those that took them: and lo far had fear bereft them of their senses, that they never perceived or considered, either how many themselves, or how few their enemies were, [Id. ibid.]

Mean while the horses which drew Darius his cart, having none to drive them, strided out of the rode way: and having gone some 4 furlongs, stood still in a certain valley, fainting, what with the heat of the weather, what with the hurts they had received; There was not far off a fountain of water: which one Polytratus a Macedonian born, having learnt out by the country people, all tired out with heat and wounds as he was, went to quench his thirst at. And as he was taking up water in his head-peece, he spied the darts which stuck in the bodies of the horses, that were in the cart, [Id. ibid.] And coming nearer, he saw Darius lying in the cart; grievously wounded, but not quite dead: And Darius calling to him for a little water, and having drunk it off desired him to carry his thanks to Alexander for the favour which he had shewed, to his mother; and to his wife and children: craving of him, nothing but an honest burial for himself; and as for revenge, it concerned not him, so much as it did Alexander himself, and the common right of Kings; which to neglect might prove, not only dishonourable, but also dangerous unto him; the one concerning him in point of justice, the other, of profit and safety to his person: in token whereof, he gave him, he said, his right hand, to carry to Alexander; and to giving his hand to Polytratus, he gave up the ghost, [Id. lib. 1. c. 5. with Plut. in Alex.]

And thus ended Darius his dayes, in the year when Aristophantus, was L. Chancellor in Athens, in the month Hecatombæon: when he had lived about 50 years, [Arri. lib. 3. pag. 69.] and had reigned 6 years, in the year from the death of Cyrus, who set up the Persian Empire, 200, in the very beginning of the 3 year of the 113 Olympiade: From whence also Calippus (a man renowned by Aristotle, who was at that time grown famous in his schoole at Athens, lib. 1. 2. of his Metaphisicks) began his Periodus, or account of 76 years: as we find by divers Astronomical observations of Ptoleme, in his great Syntaxis, thereunto applied; for though Strabo, lib. 6. saith, that Darius lost his Empire at the battle of Gaugamela, fought nine years before, and Justin, in his eleventh book, affirms, that then Alexander took the Empire of Asia out of his hand, yet since it appeareth, that Darius being murdered by his kinsfolke, lost both life and kingdom all at once, as Justin in the end of his 10 book speakeeth; we can no longer doubt but that Calippus, in memorial of Alexanders Empire, or Monarchy of Asia, made this the terme or Epocha of his Periodus, or calculation of years.

Now to this Monarchie of Alexander, Hydore and B. da out of Eusebius his Chronicle, allow but five years only: Jul. Africa, fix, and the Chronologer, which wrote in the time of Alexander Severus, leven, [Tomæ 2. Antiquar. Lætitio Hen. Cavellus, p. 600.] Strabo in the end of his 15 books, ten or eleven. Nicephorus Constantinopolitanus in his Chronicle, twelve, and Clemens Alexandrinus, [lib. 1. Stromat.] thirteen of all others from the mark, eighteen: since it is most manifest, that from the month Hecatombæon, wherein Darius died, when Aristophantus was L. Chancellor at Athens, to the month Thargelion, wherein Alexander departed this life, as we shall shew anon, and when Hegelias was L. Chancellor there, there passed only fix years, and ten months, in which small space of time, he did such so many, and so great feats of armes in the east, that he may well be said to have shewen, rather than to have marched over all those regions; whence it is, that in Daniel [c. 8. v. 1.] he is described under the type and figure of a Goate coming from the west, over the face of the whole earth, and never so much as touching the ground, and [c. 7. v. 6.] to a winged Pard, a beast, as Hierome upon that place noteth, of all others, the wisest and truest, (i. c.) importuns: for as he there addeth, nothing was so soon dispatched, as that conquest of his, who from the gulph of Venice, and the Adriatic sea, to the very Indian Ocean, and the river Ganges, ran through all, not so much with battle, as with villorie: now what he did after the death of Darius, is all delivered by Diodorus, in the second part of his 17 book; by Justin, [lib. 12.] by Curtius, in the five last books of his History: by Plutarch in his life: and by Arrianus in his 3 book, and the four following: out of all all which I have thought good here to infer the order of his gifts, as followeth.

Darius was no sooner dead, but Alexander taking his horse with him, came to the place where he lay, and seeing the dead body of him, wept to see to unworthy a death befallen so high a person; and took his own coat, and cast it over him, and forthwith sent him to his mother, to be buried in a royal manner, with the kings of Persia: he took also his brother Oxathres into the number of his friends and nobles; using him with all honour belonging to his high place and parentage; and presently set himself to pursue Bessus: but for as much as he was gotten an infinite way before him into Bactria, seeing he could not for the present reach him, he came back again.

Whiles he remained at Hecatompolis which was a City in Parthiene, built in former ages by the Grecians, and had there gotten good store of provisions together; there grew a noise which went thorough all the army, as they lay idle in their quarters, that they should all forthwith return into Greece. Alexander, when he had allayed this rumor, and they all bad him lead them whither he would, and they would follow him; alter 3 dayes march thorough the country of Parthiene, came into the borders of Hircania, which Nabarzanes had seized on: and there leaving Craterus with such as he commanded, and, out of Amyntas his Brigade, six hundred Horse, and as many Archers, to keep Parthiene safe from the incursion of the bordering Nations. He commanded Erigyus to look to the carriages, and to follow him thorough the champion country with a considerable company to guard them. Himself, taking with him his Targateers, and the best of the Macedonian Squadron, and some archers, and, following with them marched one hundred furlongs, encamped in a plain near to a small river.

He had now refreshed his army there four dayes, when letters came to him from Nabarzanes, who, together with Bessus, had murdered Darius; by which he rendered himself unto him: from hence Alexander removed 20 furlongs onward, thorough an almost impassable way; yet having no enemy to oppose him, he gat thorough: and having proceeded some 30 furlongs further, Phradapharnes Governour of Hecania, and Parthiabothe, met him, and (surrendered to him, himself, and all those, who after Darius his death, had fled unto him; all whom he graciously received, and then came to a Town called Arvas. Here Craterus came unto him, who had taken in all the countries which he had passed thorough by fair means or foul. Erigyus also with the carriages, came to him at the same place. He brought with him to his presence Phradates, al. Autrophadates, Governour of the country of the Taurins; and him Alexander restored, and sent him back to his Government again.

When Alexander was now come to the first borders of Hircania, Artabazus the Persian, who was an old guest of Philips, what time he was banished by Ochus, and had ever continued most loyal to Darius; and was now 95 years of age, came unto him with Cophenes, and eight other sons of his, borne all of the same mother, being the sister of Mentor and Memnon; and Alexander received them all most graciously; Ariobarzanes also and Arfames, Governours formerly of Darius his appointment, came in and submitted to him.

Alexander invaded now the country of the Mardians, bordering upon Hircania; which possessing themselves of the passages in the mountains, met him there with an army of 8000 men. These set upon, and slew many of them: took more of them prisoners, and made the rest flee into the craggy mountains. Whereupon, at length they sent him home his horse Bucephalus, which they had taken, and craved his pardon, by 50 Ambassadors which they sent unto him. And Alexander, taking hostages of them, made Autrophodates Governour over them, as he had over the Taurins.

From thence he returned in five dayes to the place from whence he set forth against the Mardians, and thither came to him Andronicus the son of Agerrus and Artabazus, and by his command, brought with them, 1500 Greeks, who had been in pay with Darius in his life time, and 90 Ambassadors, which had from sundry nations been sent unto Darius. Alexander committed the four Lacedemonian Ambassadors, and Drops the Athenian to prison: As for Democritus the other Athenian Ambassador, because he had ever opposed the Macedonian faction, and therefore depaired of all pardon from Alexander, he slew himself. The Ambassadors from Suope, and Hecraclides, who were sent from Carthage, and other Ambassadors out of Greece, he set all at liberty: he gave the command of such Grecians as stayed in his service unto Andronicus: But Artabazus, having heaped double the honours upon him, of whatever he held under Darius, he sent away to his own home.

Having thus ordered these things, he marched against the greatest City of all Hircania, called Zadracarta, al. Zadracarta, and there stayed 15 dayes. Here Nabarzanes came unto him, bringing with him infinite presents; among which, one was Bagoas, Bagoas, an Eunuch of a rare beauty; who was afterward in great esteem, and could do all in all with Alexander himself.

Here Thalestris, al. Minitha, Queen of the Amazons, lying between those rivers, Phasis and Thermoodon, is said to have come unto him, with 3 hundred Ladies leaving the rest of her army upon the borders of Hircania, of purpose to be with child by him; and upon that errand, stayed with him 13 dayes. Curtius in this place contrary to the stream of all Geographers, would needs place these Amazons, upon the borders of Hircania, [lib. 6. cap. 10.] whereas Justin sayes, they bordered upon the Abanias, [lib. 42. cap. 3.] Clitarchus saith, that Thalestris came from the Caspian Gates, and the river Thermoodon to Alexander: and that she came 25. al. 35. dayes journey to him, thorough 11 known & thousand furlongs, [Strabo lib. 11.] This coming of hers to Alexander is reported by Polycrates, Oneliscus, Antigones, Hifter, and sundry others. But Antistobulus Chares al. Strabo lib. 11. the Reporter, Ptolemus Lagi, Anticlidis, Philo Thebanus, Philippus, al. Strabo lib. 11. the Reporter, Hecateus Ereticifus, Philippus Chalcedenis, and Duris Samius, say all that it is naught else but a meer fable: to which Alexander himself seems to Agree, who in his Commentaries, writing therein all things exactly to Antigonus saith indeed, that a certain Scythian offered him his daughter to wife; but of an Amazon not a word. It is reported also, that Oneliscus, many years after reading his fourth book, to Lyfimachus then reigning, mentioned, something of an Amazon, that came to Alexander, whereto he smiled; and I pray Sirs, said he, where was she the while? [Plut. in Alex. see Strabo, lib. 11. p. 505, and Arrian, lib. 1. pag. 155, 156.]

Alexander, returning into Parthiene, gave over himself there, to all kind of Persian pride and luxury, he commanded also his nobles to take and wear the long Persian robe, of cloth of gold and scarlet, and if any of the common soldiers had a mind to a Persian wench, he suffered him to marry her.

Bessus, wearing now his turban upright and pointed, and other regal attire, took upon him the title of Artaxerxes, and king of Asia; and gathered into a body all those Persians which were fled into Bactria, and the Bactrians themselves, and his confederates the Scythians, and others inhabiting as far as the bank of the river Tanais, purposing with them to make a war upon Alexander.

Alexander, on the other side, made Amminapes a Parthian born, Governour of Parthia and Hircania under him, for that he with Mazeus, al. Mezaces, had delivered up Egypt formerly into his hands, yet joynd with him, in that charge. Tlepolemus, one of his Nobles, [Arrian, lib. 3. pag. 69.] though Curtius saies, that he made Menaps (for to he shortly calls Amminapes) governour of Hircania, who, being heretofore banished by Ochus, had fled for refuge to his father Philip, [lib. 6. cap. 8.] Justin sayes, that, having subdued Parthia, he made a certain Noble man of Persia, called Andragoras, Governour thereof: from whom the kings of Parthia, that afterward were, lineally came, seeing that his name, who was afterward put down by Arsaces the latter up, and founder of the Parthian kingdom, was also called Andragoras, [Justin, lib. 41. cap. 4.]

Alexander, after this, came to Susia, a city of the Arians, and thither came to him Satibarzanes, governour of the Arians, and to him he restored his government to hold it under him, but joynd Anaxippus, one of his own Nobles to hold it with him, giving him 40 javelins on horse-back to attend him, to dispose of in places where he thought fit to keep the Arians from being plundered or otherwise wronged by the army, as it passed by.

Alexander, being now ready to march against Bessus, when he saw that his army, laden with the spoile, and furniture of luxury which they had gotten, was scarcely able to stir under it, he commanded first his own, then the stuff and carriages, leaving onely what was meetly necessary for their present use, to be set on fire.

Nicanor, the son of Parmenion, Captain of the Argypatides, (i. e.) of the silver shields, or Targateers, died suddenly, and was much lamented by all, especially by the King himself, who would fain have staid to be present at his funeral: but want of provisions in that place would not suffer him; wherefore leaving there his brother Philotas with 2600 men to perform his obsequies, he went on his journey, in pursuit of Bessus.

Satibarzanes, to whom Alexander had restored his government over the Arians, as was said before, having murdered Anaxippus, with his 40 javelins on horse-back, gathered all the power he could to the chiet city of the Arians, called Chortacana, al. Artacoana, and from thence hearing that Alexander came on, he purposed to go and join himself with Bessus, as in a common war against the Macedons.

Alexander, hearing hereof, brake off his journey into Bactra, and having marched 600 furlongs in two dayes, came to Artacoana; whereupon Satibarzanes with 2000 Horle (for he could make no more at that present) fled away into Bactra to Bessus: the rest gat them away all to the mountains. And the King having pursued Satibarzanes a great while, but not able to overtake him, fell upon those who were got into the mountains and took the craggy rocks, whereinto 13 thousand of the Arians, all armed, had retired themselves, and so returned to Artacoana; which was in the mean time besieged by Craterus: and he having prepared all things ready for an assault, stayed onely for the return of Alexander: that the honour thereof as reason was, might be his; as Joab did to David, [2 Sam. 6. 12. v. 17. 28.] But the King, when he came and found them ready to implore his mercy, did not onely pardon them, and raise his siege, but also restored to every man his own again: and having within 30 dayes taken in all the places of that country, made Arfaces their Governour, and so departed.

Then came fresh supplies unto him: Zoisus brought him 400 Horle out of Greece, Antipater sent him 3 thousand souldiers out of Illyrium; Philip the son of Menelaus, brought him certain mercenary Horle out of Media, with 130 of those Thebaisians, who when they were all dismissed from Ecbatane to return into their own country, would not go, but continued still in the Kings pay. Out of Lydia also, came to him 2600 Foot, with 300 Horle, commanded, as Arrianus seems to say, by one Andromachus.

Having thus increased his number, he came to the Drangeans (whom Arrianus calls Zarangeans) whose Governour was Barzantes, one of those, who with Bessus and Nabarzanes, set upon Darius whilst he was in his flight. He, for fear of punishment from Alexanders hand, got him secretly away to the Indians on this side the river Indus.

Alexander had now spent 5 dayes in the chief City of the Drangean country, when some of his own people began to conspire his death: One Dimnus, a Macedonian borne, discovered to Nicomachus his bardash, that three dayes hence, Alexander would be murdered, and that he himself was of counsel with sundry noble personages in that action. Nicomachus, though he had sworn secrecy to Dimnus, yet imparted the businesse to his brother Ceballinus, desiring him to acquaint the King therewith. But Ceballinus, because he could not have access to the King himself, disclosed it to Philotes first: and then, finding him cold in the businesse, and like enough to be himself of the lame plot, went to Metron, a noble young gentleman, and Master of the Artillery, and advised him to acquaint the King with it out of hand. Alexander, hearing thereof, commanded forthwith all to be laid hold on. Dimnus, being taken, knew well enough what the matter was, and therefore presently drew his own sword, and fell upon it. Ceballinus, being questioned, protested, that the very hour wherein he heard of it, he disclosed the matter to Philotas, desiring him to acquaint the King with it. Philotas being charged therewith, said 'twas true; but that, not out of any ill meaning, but onely thorough over-sight and heedlesse he committed it: and that it seemed to him but a trifle; yet, being afterward had to the wrack, he confessed all, and thereupon with the rest of the conspirators in that action, was put to death.

Then was also called in question before a council of Macedons, one Alexander Lyncestes, for an old conspiracy of his, for which he had already lain in prison 3 years: as Diodorus and Curtius say. This is that Alexander Aneropus, who before the battle at Issus, which was now 4 years past, was committed to prison for praesiding the Kings death: as appears out of Diodorus, Justin, and Arrianus: see before [Ar. mem. 3. 67. 1.] and that he had been tampering about the Kings death, more than once before, appears by those words of Alexander to his Council of Macedons, in Curtius, [lib. 8. cap. 16.] where he says: Alexander Lyncestes, saith he, twice arraigned for two several treasons against my life, I have twice taken out of the hand of Justice; and being a third time convicted, I relieved him, and kept him in prison these 3 years (for so it should be according to the true Palatine Manuscript, and not two years, as in the ordinary printed books) and till you now desired, that he might be brought to his deserved punishment. For indeed, being upon this occasion drawn again into question, before the Judges, and there faulting in his answers, he was without more ado, thrust thorough with launces by those which stood about and heard him at the bar.

The body of Lyncestes being carryed out of the place, the King sitting still in judgement, caused Amyntas the son of Andromenes, with Antalus and Symmachus his brothers, all most intimate friends of Philotas, to be brought to the bar. For Polemon the youngest of all, when he heard that Philotas was had to the wrack, fled away: but was taken, and brought to judgement too. Yet at last, Alexander acquitted them all, by his own mouth, upon the general intercession of those that then were there present: And then immediately he dispatched away Polydamas, one whom Parmenion loved, no man better, with two Arabians upon Dromedary Camels into Media, that they might might

might prevent the newes of Philotas his death in those parts, with letters of credence, to Cleander, Stalces and Menidas, commanders in the army under him, to make him away: being then Governor of Media, and of greatest repute and authority, next the king, in the army. And by them was Parmenion, being now 70 years of age, whilst having read Alexanders letter, he was reading a second letter, written to him in the name of his son Philotas, stabbed and done to death: Cleander sent his head to the king, and would hardly suffer the rest of his body to be buried. Scarbo tells us, that this tear was gone about and finished in eleven dayes space: which ordinarily taketh up 3 or 40 dayes journey, in the very going, [lib. 15. p. 724.]

Alexander fearing least the glory and lustre of all his actions, might be blemished and obscured with a spot of cruelty in such proceedings, did, as Gaos formerly (Ammon. 362. ut sup.) did, (l. c.) he gave it forth, that he was to send some friends of his into Macedonia; and advised all men that would, to write to their friends in those parts; as not liketo have the like opportunity in haste again, seeing they were going further eastward: every man therefore wrote; and he took order to have all the packets brought to him: whereby finding what every mans opinion of him and his doings was, he calt all those, whom he found either weary of the war, or milking of his actions, into one company, which he termed, Arachosia, (l. c.) the unruly company; to be led by Leonidas, formerly an intimate friend of Parmenions, and then dividing his fellow Cavaleers into two Regiments, he assigned the one part to be commanded by Hephæstion, and the other by Citus.

Having settled matters among the Drangians, he marched toward them, which were called of old, Agialpes, Ar. Arimalpi, but of later times by Cyrus, for a benefit by him received from them, surnamed Euergetæ, (l. c.) Benefactors; and was there lovingly received and entertained by them.

After five dayes stay, made in that country, tidings came to him that Satibarzanes with two thousand horle, sent him by Bessus, had made a fresh inroad upon the Arians, and had drawn them away from his allegiance. Against him therefore, he dispatched away six thousand Grecian foote, and six hundred horle, under the command of Eripius and Caranus, or as Diodorus says, Strafarus command, together with Artabazus the Persian, and Andronicas, and Phrataphernes, the Governour of Parthia.

He himself remained among the Euergetæ, and there sacrificed to Apollo, and committed Demetrius, one of the Squires of his body, whom he suspected for a conspirator with Philotas, and put Ptolemei the son of Lagus, into his place. Upon these Euergetæ he bestowed a large summe of money, and such lands as they desired to be laid unto them, which was not much: and being in like manner welcomed by the Gedrosians, bordering upon the Euergetæ, he rewarded them also, according to their desires.

3675. Having spent 60 dayes among the Euergetæ, he left Ameniades, who had been sometime Darius his Secretary, to govern them, as Curtius saies; but as Arrianus, he left them a free state, and Diodorus reports, that he left over the Euergetæ and Gedrosians both, Teridates, to govern them.

Then removed Alexander from thence, and marched into Bactra against Bessus, subduing the Drangi and the Dragagi as he went; he subdued also Arachosia: and there he met with that part of his army, which was formerly commanded by Parmenion: they were in all 6 thousand Macedons, and 200 men of Honour among them, and 5 thousand Grecians, with 2 hundred horle, or rather 600: which was no doubt, the very pith and marrow of all his army; he set Menon to govern the Arachosians, leaving him foure thousand foote, and six hundred horle, to keepe that Country in order.

Then led Alexander his army into the country of the Paropamisadae; which was about the setting of the seven stars, and beginning of winter, as we gather out of Strabo, [l. 15. p. 724.] All the country was then covered over with snow, and an obscure shade, rather than any light of heaven, and a plain darknesse lay upon the earth, so that hardly could a man discern any thing near hand, yet in this vast wilderness, did Alexanders army endure and bear out what misery could possibly befall mankind; want, cold, weariness, and even despair it self; many died for cold, many mens feet rotted off from their leggs: at last yet they came into a country of a better temper, and more plenty, and there the army was relieved, and the whole country quickly brought into subjection.

Then went Alexander to the mountain Caucasus, which some call Paropamyus, which mountain he passed in 16 or 17 dayes march: and built a city near the foote thereof, at a place where that mountain opens into Media, which after his own name, he called Alexandria, he built also sundry other cities, each of them distant one dayes journey from that of Alexandria; in these he planted 7 thousand of the Nations thereabout; voluntarily yielded to him, and sent him home the prisoners which they had taken and made their peace with him.

Then removing his Camp, himself was carried in an ordinary Litter, which every man, horse and foot, were forward to put their shoulders to: from hence in 4 days he came to Maracanda, the principal city of all Sogdiana, whose wall is 70 furlongs about: and there leaving a Garrison to keep it, he went and wasted the towns adjoining and set fire on them. A few days after, came Ambassadors to him from the Scythians called Abii; who having lived a free State ever since the death of Cyrus, now rendered themselves to him.

The Barbarians dwelling near the River, took such Macedonian soldiers as were there left in garrison, and flew them, and fell to fortifying of their Cities: Many of the Sogdians joined with them, being induced thereto by those who had taken Bessus his part, and they drew some of the Bactrians to them also. The Sultians and Bactrians together, made 7 thousand horse, and these drew on the restand when Spitamenes and Catanes, who had delivered Bessus into his hands, were sent by him to repress them, they proved the principal ring-leaders of all that disorder, giving out, that Alexander had sent for all the Bactrian Horse, of purpose to murder them.

Alexander, hearing thereof himself set upon the city Gaza, and sent Craterus against Cyropolis: having taken Gaza, he flew all that were of age therein, the women and children, were sold away for slaves, and the city itself destroyed, that others might take example by them. This and four other cities in those parts, within two days thus taken and served, he marched away to Cyropolis: whereinto 18 thousand men had put themselves, as a place of greatest strength, and surest refuge: In that siege he both lost the forwardest and prime men of his army, and himself also ran a most extreme danger. For he took such a blow in the neck with a stone, that his eyes dazzled therewith, and he fell all along, and lost his senses for the present. But, being of an invincible courage against such casualties as 'tis to dare other men, though his wound was not yet thoroughly cured, he fell to assault it more fiercely than before, anger whetting on his natural inclination that way, and so at the first taking of the city, there were slain of the enemy, to the number of 8 thousand, the rest fled into the Castle, whom when Alexander had besieged but one day, they rendered themselves for want of water.

Cyropolis, being by his command, laid level with the ground, of 7 Cities which the natives had fortified for themselves, there remained now but one to take; and that he took at the very first assault: or as Ptolemy saies, it was given up unto him. But Aristobolus saith, that it was taken by assault, and all that therein were, put to the sword. Ptolemy saith, that the men therein taken, were distributed in the army, and there kept bound, till Alexander left that country, that none might be left behind, which had a hand in that revolt.

Mean while the Scythians of Asia came with a great army to the bank of the river Tanais; as having heard that the nations on the other side were up in arms against Alexander; purposing, if they were up in any considerable number, then to join with them against him, and to fall upon the Macedons.

But Spitamenes, keeping himself within the walls of Maracanda besieged the Garrison of Macedons, who were in the Castle there. Against him therefore Alexander sent Menedemus, Andromachus, and Caranus, and with them 60 of his fellow Cavaliers and 800 of his Mercenaries, led by Caranus: and 1500 Foot of Mercenaries; or as Curtius, 3 thousand, giving them Pharnuches for an interpreter, because he spake the Barbarians language, and could therefore best serve to treat with them.

Alexander came back to the bank of the river Tanais, and drew a wall round about his Camp, and made a City of it of 60 furlongs in compass; which he also called after his own name, Alexandria: a work so speedily dispatched, that within 17 days after the walls were up, it was filled with houses also. Curtius, lib. 7. cap. 17. But Justin saies, that in 17 days (pace, he drew a wall about it, six miles round, lib. 12. cap. 5.) and Aristanus, that in 20 days (pace, the City was closed round with a wall. That City he assigned to his Mercenary Greeks to inhabit, with such of the natives thereabouts as would, and certain of his Macedons also who were grown unserviceable for the war. He also put some of his captive prisoners to fill up this new built City; paying their several Masters their ransom, and to made them freemen and citizens of the place; also he removed the inhabitants of three Cities which Cyrus had built, and planted them there.

The King of the Scythians, whose Realm lay beyond the Tanais, conceiving that City to have been built of purpose to lie as a yoke upon his neck, sent his brother Caranis by name, to take and demolish it, and to put off those Macedons from the river side. These rode up and down in Alexander's sight, and let fly both their arrows, and their railing speeches, at him and his Macedons, from the other side of the river after their

their rude manner. Alexander was not yet well recovered of his hurt; his voice failed him, nor could he stand alone, nor sit on horseback, nor in any fort give order for what he would have done.

Spitamenes, taking with him, besides his own men, some six hundred Dahae, and wild Scythian horse, fell upon a part of the army that was sent by Alexander, to relieve them, who were besieged in the castle at Maracanda, and flew them. Aristobolus saies, that when the Macedons were in fight, there suddenly arose out of the gardens adjoining, such a number of Scythians, that they flew the Macedons down right, so that there escaped of them scanty 40 horse, and 300 foot. Curtius mentions only 2000 foot to have been lost in that defeat, yet that Alexander, to cover the greatness of that loss, charged those who returned into his camp, upon pain of death, not to speak a word of it.

Alexander putting his confederates, into such boats as he could make, and causing the rest to swim over upon leather bags stuffed with straw, as well as they could, passed the river Tanais, with an incredible courage, do the Scythians on the other side what they could to the contrary: and having put them to flight, weak though he was, yet followed he the chase of them 80 furlongs. In this fight there fell of the Macedon horse, to the number of sixty: of the foot, almost one hundred, and a thousand hurt.

Not long after, there came ambassadors to him from the Scythians, to excuse what they had done. That this war was not made upon him by the general consent of the Nations but by such only, as among them used to live by robbery and spoil, but that the more civil sort of them, would be at his disposal. To these he made a faire answer; and released all such as he had taken prisoner, ransom free; that they being a warlike nation, might see that his contention with them, was out of a desire of honour, not of revenge.

The Sacae seeing this, sent their Ambassadors to him, with like tender of their service; and he as graciously dealt with them, and caused Excepius, a young gentleman, whom he loved very dearly, and was to him, as they were another Hephestion, to keep them company, and to entertain them.

Alexander taking the one half of his fellow Cavaliers, all his Targateers, Archers, and Agrians, and the readiest of all the Macedonian Squadron; marched to Maracanda, whither he was informed that Spitamenes was returned, to besiege them afresh, which kept the castle there; having therefore marched 1500 furlongs in three days (pace, he came early the next day to the City. Spitamenes, hearing of his approach, raised his siege and fled, and Alexander pursued him with all the speed he could, and in his way came to the place, where the Scythians had slain his Macedons: whose bones he caused to be gathered together and buried; with obsequies, done according to their country manner: and then followed the enemy till he came into the desert.

And by this time Craterus, marching by easy journeys, as he was bidden, came up to him with the greatest part of the army; and therefore now to lay load upon all alike, that had revolted from him; he divided his army into two parts, and gave order not to spare any place from burnings, nor any male of age, from killing; and in this manner ran he over all that region which the river called Polytimeus runneth thorough: for from thence forward, and where that river looeth it itself, and runneth under ground, all the country is nothing but a Desert, void of culture and inhabitants.

Having slain of the Sogdians, as Diodorus guesseth, [part 2. lib. 1.] 120 thousand persons, there were brought unto him, 30 of the most noble of them, all men of excessive strength of body; whose undaunted courage against death, Alexander wondered at, and gave them their lives, upon their promise to be from thence forward true unto him: nor proved they worse than their words; for returning home, they kept every man his people in due subjection to him, touts of them he took to be Squires of the body to himself, nor could any Macedon prove more faithful to him, than they were.

Leaving Pencilous there with a Garrison of 3 thousand foot (for there needed no more) he came into Bactria; where calling together all that ever were, he commanded Bessus to be brought forth: and there reproaching him with his vile perfidiousness to Darius, caused his nose, and crops of his ears to be cut off: and to sent him to Ecabane, that he might there be put to death in the sight of the Medes and Persians. Ptolemy saies, that by Alexander's command, his four quarters were tied to two trees, bowed down, and so they being let go again, tare him in pieces, as they returned to their natural posture: and Diodorus writeth, that the brother of Darius, and other his kinsfolks, having spent all manner of railing and reproachful speeches on him, cut his whole body into gobbins, and then put them into slings, and scattered them abroad.

About

About the same time came unto him Phrataphernes the Governour of Parthia, and Stafanor, who was sent into Aria to apprehend Arsaces; and brought him bound in chains to Alexander, with Barzanes, whom Bessus had made governour under him of Persia, and other consorts of Bessus in his revolt.

For the sea coast Asia allocated Epicolus, and Melandaris, and Ptolemai, Commander of the Thracians, which had conveyed the monies sent by Mentes, and those of the Souldiers whom he had dismissed to go into their countries. Ptolemai and Melandaris brought with them three thousand fresh foot, and one thousand horse, to feed the King's Souldiers with them three thousand fresh foot, and one thousand horse, to feed, and pay, and one Alexander with the like number of foot, and five hundred horse, and Bessus Governor of Syria, and Alcibiodes, a Commander at sea, with many more; and Antipater sent him eight thousand mercenary Greeks; and with them, five hundred horse, under the command of Alexander and Nearchus.

dred horse, under the command of Alcander and Neartimus.
 His army thus encamped, he proceeded to ferin order, what had been disturbed by that general revolt which was made from him : for many, especially of the Sogdians, had put themselves into walled towns and cities, and stood upon their guards, nor would submit to the Governour which he had fer over them : wherefore leaving Polyverchon, and Artalus, and Gorgius, and Meleager, in Bactriana hold them in awe, that they might not rise again, and to take in thole that yet stood out against him, himself after four dayes march came to the bank of the river Oxus. This river, because it runs all along upon a mud, is very filthy and unwholfom to drink; wherefore the fouldiers fel to digging of pits and wells for water, but found none : which they observed not at first, therefore rising up in the kings own pavilion, which because they observed not at first, therefore they gave it out, that it suddenly there arose, [Cur. lib. 7. cap. 25.] Plutarch reports, that one Proxenus a Macedon, and master of the Kings army, found a spring of a dig'd place to pitch the Kings pavilion in, near the river Oxus, found a spring of a fatty, and uliginous, or oily liquor, and that Alexander, in his letters to Antipater, relates it for one of the greatest miracles that God had given him. Arrianus goeth further, and faith, that he found these two fountains, one of water, and another of oyl, newly sprung up, near to the place where his tent stood : whereof, when Ptolemei brought him word, he presently (as he was directed by his footliallers) offered sacrifice to his gods : and Aristander told him, that the fountain of oyl, portended him the great labour and travel that he was to endure, but the end shoud be crowned with victory.

Afterward, having passed to the two rivers, Ochus and Oxus, he came to the river Marginaia, and Magnaria about which he chose a place to build 6 towns in two to the southward and 4 others to the eastern quarter of it, not far distant the one from the other: that they might be the easier to defend, and to be ready at hand to help each other. [Curt. i. §. 10. p. 17.] Justin tells us, that he built eight towns in Bactria and Sogdiana, [ibid. i. §. 10. p. 17.] Justin mentions twelve, [ibid. ii. c. 5.] where he noteth, that he distributed his army, as he observed to be malicious and feignous in his army, and so rid his hands of them.

Arimazes of Sogdiana, with an army of 30 thousand men, got into the top of a high Rock, which Strabo calleth by the name of Oxi; having laid in there provision enough of all sorts, for three years fidge. This Rock was 30 furlongs high, and 150 furlongs about. There were 300 gallant young lads, who, drawn on with the large promises, which Alexander made, with the help of cramp-irons, which, where need was, they strook into the Rock, to hold fast by, got by little and little to the top of this Rock; of which yet 32 perished in getting up, by the slipping of a foot, or brickett of the Rock, on which they caught hold, and came tumbling down, and brake all in pieces: these Sogdians astonished, as at a miracle, to see men gotten up there; supposing they had been more in numbers, and better armed than indeed they were, presently rendered themselves; and Arimazes, more afraid than hurt, with the chief men of the country, came down to the King in his Camp, all which Alexander having first caused them to be well whipt, commanded afterward to be crucified at the foot of the hill, the rest he distributed for slaves among the new cities, which he had built with the monies taken with them, And Artabazus was left to keep that fort, and the country adjoining in subjection, [Curtius lib. 7. cap. ult. see also Polyanius Strateg. lib. 5. in Alexander viii. 29.]

Alexander, having taken in the Rock in Sogdiana, seeing his enemies up in divers parts, divided his whole army likewise into five brigades, whereof Hephthalion commanded three, Conus and Arabazas the fourth: and the fifth he took to himself, and with it, marched the next way toward Maracanda: the rest ranged here and there, as their feet led them, and by the way, if they found any fled to Castles or places of strength, there they fell on, and took them by assault, where they yielded, there they took them to mercy. But when all these five Brigades having taken in the greater part of all Sogdiana, came together at Maracanda, he then sent Hephthalion, to make plantations plantations in fundry parts thereof; but Cœnus and Artabazus, he sent to Scythia, for that it was said, that Spitomenes was gone thither. And himself with the rest of the army going into Sogdiana, easily re-possessed himself of such places as the Rebels were fled unto; and such as yielded without fighting, he removed and planted in those towne which he subdued by force, and caused their lands to be divided among these new inhabitants.

While these things passed, Spitamen, and the Banditroes of Bactria, with a company of Scythians, who were fled from thence into Scythia, and some 6 or 8 hundred Mallians, who were also fled from thence into Scythia, came unto him, with a certain Cattle which was built and named against the Bactrians ; and there falling suddenly upon the Garrison, flew them every man and committed the Governour to prison ; and growing proud of what they had done, shortly after went with a purpose to take the City of Zariapes, but falling thereof, brought away yet a great booty out of the country thereabout.

To suppress this rabble, Attinas Governour of the country, led out some 300 Horse, little thinking of the ambushment that lay for him. And with them went also certain Horse of the Kings Troup; which having formerly been sick at Zariaphes, were recovered, and well able to travel again: and Pitho, the son of Soficles who commanded them, and Aristonicus, a Multian; for these having gotten together some 80 mercenary Horse of those who were left in garrison at Zariaphes, and some of the Kings fellow Cavaliers, would needs for company, go with Attinas into the country of the Maffagetæ: But Spitanenes and his company, riding out of the thickest, and woods, fell suddenly upon them: Of the Kings fellow Cavaliers Troup, he slew seven, of other Mercenaries, to the number of 60, and Aristonicus the Musician, who in that fight behaved himself more like a fouldier than a sildier. But to be short, in this encounter, he slew Attinas with his whole Troup; Pithon was wounded, and had quarter given him: news of all which came quickly to Craterus, who falling on presently will all his Horse, put the Maffagetæ to flight, and pursued them till they came to the Wilderness of that country, where they fought: and after a sharp dispute, the Maccæans had the better of it, and the Maffagetæ, seeing 50 of their Horse slain, fled and casually saved themselves, in that wild country: but there fell of the Dahæ, no less than a thousand men, which thoroughly quieted the rebellion in those parts.

Alexander, having now a second time quiered all Sodiana, returned to Maracanda; and then came to him an Ambassador from the King of Scythians, dwelling in the European side, above B-ithorus, and brought him a present, and offered him his daughter in marriage: whereof Alexander himself in his letter to Antipater maketh mention, as I said before: But, if he feared the offer for himself, his second motion was, that he would suffer his Nobles of Macedon, to match with the principal Houses of the Scythians: offering, if he pleased, to come himself in person, and to receive his commands from him.

At the same time also, Phrataphernes, al. Pharcmenes, who commanded the Chorasmians, bordering upon the countries of the Massagetae and Dahae, sent his Messengers to let them know, he was ready to receive his commands: And he having graciously heard both their errands, stayed there right in expectation of Hephæstions, and Craterus, their return unto him.

So soon from the forest as they were come, he with his army fell into the country of Bazarzia, a plain, where was a Forest which had not felt the stroke of a hatchet, in which whole ages before. In this Forest, when a Lyon of a vast bignesse fell upon the King by chance, Lyfimachus, who was afterward King of Thracia, offered to inter-pole with his hunting Spear; but the King put him by, and bad him be gone : and when the Lyon came on, he not only stood him, but slew him out-right, at one blow ; and after that, having slain some 4 thousand wild beasts, he with all his army fell a feasting in the wood.

Then came he back to Maracanda, and quiting Artabazus of his government of Bactria, by reason of his age, he gave the command thereof to an old soldier of his fathers, called Citius, the son of Dropidas of Macedon, the brother of Hellanicus, 41 Lanica, Alexanders Nurse; a woman whom he ever respected and loved as his own mother that bare him. But in a dream, he happened to see him all in mourning, and firing among Parmenions sons, who were then dead.

The third day after this dream, fell out to be a holiday to Bacchus; wherein Alexander was wont yearly to offer a sacrifice to him. Now some or other had at that time brought him certain apples as far as from out of Greece; and he wondering at the fresh colour and fairnesse of them, sent for Clitus, to show him them, and to beflow some of them upon him. Clitus left the sacrifice which he was about, and as he was going in all haste to the King, was followed by three sleep which were ready prepared to beoffered, having meale and salt upon their heads. The King, hearing thereof, what Alexander had set them about, returned to him, where he was at Nauraca. Alexander setting his army at Nauraca, because it was now in the heart of winter, which Ariaricus expected, by καταρσιον χειμῶνος, (i. e.) in the strength of winter, set his mind to revenge the soldiers wrongs; which they had suffered through the pride and avarice of their officers, or commanders, and thereupon he gave in charge to Phrataphernes to look to Hircania, and the countries of the Mardi and Tapuri, and willed him to send him Phradates the Governor there (who had been off sent for upon complaints made of him, but never would come) under a sufficient guard.

He removed Artanes from the government of the Drangis, and put Stafanor in his room, Artace, as Curtius, Atropates, as Ariaricus calls him, was sent Governor into Media, to take Oxidates from thence, because, as the King thought, he stood not well affected to him. The province of Babylon, upon the death of Mazaeus, was committed to Deditamenes, or, as Ariaricus calls him, to Stamenes. But Sopolis and Epicolus and Menadas, were dispatched away into Macedonia, to bring him a fresh supply of soldiers from thence.

These things thus ordered, after three months, he drew into the field, to march into a country called Gabaza. But the third day after, as he was upon the way, there fell such a hideous and dreadful tempest upon him, with such an extremity of cold, that his whole army was in danger to have perished in it. Curtius in his history, lib. 8, cap. 9, describes it to the life, both the direfulness of the tempest itself, and with all, the Kings constancy, in bearing it in his own person, with his wisdom and humanity, in keeping the army together, and comforting the poor weather-beaten soldiers, in that extremity: which notwithstanding he tells us, that what of the poorer sort of soldiers, what of the scullery and hangers on of the army, there perished no less than a thousand persons, where he addeth further, that which is remembered also by Valerius Maximus, lib. 5, cap. 1, and by Julius Frontinus, lib. 4, Stratag. cap. 6, that whilst Alexander was warming himself at a fire, a common soldier of the Macedons, had starved with cold, and benumbed in his wits, no less than in his limbs, came thrusting to his fire; Alexander took him and set him down in his own chair; telling him that that should be to his good, which in Persia heretofore would have cost a man his life; to wit, to have sat down in the Kings chair.

The next day, calling his Nobles and Captains together, he caused proclamation to be made, that what ever any man had lost in that tempest, he would make it good again unto him; and he performed it to a hair; for example, Sisimithres had brought along with him many beasts of burden and draught, and two thousand Camels, and whole flocks of sheep and herds of beasts, which being distributed among the army, both repaired their loss sustained, and saved them from the famine, which at that instant lay upon them; whereupon the King, declaring openly how much he was for that censure beholding to Sisimithres; bad every soldier take eight dayes victual with him; and then went to take in the Sacae, who had revolted from him; and having taken all the spoile of that country, gave Sisimithres out of the spoile, thirty thousand head of cattle.

Alexander then took to wife Roxane, the daughter of Oxyartes; which Strabo reports to have been done, in the Rock or Fort of Sisimithres, when it was first surrendered to him, lib. 15, and this example of his, moved many of his Macedon Nobles to take their wives also out of the more illustrious families, of forraign nations, as Diodorus in several chapters, of his 17 book at large declareth.

And now bending his thoughts wholly to a war upon India, to the end he might leave all safe and quiet behind him, he caused out of every province some to be lifted for his service, so many as to make up in all 30 thousand men, whom he purposed to carry with him into India; there to serve him both for soldiers against the enemy, and also for pledges of their fidelity, whom he left behind him: then moving into Bactria, he sent Craterus with 600 of his fellow Cavaliers, and his own foot companies, as also the regiments under Polyperchon, Artalus and Alcetas, to pursue Antisthenes Canates, who only remained of the Rebels of Paratcene, between whom and Craterus, there was a great battle fought, wherein Canates was slain, and Antisthenes taken prisoner, and brought alive to Alexander, and of their men were slain 15000 horses, &c. about 1500 foot: which done, Craterus went into Bactria, and Polyperchon reduced the country of Bactriace to the Kings obedience.

And now began Alexander to act, what he had of long time agitated in his mind, which was, to affirm to himself divine honours; and would no longer be called, only, but also believed to be, Joves son: as if he had the sovereignty over mens hearts, as well as over their tongues, and therefore refused now to be saluted and revered, after the manner of the Macedons, but would be adored with prostration after the fashion of the Persian Kings: nor wanted he court flatterers, to let this wheel a going; flatterers, I say, that peest of all kings, and by whose tongues, more Kings have perished, than by the sword of their enemies, [Curt. lib. 8, cap. 12.] chief of which about him, were Agis of Argos, the worst Verifier that ever was, next to Charilus and Cleo of Sicilia, and Anaxarchus, a Sophister: and of them, which opposed him herein, was Calisthenes, a true Philosopher, and a Scholar of Aristotles, which cost him his life, and that which hastened it, was this.

Hermolus, a gallant youth, and one of the Kings company of Pages, and instructed in the rudiments of Philosophy, by Calisthenes, being upon a time a hunting with the King, slew a Boare, which the King himself had aimed at; whereupon the King commanded him to be had away and wipt: which he taking to heart, fell into a conspiracy, first with Sopater, the son of Amyntas, a youth like himself, and of his own rank and quality, and then with Antipater, the son of Asclepiodorus, Governour of Syria, and others of the same company of Pages, to kill Alexander: which conspiracy coming to light by the discovery of one Epimenus, one of the conspirators, they were all presently put to death. Alexander in his letters to Craterus, Alcetas, and Artalus, written at that instant, signified, that they had confessed that the conspiracy grew of themselves alone; without the setting on, or privacy of any other. But in another letter, written afterward to Calisthenes, he charges him as the author of it: yea, and he glanceth, that Aristotles himself, whole Cousin Germane was mother to Calisthenes, in this manner, ὁ δὲ μακάριος, &c. (i. e.) The youth indeed, saith he, were flied to death by the Macedons: but that Sophister I myself will punish, and those which sent him, and such also as received things that conspire against me, into their towns.

When he had seized on Calisthenes his person, he kept him in irons seven months, to have him judged and condemned in a Court of Justice, when Aristotles himself should be present. Now Chares the Miltienian tells us, that at what time, Alexander was in the country of the Mallians and Oxydracans in India, and lay there of a wound received in a fight, (between which time, and the conspiracy of the Pages, there had passed upward of 17 months) Calisthenes being a fat man, fell there sick of the Phthisis, or lowlie disease, and died of it. But Aristobolus and Ptolomei, say and affirm, that the Pages confessed upon the rack, that Calisthenes had put them upon it, by his persuasions: and again, the same Ptolomei sayes that he was first racked, and afterwards hanged, but Aristobolus, that he was carried about with the army in chains, and so dyed: and so we see that these great Authors, and who were themselves present in the army, and attending upon Alexander at the very time when these things were acted, yet cannot agree about a matter, whereof there could be no doubt at all, at the time when it was done.

Amyntas being left in Bactria with 3500 horse, and 10 thousand foot, Alexander, toward the middle of the spring, as Ariaricus tells us, removed with his army from thence toward India; to make the Ocean and utmost border of the east the boundary of his Empire. And to make his whole army in their very accommodations suitable to so great a designe, he made all their targets to be covered over with silver plates, and their horse bridles, to be made all of beaten gold; and their very cotelets, he caused to be enriched, some with gold, some with silver, and the number of men, which for armer, followed him to this Indian war, amounted to one hundred and twenty thousand men.

Alexander having passed the Caucasus in ten days, came to his city of Alexandria, which he had built in Paropamisus; and put out the Governour there for his ill behaviour in the place, and then peopled his new city with more inhabitants, out of the neighbouring countries, and such of his own Macedons as were grown unserviceable for the war, and made Nicanor, one of his Governours of the place, but made Tryphaes Commander of the whole region of Paropamisus, and of all that territory, or Province, as far as the river Cophene.

From thence he went to the city of Nicæa, and there offered sacrifice to Minerva, and then marched to the river of Cophene, and sending an herald, commanded Taxiles, and the rest of the Satrapes or Governours of the countries, lying between Cophene, and the river Indus, which is improperly called India, to come unto him.

Taxiles, and other petty Kings, under his government, came forth and met him, and received his commands, telling him, that he was now the third son of Jove, that had come into those parts. That as for father Bacchus and Hercules, they had only heard of them, but that their happinesse was to see him now personally present among them, they therefore brought him large presents, promising him wihall, to send him 25 Elephants, and he entertained them very graciously, and bad them attend him, purposing to use their help in his passages through the country.

But when he saw that the rest came not, he divided his army, and sent Hephæstion and Perdicas, into the country called Pencilotis toward the river Indus; with the armies led by Gorgias, Clitus, and Meleager, and half the company of his fellow Cavaliers, and all the mercenary horse; commanding them, to take in by fair means or lowly,

soul, all the towns which they found in their way : and that when they came to the bank of the river Indus, they should there fall to building of ships, whereby to passe over, into further countries, and with them was sent Taxiles, and other Commanders of those parts.

After, the Governour of the country of Peucelaitis offering to revolt, left both himself and the city which he put himself into : for Hephæstion came and besieged it, and after a moneths time took and sackt it, and killing him, made one Sangeus Governour of it, who a little before forsaking Astes, had fled over to Taxiles, which made Alexander the more confiding in him ever after.

Alexander, with his Troup of silver Targateers, and the horse of his fellow Cavaliers, Hephæstion, and the Troup of those who were called Assatari, and his Archers, and Agrians, and Lances, marched into the country of the Aprians and Thyrsians and Arafocans ; and going on his way to the river Choes (which way was, for the most part, all mountainous and rockie) and having at last passed that river, he commanded Craterus to come after him fair and softly with the Foot. And himself taking with him the whole body of his horse, and eight hundred Macedons, Targateers on horseback, marcht away a great pace, because he heard, that the people of that country were fled, some to the mountains, others to fenced cities, and all to make head against him.

Those which came fourth to oppose him, he easily routed, and beat back into the Town, upon the way wence they came out ; and the townsmen, which stood all in array before their walls, he easily likewise vanquished, and made them take sanctuary within their walls again. And now was Craterus come up with the Foot : and therefore to strike the greater terror into the minds of a nation, which knew not yet, what manner of men the Macedons were, he gave order, to spare no flesh, setting fire on the out-works which they had made ; yet as he rode about the walls, an arrow came off, and shot him thorough his armor, into the shoulder, but made there no great wound ; Ptolomei also, and Leonatas, were both wounded at the same time : then Alexander, spying a place where the wall was weakest, pitched his Camp just against it, and the next day early in the morning, took the vawmure, which was of no great strength, with no great ado ; at the inner wall, the inhabitants made some resistance : But when the Macedons had once scaled the walls and the townsmen felt the arrows showing down about their ears, the soldiers within, brake out of the gates, and ran every man his way to the mountains, which were not far off, and thither many of them escaped, and saved themselves there ; but the Macedons following after, overtook and slew the greater part of them : but the Townsmen that were left behind, were slain every man of them, and the city it self, laid level with the ground.

Then, having subdued another poor base nation, he went forward, and came to the city Nisa, situate at the foot of a hill called Meros, and built in old times, as was said by Bacchus ; but at the entreary of Acuphis, the chief man of the place, who was sent unto him, with 30 other prime men, he spared the inhabitants of Nisa, and they were onely commanded to furnish him with 300 horse : which done, he restored them to their natural freedom, and suffered them to live after their own laws, and made Acuphis himself, taking along with him his son and grandchild for hostages, governour of the city it self, with all the whole province of Nisa ; moreover he sacrificed there to Bacchus by the name of Dionysius, and made merry, and feasted his Nobles, and all his Macedons, and wearing garlands of Ivy on their heads, sang praise to Dionysius, with all his titles and appellations, Bacchumque vocant, &c.

*Calling him Bacchus, Bromius, and Lyæus,
Born of the fire, Twice born, and not like others:
But the only one that ever had two mothers,*

As Ovid speaks of him, upon the like, though a different occasion, 4 Metamorph. see also Philostratus in Vita Apollonis, lib. 2. cap. 4. to the same purpose.

From whence he went to a country called Dadala, but all the inhabitants were gone and fled to the woods and mountains, wherefore he passed over Acadera, a country deserted by the inhabitants as the other was.

The city Ardacena being taken in upon surrender, he left Craterus there, with other Commanders of the Foot, to force such places, as voluntarily would not submit, and to order matters there, as he saw fittest for the present.

Himself, with his silver Targateers, and his Squadron of Agrians, and Cæsus and Artales their Brigadaes, and the body of his own Horse, and at most four companies of his fellow Cavaliers, and the one half of his Archers on horseback, went to the river of Euxapla, where the Governour of the Aprians lay, and upon a great journey taken, the second day he came with his army to a city called Arigeum. But the inhabitants, so soon as they heard he was coming, let their city on fire, and fled to the mountains ; but the Macedons followed after, and slew a vast number of them ; and Ptolomei slew the Captain of them, hand to hand, and brought of his armour with him.

And now Alexander was come up with his Foot, which rode on horse-back, and let they alighting, set upon the natives, and with much ado, made them at last, flee for refuge to the mountains : and then came Craterus to him with the main body of the army ; having done the errand which he was sent on, to the full : Him Alexander commanded to see Arigeum, which the inhabitants themselves had burnt, repaired : and to repeople it, with the inhabitants, of places near adjoining, such as would, & with such Macedons, as were grown unserviceable for his wars. But himself went on, to the place whither he heard the natives were fled, and coming to the foot of a mountain, he there pitched his Camp.

Mean while Ptolomei, who was sent a foraging, went further off, with a small Troup, to discover, and sent back word to Alexander, that there seemed to be more fires, in the enemies Camp, than there were in all his : whereupon Alexander leaving a part of his army in the Camp, went with the rest to take a view of those fires himself : and having considered well of them, he cast the company which he brought with him, into three parts : one he gave to Leonatus, one of the Squires of his body, giving him the brigade of Artales and Balacrus to attend him, the second he commanded Ptolomei to take charge of ; and to him assigned a third part, of his own Argyratides, or silver Targateers ; and the brigade of Philip and Philotas, with two thousand archers, and all the Agrians, and one half of the whole Cavalrie : The third part he took to himself, and led them to a place, where he saw the greatest throng of the enemy to be. And they on the other side, confiding in their multitude, & supposing the Macedons to be but few in number, left the mountain, and came down into the plain, where after a bloody field fought, the Macedons gat the victory : Ptolomei, who led one of the three Brigades of Macedons, reporteth, that there were taken in that fight, upward of 40 thousand prisoners ; and of cattle, above 230 thousand head, out of which, Alexander was purposed to have culled out the principall of all kinds, because they were exceeding fair, and to have sent them into Macedon, to make a breed there, for the tillage of the ground.

From thence Alexander went into the country of the Affacenians, who were said to have mustred a thousand Horse, 3 thousand Foot, and 30 Elephants, to encounter him. It was said also, that Affacenus, (which as it seems, was the common name which all their Kings went by) being lately dead, his mother Cleopis, commanded all at that present.

Craterus, having finished the city, as he was commanded, brought all his corselets to Alexander, with engines of battery and other instruments for a siege if need should be. Then set Alexander forward with the Horse of his fellow Cavaliers, and his Darters on horseback, with Cæsus and Polyperchon companies, with a thousand Agrians, and Archers toward the Affacenians : marching thorough the country of the Gureans, and was much troubled in the passage of the river Gureus there. The natives hearing of his coming, durst not abide him in a body, but brake up their army, and dispersed themselves, every one as he could into several cities, purposing there to stand upon their guard.

Alexander went first with his army to Massaga the greatest City of the Affacian country, and enclosed with a wall of 35 furlongs in compasse : there were 30 thousand men within to defend the walls, of which number there were 7 thousand mercenaries, out of the inner parts of India : These coming to a fight at the foot of a hill distant from the river Gureus some seven furlongs ; were fain to flee back into their city, having lost about 2 hundred in their flight. Alexander presently drew up his maine batrel of Macedons before the gates thereof, and took a Dart into his thigh from off the wall ; and when it pained him, he cryed out, that they told him, he was Joves son, but that when he was wounded, he felt the pain of it like another man : adding withal, (as Plutarch in his book of Alexanders fortune writeth) when he saw the blood running down his body : a saying out of Homer in his liads, that this was blood indeed, but not Such blood as from the blessed gods doth flow.

By nine dayes end the besieged, seeing his works, the incessant labour and travel of the besiegers, what vast valleys they filled up, what towers they built, and how they made them run upon wheels, they began to consider of it : but when their Captain was shot thorough with a Dart coming out of an engine of battery, from the Works without, their courage failed, and despairing of any longer holding out, retired into their Castle,

Castle, and from thence sent Messengers to crave pardon, and submitted. Cleopis also to the Queen with a great multitude of noble Ladies, all pouring wine into golden basins, came forth unto him: and the Queen laying her young son at his feet, obtained not only his pardon, but also to be restored to her fathers estate, and prison fortune of his House; for which yet it was thought he was more beholding to her own beauty, than to his bounty: for men commonly said, that all that was but the fee of a nights lodging; and that she got her kingdom again, by her allurements, which she could not do with all the strength she had: whence it was, that among the Indians, he went afterward by the name of the Kings whore. In all which siege yet Alexander lost not above 25 men.

The Indians which were there, hired out of the inner parts of Indie, and in the siege, had annoyed Alexander more than all the rest; being according to the articles suffered to depart with their arms, encamped themselves about 8 hundred furlongs off from thence, whereof Alexander being advertised, grew into an implacable rage against them; and set upon them, saying, that he indeed suffered them to depart with their arms, but not that they should ever after use them against the Macedons: and they, nothing terrified with the greatness of their danger, lockt themselves close together, and casting themselves into a ring, took their wives and children into the midst of them: And so when the enemy came on, they withstood them in very manful wise: and the women themselves, as any of the men were slain, took up their arms, and with them went and served among the men; yet at last overcome with the numbers of the enemy, they all died in the place: And Alexander bestowed the women and the rest of the rascality which were left, upon his Troup of Horse; which act of his, blemished his glory, and stuck as a spot upon all his former noble actions in his wars.

Alexander sent Crenus to a strong and rich City called Bazira, supposing that the inhabitants there, hearing what passed at Aftacan, would have submitted, as the Aftacans had done; which yet they refused to do: but he sent Alcatas, and Artalus, and Demetrius General of the Horse, to the City Ora, and willed them to draw a wall round about it, and do no more till he came. The inhabitants made a falley upon Alcatas his quarter: but the Macedons easily put them back, and quickly mured them up on that side. And when as Alexander heard, that Abisarus would privily put in there, more of the natives to defend it; he presently sent word to Crenus, to build a strong castle upon it, and leaving a good garrison in it, which might be able, to hinder the Tillage of their ground, to returne to him with the residue of the army.

They of Bazira, seeing Crenus gone with the greatest part of his army, contemning those that were left in the Castle, drew out into the open field: where having lost 500 upon the place, and 70 more taken prisoners, the rest which returned into the city were closer shut up, and streightened than before, and not suffered to peep out of the Gates.

Alexander took the city Ora at the first assault, and took such Elephants as he found therein: which when the inhabitant of Bazira heard, fearing to be taken, they all in the dead of the night, fled out of the gates, and got up into a Rock, called Aornus, and the rest of the cities thereabout, did the like, every man with his arms: and Alexander having put Garrisons in Ora and Massaga, built up the walls of Bazira, and seized on the townes, which the Inhabitants had left.

Taxiles being dead, his son Omphis or Mophis, who had perswaded his father to submit to Alexander, sent unto him to know his pleasure, whether he should take the kingdom presently upon him, or live a private man till his coming: and though word was returned him that he should reigne, yet he forbore for the present: mean while, when Hephastion and Perdicas being sent to make a bridge over the river Indus, came that way, he received them with all honour, and furnished them with provisions gratis; but went not out to meet them upon the way, lest he should seem to depend on any man for favour, but Alexander himself.

Alexander coming to Embolyma, a city not far distant from the Rock Aornus, left Craterus with a part of the army there, and gave him order to make provision of corne and other necessities, for a long time, if occasion should be to stay at the siege of Aornus, and in case he should not be able to take it at the first. Himself, taking with him his Agrians and Archers, and Crenus his brigade, and out of the Macedonian Squadrons, such as were of the nimblest foot, and with all best armed, and 200 of his Cavaliers, and archers on horseback too, marched to the Rock.

The same went that Hercules heretofore, when he was in those parts, tried to take that place, but could not, and that he was put off thence by an earthquake, which let Alexander the more on fire to take it, that therein he might be seen to out-do Hercules. The compass of the Rock, was an hundred furlongs, and the height thereof sixteen, if we believe Diodor. for Artianus sayes, that the compass of it was 2 hundred furlongs; and the height thereof, where it was lowest, eleven; at the foot of it toward the South, ran the River Indus, not far from the head where it riseth, as Strabo lib. 15. I reliev us, the rest is taken up with vast bogs and inaccessible crags: in Sirabos lib. 15. I reliev us, the rest is taken up with vast bogs and inaccessible crags: in that there dwelt a poor old man, with his two sons, in a cave wherein there were three beds, cut out of the Rock. Alexander promised him 80 talents, if he would shew him a way up into the Rock: whereupon he told him there was but one way; and shewed him where it was. Alexander finding there was no way but that, manned that place so strongly, that they could not possibly receive any the least relief, from without. And then letting his army to work, he cast up a mount of earth, and rubbish so high, that now he could come at least to fight with them at a small distance, and to assault them, which assault lasted nine whole dayes and nights together, without cessation. Alexander having lost many of his men, what in fighting, what in climbing the rocks (among which were Chares, and one Alexander) though he had no hope to take it, yet he made shew, as if he would not off from the siege, leaving yet the passage which led into the Rock open, for them to flee out there that would: which they perceiving, and being adawed at his constancy and resolution, took the advantage of a dark night, and fled every man of them, by that way out of the rock.

The King, seeing no stirring there the next day, sent Balacrus to see what the matter was; and he brought word, that the enemy was all gone. Then he taking with him certain Squires of the body, and 700 of his silver Targateers, went himself first up into the rock, and then the rest of the Macedons, lending one another a hand to climb up, as well as they could; and then giving the word, to pursue the enemy, they did, and flew many of them in the chase: many of them also, flying over the Rocks fell and burst themselves in pieces. Alexander having conquered the places rather than the men that dwelt therein: offered yet many sacrifices, and built Altars to Minerva and Victoria, in that Rock; and leaving a Garrison there, made one Sifocopus, al. Sifocollus, Governour of that place, and country thereabouts: which Sifocollus, came formerly out of India to Bessus in Bactria, and when Alexander had subdued it, he came in with his men unto him, and ever after served him faithfully.

Alexander removed from Aornus, and went into the country of the Aftaceni; for he was told that the brother of Aftacanus, the last King, with a number of Elephants, and no small company of the Inhabitants, and bordering Nations, were fled to the mountains in those parts: and when he came to the city Ditta, he found no creature there, nor in the country thereabouts.

The next day he sent out Nearchus and Antiochus, each of them commanding a thousand silver Targateers: and to Nearchus he assigned certain light armed Agrians; to the other, besides the thousand silver Targateers which he commanded, he added a thousand more of the same sort. These he sent out to scour about, and to see if they could light upon any of the natives, of whom they might enquire among other things, especially concerning the Elephants.

Himself marcht forward to the bank of the River Indus, sending an army before him to mend the wayes, without which it had been impossible for him to have got thorough them. But when he found, that the streights and narrow passages thereof were taken up by one Erix, he left Crenus to bring after the main body of the army, by easie journeyes; but himself going forward with his slingers and archers, cleared the Forest, and made a safe way for the army that came after. Diodorus calls this Indian Aphricus, and sayes, he had with him 20 thousand men, and 15 Elephants; But the Indians, whether out of a hatred to this Erix or Aphricus, or whether to ingratiate themselves with Alexander, slew him, and brought both his head and armes to Alexander: He pardoned them, but thanked them not, for example sake.

From hence, in sixteen dayes march, he came to the River Indus side; and took in the city Pencelotes, not far from thence, upon surrender: and leaving there a Garrison of Macedons, he left Philippus to command them. He subdued also a multitude of lesser towns standing upon that River, Cophæus, and Aftages, the Governours of that country attending on him from place to place. He understood also by some of the natives, which he had taken prisoners, that the men of that country were all gone, to Baniades, (perhaps Abisarus) and that the Elephants were left a grazing, upon the bank of Indus: whereupon he commanded them to shew him the way to the place where the Elephants were. In catching of them, two fell over the Rocks and perished; the rest were taken, and being handled, and made fit for service, were taken into his army: And having found there a wood of timber-trees, he caused it to be felled, and ships to be built thereof: which being launched, he went in them to the bridge of Boates, which Hephæstion and Perdicas had built for him. And they, foreseeing that they should have more Rivers than one to passe, made their ships, or boats (so as they might take them alunder at their pleasure, and carry them in carts, as occasion was, and then put them

When the soldiers were returned home laden with wealth and riches, the King called them all together, unto whom he made almost a set speech, to request them to accompany him cheerfully to the conquest of the Gangaridæ, unto whom Cæmus the son of Polemocrates, made an answer in the name of the whole army, and concluded, that they all desired an end of the war. And when the Macedons would in no wise listen to his desires, yet as Ptolemy reports, he went on, and offered sacrifice for a passage over: and when the entrailes portended all direfull things, if he proceeded, he then called together his friends, and such as were the ancientest, and of greatest familiarity with him, and told them first, and afterward declared to all the army that since all things seemed to be adverse to his proceeding any farther, he was now content and resolved to return.

Yet Pliny, very improbably, will needs have it, that notwithstanding all this, he passed the river Hypanis, and erected altars on the other side thereof, [lib. 6. c. 17.] for that which follows in the same place; to wit, That the Kings own letters do confirme as much, I conceive that those words refer not to his passing over the river Hypanis or Hypafis, but to that which went before, concerning the order and distance of his removals and journeys from place to place, described and set down by Diogenes and Baton, his two principal Harbengers, and Camp-masters: For who can believe that Alexander alone, without his army, and without any purpose of going any farther, would offer to pass such a dangerous river as that was, or if he would that the enemy which attended him on the other side, would not have set upon him, and hindered him in his way, especially, seeing that Strabo, [lib. 15. pag. 700.] noteth that he went no further Eastward, to wit, because he was forbidden to pass the river Hypanis or Hypafis, and Plutarch also tells us, that in his time, the Kings of the Præstians or Pratians, passing the river westward, worshipped those Altars, which Alexander then set up, and did Sacrifice upon them, after the Grecian manner.

Wherefore manifest it is, that Alexander, dividing his army into several companies, caused 13 altars to be built all of square stone on the hither side of the river Hypanis, and not on the further; each of which alters was 50 cubits high, and like to 10 many great towers, and of a greater bulk than towers use to be of, upon which, having offered sacrifices after the Grecian mode to his gods, he presented them also with games of all sorts, wrestling, and dancing, and sports on horseback: Then made he his Camp three times greater in every respect than it was ever wont to be: his trenches 50 foot broad and 10 foot deep, and of the earth cast up out of the ditch, drew a reasonable wall also, round about the trench: He commanded his foot also, that in their several tents they should set up two bedsteads, each of them 5 cubits high: and the horsemen, that they, besides such beds, should also in their tents make mangers for their horses, as bigge again as at other times; with armes, and horse bits, and other furniture belonging to them, after the same proportion, and to hang them up, and leave them behind them, to abuse posterity, with an imaginary belief of his greatness: concerning the inscriptions and titles of his altars, we may see more in [Philostratus, his life of Apollonius.]

These things thus done, he returned by the same way he came to the river Hydrates: which having passed, he came back to Acæfines.

There found he this City ready built, by Hephestion, whom he left to do it, and thither he drew such of the neighbouring places as would, and of his mercenary soldiers, as many as were grown unfit for the war, to store it with inhabitants.

Araces, who ruled all in the province, bordering upon the kingdom of Abifarus, and the brother of Abifarus, and his associates came to Alexander; and brought him presents, such as were of greatest esteeme in those parts, and 30 Elephants sent from Abifarus: telling him Abifarus would have come to him, had it not been for a sickness which then held him: and when such messengers as Alexander sent to him, at their returne affirmed as much, and that he was sick indeed, he was easily perwaded of the truth of his excuses; and thereupon made Abifarus Governour under himself of that province, and made Araces subject unto him: and appointing what tributes they should pay, offered sacrifice again at the river Acæfines.

Having passed the Acæfines, he came to Hydaspes, where he repaired, by the help of his soldiers, what ever the overflowing of that unruly river had demolished in his two Cities lately there built, Nicæa, and Bucephalis: for because that from the time that he went from thence, till his now returne thither again, it had done nothing else but raine, especially the Etesian or yearly winds at that season blowing, as Aristobolus saith cited by Strabo, [lib. 15. pag. 691.] And so it fell out, that together with that rain, which continued for 70 dayes space, there fell also horrible tempests of thunders and lightnings, as I shewed before out of Diodorus.

Alexander,

Alexander, when he had caused a multitude of ships, what of two, what of three stages high, to be built, and rigged, upon the Hydaspes, besides others, for the passage of his Horse and Foot over the river, he resolved to fall down from thence, into the southern Ocean; and for that purpose gathered all the Phœnicians, Cyprians, Carians, and Egyptians which followed his Camp together, and put them aboard his ships.

At the same time died Coenus, one of his best, and best friends, whose death he much lamented, and caused him to be entered with all honour and sumptuousness, which that time and place afforded, yet not forgetting the speech which he made in the armies behalf, for a return, gave him this biting taunt, That had he known how short a time he had to live, he would never have made so long an oration to that purpose.

Then came to him new supplies out of Greece, as well auxiliaries, as mercenary soldiers, under their several Commanders, to wit, 30 thousand Foot, and six thousand Horse: bringing with them besides, rich arms, for 25 thousand Foot, and 100 talents in Apothecary stuff for medecines, as Diodorus noteth: and Curtius [lib. 9. cap. 5.] Memnon also brought him out of Thracia, six thousand horse, besides those which came from Harpalus, and seven thousand Foot, and 25 thousand arms, in-laid with silver and gold, which he caused to be distributed in the army, and the old ones to be burnt.

Now that Harpalus, which Curtius tells us sent a supply unto him, was none other, but he, whom Alexander had trusted with the keeping of his treasures and treasure in the city and province of Babylon, and whome he had left, in quâdam, (i.e.) his overseer, and Procurator, or L. Steward of all that country, as Plutarch in Alexand. writeth, yet left he the rule and government of it to Mazæus, who had delivered it up into his hands; and when he died, Dittamenes succeeded him in that charge. Though Diodorus calls this Harpalus, the President of that province, in his History [year 2. 113 Olympiade] upon which now we are: where he further tells us, that he, hoping that Alexander would never return alive out of India, gave himself over to all kind of intemperance and luxury, sparing for no cost. And first, saith he, he fell to committing of all manner of whoredom and luxury with the women kind of that country, and then laying it on, upon all other sorts of unseemly and unseasonable delights and pleasures: he made havock of the Kings monies, committed to his charge; and took order for sundry sort of filth to be brought unto him, from as far as the red Sea, and to so lavish in his feasting, and usual diet, that every man cried fame of him, for it, and sent for a noted trumpet, Pythonic by name, from as far as Athens, and when he died, for another from the same place, called Glycera: whereof Theopompus complained in a letter of his to Alexander, telling him, he spent above 200 talents, in making two tombs for Polynece, when she died, one at Athens, and another at Babylon it self, and that he dedicated a Grove, and an Altar, and a Temple to Pythonic, by the name and title of Venus Pythonica, and that he set up Glycerae statue in brass, at Tarsus in Syria, and gave her leave to have her habitation in the Kings own palace, commanded the people to call her by the title of, and reverence her as a Queen, [Athenæus lib. 13. cap. 23.]

The like did Cleander, Sitaces, and Heracon, in Media, all hoping that Alexander would never return alive out of India, and in assurance thereof, fell to plundering of private mens estates, and pulling down of Temples, ravishing the young virgins, of the noblest families, with many other kinds of villanies upon the goods and persons of the subject; in so much, that the very name of a Macedon grew odious to all nations, for their avarice and luxury in all kinds. But above all, Cleander, who having first ravished a noble Virgin himself, gave her afterward to his slave for his whore, [Curt. lib. 10. cap. 1. Arrian. lib. 6. pag. 142.]

Alexander, preparing for his voyage into the Ocean, and seeing old grudges kindling afresh between Porus and Taxiles, made them friends again, and linked them together by bonds of affinity, which he procured to be made between them before he went, and then sent them away each to his own kingdom. And for Porus, he not only made him king of all the countries lying between Hydaspes and Acæfines, as before, but also, of all the free states, which he had subdued between the rivers of Acæfines, and Hypanis, which were several nations, and in them, cities above two thousand, as in Arrian [lib. 6. pag. 124.] others reckon in that space 15 several nations, and in them, great cities, to the number of 5000, besides towns and villages of them belonging, as [Plutarch in Alexand.] And the truth is, that the region lying between Hydaspes and Hypanis, containeth now more than nine nations, but there were therein 5000 cities, every one of them as big as Coos, in Meropis, as Strabo, out of Apollodorus, who wrote of the affairs of Parthia, reports, [lib. 15. pag. 586.] who yet in his own opinion thinks, that in this reckoning, he did overcall; saying, δοῦναι δὲ, (i.e.) it seemeth, that this number is put a little Hyperbolically, and therefore Pliny draws this number to the cities, which he subdued in all India, [lib. 6, cap. 17.] in these words. These who were with Alexander in his voyage reports, that in that tract of India which he subdued, there were 5 thousand towns and cities, every one of them as big as Coos, in the compass of 9 nations. Philippos, one of his company of Nobles attending him, and who was by him made Lord and Governor of a Country beyond the River Indus.

The Horse of the City Nilæa, were sent back : Craterus and Hephæstion, were commanded to march before him into the capital City of Sophites his kingdom, and there to attend the coming of the Fleet : Craterus held on, upon the right hand of the Hydaspes with a part of the Horse and Foot, and Hephæstion on the left, with the remainder and far greater part of the whole army, and 4 hundred Elephants. The whole army at this time consisted of one hundred and twenty thousand men, with those which he brought from the sea coast. And now they returned to him all, whom he sent to levy fresh companies, bringing with them men of divers nations, and diversely armed, [Arrian, lib. 6, and in his Indica, pag. 181.] and Plutarch says, that at this time he had : 20 thousand Foot, and 15 thousand Horse.

Curtius says, that this Navy was one thousand ships, of which Diodorus says, 200 were open, the rest were of the nature of Row-barges, as Diodorus saith. Arrianus, in his Indica, saith he had but 8 hundred in all, some for carriage of horses, the rest of loading for corn and other provisions, but of all sorts, amounting to little less than two thousand.

Amiral of this fleet, was Nearchus, born in Crete, and Euagoras of Corinth Purser to it; but of Alexander's own ship wherein he went, was Master or Steersman, one Oniscus, an Asiatick born, and Arrianus in his Indica, sets down the Master of every particular Ship.

This done, Alexander sacrificed to his country gods, and such other as the Priests advised him to : and among the rest, to Neptune, and to Amphitrite, and to the Nereides or sea Nymphs ; and above all to the Ocean it self, and to the River Hydaspes from whence he set forth ; as also to the River Acesines, into which the Hydaspes falls, and to the river Indus, which receives them both. Also he proclaimed several sorts of Games, of Musick, and Wrestling, and the like, with Prizes, for such as would put in for them ; distributing beasts, for every company to sacrifice by themselves.

In the morning, the army went aboard, to wit, the silver Targateers, and Archers, and such of the Horsemen as were called his nobles or friends, amounting to the number of 8 thousand, not many days before the setting of the Pleiades, as [Strabo, lib. 15.] out of Aristobolus, sheweth ; which falleth much about the end of our Octob. Alexander himself coming aboard, poured out a golden viol of wine from the prow of the ship into the River, calling upon Acesines, Hydaspes, and Indus, all at once. Afterward when he offered to his Progenitor Hercules, and to Ammon, and the rest of the gods, according to his accustomed manner, the trumpet sounded, at his command, to draw down the ships into the water, and to be going, whereupon every man did accordingly ; no order was given, how far every barge, how far every horse-lighter, how far every ship of war should steer off from each other, for fear least any should perchance fall foul of any other in their course, and that one should not strive to out sail, or out rowe another ; but keep every one in his rank and order wherein he set forth.

Alexander, going on in this order, came on the third day to the place where he appointed Craterus and Hephæstion to attend him : there he stayed two dayes, that Philip might there overtake him, with the rest of the army ; for he had sent him to the River Acesines, commanding him to march down by the bank thereof : and sent away Craterus and Hephæstion again with directions, what course to hold in their march by land.

He, holding on his course upon the River Hydaspes, which was every where 20 furlongs over at the least, landed his shouldiers and went to Sibarus, or country of the Sorianians. There, they lay, wrore of the poverty of them, who with Hercules heretofore besieged the Rock of Aornus ; and when they could not take it, were left here by him when they were not able to march with him any further : their cloths were nothing but skins of wild beasts, and their weapons nothing but clubs : and although the Grecian manners and fashions were worn out, yet might a man easily perceive some traces and marks of their original among them ; But when Alexander pitched his Camp near unto the chiefeft City of their country, the principal men of them came forth unto him, and being admitted to his presence, they put him in mind of their first origin, and what reverence they had to the nation of the Greeks, and offered him their service, in what ever his pleasure was, as became men of the same blood with him and his Grecians, testifying as much, by the no ordinary presents which they gave unto him. Alexander received them very graciously, and made them a free State, to live according to their own laws.

From

From hence he made a rode further into the country some 250 furlongs, and having waited all the field, came and besieged the chief City of that country.

The Agalastius opposed him, with 4000 Foot, and 3000 Horse, upon the bank of a River : but he passing the River, quickly disfiled and routed them, and having slain the most part, made the rest run into the towns, which having taken, he slew them that were of age, and sold the rest for slaves.

Other inhabitants there were which would needs take up arms too, and were gathered together into one city, to the number of 20 thousand : Into this city also, he brake by pure force ; but when they barricaded their streets, and fought upon them from the battlements of their houses, he was forced to get out again, and left many of his Macedons dead behind him, wherefore in a rage he let fire on the houses, and burnt both it, and most of the people therein, with fire. Three thousand there were which got into the castle ; they sued for pardon and had it.

And then returning a shipboard with his nobles, he went with all speed into the countries of the Mallians and Oxydracans : because he was informed of them, that they were two very populous and warlike Nations, and that having carried their wives and children into fenced places, they purposed to abide him in the field, and he made the more haste, to the end he might fall upon them, whilst they were but in their preparations, and not fully yet provided for him.

Upon the 5 day, falling still down the river, he came to the confluence of the two rivers, Acesines and Hydaspes : where they both meet and make one river, but in a very narrow Channel : and by that means, runs with a most violent and rapid current, and maketh strange whirlpools with all whereupon many of their ships were bilged, and two of the greatest of them falling lowe each of other, split in sunder, and perished with those who were therein. Alexander's own ship, falling into one of these whirlpools, was in extreame danger to have been lost, and he in her. But having gotten a little lower, where the Channel openeth somewhat wider, the stream grew calmer, and the ship coming to the bank on the right hand, found a safe harbour to ride in, under a bank which running out into the river, brake the violence of it, and so had they leisure to draw their ships on land.

The King set up altars upon the banks side, and sacrificed to his gods for escaping so grand a danger : and then marched 30 furlongs further, into the country, and falling upon the natives, that would not submit unto him, he charged them onely, not to help the Mallians, and to returned to his ships again ; and there found Craterus, Hephæstion, and Philippos came with their several Armies, and ready to attend him.

The countreys of the Oxydracans and Mallians lie between the place where the Hydaspes falls into the Acesines, and that where they both together fall into the river Indus, as Arrianus in his Indica teacheth us [pag. 171.] They were wont to be always in war, each against other ; but now Alexander, a common enemy to both, coming on, made them friends : for a further confirmation whereof, they gave ten thousand virgins each to other to be cross-married ; their foot were in all 80 thousand ; their horse, 10 thousand ; besides 7 hundred chariots ; Curtius saith 9 hundred, [Justin, lib. 12, cap. 9.] and Orosius [lib. 3, cap. 19.] give unto these Mandri or Ambri, and Sabracans, and Subagrans, and Sugambrians, for by all these names, the Malli and Oxydracans (who in Diodorus are also corruptly written Syraculians) in divers editions go, 60 thousand horse.

The Macedons, who thought they had been past all danger, and lookt for no more fighting businesse, when they now law themselves engaged in a new war, making more fierce and warlike Nations, than any they had hitherto met withall in any part of India struck (as they were) with a suddain fear, began a fresh to murmur and mutiny against Alexander ; but he by a faire Oration which he made unto them, pacified them, and made all well again.

Commander in chief of all this army of the Natives, was a man of approved valour, chosen out of the Oxydracans : and he pitched his camp at the foot of a hill, making store of fires that he might make his army thereby seeme the greater, and making alwaies great shouts and noises, after their country manner to terrifie the Macedons, if it might have been. But the next morning Alexander, full of hope, and all assurance of victory, encouraged his shouldiers, and took the field against them : when upon the suddain, the enemies, whether for fear, or whether upon some falling out among themselves, ran all away, left the field, and betook themselves to the mountains and woods, which because the Macedons could not overtake, they therefore fell to the rifling of their Camp.

Alexander having rigged his Navie, sent Nearchus with it, down the river into the country of the Mallians, charging him to be there 3 daies before the army, and passing the Hydaspes, commanded Craterus, who was on the right hand of the Hydaspes, to take take charge of the Elephants, and of Polyperchons Brigade, and his Archers on horseback, and of Philips Regiment. He willed also Hephæstion to go 5 dayes march before him; and Ptolomei, to come 3 dayes journey behind him: that whosoever escaped Hephæstion, might be sure to fall into the hands of one of them two. But commanded them that went foremost, when they came to the confluence of Acefines and Hydræotes, which was the utmost bound of the Mallians, as the confluence of Acefines and Hydæpes was of the Oxydracans, there to stay and attend his coming, and till Craterus and Ptolomei's armies were come in and joyned to him.

Himself taking with him his Regiment of silver Targateers, and his Squadron of Agrians, and Python's brigade, and all his Archers on Horseback, and one half of his fellow Cavaliers, went through a sandy thirsty country into the Region of the Mallians, to set upon them, before either the Oxydracans could come to help them, or they the Oxydracans.

Now the first day he encamped near a little river, distant from the Acefines, some 100 furlongs, where, having rested himself a while, and his army, he commanded every man to fill what bottles he had, with water; and then put on again; and in the remainder of that day, and the night following, marched 400 furlongs, and in the morning, lighted upon a great many of the Mallians, who, because they conceived, that surely he would never come over that dry and thirsty wilderness, were walking abroad idly with out the city. The most of them he slew, the rest ran into the gates, and there lockt them up; then caused he his Horse to surround the walls, instead of a trench, till his Foot came up.

But so soon as they were come, he presently dispatched away Perdicas, with his own, and Clitus his Horse, and with the Agrians, to besiege another town of the Mallians, where he understood, that many of the Indians were gathered together, willing them to keep them in, but not to make any assault, till he came onely to take care that none got out, to carry news into other parts, that he was come into the country, and then began he to make his approaches, and to assault the city, which he lay before.

Having slain many of them in the assault, the rest left the walls, and fled to the Castle, and that being also taken, he slew therein two thousand men.

Perdiccas, coming to the city, which he was commanded to besiege, found all the birds flown; and because he found that they were but newly gone, he followed after them, with all the speed he could make: all he overtook he flew: the rest escaped into the bogs, and fennie places, and there saved themselves.

Alexander, having rested and refreshed both himself and his army, a while, removed in the first watch of the night: and having made a long march that night, at break of day came to the river Hydræotes, where he found that many of the Mallians were already passed over: the rest he set upon, as they were passing, and slew them every man: then himself passed the river with his army, and overtook such as were gone before; and of them he slew many, and took other prisoners: Nevertheless, most of them got away into a city, very strongly situate, and well fenced with works.

But when his foot came up, Alexander sent Python against them, with his own, and two other Regiments of Horse, who at first onset, scuried them into the Town, and took it; and made all that had fled thither, and were not slain in the taking of it, slaves: which done, Python returned to the Camp.

Then led Alexander his army against a City of the Brachmanni, whither he understood other of the Mallians were fled: and as soon as he came, besieged it round with his Squadrons very thick. The souldiers forthwith left the walls, and fled to the Castles, which taken, the inhabitants, some left their own houses on fire, and threw themselves into it: others would sell their skins, as dear as they could, and died fighting: there died in all five thousand of them, few came alive into the enemies hand.

Alexander stayed there one day, to give his souldiers breath, and the next day he marched against other Towns of the Mallians: all which he found, to have left their cities, and fled to the woods and mountains: there also he spent one day.

The next day he sent Python, and Demetrius, Captain of a Regiment of Horse, back to the river side, to whom he joyned also, certain other Troups, and Companies, requisite for the service he employed them in, willing them, if by the way, they chanced to light upon any of those, who were fled to the woods, if they submitted not, to kill them; whereupon they slew a very great many, as they passed.

Himself

Himself march against the Capital City of the Mallians, to which, as he understood, many others had retired themselves. But even this great city also, hearing of his coming, abandoned the place, and fled, &c. flying over the river Hydræotes, there put themselves in battle array, upon the high cliffs of that river, as if they would there stop his passage. Alexander followed them instantly with his Horse, commanding his Foot to come after; but when he was in the midst of the river, the Indians forsook the place, and though in good array, yet ran away: whereas yet they were not fewer in number than 50 thousand, and Alexander seeing them in a strong compact body, yet having no Foot come up to him, offered here and there, and every where to charge upon them; but thought it no discretion to engage in a fight against them.

But so soon as the Agrians, and other well-ordered Squadrons, and the Archers came, and the main battel of the Foot, were now in fight, the Indians took them to their heels, and ran away all to the next fence city. Then Alexander pursued, and slew a many of them; and when they were there, Alexander presently surrounded the City with his Horse before the Foot came up.

Demophon a Southlayer, having speech with Alexander, told him, by certain signs and prodigies by him observed, that there was some great danger towards him; and withal desired him to forbear, at least to defer the siege thereof. The King reviling him with shrewed words, for disheartening the souldiers whiles they were in action; and dividing his army in two parts, took one to himself, and gave the other to Perdicas, and both together went to scale the wall: which brunt the Indians not enduring, left their stations on the wall, and fled all to the Castle. Alexander with those about him, brake open the first gate himself, and got into the City, and began to let ladders against the Castle wall: And when he saw his Macedons not come on so roundly, as he wished, he took a ladder himself and set against the wall, and gat upon the top of it. Peneftes, bearing the target, which he borrowed out of the Temple of Minerva in Troy, and which in all encounters he ever caused to be born before him, followed, and after him Leonatus, one of the Squires of his body, upon the same ladder, and Abreas (one of the Δυποῖσι or Dupliarians: i. e. of that order of Knights or Esquiers, who had double pay or allowance) upon another. And then the silver Targateer, hearing of the danger the King was in, strove to set up the ladders so thick, that they brake, and so all came tumbling to the ground, and thereby both lost themselves, and hindered others from getting up that would. [See Appianus toward the end, lib. 2, Bel. Civil.]

Alexander, who was shot at on every hand, from the towres, adjoining, (for no man durst come to handy-blows with him upon the wall) leapt off the wall down into the Castle yard, and setting his back to a wall there, slew sundry that came to assault him, with his own hand; and among the rest, the Captain himself of the Indians, which came boldly on upon him: so that afterward none other durst come near him; but all set themselves to shoot him a far off.

Mean while Peneftes, Leonatus, and Abreas, leapt down the wall into the yard after him, and came to his rescue; of which Abreas, shot thorough the face into the head, died upon the place. And Alexander himself (as Ptolomei reporteth) received to great a wound in the breast, that his very breath came forth at it together with his blood. Peneftes, who interposed, with Minerva's buckler in his hand, and Leonatus, who took in his own body the blows which were meant to him, were likewise sore wounded: and little wanted it, but that Alexander himself, had there poured forth his soul, together with his blood. And all agree, that Peneftes defended him with his Palladian buckler: whence Pliny call him, lib. 34, cap. 8.] the preserver of Alexander the Great. Concerning Leonatus, and Abreas, the Dupliarian; all do not agree: but that Ptolomei the son of Lagos, was at the rescue of him, Chitarchus and Timogenes, and Paulanias in his Attica, do affirm: which yet himself denies, and says, he was not; and that all that while he was in fight with the enemy elsewhere: So great saith Curtius, was the carelessness of these old Historians in writing, or which is as bad, callness in believing.

The Macedons at last breaking into the Castle, put every man therein to the sword, not sparing man or woman, old or young, and brought the King out upon their targets, living or dead, they knew not well whether. The cure of his wounds was more grievous, than the wounds themselves: but enduring the paine, he came at last to have hope of life again: which yet the army could hardly be brought to believe, it having been once bruited abroad that he was dead of his wounds. Wherefore so soon as possibly he could, he caused himself to be carried to the River side, from thence to fall down in a Barge to the place where his army lay, which was at the confluence of the Hydræotes with the Acefines, where Hephæstion was, commanding the army, and Nearchus the Navy; to soon as he came on land, he admitted the souldiery to kill his hand, hand, and refusing his lister, gat upon his Horse, to be seen of all, and then alighted and went a foot to his pavilion.

The King having his wounds cured in seven dayes space, though not yet healed, hearing that the Indians were perwaded of his death, caused two Barges to be joynd together, and upon them his Tent Royal to be spread; open on every side, to be seen of all thereby, to say the report, that went among his enemies, that he was dead; and from thence went down the river, giving order, that none should come near the barge he was in, for fear of flogging his weak body, with the beating of the Oares: and so on the fourth day, came to a country, delighted indeed, by the inhabitants, but plentifully stored, with all manner of provisions, both corn and cattle, wherefore that place pleased him well, to stay at, and refresh both himself and his army in.

Nearchus the Ammiral, reporteth, that his Nobles blamed him, for doing the office of a souldier, rather than a King or Captain in the army, and when he grew angry thereat, and shewed his dislike by his looks; a certain old Bactrian pleaded him again, by reciting an old fambick verse, to this purpose, That he who would do any great thing reason was, he should suffer something too. And indeed, Curtius [lib. 9. cap. 12.] mentions an oration uttered to him by Craterus, in the name of his Nobles, to the same purpose, with his answer thereunto: wherein, shewing that a man can never want matter to win glory by: After the ninth year, (saith he) of my reign, and twentieth of my ages do ye think it possible for me to be wanting, to my self in advancing my glory, which I have ever added and devoted my self unto; for so Curtius brings him in speaking, whereas yet in true point of Chronology, this was the tenth year of his reign (which agreeth well enough with this laying) though the 30 of his age.

Whiles the King stayed here many dayes; all which he spent in the full curing of his wounds, and in encreasing the number of his ships; the Grecian souldiers which he had planted in certain Cities of Baetria, and Sogdiana, which himself had there built, to the number of about 3000 men, partly because they grew weary of living among those Barbarous people, and partly, because they took courage, upon the news of Alexanders death, fell off from the Macedon government; and having killed some of the chief of their own country men, began to take arms: and seizing on the Castle of the City Baetria, which was not so carefully kept, as it should have been, drew the inhabitants to joyn with them in this revolve; chief in this conspiracy, was one Athenodorus, who also assumed to himself the Title of a King, not so much out of a desire of any sovereignty, as out of a purpose he had, to draw men thereby to follow him in his return to Greece. But there was one Biton or Bicon, a Grecian likewise, who out of a grudge and envy, which he bare him hereupon, invited him to a banquet, and there, by the hand of one Boxus, slew him. The next day this Biton called a company together, and there perwaded some, that Athenodorus would have killed him: others there were, who thought it was nought else but a meer rogery of Bitons, and they quickly drew others to their belief: whereupon they all took up arms, ready to have slain him, if they could; but the chief among them perwaded the rest, and so all grew quiet again.

Biton, having got out of these bryers, fell to practise the destruction of those who had saved his life; which they perceiving, laid hold on him, and Boxus both, but Boxus they put instantly to death: Biton they purposed to have first to the Rack; and now they were ready to fall to work with him: when upon the sudden, the Grecians, like men out of their wits, rose all in arms, no man knew why; whereupon they forbore Biton, for fear of a rescue by the multitude; and he all naked as he was, fled to the Grecians: and they seeing what case he was in, and ready to be racked, changed their minds, and rescued him from the danger he was in.

Mean while, the Mallians, that were left, sent their messengers to Alexander, to yield up all the nation to his mercy; and in like manner from the Oxydracans, came the Captaines themselves, and chief men of every City; and with them, one hundred and fifty of the principall of the whole nation, giving up the whole Country into his hands, Alexander willed them to send him one thousand of their principall men. Curtius saith, 2500 horse, which he might keep by him, either as hostages, or as souldiers to serve him, till he had ended his war with the Indians.

Then invited he all the principall men, and petty Kings of these nations, to a feast, where he caused one hundred golden Beds to be set, at a reasonable distance each from other: every of those beds was enclosed with Curtains wrought of scarlet and gold: in which feast was set out to be seen, what ever the old luxury of the Persians, or new fanglens of the Macedons, both jumbled together, could afford.

Dioxippus the Athenian was at this feast, of whom Pliny, [lib. 35. cap. 11. Athena, lib. 6. cap. 6. Elian, lib. 10. cap. 22. and lib. 12. cap. 58. and Plin. in his book of Curiosities] make mention: Dioxippus, I say, a famous Champion, and one whom the Kings, for his great strength of body, and courage of spirit, made very much of: and one Choragus a Macedon, a man of mighty strength likewise, and who had, in many a fight, given great testimony of his worth. This Choragus being in drink, would needs challenge Dioxippus to a single fight. And the next day Dioxippus (stark naked, and all over anointed with oyl, came into the list, having nothing but a truncheon, and a cloak for his arms, and there clofed with the Macedon, who came in armed, with sword and buckler, and pike, and javelin, and laid him at his foot.

for

The Macedons, and Alexander himself, took this for a fowle flur and disgrace, put upon the Macedons nation, in the fight of these Barbarians, and repined at it: and shortly after, at another feast, there was a golden cup miffing, and the suspicion of stealth thereof laid upon Dioxippus; the indignity whereof, wrought to far upon him, that returning to his lodging, he there wate, and slept a letter for Alexander, and then flew himself.

Alexander shippe his horses, and of his fellow Cavaleers some 1700, and of others, as many, and 20 thousand foot, and went not far upon the Hydracotes, before he came to the confluence of it, and the Acelines: and then falling down upon the Acelines, came at length to the confluence of the Acelines with the river Indus; and there he stayed with his Navie, till Perdicas came to him with the body of the army: having by the wayes he came, lubdred the Abastenians, who were a free state among those Indians.

While he there stayed, there came to him, other ships of 30 Oares a piece, and certain ships of burthen, which had been newly built in the country of the Xathri, another free state in those parts: and Embassadors also, from the Ossadians, a free state likewise, all submitting to him.

Likewise the messengers of the Oxydracans and Mallians, returned to him with presents, among which, besides some small quantity of linnen cloath, there were 1000 Indian targets, and 100 talents of Steele, and Lions of a vast bignesse, and Tigers, all brought to hand, and tame: As also the skins of huge Lizards, and Tortaile shells: There were also 300 Chariots, and 1030 horses to draw them: four for every Chariot, as we read in Curtius, [4. 9. c. 15.] Arrian saith also, that they sent him 3 thousand men for hostages; the bravest and goodliest men they could find among them; with 500 chariots, and men in them to fight, over and above what Alexander had required at their hands; adding, that Alexander accepted their Chariots, and returned their hostages home again.

Alexander commanded them to pay him such tribute as they formerly paid to the Arachosians, and let Philip to be their Satrapa or Governor, his government to extend to the confluence of the 2 rivets, Indus and Acelines, and no further: so that we can hardly believe Plutarch, where he saith that the extent of this Philips government was thrice as bigg as Porus his kingdom, especially if it were so bigg, as he himself delivers it to have been. But Alexander left unto him, for a guard of that Province, all the Thracian horse, and such companies of foot as he thought fit and requisite for that purpose. Moreover he caused a City to be built at the confluence of those two rivers; supposing it would quickly grow very populous, and of great renown, and therefore caused Docks, for the building of Ships, to be there made, in great number.

At that time came to him Oxyartes, father unto Roxane, whom Alexander had married, and was by him acquitted from all suspicion of having any hand in the revolt of the Grecians that were in Baetria.

Afterward Polyperchon was sent to Babylon with an army, as in Justin, [lib. 12. cap. 10.] and Craterus was commanded with a great part of the army that was left, and the 10, and Craterus to march down on the left hand of the bank of the river Indus, because that Elephants, to march on the left hand of the bank of the river Indus, because that seemed the easier way for the Corcleeters to go, and the bordering Nations were no surer to him, than need was; and then himself, with some choice companies, took ship, and let forward toward his long intended journey to the Ocean: and it is said that he went never a day less than 600 furlongs: and yet was full five months in going with some odd dayes over and above, [Plin, lib. 6. c. 17.]

In this volage of his down the river, he first came to the countrey of the Sabracans, or Sambettans: This was a Nation, inferior to none of all India, both for number, and warlike sense of men: and was governed by a popular State, throughout all their Cities. These, hearing of the coming of the Macedons, presently armed 60 thousand foot, and six, or (as Curtius saith) eight thousand horse, with five hundred Chariots; and let over them, to command, three most expert Captains. But the Navy coming upon them (of which more is to be seen, besides Curtius, [lib. 9. cap. 15.] in Pliny, [lib. 19. cap. 1.]) they took a fright at the strangeness of the sight, and casting wthal in their minds, the fame and invincible glory of the Macedons, took advice of the old men among them, who for the avoiding of so imminent a danger, advised them to submit, where-where-

whereupon they sent messengers; and gave themselves up wholly into his hands: whom he graciously received: and they again bestowed on him, besides other gifts, honours also bestowing a demy God.

Four days after he came to a Nation, which lay on both sides the River, which were called, Sodrans (or Sogdians, as in Arianius,) and Mallanians: and received them likewise to grace and favour as he had done the former. And here, upon the bank of the River Indus, he built another Alexandria: and chose out a thousand men to people it, and made havens for Merchants, and docks for shipping; and there he cured such of his ships as had any wayes been bruised: And made Oxyartes, his father in law, and Pithon, Governours of all the country from the confluence of the Acesines and Indus to the sea: adding thereto also, all the sea coast. But himself falling still down the River, came so speedily into the country of King Muficanus, that he was there, before Muficanus ever heard that he was coming: wherefore not knowing what else to do, he forthwith went out to meet him, presenting him with the choicest gifts that India did afford, and in special, with all his Elephants; and gave up himself and all his whole kingdom into his hands, craving pardon for that he had done it no sooner. Alexander pardoned him that offence; and wondering both at the country it self, and the city there: of which we may see more in Strabo, lib. 15. pag. 694. and pag. 701. which he collected out of Aristobolus, and Onesicritus, restored him to his kingdom, as he was before.

Here he heard the complaints brought against Tixiote, al. Tityeste, whom he had made Governour over the Parapamitades, with his accusers face to face: and finding him guilty of many acts of cruelty and avarice committed by him, he put him there to death: and gave that Government to his father in law, Oxyartes.

He commanded Craterus to build a Citadel or Fort, upon the City of Muficanus: which was dispatched before he went from thence, because he saw that place fit to serve for a bridle in the mouths of the neighbouring nations, to keep them in order with.

From thence, with his Archers and Agrians, and all the Horse, which he had a ship-board, he came to another Nation of the Indians, called Praestans, and marched against their King Porticanus, al. Oxyanus, because he neither came himself, nor sent Ambassadors unto him: and took two of the greatest Cities that he had in his Dominions: Porticanus himself was in one of them, which Alexander took the third day of his siege thereof. But Porticanus flying into the Castle, sent Ambassadors to treat of conditions: but ere ever they came to his presence, two great panes of the wall fell flat down to the ground; by the breaches whereof the Macedons flew into the Castle, and when Porticanus with those few which were with him stood still upon their guard, they were all presently put to the sword: The Castle was pulled down; all in the town were fold away for slaves: the spoils thereof given to the souldier, only the Elephants Alexander took, and carried away for himself.

Diodorus sayes that Alexander first gave those Cities to be spoiled by his souldiers, and then set fire on them; and after that went and took in all the rest of his Cities and Towns and destroyed them: and thereby struck a terror into all the neighbouring Nations; and that the rest of the countries hearing of his approach onely, presently sent, and yielded themselves unto him, without the least resistance, as Arianius writeth.

After this, he entered the country of the Brachmanes, where Sambus, al. Sabus, or Samus; as Curtius, al. Sabbas, as Plutarch, al. Ambigerus, as Justin, al. Ambrasis, as Orofius calleth him, was King: of whom Alexander had been told that he was fled away: but when he came near his chief City, called Sindomana, al. Sindonalia, he found the gates set wide open to him, and Sambo his servants came forth to meet him with money and Elephants to present unto him, telling him that Sambus was fled indeed; not out of hostility to him, but for fear of Muficanus, whom Alexander had let go and pardoned, and for that there was mortal enmity between them two.

Alexander having taken in, this and many other places, went and by force took another City which had fallen off and revolted from him; and put to death many of the Brachmanes who had been the occasion and authors of it. For by their instigation it was that Sambus, who had but lately submitted to him, and the Cities of his subjection, had revolted from him. Curtius sayes, that Alexander took the City, by undermining the wall; and that the natives stood amazed to see men rise out of the ground in the midst of their City.

Cicarchus, cited by Curtius, saith, that there were eight, or rather (as Diodorus with others have it) 80000 men slain in that country: and a multitude of others fold away for slaves. These plagues therefore the Brachmanes suffered: the rest, which simply submitted to him, and craved his pardon, had no harme: And King Sambus, getting getting away as farre off as he could, with thirty Elephants, saved himself.

Alexander got into his hand, to the number of ten, of those which were called Gymnopolitae, who had principally perswaded to flee away: and had caused much trouble to him and his Macedons; to whose he propounded certain hard and obscure questions, threatening to hang them every man if they did not resolve him; those questions of his, with their answers upon them, Plutarch sets down in the life of Alexander, where he also tells us, that having heard them, he dismissed them, with many honours heaped upon them for their pains.

Muficanus in this interim revolted, and Pithon with an army, was sent against him: who setting upon the cities of his subjection, destroyed some, others he put Garrisons in, and built citadels or Castles, for a yoke upon them. And having taken Muficanus, and brought him alive to Alexander, he caused him forthwith to be crucified in his own kingdom, and as many of the Brachmanes as had put him on to that revolt.

Alexander, coming back to the river Indus, where he had commanded his Navy to attend him, fell down the river again, and came to a City called Harmatelia, belonging to Sambus and the Brachmanes: And when the inhabitants (trusting in their own strength, and situation of their city) shut gates against him, Alexander commanded 500 of his Agrians, to go close under the walls, with their arms; and if the townsmen sallied out upon them, to retreat: Three thousand fell out upon the 500, who according to direction, fled back, as if they had been afraid, and the enemies pursuing them, fell unawares upon other companies, which were laid off purpose for them; and where Alexander himself in person was: there were they forced to fall to a new fight, where in there were 6 hundred of them slain upon the place, and 1000 taken, the rest fled, and kept them close within the walls: But of the Kings side there were many grievously wounded, and in danger of death therewith: for the Indians had poisoned the heads of their weapons with a deadly poyson; and whereas among other, Ptolemei the son of Lagos, was in like manner wounded, and was ready instantly to die thereof, it is said that Alexander in his sleepe saw an herbe, which was a present remedy for that kind of poyson, and that herbe squeezed into drink and taken, presently recovered him: whereupon others also made use of that medicinable herbe, and recovered. It is most likely that some or other, who knew the virtue of the herbe, acquainted Alexander with it; and then flattery made up the rest of the fable, for his honours sake, saith Strabo, (lib. 15. pag. 723.) who yet relates this as done among the Orientals, of whom we shall speak anon.

When as therefore, Alexander now set himself to besiege Harmotelia, being a strong and well fenced city, the inhabitants came all forth to him, and humbly begged his pardon, submitting themselves and their city, and all to his mercy, whereupon he pardoned them.

Micris King of Pattalena, the next bordering countrey thereunto, coming to Alexander, put himself and kingdom wholly into his hands: whom when Alexander had freely restored to his state again, he gave order withal to have all things necessary provided for his army.

Alexander commanded Craterus to take with him the Regiments of Attalus, and Meleager, and Antigens, and some of his Archers, and some also of his allies, and Macedons, which were grown unserviceable, and to carry them into Macedon, by the way of Caramama, through the countreys of the Aracotti, and Zarangi, or Drangi: the rest of the army, some were led by Hephestion, on the one side of the river Indus and the darters on horseback, and the Agrians, by Pithon on the other: who had also in charge, to provide inhabitants, for the cities which he had built, and that if any new commotions were raised in those parts, he should settle matters there, and that done, should come and joyne with the rest of the army at Pattala.

And when Alexander had now sailed down the river three dayes journey, word was brought him, that Moeris, and a great company of the Patalemians with him, had left the city, and were fled to the mountains and woods: whereupon he made all the haste thither, that possibly he could.

Strabo, (lib. 15. pag. 691.) tells us out of Aristobolus, that Alexander came into Pattalene, about the rising of the dog-star; having then spent full ten months, in his navigation, for that he set not forth but very few dayes before the rising of the seven stars: so that Alexander arrived in Pattala, about the end of our July, having been in this navigation, ever since the beginning of the tenth month before, hereby it appears, that going still down the water, along the Hydaspes, Acesines and Indus, he had spent full nine months, as appeareth by the known rising and setting of these stars: whereby we find that Plutarchs account in this point was not very exact, where he tells us, that ὅτε παρὰ τὴν ποταμὸν τὴν βαλάντιον ὑπὸ τῶν ἑπτὰ ἡμέρων ἀνέλας (i.e.) His passing down the Rivers to the sea took him up seven monthes time.

Alexander coming to Patala, found the city and country thereabout void of all inhabitants; though he there found great flocks of flocks and herds of cattle, and corn in great abundance left. But he presently dispatched away the nimblest souldiers which he had to overtake those, who were fled away; and ever as they took any, they sent them away to overtake the rest, and to persuade them to return; promising them all security, and fruition of their estates in manner as before, both in City and Country.

Then commanded he Hephæstion to build a fort or citadel upon Patala; others he sent into a Region of theirs which was altogether desolate upon them, and slew many of them; yet having lost many of their own also in the fight, the rest fled all away to the Woods and Mountains: and Alexander, hearing of what had befallen his men, sent more to join with the former, and to go thorough with the work begun.

Alexander dealt with Nearchus, his Ammiral, to chuse some fit season of the year, to set out from the mouth of the River Indus, and to coast along till he came to the Persian gulf, and to the mouth of the river Euphrates and Tigris: as Arrianus in his Indica, reports out of Nearchus his own writings, [pag. 182.] Making, [saith Plutarch, Nearchus Ammiral of the Fleet, and Onesicritus chief Pilot of it.] Whence it is that Onesicritus himself in his story says of himself, that he was Nearchus: (i. e.) Pilot, as Arrianus lib. 6. pag. 124. relates him, and Pliny lib. 6. cap. 22. renders him, Præfektum classis: (i. e.) Commander of the Fleet. But Strabo, [lib. 15. pag. 781.] more rightly terms him Ἀρχιναύκλητος: (i. e.) chief Pilot: See [Arria. lib. 7. pag. 162. and in his Indica, pag. 191.]

At Patala the River Indus parts it self into two great arms; both which keep the name of Indus till they fall into the Sea: making between them an Island of a three-square figure, or a Δ , which from the city is called Paratene, bigger than Delta in Egypt is. Onesicritus tells us, that every side of this Δ or triangular Island, is 2 thousand furlongs in length. But Aristobolus says, that the basis of it: (i. e.) the side next the sea, and where both the Rivers fall into it, and make a marshland on either side of this Island, is not above 1000 furlongs: But Nearchus, and after him Arrianus, [saith, 1800. and Pliny saith, that it is 220 miles in length, [Strabo, lib. 15. pag. 701. Plin. lib. 6. cap. 21. Arria. lib. 5. pag. 103. and lib. 6. pag. 135. 137.]

Alexander, purposing to fall down to the sea by the right hand channel, made choice of the swiftest ships he had, all of two decks high; and all his gallees of 30 oars a piece, and some nimble barques, and such guides as best knew the River, and to set forward; willing Leonatus, with a thousand Horse, and some 8 thousand Foot, to keep along with him, by the bank of the River.

The morrow after that he set forth, there arose a mighty tempest, and the wind and tide coming cross to each other, raised a huge billow upon the River, so that his ships fell foul each of other; whereby most of them were bilged, and many of the 30 oars a piece were quite split therewith, before ever they could get to an Island, which lieth in the middle of the channel.

There was Alexander forced to stay a long while, both to build him new vessels instead of them that were lost, as also for that those which were taken in, as guides upon the River, were all run away: And when he sent to get others, he could find none; and so they were fain to go and do as well as they could without them. And now they had gone 4 hundred furlongs, when the Pilots all agreed, and told Alexander that they found a lent of the sea, and that therefore certainly the Ocean could not be far off. He thereupon sent some to go a land, and to take up some of the country people; or of whom he thought something might be learned. They searched their cretes and cottages so long, that at last they found some people in them; whom they asked, how far they were from the sea: and they answered, that they knew not what the sea was, nor ever had heard of any such thing; but, that, if they went on, in three dayes journey they should come to salt water, which marred the rest.

Arrianus tells us, that certain Macedons, being set a land, lighted upon some Indians, whom Alexander from thence forward used for his guides upon the River. But when they came where the river opened to the breadth of 200 furlongs, (which is the greatest breadth thereof) and the wind blew very strong off the sea, they were fain again to thrust into a creek, and harbour, which his guides directed him to. But Curtius says, that when upon the third day he came, as he was foretold he should to brackish water; he there found an other Island in the River, where they observed that the ships went not so fast, as they were wont to do, because the tide met them, and turned back the River upon them.

Whiles they lay there at anchor, and some went a foraging, they fell into a new danger, for there came in upon them a mighty tide (which to this day is usual in Cambay, where this river of Indus emptieth it self into the sea) and overflowed all the Country thereabouts, only the top of some Hillocks, like to many little Isles, appearing above water:

water: to which, leaving their Boats, they for safety betook themselves; and when the sea was gone out again, and the land left dry, as it was before, then their ships, as it fell out, some fell forward upon their noses, others sidelong, from the side of a bank, where they stuck; and when the next tide came in, those ships which stood upright upon their keels, in the mud, floated presently, with the rising of the water, and had no hurt; but such as lighting on hard ground, when the sea was gone out, were fallen all along: those, upon the returne of the tide, were there right driven one against the other, or beaten and broken all together upon the shore.

All which being repaired, as the time and place would permit, Alexander sent away two Barques down the river to view the Island, which the guides had told him, he must touch at, if he would saile out into the Ocean. That Island the natives called Ἰλίου, Alexander himself, Scyllustin, and others Philicutin. And when they brought him back word, that the Island was large, and had in it, very commodious ports, and store of fresh water, he commanded the whole navy, to make for that Island; himself with some choice vessels, went further, to discover whether at the mouth of the river, there were no bar, but a safe passage out into the open Ocean; and having now gone some two hundred furlongs, he espied yet another Island, lying further out in the open Ocean.

Then returned he to the former Island lying in the mouth of the River, and coming on shore, at a certain foreland thereof, he there offered sacrifice, to certain gods, such as he said, Jupiter Ammon commanded me to sacrifice unto. And the next day he sailed to another Island, lying out in the same Ocean, and there offered other sacrifices, and to other gods, and in another form and fashion, than formerly he had done; laying still, that what he did, was by the direction and command of Jupiter Ammon, and so sailed quite and quite out of the mouth of the river Indus, into the vast Ocean, and there having sacrificed certain Oxen, on shipboard to Neptune, threw them over board into the sea: whereunto he addeth also, a drink offering, and having poured that first into the sea, he threw a golden vial, and sundry golden goblets after it, with thanksgiving, into the Ocean; and praying that, whereas he had a purpose to send Nearchus into the gulf of Persia, he might safely there arrive, [Arrianus lib. 6. pag. 126.]

Justin lib. 12. cap. 10. reports, that having returned with a faire tide, to the mouth of the River Indus, he there, in memory thereof, built a new City called Barce; and erected certain Altars upon the place, and Curtius lib. 9. cap. 16. saith, that at midnight, he put forth with a small company of ships, with the stiff of the Eb, and went quite out of the mouth of the River Indus, four hundred furlongs into the open Ocean; and so having done there what he intended, and sacrificed to the gods of those seas, and land adjoining, returned to the rest of his Navy: and Diodorus Siculus, that he went with some of his familiar friends, out into the main Ocean; and lighting up in two little Isles, offered there a magnificent sacrifice to the gods: and that withall, he cast a multitude of golden cups, and of a great price, with drink offerings into the sea: and in the end, having there erected certain altars, in honour of Tethys, and Oceanus, supposing that now he had finished his intended voyage into the East, returned with his navy up the River, and that in his returne, he came to a goodly and famous City, called Hyala, whose government was much alike to, or rather, all one, with that of Lacedæmon.

For there were in it, two Kings of two several families, succeeding always in a line and had the administration of the wars, but the chief ordering of civil affairs, was in the senate, and supreme council of state.

Alexander returning to the Patala against the stream, found there the Castle, or Citadel, ready built, according to his directions given; and Pithon returned with his army, having done all, that he went about: and whereas he purposed to leave a part of his navy, at Patala, (which city retains the same name, among the Indians of Cambay, to this very day) where the River Indus severs it self into two channels, he gave Hephæstion, the charge of making there the ports, and docks fit to receive it.

Mean while he made another journey to the Ocean, by the channel on the left hand of the same River, to try which of the two channels was the best, and easiest to passe into the Ocean by, and to return again: and when he was now almost come to the very outlet of this second channel, he found a certain lough in it, which is made either by this River diffusing it self, into a larger space, or by waters which fall in there, from other parts, and make the River more spacious there, than in other parts; and to look like an arme of the sea: there he left Leonatus with most of his army, and with all his lesser sort of ships; and himself went forward, with his ships of 30 oars a piece, and of two tire of oars: and having gotten quite out of the River on that side alio, sailed again out into the vast Ocean, and found by experience, that that was the more commodious dious channel of the two, to drive a trade by, to Patala. And then going a shoar with certain Horfe, he made three dayes journey along the sea coast, and having considered of the coast all along, where he had failed, he caused wells to be digged in sundry places, for fresh water for his Navy, in case should be. [Arria. lib. 6. pag. 137.]

The next day after his return out of the Ocean, Curtius sayes, that he came up the River, to a certain lough of salt water: which put sundry of them to a great inconvenience, whilst they went into it, not knowing the nature of it: for it drew a scab upon them, and the same infectious also unto others; yet they quickly found an oyl, which cured it: which if it were the same lough, which I mentioned before out of Arrianus, then is all this History to be referred to Alexanders later return from the Ocean, which no author mentions, save onely Arrianus.

Alexander at his second return to Patala, sent a part of his army to dig those wells by the sea side: charging them withal, as soon as they had done, to return to Patala: and he sailing again into the lough, made there new Ports, and other Docks for his shipping: and leaving a Garrison there, laid up likewise provision of corn for four months, and other necessaries for the use of navigation, [Arria. ut sup.] Now it seems, that at this lake it was, that he built the City called Potana: to the end he might have a fit Port for his shipping, in that part of the Ocean: as we gather out of Diodorus, [lib. 3. pag. 181.] in the Greek and Latin edition, compared with Agatharchides, his Excerptions in Photius, [Cod. 250. cap. 51.] and with this place in Arrianus.

Curtius [lib. 9. cap. 16. & 17.] writes, that Alexander with his army, stayed in the Island of Patalene, expecting the coming on of the Spring; and that during that time, he built many cities there, and that the Winter quarter drawing now to an end, he set fire on his ships which were grown unserviceable, and marched away by land: and [Strabo, lib. 15. pag. 721.] signifies, that towards the Summer season, (which alter their account, begins ever with the Spring) he left India: which I conceive, he would not have said, had he better considered, of what he himself a little after affirmeth out of Nearchus, who was Ammiral in it, concerning this voyage: where he saith, That when the King was now upon his way, he himself began his voyage in Autumn when the Pleiades or seven Stars began to appear in the evening.

Wherefore plain it is, that Alexander in September, having sent Leonatus before him, to cause wells to be digged in convenient places for the use of the army in their march overland, thorough a dry and thirsty country, and set fire on his ships, which were leaky; removed from Patala, and came with all his army, to the bank of the River Arbis or Arabius: which River parts the Arabites, or the Arabites, (whom Diodorus Periegetes, calls Aribes, and others call Abrie,) and with them India itself from the Orites. For the Arabites inhabit along the sea shoar of India, which lieth between the River Indus, and the River Arbis, by the space of a thousand furlongs in length, as Nearchus saith, [in Strabo, lib. 15. pag. 720. and Arrianus in his Indica, pag. 185. in fi.] and these are the utmost people of the Indians westward, as appears out of [Arrianus in his Indica, pag. 184.] and out of [Plin. lib. 7. cap. 2.] and next to the Oritans, as saith [Pliny, lib. 6. cap. 23.] and Arrianus in his Indica, pag. 185.] and which speak in a language of their own, and not that of the Indians.

These Arabites or Arabites, being a free State, or people, living under their own laws, neither strong enough to withstand Alexander, nor willing to submit unto him, so soon as they heard of his coming, fled away to the Woods, and Wildernesses.

Alexander, delivering the rest of his army in the Hephestions hands, took with him one half of his silver Targateers, and a part of his archers, and some certain Regiments of those who were called Assieri, and a Troup of his fellow Cavaliers; and out of every Regiment of Horfe one Troup, and all his archers on horseback, and turned his course on the left hand toward the Ocean; and commanded a multitude of wells to be digged along the sea side, to relieve his Navy with fresh water, as they passed by, on their way to the Gulf of Persia.

No sooner had Alexander his back turned, but the Patalenians, taking fresh courage, and desirous of liberty, set upon Nearchus with the army that was left with him, and sent him packing with his Fleet, when he had yet no wind to carry him: as Strabo reports out of Nearchus himself, [lib. 15. pag. 721.] for before the beginning of Winter, which began, together with the setting of the Pleiades in the month of our November, in those parts, was no time fit for Navigation, [Arria. lib. 6. pag. 137.]

So soon, therefore, as the Ctesian, or trade winds, (which blowing all summer long from the sea to land-ward, put a stop upon all navigation in that coast) were ended, Nearchus having sacrificed to Jove the deliverer, and having performed certain Gymic games, let sail from thence, in the eleventh year of Alexanders reign, when Cephalodorus was L. Chancellor of Athens, the 20 day of the month Boedromion, or the first of October, according to the Julian Calendar, as I have already shewed in my discourse of of the Solar year among the Macedons, [cap. 2.] out of Arrianus his Indica. Now we meet with the name of this Cephalodorus, not onely 40 years before this, viz. year 3. meet with the name of this Cephalodorus, but also 3 years after this, viz. year 2. of the 114 Olympiade, which was the next year after Alexanders death, as we find in the Rowls or Tables, of the Chancellors of Athens: so that if this name be rightly set down by Arrianus in this place, and there be no scruple to be made of two Cephalodori, by reason of the vicinity of the times, then there will fall out in the 4 years of 113 Olympiade, this difference ensuing in the ordering of the Chancellors of Athens, between Diodor, Sic. Dionysii. Halic. and Arrianus, as followeth.

Pliny tells us, that Alexander built a City, at the place; from whence Nearchus and Onesicritus set forth upon their intended voyage; and that is the same which we find called, Xulinopolis, [lib. 6. cap. 23.] of which yet it is a wonder, that in the same place he should add, That no man can tell, where, or upon what River it was built: For where he should be, but in the Isle of Patalene, where they were left by Alexander, to attend the season fit to begin their voyage: or upon what River, but upon the Indus, where the Navy rode, and along which that fleet passed, when it fell down into the Ocean, as Arrianus teacheth us, out of Nearchus himself, in his Indica, pag. 183.]

The first day after they set forth from the port of Xulinopolis, to go down the River Indus, they came to a wonderful deep channel, called Stura, distant from the port, one hundred furlongs; and there lay at anchor, two dayes.

The third day, they removed; and came to another channel, 30 furlongs lower; where they found the water a little brackish, for the tide coming up so far, and there mingling with the fresh water, leaves a taint of salt in the place, even at low water: and when the tide is gone out, and that place was called Cannana.

From thence they parted, and came to a place lower upon the river, 20 furlongs, called Coreatis.

And then weighing again, they had not gone far, but they kenned a Rock, just at the place where the Indus opens and falls into the sea, and beats upon the shoars: which was of it self very rocky: but where it began to be soft ground, and better bedding for ships, there they put in with the tide, and drew a ditch of five furlongs long, before them.

And falling down again, 150 furlongs farther, they came to a sandy Island called Crocala, and stayed there one other day, near to which, upon the main land inhabited, an Indian nation, called the Arabii, from the River Arabius, which divides them, as was said before, from the Oritans.

Their journey forward, is at large described by Arrianus out of Nearchus himself, as he witnesseth, [lib. 6. pag. 143.] and after him by Jo. Ramusius, in his Navigations, [vol. 1. fol. 169.] a brief of which voyage, is also delivered by Pliny [lib. 6. cap. 23.] gathered out of Onesicritus by King Juba: as those words in him shew right well, where he saith, It is fit I should here set down, what Onesicritus delivers, of this navigation, wherein himself was by the command of Alexander, out of India, into the very mediterranean parts, of Persia, and out of him again related by King Juba: out of which we may also gather the meaning of those other words of Pliny next following, (i. e.) That voyage of Nearchus and Onesicritus, hath neither names of places, where they touched by the way, nor distances from one place to another; to wit, as it is described by Nearchus, appears by Arrianus, who himself, for that both were delivered by Nearchus, appears by Arrianus, who out of him, hath delivered both the one and the others particularly.

But that we may returne to Alexanders, he having put over the river Arbis or Arabius, and having the very night following marched thorough a great part of the sandy Country, came the next morning into places well inhabited and cultured. Then he leaving the foot to follow in good array, took the Horfe with himself, cast into several Troops, and squadrons, in very good order, but so wide spread, that they might take up and drive all the Country before them, and so let upon the Oritans, of which a great party, which took up arms, were slain, and many were taken prisoners, and then coming to a final river side; he there encamped,

Then

Then dividing his company into three brigades, he gave one to Ptolemei, to lead along by the coast; the second to Leonatus, to pass through the midst of the country, and champain part thereof; and the third he took to himself; and with it marched into the hill country of that region, and mountainous parts thereof, with the places adjoining, and spoiled and wasted all that came in his way, whence the souldiers enriched themselves, and slew many a ten thousand of men withall.

But when Hephæstion, who had the greater part of the whole army under his command, was come up unto him; Alexander went forward to Rambacia, which was the principal division of all that country, where, when he found a place by the sea sides safe from all wind and weather, he presently gave order to Hephæstion, to build a city there, which being finished, and called by the name of Alexandria, he made there a plantation of the Arachotians, to dwell therein.

And then again, taking with him one half of his silver Targateers and Agrians, and a Squadron of horse, and Archers on horseback, marched away to the borders of the Oritans and Gedrosians, where he was told there was a narrow passage, which parted the two countreys: and that both nations with their several armies were encamped there, to keep that passage against him: But no sooner came the newes unto them of his approach, but the most part of them abandoned the place and fled: whereupon the chief of the Oritans, went unto him, and submitted themselves and their whole country to him: and the only charge which he laid upon them was, to call home their countrymen, every one to his own place, assuring them, that in so doing, all should be well with them; and they receive no harm.

Then made he Apollonphanes Governor of the Oritans, joyning Leonatus, a Squire of the body with him: with whom he left all his Agrians, and some of his Archers, and Horse, and other companies of his foot, and mercenaries out of Greece, in the country of the Oritans, giving them in charge to attend the coming of the fleet into those parts; and in the mean time to go in hand with the building of a new city, and to order all matters there for the benefit of the people.

Then let he forward with a great part of his army (for now was Hephæstion again come up unto him) and marcht into the country of the Gedrosians, which was for the most part abandoned by the Inhabitants. In which desert, as Aristobolus saies, the Phenicians, which followed the army, to buy what was there to be sold, loaded their camels with mirth, and spikenards, for of such picyery and Apothecary ware, there was infinite store growing in those parts: so as the whole army used it for coverings, and beds to lie upon: and of the pikenard which they trode under their feet, a most sweet smell distilled it self far off; [Arrian, lib. 6, pag. 138, and Strabo, lib. 15, pag. 721.]

He sent Craterus before him with a part of the army, into the mid-land countreys, both to subdue Armanian (under which name, all the Regions to the west of India, properly so called, even as far as Carmania, go) and so to go from thence forward into those places, which himself purposed to come unto: But Craterus marching through the countreys of the Aracotti, and the Drange, subsidied by force the country of Chiorina, which refused to submit themselves, [Strabo, ut supra, pag. 721. 725.] And whereas Ozines (whom Arrianus calls Ordones) and Tariatpes two noble men of Persia, endeavored a revolt in Persia, he subdued them by force, and laid them in irons, [Curt. 4, c. 18.]

Himself with another part of the army, going through the country of Gedrosia, some 500 furlongs distant from the sea, and yet sometimes quartering near to the sea, marched through a barren, craggy, dry, and desolate countrey: for his desire was to visit the sea coast, all along, that he might discover, what places there were in those parts fit to make ports of; and there to make provision for his fleet, which was to come that way by his appointment, and for that purpose, to cause wells to be digged, and markets to be kept, and ports to be made, fit to receive them when they came, [Strabo, ut supra, pag. 721. and Arrian, lib. 6, pag. 139.]

To this purpose, he sent before him one Thoantes, with a competent company of Horse, to scout about the sea coast; and to see whether there were any fit place for landing there, or fresh water near the shore; or other fitting provisions for them: who returning brought him word, that he found there certain poor fishermen: and that they had to dwell in, a kind of little cottages, built up and covered over with shells of fishes, and the back-bones of them serving for rafters; and that the men used little water, and that it self, such as they digged out of the sand; and that not very sweet neither.

Alexander, coming at length into a countrey of the Gedrosians, where was store of corne, he seized it all into his own hand, and sealing up the sacks, wherein it was, with his own signet, and laying it upon carriages, sent it all away to the sea side. But whiles he went to the next ports, the souldiers, for all the seals, brake up the sacks, and took out out the corn, and spent it, for very hunger; in which action, they were the most, who were principally trusted with the keeping of it: and Alexander, understanding that what was done was for pure hunger, winked at it. And sent about all the country over to take up more corn, and sent that away by one Cretheus, to the sea side, to relieve the Fleet, with the army in it, which at that very time came to land in those parts: commanding also the natives, to go farther up into the country, & from thence to bring as much corn ready ground, and dates, and cattle, as possibly they could; and carry it to be sold at the sea side, to the army; and withal, dispatch away Telephus one of his Nobles, to make further provision of corne ready ground, whereof he found some quantity, though not much; and carried it to another Port, according to directions.

Mean while some of the Oritans, dwelling in the mountains set upon Leonatus his Brigade, and slew a great number of them, and then retired into their fastness again: as Diodorus saith: and then the whole nation of the Oritans, joyning with other neighbouring countreys, made a body of some 8000 Foot, and 400 Horse, and made a general revolt. But Leonatus meeting with them, cut off 6 thousand of their Foot, and all their Leaders: and lost of his own men, but 15 Horse and some few Foot; but withal, there died in that fight, Apollonphanes, Governour, as was said before, appointed by Alexander, of that whole country, [Curt. lib. 9, cap. 18. Arrian, lib. 7, pag. 149, and in his Indica, pag. 184.]

Nearchus, coming a shoar at this place with his Fleet, took in provision of corn, provided by Alexander, to serve his army aboard for ten dayes: repaired his ships, that were any wayes leaky, and left such of his Mariners as he found not fit for sea, with Leonatus to serve at land, and took others in their room, out of his companies, [Arrian, in his Indica, pag. 185.]

Philippus, whom Alexander had made Governour over the Oxydracans and Malians, was set upon by his own mercenary companies, and by them murdered; and the murderers presently were set upon by the Macedons which were of his guard; and either then present, or immediately after, taken and hewed in pieces for their pains.

It is said, that Alexander endured many a hard brunt, and suffered more losses, in the country of the Gedrosians, than in all Asia besides; so that of all that army, which he carried with him into India, he brought scantily a fourth part out of Gedrosia; what with greivous diseases, ill diet, burning heats, deep fads, want of water, and famine, which he suffered in those parts. But Nearchus saies, that Alexander, though he were not ignorant of the incommodities of this way, yet out of a selfwill'd ambition, which reigned, or rather raged in him, he would need force his way thorough it forsooth; because some had told him that Semiramis, and Cyrus both, had gone that way into India; and therefore he would needs return the same way out of it: though it was told him withal, that she was faine to save her self by flight from thence, with 20 men onely in her company; and Cyrus with seven, thinking it would prove a great glory for him, if, when they suffered so much there, he should be able to come off with his army safe and sound: wherefore partly out of this ambition, partly to favour and relieve his Navy, which he had appointed to meet him in those parts, it was, that Nearchus saies, he would needs return homeward thorough that country. When his guides, missing their way thorough those vast sands, by reason the wind had confounded and covered all the tracks, which lead thorough them; Alexander guessing out of his own mother wit, that the way must needs lie on the left hand, took a small company of Horse with him, and went to see whether he could recover the sea shoar or no: but their horses being all spent to five, with the length and torridness of the way, lay behind, and he with those five onely in his company, came at length to the sea side, where digging a while, and finding fresh water to drink, he presently sent back for his whole army to come thither to him: and when they were come, he marched forward seven dayes journey, along the sea coast, and found plenty of fresh water all the way; and then his guides having found the way again, led him up into the midland countreys as he desired, [Strabo, ibid, pag. 722. Arrian, pag. 142.]

At two monthes end therefore, after he parted from the country of the Oritans aforesaid, he came to the chief city of the Gedrosians, called Pura, and there he rested his army; and refreshed them with feedings, as was very fitting, and high time for him to do, [Strabo, ut supra, pag. 723. Arrian, pag. 140. and 142. and Plut. in Alexan.]

From thence he dispatched away the whitest courtiers that possible he could finde, to Phrataphernes, whom he had left Governour of Parthia, and to the two Presidents of the Provinces of Drangia and Aria: lying at the foot of the mount Taurus, with commands to them, that they should forthwith get together as many Camels, Dromedaries, and others, with all sort of beasts of draught or carriage, as possibly they could, and load them all with victuals, of all sorts, and send them in all haste to meet him at his his first entry into the country of Carmania; These letters speedily carried, and duly executed on all hands; caused, that when he came into Carmania, he found there all kind of provisions necessary, ready to receive him and his army, at the place appointed.

Menon, the Governor of the Arachosians, being lately dead, Alexander made one Sibyrtius, Governor of Arachosia and Gedrosia, both.

As Alexander was upon his march towards Carmania, news was brought him of the death of Philip, Governor of the Oxydracans and Mallians: whereupon he presently wrote away to Eudemus and Taxilas, and by his letters, commended the charge and care of those two Provinces unto them, until he should send a Governor to succeed in Philip's room.

So soon as he set foot in Carmania, Ataspes the Satrap of that province, met him, of whom there was a suspicion that he would have revolted from him, whiles he was in India. Alexander concealing the grudge which thereupon he bore him, received him very graciously, and used him according to his rank and quality, whiles in the mean time, he sought by all means possible to find out whether the suspicion that was raised of him were true or false.

Here Craterus came unto him, with the rest of the army, and the Elephants, and bringing with him Ordesius, al. Ozines, and Zariaspes, whom he had taken into custody, for having endeavoured a revolt in Persia. And thither came also Stafanor, Governor of the Provinces of Parthia and Hircania; and with them, the Captains and Commanders of all those forces which he had formerly left with Parthenion, in the Province of Media, to wit, Cleander and Sitalces, and Heracon and Agetho, which brought him 5 thousand foot, with a thousand horse.

Now the several Governors and Presidents in the parts of India, sent him in here, an infinite number of horses and other beasts of draught and carriage, some for pack-ladles, and some for panniers, out of every country of his dominions in India, some, Stafanor also, and Phrataphernes, brought him a huge number of dromedaries, and Camels. And Alexander presently distributed them all among those that wanted them to carry their goods upon, some he bestowed upon particular Captains, the rest he distributed among the soldiers, by troops and companies, as he saw cause; He also new armed his soldiers with as much bravery as ever: for why? they now drew near unto Persia, a country full, not onely of peace, but also of all manner of plenty and wealth.

Here Alexander (as Arrianus reports out of Aristobolus) offered a sacrifice of thanksgiving to his gods for his victory over the Indians, and for the safe coming of his army out of Gedrosia: and withal, entertained his armies with sports of musick and wristlings, and such like: and moreover took Pencestes, who covered him with his target in the country of the Mallians, to be the chief Squire of his body, an honour, which at that time, even only men had borne: Leonatus, Hephestion, Lyfimachus, Aristonous (all born in Pella) Perdiccas of the country of Macedonia; Ptolomei the son of Lagus, and Pithon, and the 8 was Pencestes, for his brave behaviour in saving the King from the Mallians. Others, and among them, Diodore, and Curtius, and Plutarch, say, that Alexander, whether in imitation or emulation of Bacchus, but in a drunken manner, spent seven days with his army, in his passage through Carmania. [Diodor. and Plutarch in the life of Alexander, and in the book of his good fortune; and Curtius, lib. 9. c. 18. lib. 3. ib. c. 24. & lib. 8. c. 19.] which Arrianus therefore holds for very probable, because that neither Ptolomeus, Aristobolus, nor any other credible Author in this kind, make any mention of it.

Ataspes the Governour of Carmania, was put to death, and Tlepolemus made Governor in his room. [Curr. lib. 9. cap. ult. Arrian. lib. 6. pag. 143. and again in his Indica, pag. 139.]

Cleander and Sitalces, who slew Parthenion, by Alexander's command, were accused to him for many villanies (which I mentioned before) by them committed both by the Provincials, and also by the army it self: nor could that slaughter by them committed, how acceptable soever it was to the King, exiate in his mind such a multitude of villanies and grosse misbehaviours, as were laid to their charge: wherefore he put them forthwith in chains, to be done to death when he thought fit: but seven hundred private soldiers, whom they had used as executioners of their villanies, he caused there presently to be executed, and at the same time also was execution done upon Ozines and Zariaspes, whom Craterus had brought prisoners, for endeavoring a rebellion in Persia as was laid before.

Mean while Nearchus, having sailed along the coast of the Arabii, the Oritans, the Gedrosians, and the Ichthyophagians (so called because they lived onely upon fish) arrived in the Gulf of Persia, and came to Harmozia, al. Armusia (which is now called Ormus, or Ormusa) and there drew up his ships, and went over land with a small retinue continue to Alexander, who as he heard by a Grecian, which came from the army, was not above five dayes journey off, and found him in a certain sea Town, called Salmontes, busie in making stage-plays there, and sitting himself on the open theatre.

Alexander also offered sacrifice there, to Jupiter, by the name of a deliverer, and to Hercules and Apollo, by the name of Apollo, Αἰσίου, (i. e.) the deliverer from evil, and Neptune for bringing his army safe out of the Ocean. He also made sports and games of Mulick, and other Gymnick exercises; and made a pageant, which was led in by Nearchus, all the army setting themselves on work, to get flowers and garlands to strow upon him.

Alexander, having fully heard the relation which he made of his whole voyage, sent him back to the fleet, with a small army to convoy him, because the whole country, which he was to passe, was, as he thought, friend, and wished him to faile up as far as the very mouths of the Euphrates, and to be in a readinesse from thence to row up to Babylon, when order should be given.

Tlepolemus was scanty warm in his Satrapie or Government of Carmania, when the natives all rose, and possessed themselves of the principal and strongest places, of that country: these also set upon Nearchus in his return, in sundry places, so that he was often put to it, and forced to fight twice or thrice in a day: yet with much ado, he came at length safe to the sea side, where he sacrificed to Jupiter his deliverer, and made games of dancing, running, wrestling, and the like: then looting from Ormus, he kept along by the shore of the Perian gulf; and by such stages, as Arrianus in his Indica, out of Nearchus himself, delivereth, came to the mouth of the River Euphrates.

Alexander, understanding by letters from Porus and Taxiles, that Abifar was dead, gave his kingdom to his son. He sent away also Eudemus, al. Eudemus, who was commander of the Thracians, to succeed Philip, slain, as aforesaid, in the government of the Oxydracans and Mallians.

He sent Hephestion with the greater part of the army, and with the carriages and Elephants, to go out of Carmania into Persia by sea for that the Persian sea in the winter season it always calm, and there was great store of provision in those parts.

Stafanor being sent back to his Government, Alexander himself, with the choicest of his Foot, and with the Horse of his confederates, and a part of his Archers, marched to Palargadas in Persia, where he gave money among the women, as the fashion of the Persian Kings was, when ever they came into Persia, to give unto every woman there, a piece of gold.

At his very entrance into Persia Ordesius, al. Ozines met him: He it was, who after the death of Phrataphernes the Governour there, (Alexander being then a far off in India) by his authority kept the Persians in their due subjection and allegiance to him, till he gave order for another Governour to succeed in the deceased's room. He was descended from one of the seven Princes of Persia, and deduced his pedigree from Cyrus himself, and now came, and met Alexander, and presented not him alone, but all his nobles also, with rich gifts, onely he gave nothing to Bagoas the Eunuch, and the Kings bardachy: which proved afterward the cause of his destruction. [Curtius lib. 4. cap. 27. and lib. 10. cap. 3. Arrianus lib. 6.]

While he was at Palargadas there came unto him Atropates, the Governour of Media, bringing with him prisoner Baryaxes a Median, who had worn his Turban upright, and called himself king of Medes and Persians; him therefore he brought prisoner to the King; and all those, who had been partakers with him in that action. All which Alexander caused forthwith to be put to death.

But he was most of all offended at that villany committed upon Cyrus, his monument, which he found all broken down and spoiled, and the precious things which he had formerly seen there, all save a litter, and a golden urn, wherein his body was put, spoiled, and that also was broken, and the covering of the urne taken off, and his very body tumbled out of it by those sacrilegious thieves, and they had also gone about to hew in pieces, and batter the urne or coffin it self, the better to carry it away, by pieces, if it might have been; which because they could not, therefore they left it behind them. But Alexander presently gave order to Aristobolus, to rebuild his sepulchre in such form as it was before, and for those parts of his body which were left, to put them into the urne again, and to make a new cover for it; and to reform what was defaced, and to embellish it in all points, as formerly it was: and moreover, to mure up the dore, which led into the Chappel, where the body lay, with lime and stone, and to put the impression of the Kings seal upon it. All this Serabo reports, out of Aristobolus himself, [lib. 5. pag. 173.] And Arrianus, at the end of his 6 book.

After this, Alexander commanded the Magi or Priests, which had the keeping of the Sepulchre, to be taken and had to the rack, to make them confesse the authors of this sacrilege; who yet could never be drawn to confesse any thing, either against themselves, or any other person; and thereupon were discharged: yet Plutarch says, that Polymachus, though no mean person, and a Persian borne, was put to death by Alexander, onely for opening and looking into the Sepulchre.

From Palargada, Alexander marcht to Persepolis, the Royal Seat of the Kings of Persia, which he himself had set on fire, and burnt to the very ground; but now at his return thither, he blamed himself for so doing. Here were many foul matters laid to Orxines charge: as, That he had spoiled and robbed the Kings houses, and Sepulchres of the dead, and done many of the Nobility of Persia to death. But in particular, Bigas the Eunuch put into the Kings head, that perhaps it was he, that had robbed the Sepulchre of Cyrus too: whereupon, he, I have heard Darius say, there were 3000 talents layed up; and wrought so far with the King, that he forthwith caused the Noblest person of all the Persian Nation, and to him a most affectionate servant, to be crucified.

At the same time also, Phradates, who had formerly been Governour of the Hircanians, and Mardians, and Tapyrians, being now drawn into suspicion of making himself a King, was put to death, [Curt. lib. 8, cap. 8, and lib. 10, cap. 4.]

Alexander now made Penceltes, (of whose worth in all kinds he had had so good proof, especially in that danger of his among the Mallians) Governour of Persia. And he presently, and onely of all the Macedons, put himself into the Median attire, and fell a learning of the Persian tongue: and began withal to order matters all after the Persian garb; for which Alexander much commended him, and the Persians were glad at heart, to see him use the Persian, rather than the Macedon attire.

And now a toy took Alexander again in the head; and he would needs fall down the Euphrates, and Tigris, and go see the Persian sea, and how those Rivers fell into the Ocean there, as formerly he had done, at the River Indus, and the sea which that falls into. Also, he had a purpose to sail round the coast of Arabia first, and then of all Africa; and so to return into the Mediterraen Sea, and to Macedon by the way of Hercules his pillars, [Arria, lib. 7.] And being in this mood, he gave order to the Governours of Melopotamia, to fell timber in Lebanon, and to carry it to Thaplaus a City in Syria, and to make keeles for huge ships to be built thereon; not all of seveneigh high, as Curtius hath it; but some of one fize, some of another, as we shall see anon out of Aristobolus, and all to be brought overland to Babylon: and order was given to the Kings of Cyprus to provide, brasse, and tow, and sailles for this Fleet, [Curt. lib. 10, cap. 2.]

Nearchus, and Onesicritus, coming with the Fleet to the mouth of the Euphrates, anchored at Diridos, which is the chief Mart Town of the whole Province of Babylon; and where the Merchants of Arabia, with their frankincense and spicery, use to discharge; And there hearing that Alexander would go to Sufa, they fell back; and went to the mouth of the River Pasitigris: and rowing up that River, they came to a country well inhabited, and plentifully stored with all provisions; and having rowed 150 furlongs, they there came to an anchor again; attending the return of them whom Nearchus had sent to bring him word where the King was. Mean while Nearchus there again sacrificed to the gods his deliverers, and made Games; so that the whole Sea-army, gave themselves wholly to pastime and merriment, [Arria, in his Indica, 3.]

Calanus an Indian borne, and a Gymnosophist, or of the sect of Philosophers, which went naked in those parts; having now attained the 73 year of his age, and had never in all that time felt ach in his bones, or other sicknesse or distemper in his body; happened now to fall into his first sicknesse at Palargadas; wherefore finding some feeblenesse in his parts, and them to grow weaker every day more than other, when he came to the borders of the territory of Sufa, (for there it was that this fell out, as Diodorus saith; and not in a suburbe of the City of Babylon, as Elian, lib. 5, Varia. Histor. cap. 6, will have it) he petitioned Alexander, that he would cause a great pile of wood to be made, and that when he was got up upon it, he would cause some of his servants to put fire to it. The King at first endeavoured to dissuade him from his purpose; but when he could not, and the man told him, that if not that, he would die some other way: Alexander commanded a pile of wood to be dressed as he desired, and bad Ptolemei the son of Lagos, to take care for it, [Diodor. lib. 17, Strabo, lib. 15, pag. 686, & 717, & Arria, lib. 7.] But as he was going to the Pile of wood, he saluted and kissed the hands, and bid farewell to all the rest of his friends: but Alexander's hand he would not kisse; saying, that he should meet with him time enough at Babylon, to kisse it there; meaning, that he should die there, [Arria, lib. 7, pag. 160, Plut. in Alex. Cic. lib. 1, De divinas. Valer. Max. lib. 1, cap. 8.]

Now

Now Nearchus tells us, that so soon as the fire was put to the pile of wood, the trumpets sounded, for so Alexander had appointed; and the whole army there present, gave a shout, as if they had been ready to joy in a battle: the Elephants also at the same time made a noise, such as they use when they enter a fight in the field; as if all had conspired to honour the funeral of Calanus, [Arriane.]

Chares of Mitylene, addeth further, that Alexander, to honour his funeral, caused a prize of Musicians and Wrestlers to be proclaimed: and that, detrous herein to gratifie the Indian Nation, he made one match of drinking, a thing usual among them; and that he appointed a talent for him that could drink most, and 30 pounds for the second, and ten for the third: and when he had called many of his Nobles and Captains to that feast, he that drank most, was one Promachus, who drank off fower gallons and one pottle, and having received his talent for his prize, lived three days after, and then died; of the rest, 35 finding a starke chillinelle coming on them by the surfeit which they took instantly, and six others of them, shortly after, were found dead in their tents, [Athenaus, lib. 10, cap. 12, Plutarch in Alexander, Elian, Varia. Histor. lib. 2, cap. 42.]

Nearchus, and Onesicritus, with their Navale army; continuing their course up the river Pasitigris came to a bridge newly made, over which Alexander with his army was to passe, to come to Sufa; and there they anchored, [Arria, in his Indica, pag. 197, Plut. lib. 6, cap. 23.] saith, they found him at Sufa, keeping holiday seven months after he left them at Patala, and in the 3 month after they set sail from thence: or rather in the sixth month: seeing we have already made it appear that they set out from Patala, the very next month after he parted from them at the City Patala.

Now when both armies both of land and sea, were come together, Alexander offered sacrifice yet again, for his Navy and Army both, to prevent, and made playes and games for it: and whereever Nearchus went through the spaces of the camp, every man throwed flowers, and cast garlands on him, [Arria, ut sup.]

Alexander, having sent away Atropates to his Government, marcht to sufa: where when Abulites; who had made no provision at all for his entertainment, onely presented him with 3 thousand talents of silver, he bade him lay it before his horses, and when they would none of it; for what purpose then, said he, is this money: Plutarch saith that Alexander laid Abulites in irons, and struck his son Oxathares all. Oxathares through with a javelin: Arrianus saith, that he put both the father and son to death, for their ill behaviour, in their government at Sufa.

Many of the Nations, which he had conquered, came in and complained of their Governours who little dreaming of Alexanders ever returning out of India, committed many and monstrous outrages, both upon the temples of their gods, and upon the Sepulchres of the dead, and also upon the persons and fortunes of the subject: all which Alexander commanded to be executed in the view of those who came to complain against them, without all respect of nobility, favour or service, which otherwise they might have done; and now also Cleander and Sitalces, whom he had condemned whilst he was yet in Carmania, he caused to be executed for company, as guilty of the like disorders. Heracon also, who hitherto had escaped scot free, but was now accused by the men of Sufa, for robbing and ransacking their temple, and thereof convicted, suffered according to his deserts. And now Alexander grew ready to hearken to every slight accusation, upon trivial matter; and to punish with death and torment, every small offence, conceiving with himself, that they who acted small matter, intended greater in their minds.

And when the fame of such his severity against his officers in their several places flew abroad, many, considering what themselves had done, began to fear what might come thereof: some of which packing up what moneys they had gotten, fled away into unknown parts, others who commanded over mercenary companies, openly revolted from him: whereupon letters were presently dispatcht away to all the Governours and Presidents of countreys throughout all Asia, to disband and send away all mercenary companies, [Diodor. per 2. Olym. 113.]

No sooner then, was this order put in execution; but forth with many strangers, finding themselves cashiered, went straggling over all Asia, and for want of pay, lived upon the spoile of the countrey, till at length they all came into one body, at Tenarus in Laconia: and so likewise all the Commanders and Governours of the Persians which were left, gathering together what men and moneys they could make, came all to Tenarus, and there joyned their forces together, [Id. year 3. Olym. 113, and year 2. Olym. 114.]

Alexander now took to wife, Statira, the eldest daughter of Darius, and besides her another, as Aristobolus tells us, called Parysatis, the youngest daughter of Ochus; and gave Drypatas the youngest daughter of Darius, and his own wives sister in marriage to

to Hephæstion. To Craterus, he gave Amestris, the daughter of Oxyartas, al. Oxathra, a daughter of Oxathres the brother of Darius. Perdicas married the daughter of Antopates the governor of Media. Nearchus had given him to wife the daughter of Spitamenes the Bactrian; to Ptolemy the son of Lagos, the squire of his body, and to Eumenes, were given the two daughters of Artabazus, and sisters unto Barina, by whom, though not in lawful wedlock: Alexander himself had a son, called Hercules. Ptolemy's wife, was called Aracama, al. Apama; but the whom Eumenes married, Artonis: where we must note by the way, that the name of Barina in Arrianus, [lib. 7. pag. 148.] is put for Statira: But in Plutarch, in the beginning of the Life of Eumenes, where he nameth his wife it is, I know not how, crept in for Artonis.

Upon all the rest of his Nobles likewise, Alexander bestowed wives, of the most illustrious families that were of the Medes and Persians, in all to the number of 80, as Arrianus, or 90, as Elian, 92 as Chares, 100 as Plutarch, in his discourse of the Fortune of Alexander affirmeth. Now these marriages of Alexander and his Nobles were all made and solemnized, at one and the self same time, the King bestowing a dowry with every one of them; and for five days together, celebrated these marriages, with that pomp and magnificence of feasting, and Maccarades, as is set down by Elian, [lib. 8. cap. 7. Var. Hist. and by Athenus, Deipnosoph. lib. 12. cap. 18. out of Chares of Mytilene, lib. 20. of his History of Alexander.] To every one of the guests, who amounted in all to the number of nine thousand; it is said, that he gave a golden vial to sacrifice a drink offering withall. To the rest of the Macedons, who had formerly married wives out of Asia, which amounted to above ten thousand men, he gave them every man wedding gifts.

Moreover, he thought it fitting at this time, to pay every one of the souldiers debts out of his own store: and when he had given order that every one should give in a ticket of what he owed, that thereupon they might receive every man his money, at the first very few gave in their tickets, fearing that this was but a device of the Kings to find out who they were, that could not live of their pay, by reason of their riotous expenses. But among those, who did give in their names, there was one Antigones, with one eye, and who had lost the other under Philip, at the siege of Perinthus, with the hurt of a dart from the wall. He feigning himself to be more in debt than indeed he was, brought one to the pay-master: who affirmed to him, that he had lent the said Antigones so much money: whereupon Antigones received it. But the King being afterward informed of this abuse of his, grew wroth thereat, and forbade him ever after to come within his court, and took from him an office, which he had; which brand of ignominy, he took to heart, that he thought thereupon to kill himself; which Alexander perceiving, remitted his displeasures and suffered him to enjoy his money.

But when he heard that many, who were truly in debt, would not yet give in their names, but would keep their own counsel, and would not be known what they ought, he then openly blamed them for being so distrustful of him, saying, that a King should be no other than true to his subjects, nor the subjects have other opinion of their King, but that he would be in all things true unto them. And then he caused tables to be set out in sundry places of the Camp, with monies on them; and whoever brought in his ticket of what he owed, received presently his money, without being asked so much as what his name was, and then they began to believe that Alexander was Alexander, and a man of his word, indeed.

That largesse of his among his souldiers, amounted, as Justin and Arrianus report, to upward of 20 thousand talents, whereas Diodorus more probably saith, that it came to little less than ten thousand, for Curtius and Plutarch say, that of 10 thousand talents brought forth, there were, 130 leltall paid, with this lennoy over and above of Curtius, So that, saith he, that army, conqueror of so many nations, brought yet more honour and glory, then spoil and riches out of Asia.

Sundry other gifts did Alexander at that time bestow upon several men in the army, either according to degree and quality, or in regard of some memorable service which they had done, and upon those which excelled in this kind, he bestowed over and above Crowns of gold to wear: as first, upon Pencilles, who covered him with his Target against the Mallians, and next him upon Leonatus, who at the same time also fought most manfully in his defence, and had upon sundry occasions behaved himself bravely in the country of the Oritans and thirdly upon Nearchus, who had brought his Navy and army therein safe out of India thorough the Ocean into those parts: and in the fourth place Onesicritus, the Pilote of the Kings ships, and then Hephæstion, and other squires of his body.

Mean while, there came unto him the Governours of sundry Cities, which he had built, and divers Provinces, by him subdued, bringing with them to Sula 30 thousand souldiers out of Persia and other Nations (of which I spake formerly in the year of the World 3676.) all young men, and of an age, goodly persons all, to look on, and of great great performance. These being thus selected by the Kings command, and trained and marshalled after the Macedonian manner and discipline in feates of armes, and all gloriously armed, encamped before the walls of Sula; where when they had given a proof of their readinesse and good address in Marthal Discipline before the King, the King highly rewarded them every man, and gave them the name of Epigoni; that is, of an after brood, growing up in their room, who in feates of Chivalry, and Conquering the World, had gone before them.

Alexander, having delivered over the greater part of his land army to Hephæstion, to be led to the coast of the Persian Gulf, and given order for his Navy to come to the country of Sula; took shipping there with his silver Targateers and his Phalax or Main Squadron, and part of his fellow Cavaleers, and fell down by the River Ulay, into the Gulf of Persia. But before he came at it, left many of his ships, which were any ways bilged and leaky, and with the rest went forward and came about from the mouth of that River by sea, to the River Tigris: the rest he sent up the channel or cur, by which the Tigris is drawn into the Ulay, and to they also came into the River it self of Tigris.

Alexander, compassing about all the shoar of the Persian Gulf, which lieth between the two mouths, that of the River Ulay, and that other of Tigris, came to his Camp; where Hephæstion with the army attended his coming. Then returned he again to Opis, a City seated upon the bank of the Tigris; and as he went on, caused all the darts, locks, and lances, which the Persians had made upon that River, to hinder the access of any enemy by sea to Babylon, to be taken away; saying, That they were but shifts and devices of those, who were of little worth in themselves, [Arria. lib. 7. with Strabo, lib. 16. pag. 740.]

But so soon as he came to Opis, he called all his army together, and declared to them that his purpose was, to discharge all such, as thorough age, or otherwise, found themselves grown unserviceable for the war, and to give them free leave to return every man to his own home: but for such as were able and would stay, he promised to make them condition such, and to bestow such largesse upon them, as should make their eyes ake, that lay idling at home; and should encourage the rest of the Macedons to come and share with them in their fortunes.

This he did with a purpose to gratifie the Macedons: But they took it, as if thereby he went about to disgrace them, and held them for no better than a company of uselesse men for his wars; and champing upon this bar, called to mind all other grievances, and occasions of discontent by him formerly given them in any kind: as that he went attired in a Median Robe; and that all those goodly marriages that he made, were all solemnized forsooth, after the Persian fashion: that Pencilles his Governor of Persia, was turned altogether Persian, both in attire and language, and that Alexander himself delighted, but too much, in these new fangles, and outlandish fashions. That the Bactrians, Sogdians, Aracholians, Zarangians, Arians, Parthians, and those Persian Horfe, which were called Eneacs, were mixed with and reckoned among his fellow Cavaleers. That now there was a fifth Brigade of Horfe let up; not altogether indeed consisting of forreign nations; but yet that encreasing the number of his Horfe, there were taken into them, Copthes the son of Artabazus, Hydaive, and Artiboles the two sons of Mazæus, Itanes the son of Oxyartes, and brother to Roxane, Alexanders wife, Agobares, and his brother Mithrobates; and that he had made Hydaïpes a Bactrian by birth, Commander over that Regiment: and that instead of the Macedonian Spear, they used a Javelin, after the manner of forreign nations. That he had erected a new company of young forreigners, calling them Epigoni, and armed them after the Macedonian manner. And lastly, that in all things he despised and scorned the Macedonian Discipline and Customs, and the Macedons themselves: wherefore one and all cryed out, and desired to be discharged, and to serve no longer in the wars: bidding him and his father Hammon, go fight hereafter if they would, seeing he grew weary of, and cared no more for his own souldiers, who had hitherto fought for him.

In this combustion, Alexander enraged as he was, leapt off the place, where he stood speaking to them, and with such Captains as were about him, and flew in among them, and took thirteen of the principal routineers, and which stirred up this sedition among the rest; and delivered them to the Serjeants, to be bound hand and foot and thrown into the Tigris: so great was either the dread of the King upon them in making them take their death so patiently as they did, or the resolution of the King himself, in doing them to death, according to Marthal Discipline: and then attended only with his Nobles and Squires of his body, he went to his lodging; and there neither eat nor slept, nor suffered any man to have access to his presence all that day, no nor yet the next.

Upon the third day, he called his forreign souldiers together, commanding the Mac-

Macc-

Macedons, not to bugde out of their Tents; and when they came, he spake to them by an interpreter, and commanded their perpetual loyalty to himself, and to their former Kings, and withal reckoned up, and put them in mind of the many favours and honours, which he had conferred upon them; how he had never used them as conquered persons, but as fellow soldiers and partakers of all his conquests, and had mingled the conquered with the conquerors, by mutual affinities & intermarryings, the one with the other: Wherefore, saith he, reckon not your selves, as made, but born, my soldiers: The kingdoms of Asia and Europe are become all one; what was newly before, is now grown natural by long use and custom, and you are no less my country men, then you are my soldiers.

And presently he chose out of them a thousand tall young men, and appointed them for a guard of his person, the chief commands of the army, he bestowed among the Persians, and called the severall Troups and Companies, by Macedonian names, and thence he also called his Cousins and Nobles, and gave them only the privilege, to be admitted to kisse his hand, [See Polyanius Strateg. 4. in Alexander 7.]

When the Macedons saw the King come abroad guarded onely with Persians, and that out of them, all Serjants, and other attendants were taken, and they promoted to all places of dignity and honour, about his person, and themselves cast off, with scorn and infamy; their courage abated, and conferring a while among themselves, ran all together to the Kings lodging, and casting off all their cloths to their very wait-coats, threw down their armes at the Court gates; and standing themselves without, lift up a pitifull cry, and desired to be admitted, offering to give up every author of that mutiny, and desired the King to save himself with their deaths, rather than their disgraces. But he, though his choler were down, yet would not admit them: and they on the contrary would not away, but continued their crying and howling two whole dayes and nights; and calling upon him, by the name of their Lord and master, protesting never to leave his gate, until he had mercy on them: whereupon upon the third day he came forth unto them, and seeing their humiliation, and dejection before him, with their unfeigned sorrow, and hearing their pitifull complaint and lamentation which they made, was moved to compassion of them; and wept a long time over them: and when he stood a good while, as if he would speak unto them, but could not; and they continued all that time upon their knees before him.

Then one Callines by name, a man venerable for his age, and of no mean esteem in the Regiment of his fellow Cavaliers, spake thus unto him, This is that, saith he, O King, which grieves thy Macedons, that now thou hast made some of the Persians, thy Cousins, and these thou hast received to kisse thy hand, and hast deprived thy Macedons of this honour, and when he would have proceeded, Alexander interrupted him, and said, I now make you all my Cousins, and from henceforward, will call you by that name. This said, Callines stepped out, and went and kissed his hand, and so did as many else, as had a mind to it, and then taking every man up his arms again, they all returned with joy and triumph into the Camp.

Then went the King and sacrificed to the gods, as he was wont to do, and made a general feast for all the army; sitting down himself, first with his Macedons, and then the Persians, and after them, the rest, according to their severall ranks and qualities in the Army. Then took Alexander a bowl, and drank, and so it went round among the Macedons. The Grecian Prophets, and Persian Priests; pouring forth their prayers, and among all other prosperities, and favours from their gods, desired of them, to grant a concord and unity of Empire between the Macedons and Persians, and both kingdoms. It is said, that there were nine thousand guests, which sat at this feast, and that they all pledged this health, and sang the same Panna, or Song of joy and gladness unto Apollo, as they used to do, when they returned from a victory into their Camp.

Alexander, passing over the Tigris, encamped in a country, called Cares, and then having passed the region called Sitacene in four dayes march, he came to Sambana; where he camped seven dayes: and then after three dayes journey, he arrived at Celovaz, where Xerxes heretofore had made a plantation, of those, which he brought out of Bactria, and then turning a little out of the right way, leading to Babylon, he went to see Bagisthenes, a country, abounding with fruit, and all other commodities, belonging either to the pleasure or profit of mankind.

Mean while, Harpalus a Macedon born, chief Baron and Treasurer, of all the Kings monies in Babylon, and revenues of that whole province, being privy to himself of his wastfulness, and other ill behaviour there, and knowing what Alexander had done, to many other Governours, upon complaints made of them, by the provincials, got together five thousand talents of silver, and fix thousand hired soldiers, and fled quitted out of all Asia, and coming with them to Tannarus in Laconia, left them there: (Whither, others also, which could not well stay in Asia, had already retired themselves, as I said before) and came himself to Athens, in suppliant wife: But when Antipater and Olympias demanded him out of their hands, he dealt with the people of Athens, by seeing Demosthenes, and other Orators there, that he escaped, and returned safe to his company at Teaurus. [Diodor. year 2. Olymp. 113. Pausanias in his Attica, Plutarch in the Lives of Demosthenes and Phocion.] In Arrianus there is a blank left, [lib. 7. pag. 155.] in which place this flight of Harpalus from Babylon, should have been joyned to that journey of Alexander thitherward, [as appears by Phocion in his Biblioth. cap. 91.] and that there was an action brought against this Harpalus, mei duos, (i. e.) of bribes received by him, Dionysius Halicarnassensis, in the end of his Epistle to Ammeus concerning Demosthenes, when Anticles was L. Chancellor at Athens, which was, as I said before, in this 4 year of the 113 Olympiade, according to his account, plainly sheweth.

A contention falling between Hephæstion and Eumenes, concerning a certain gift, whatever it was, and wherein many foul words passed between them, Alexander composed the difference and made them friends, much against Hephæstions will, and not without some threatening speeches used by Alexander to him; but much to the content of Eumenes, [Plut. in Eumenes. Arrian. 7. p. 155.]

Alexander from hence came into a country, where great herds of the kings of Persias horses fed, for in this place, called the Nican Countrey, there were wont to be kept 150 or 160 thousand horses of the kings, though Alexander at his coming thither found not, as Arrianus saith, above fifty thousand, or at most fixty, as Diodorus hath it.

When Alexander had encamped here 30 dayes, he set forward again, and upon the 7 day after, came to Ecbatane, the chief city of all Media: the circumference whereof was [said to be] 250 furlongs, where, as his manner was, after any good success, he offered sacrifices, and made games of mulick, and gymnick sports, and exercises in honour of his gods; and feasted himself with his nobles; and then having ordered all matters in that kind, he returned again to see his flag-polesters, and Anticks at their parts; and moreover, instituted certain set feasts and clubbings, because there were newly come unto him out of Greece, 3 thousand Cooks, and other ministers, and artificers of that kind.

Apollochorus of Amphipolis, a noble man about Alexander, and whom he had made General of that army, which he had left with Mazæus, when he made him Governour of the City and province of Babylon, hearing what course he took with such Governours or chief officers as he had set over the severall regions of his dominions, took a fright, as his fellow Harpalus had done before him, and having a brother called Pythagora, who was a kind of a toothfayer, consulted him by his letters, to know what was like to become of him: And Pythagoras by his letters back again to him, desired to know for fear of whom it was that he would have his fortune told? and he answered, it was for fear of Alexander and Hephæstion: whereupon he first looked into the entrails of a beast for Hephæstion, and when he found that the liver of it had no fillets, he wrote back again to his brother from Babylon to Ecbatane; and bade him never fear Hephæstion, for that he should shortly depart this life himself: which letter, Aristobulus reports, was written the very day before Hephæstion died, [Arrian. l. 7. with Apollonius, towards the end of his second book De Bell. Civil.]

For Hephæstion being overmuch given to wine, fell thereby into a fever: and being a young man and a soldier, would keep no diet, which was prescribed him, but whilst his Philition Glaucius, a. Glaucias, was a little away, fell to his dinner as at other times, and eating of a roasted dromedary cock, & taking a huge draught of frigidated wine after it, felt himself presently not well, and upon the seventh day after, died of it.

Upon the same day there were certain gimnic games, exercised before the King, by the boys, or pages of the Court, from which he suddenly arose, and went to see Hephæstion, but when he came, found him dead, whereupon he restrained all eating for 3 dayes space; nor took any care of himself; but lay all that while, either fully silent, or impatiently lamenting the losse of his Hephæstion: Afterward he changed his attire, and caused not only himself and his soldiers, but even very horses and mules, to be all thorne: and caused the pinacles of Ecbatane, and all other cities and towns thereabouts, to be taken down from their walls, to the end that they looking in a worse, and more deformed fashion than they did before, might seem in a sort, to lament and bewail his death; and withal crucified his poor Phylition that could not help it: commanded there should no found of pipe or flute be heard in all the camp, gave order for a general mourning among all Nations to be made for him, [Diodorus, year 3. Olymp. 113. Plut. in his Alex. and Pelopidas. Arrian. l. 7. and upon Epistemon, l. 2. c. 22. Elian Var. Hist. l. 7. c. 8.]

He gave his body to Perdicas, to be carried to Babylon; for that there he intended to bestow

bellow on him a most magnificent funeral, and had often preach with the principal architects about him, of making a most sumptuous monument for him, especially, with Statiracres, who made profession of new and rare inventions, in devising and erecting vast and excessive buildings.

Now Eumenes, fearing lest Alexander might conceive that he was glad of Hephæstions death, put him on the more upon this project, and suggested to him new devices, as pertaining much to the honour of Hephæstion, devoting both himself and his arms to Hephæstion, and sundry other of the Nobles following Eumenes his example, did the like. [Plutarch in the Life of Eumenes, and Arrianus lib. 7.]

And moreover, whereas Hephæstion was Colonel of the Regiment of the Kings fellow Cavaliers, he put none to succeed him in that place, lest happily the name of Hephæstion should be forgotten among them; but caused that Regiment to go by the name of Hephæstions Regiment, And the Cornet which he gave to be born still before them, when ever they went to fight.

At last, to put himself out of this melancholly fit, he would needs go and make a needlesse war, and parting his army with Ptolemy, went a hunting of men, and to drive the country as he would drive a forest for wild beasts; and fell upon the Cossians, a people bordering upon the Uxians, and inhabiting the mountainous parts of Media: which all the Persian Monarchie could never bring under their subjection; nor were in all these wars ever daunted in courage, or thought the Macedons such bugbears, as to be afraid of them. But he first took the passages leading thorough the mountains into their country, and wasted their borders: and going further on, routed them in sundry conflicts, and destroyed them wherever he came without mercy, and called that, Hephæstions funeral feast. Now as well Nearchus, as Arrianus, tells us, that he thus let upon these Cossians in the depth of Winter, when they little dreamt of any enemy to come upon them, [Sirabo, lib. 11. pag. 524. Arrian, lib. 7. pag. 157. and in his Indica, pag. 196. See also Polyæmus, Strateg. lib. 4. in Alexan. nn. 31.]

The Cossians, seeing they had ever the worst of it, and grieved to see what multitudes of them were taken prisoners, were fain at length to redeem their fellows lives, with their own slavery; and giving themselves up wholly to Alexanders will and pleasure, had peace granted them, upon these terms. That they should be obedient in all things, to the King, and do whatever he commanded. So Alexander having subdued all that nation within 40 dayes space, and built sundry Cities upon the most difficult passages of the country, returned with his army.

Alexander sent one Heraclides, with certain Shipwrights into Hircania, to sell timber there, for the building of ships, all men of War, some with decks some without, after the Grecian manner; for he had a great desire to be acquainted also with the Caspian sea, and to know to whom it belonged.

When he had passed with his army over the Tigris, then marched he strait forward to Babylon; yet so as he made divers encampings by the way, and rested his army in sundry places to refresh them; and when he removed at any time, made easie marches. And now he was come within 300 furlongs of Babylon, when the Chaldean Priests, and Prophets, sent unto him, by one of their own company, called Beléphanes, advising him by no means to come to Babylon; for that if he did, it would prove fatal to him.

Alexander, when he had understood by Nearchus, (for himself durst not have speech with Beléphanes) what these Chaldeans errand was, he sent many of his Nobles thither; but himself turned aside from it, and would not go into it, but encamped some 200 furlongs off from it, at a place called Bersia, which perhaps is the same which Ptolemy calls Bersia, a City long since destroyed and there stayed.

There was he persuaded by Anaxarchus, and other Grecians, and their philosophical reasons, not to regard those predictions of the Priests and Magicians, but rather to reject and despise them, as vain and false. Whereupon he brake out with that Lambick Verse of Euripides,

Μακρόν δ' αἶψα, βροχέων μακρόν: (i. e.)
Who best can guess, he best Prophets is.

Then the Chaldeans desired him, that if he would needs enter that City, yet at least he would not enter with his face toward the West: but take the pains to go about, and come into it, looking toward the East. And Aristobolus tells us, that he was content to hearken to them in that point; and therefore the first day he marched as far as to the River Euphrates: but the next day, having the River on his right hand, he marched along the bank thereof, as desirous to passe by that part of the City which looked toward the West: that so he might come in looking toward the East: but when

when he found that way slabby, and full of slowes and fens, and cumbersome for his army to passe, he neglected that very point of their counsel also, and entered it, with his face toward the West, [See Appian, toward the end of his second book, De Bello Civili, and Seneca, Senfor. 4.]

When he came to the walls of the City, he looked and beheld a flock of Crows, fighting and killing one another: whereof some fell down dead hard by him. And when Apollodorus told him, that he had a brother in that City called Pythagoras, who was versed in the skill of soothsaying, by looking into the bowels of beasts offered in sacrifice, and that he had already consulted the gods that way concerning him; he forthwith sent for him, and asked him what he found concerning him: Sir, said he, I found the liver of the beast without strings or files: without strings? (quoth Alexander) what means that? The meaning, Sir, is, quoth Pythagoras, that some great mischief hangs over your head: or as Appian, that you shall shortly die; for which so far was it off, that Alexander, grew offended with him, that from thence forward, he made the more of him; because of his free and clear dealing with him in the way of his profession: And thus much Aristobolus relates, that he learnt from Pythagoras himself.

When the Babylonians had entertained his army in all courteous manner, as his former being there, they did, all betook themselves to ease and luxury, for that there was no want of any thing that the heart of man could wish in that place, [Diader.]

While Alexander resided at Babylon, there came in Ambassadors to him from all the parts and nations of the world; for besides those that came out of Asia, from Cities, and Princes and Countries there, there came also sundry others, out of Europe and Affric: out of Affric, from the Ethiopians dwelling about the Temple of Hammon, and from the Cathaginians, and other Ponick nations, bordering all along the sea coast, as far as Hercules his pillars, and the western sea, out of Europe, from the several Cities of Greece, and out of Macedon it self; as also from the Thracians, Illyrians, Scythians, and out of Italy, from the Brutians, Lucanians, and Hetrurians, with the Islands of Sicily, and Sardinia, and from Spain and France, whose very names and habits, the Macedons never knew nor had heard of before.

Alexander, calling for a list of them, appointed, which of them should have audience first, and so forward, till he should have heard them all; and he resolved to give audience first of all to such as came about any matter concerning religion: and in the second place, to such as came to him with presents, in the third, to them, who came about differences, or wars, which they had with their neighbouring nations. In the fourth, to them which came about their particular and private interells. And in the last place, those, who came to shew cause, why they did not restore any Grecians, whom they had banished out of their cities or countries, to their homes and estates again; for the hearing of all which, he caused a throne of gold to be set up in the garden there, and seats for his nobles, all born up with feet or frames of silver; whereon taking his place with his Nobles, he purposed to give them audience, as Athenæus [lib. 12. cap. 18.] reports out of one Ephippius Olynthus: wherein his chief purpose: and care was, upon hearing of the cause, to give such answers, as might give all content, and send every man away satisfied and well pleased therewith.

The first which he gave audience to, were they, which came from the City Eli-shen to those, which came from the Temple and City of Ammon, from Delphos, from Corinth, Epidaurus and others; hearing of every of them in order, according to the dignity and fame of the Temples, rather than of the cities from whence they came.

When he had heard the Ambassadors from Epidaurus, and granted their suit, he sent moreover a present and oblation by them to their God Esculapius; but with these words added, That Esculapius had dealt but ungenerally with him, in taking lately away from him, a friend, whom he loved as his own life: and then look what Statues lover of illustrious persons, or Images of the gods, or any other consecrated thing Xerxes had heretofore taken and brought out of Greece, and set them up, or otherwise bestowed them in Babylon, Sula, Pafargada, or elsewhere in all Asia, those he gave order to the Ambassadors of Greece, to take and carry them home again with them, and among the rest, he now caused the brazen statues of Harmodius and Aristogeiton, to be returned to Athens, with the Image of Diana Cerecia.

But as concerning the restitution of the Banditoes of Greece, he sent this short Epistle, by Nicanor, a native of the city Stagyra, to be read and proclaimed, at the next Olympian games to be held in this wise, Βανδῖται Ἀλλεγάρι, & Νῆ, & c. (i. King Alexander, to the Banditoes of Greece, sendeth greeting. We were not in fault that you were banished, but we will take care, to see you restored to your former estates, all save such as are banished for outrageous crimes, of which things we have written to Antipater, requiring him to proceed by way of force, against all such as shall oppose your restitution, [Diod. lib. 17. year 2. Olymp. 113. and lib. 18. year 2. Olymp. 114.]

Having dispatched this matter of Embassies, he let himself to take care of Hephæstions funeral, commanding the Cities thereabout to contribute what they possibly could, to the adornment thereof. And moreover sent an expresse command to all the Cities and nations of Asia to put out the fire, which among the Persians, is called Holy fire, till the exequies of this Funeral were fully finished, as was wont to be done, in the Funerals of the Kings of Persia: which was taken for an ill bode to the king himself, and as a portender of his death.

Whereupon all his chief Commanders and Nobles, for themselves, for the Kings pleasure, to make Medailes, or Portraitsures of Hephæstion, graven in Ivory, or cast in gold, or other costly metal: Himself called together the most exquisite workmen, that were to be had, and a great number of them, and brake down the wall of Babylon, ten furlongs long; and took the brick of it, and first levelling the place, built thereon a four square pile, each square taking up a furlong in length, and 130 cubits high, whereon the body was to be burnt. This work of his Diodorus describeth at large, summing up the particulars, of the cost of this sumptuous Funeral; because the Mourners, the Soldiers, Ambassadors, and Natives of the Country, strove a vie, who should give most toward the charge thereof, amounting in all to above 12 thousand talents: which very summe, Justin also hath, [lib. 12. cap. 12.] Though Plutarch and Arianus, have but 10 thousand.

Alexander, throwing his armes first into the fire, threw in also gold and silver to be burned with him; with a Robe, of a great value and esteem among the Persians, [Eliu. Var. Histor. lib. 7. cap. 8.] and besides he made Gymnick Games, and of music, far beyond all that ever he had made before; both for number of the Prizes, and value of the Prizes themselves, to those, which won them; for it is said, that there were no less than three thousand, which put in for the Prizes in all kinds, [Arius, lib. 7.]

And then also it so fell out, that Philip, one of the Kings Nobles, returned to him from the Temple of Hammon, whither he had been sent, and brought word from the Oracle there, that Hephæstion might well be sacrificed to, as to a demy god: whereat Alexander was infinitely glad; and first of all offered to him upon that file: and then sacrificing to the number of 10 thousand beasts of all kinds, he made a Magnificent Feast to all the multitude, [Diod. year 1. Olymp. 114. compared with Arius, lib. 7. pag. 157. 164.] He gave in charge also to Cleomenes the Governour of Egypt (as we have noted formerly in the year of the World 3671. 4.) a lewd man, to erect Temples to his name; and generally no contract in writing to be good or valid, if Hephæstions name were not subscribed to it: adding this also in the letter which he wrote unto him about this matter: ἵνα γὰρ καὶ μὴ δὴν ὅτι μὴ ἴσῃς, &c. (i. e.) For if I shall find that thou shalt have duly erected Temples to Hephæstion in Egypt as to a demy god; I will not only pardon thee all thy past offences which in thy government thou hast committed; but whatever thou shalt hereafter commit in any kind, shall never be laid to thy charge by me. Whereupon many Cities presently fell in hand with building of Temples and Chappels, to Hephæstion, erecting altars, offering sacrifices, and enioyning Holidayes, to be kept in his name: and the most religious oath that a man could make, was if he swore by Hephæstion, it is true or false: And death it was for any man to fault or faile in his devotion unto him: many dreames were said to have been of him, and that his ghost appeared to many; and of words which his ghost should utter, and answers which it made. To conclude, sacrifices were offered to him, as to a tutelar god, and a Revenger of all evil. Wherefore Alexander at the very first was wonderfully pleased with such phancies in other men; but after a while, he began to believe them himself; and spared not to brag and boast, that he was not only himself Joves son, but also that he could make gods of other men. At which time also, one Agathocles a Samian borne, and one of Alexanders prime Captains, was in extreme danger of his life, for being accused, that passing by Hephæstions Tombe, he was seen to weep; and had undoubtedly dyed for it, had not Perdicas holpen him out by a lye of his own making, & swore it too, by Hephæstion himself, that Hephæstion appeared to him as he was a hunting, and told him, that Agathocles, did weep for him indeed, but not as for one that was dead, and now vainly called upon, and worshipped as a god; but wept onely in a due remembrance of the former intimacy and familiarity that was between them two: but for which tale, Agathocles a great Souldier, and ever well deserving of the King, had without peradventure lost his life, for being to kind to his deceased friend, [Lucian, in his book de duobus; (i. e.) of false accusing.]

The 114. Olympiade was celebrated at Elis, in which year all agree, that Alexander died: as [Josephus Antiq. lib. 1. cont. Apoc.] when Hagesias, al. Hegesias, was L. Chancellor at Athens: as [Diodor. lib. 17. syet.] and Arianus in [his 7 book.]

Gells

Gifts of Alexander, confirms, to wit, toward the end of his year of Chancelorship: and in this very Olympic year, as shall discloses appear by the month wærcia he dyed.

In that general assembly of all Greece, at the Olympic games, was that letter of Alexander, for the restoring of all banditoes, or outlawed persons, to their homes a. c. etares again, read openly by him whose office it was to proclaim him that had won the prize in any kind of those games: nevertheless, the Athenians and Eleans protested against it, [D'odorus, year 2. Olymp. 113. Justu. lib. 13. c. 5.]

Whiles he was at Babylon, he received, as Aristobulus reporteth, his fleet, which partly went out of the Euphrates, into the Persian sea, under the command of Nearchus, and partly had been built in Phænicia and Cyprus: of the Phænician ships, there were two, each of them of five tire of Oares, and three, of four tire, of three tire high, twelve: and 30 vessels, of 30 Oares a peece, all which had been taken in pieces, and carried overland to the city Tnaplacu, and there put together again, and came by the Euphrates unto Babylon, Alexander caused certain other ships also to be built at Babylon, of those Cyprus trees which he found in their gardens there, for as other timber fit for shipping, there was none to be found in those parts. And moreover there was brought unto him, lying at Babylon, all other provisions for shipping, out of Phænicia, and other cities, lying along the sea coasts in Asia, and wrights and mariners of all sorts, [Strabo, lib. 16. pag. 741. Arian. lib. 7. pag. 162. om. of Aristobulus.]

Moreover Alexander caused a Port to be made among the Babylonians, big enough to receive a thousand sail of ships of war, adding galleries and docks threeto, and sent Mecalus a Clazomenian born, with 500 talents into Phænicia and Syria, to purchase as here as many sament as possibly he could, to come and serve him: for he had a purpose to make several plantations upon the Persian gulf, sowing them that those, would be as rich to dwell in, as any places in Phænicia were, [Arianus, ibid.]

All which preparation by sea, was to be set upon the Arabians, under that colour, that among all other nations, they only had never sent any Embassadors unto him; nor showed any duty or respect unto him: whereas indeed, it was out of an immoderate desire he had to be sovereign over all alike, and whereas he had heard that they worshipped two gods onely, Jove or Heavens, and Bacchus, he thought himself not unworthy to be worshipped as a third God among them; if he could overcome them, and restore to them, as he had done to the Indians, their primitive liberty, [Strabo and Arian. sup.]

And whereas he had heard say that Arabia, lying upon the sea coast, was of as large an extent as all India, and had many Islands lying upon their coast, he sent Archias, and Androtithenes, to wit, that Androtithenes of Thalus, (of whom Strabo, lib. 16. pag. 766. and Theophrastus, lib. 2. of Plants, cap. 7. maketh mention) and Hieron of Solos, with three ships of 30 Oares apiece, from Babylon, with charge, that sailing round about that Cheronele, or Peninsula of Arabia, they should discover and inform themselves of the ports of all that region: of these, Archias brought him word, that there were two Islands which lay out in the sea, at the mouth of the river Euphrates, the one a lesser, consecrated to Diana, one hundred and twenty furlongs off from the land (which Alexander, as Aristobulus saith, caused to be called Icarus;) the other a greater one, a day and a nights sail off from the shore, in the same latitude, called Tylos: But Hieron, which went further than any of the rest, brought him word, that the Cheronele was of a vast extent, and had a foreland which ran far out into the Ocean: which they also who came with Nearchus by sea, out of India, desired to be not far off before they stood in for the mouth of the Euphrates, [Arianus, lib. 7. and in the end also of his Indica.]

Whiles his ships of war were in building, and the haven a digging in Babylon, Alexander himself fell down the Euphrates, to the mouth of the river Pallacopa a distant from Babylon, some 800 furlongs, where rowing up and down, and, as Aristobulus saith, steering sometimes his own boat himself, he espied some certain ditches, which he caused to be scoured by such as were in his company; damming up the mouths of some, and opening others of them: And clysing one dike among the rest, in the Arabian side, toward the fenny and moory places thereof, having an outlet, hard to be stooped up by reason of the rottenness of the soile, he opened a new mouth, 30 furlongs off from the other, in somewhat a more firme and hard ground, and forced the water conic that way: He saw there also many monuments of old Assyrian Kings and Princes, which lay buried in that fenny Country, and midst of those loughs, [Strabo, lib. 16. p. 741. Arian. lib. 7.]

And sailing through those loughs into the body of Arabia, he there built a city, and a wall about it, planting there a colony of mercenary Greeks, and volunteers, and such as through age or otherwise, were grown unuseable for the wars, [Arian, ib.]

And now he began to laugh and scoff at the Chaldeans, and their predictions, for that he had both entered Babylon, and was come late out of it, with his fleet; and therefore failed the more bodily through those laughs of Arabia, having Babylon still on his left hand. [Id. ibid. Appian, toward the end, lib. 2, D. Bell. Civil.]

And when at last, a part of his army wandered up and down in those parts, they knew not whither, for want of a Pilot, he sent them one, which brought them into the right channel again: then there arose a mighty wind, which severed the ship wherein himself was, from the rest of the fleet, and hurled the Kings hood or bounet off from his head into the water; but his Turbant or Diademe, which was fastened to it, was rent from it, and driven by the wind upon a great reed, which grew up close to a sepulchre, of one of the Kings, which there lay buried, as I said before; for one of the mariners spying, swam unto it, and took it up, and in his return for fear of wetting it, clapt it upon his own head, Aristobolus saith that the martiner which did it, was a Phenician born, and that he was well coured for presuming to put the Kings Diademe or Turbant upon his head: yet Alexander upon this accident, consulted a wizard about it, and was by him advised to offer a magnificent sacrifice to the gods, and to be very diligent and devout therein, [Diodor. see Appian, in his Syriae, pag. 124. in the Greek and Latin edition.]

When it was told Alexander, that the Athenians and Erolians would not obey his edict, concerning the restoring of their banditers, he presently gave order for a thousand tall men of war to be built, with which he purposed to make a war in the west, and to begin it with the destruction of Athens it self, which yet never took effect, [Justin lib. 13. cap. 5. see Curtius lib. 10. cap. 4.]

Alexander returning to Babylon, then gave himself over to ease and company keeping; so addicted to gluttony and drunkenness, that in the Diaries kept by Eumenes Cardianus, and Diodorus Erythraeus, it is often found, such and such a day or night, Alexander was carried drunk to bed. Athen. lib. 10. cap. 11. with Philius in Plut. lib. 1. Sympos. cap. 6. one example whereof, Elian. lib. 3. Var. Histor. lib. 23. reciteth out of the last Eumenes, which I thought good here to insert, to the end it may appear, that some use may be made of my treatise of the Macedonian year, comparing therewith, the dayes of our Julian Calendar, mending first that place in Elian, where it is written Δις, without all sense, and making it mensis Δις nomine, (i. e.) of the month called Δις, as thus: On the fifth of the month Δις (our Septemb. 28.) he drank drunk, as Eumenes his house; nor did any thing all that day, but rise and give order to his Captains, whether they should march to morrow, and telling, he would be going very early. And upon the seventh day (our Septemb. 30.) he dined with Perdiccas, and there he fell to drinking again: and on the eighth, (our Octob. 1.) he slept all day, and upon the 15 of the same month (our Octob. 8.) he fell a drinking again, and the day following (our Octob. 9.) he slept it out all day according to his wonted fashion. Upon the 24. (our Octob. 17.) he supped at Bagoas his lodging, which was 10. furlongs off from the Kings palace, and then upon the third (or rather the fifth) he slept it out again.

Alexander seeing Babylon to excell, both in greatness, and all other things, purposed to embellish it all that might be, and to make it the place of his residence, for ever after, [Sera, lib. 15. pag. 73. 1.] and resolved to rebuild the Temple of Belus, and raise it out of its old dust; and, as some say, to make it more magnificent than ever it was before: and when in his absence the Babylonians went on more slowly in the work than he would have had them, he intended to set himself and all his army to work about it. But because the work, would take up a great deal of labour and much time, therefore he was not able to go thorough with it, as he desired, for he was taken short by death, [Id. lib. 16. pag. 73. 8. with Arrianus lib. 6. pag. 159.]

Alexander dreams, that Cassander killed him, whereas he had never seen the man in all his life, and shortly after, when he happened to see him; he called to mind his dream, with a great deal of horror at the first: but then again understanding that he was a son of Antipater, he cast off all such fear of any hurt from him, especially of poison, which yet was at that time ready prepared for him, merrily uttering certain Greek verse, purporting, that so many dreams, so many lies, or to that effect.

When Cassander saw the outlandish people prostrating themselves, when they came unto him, having never seen the like done before, he fell a whickering; whereas Alexander grew into such a cholour, that wrapping both his hands in his long hair, he beat his head against the wall, [Plut. in Alexand.]

As there went a report that Antipater had sent a po son by Cassander to deliver it to his brother Iolla Cup-bearer to the King, and by him infused into the last draught that he ever took, so was it said also, that at the same time, Alexander had sent Craterus with a company of old souldiers to make away Antipater, [Curt. lib. 10. cap. ult.] Concerning the poison, of which Alexander is said to have died, see Andreas Schottus, and and his collections thereupon made out of sundry authors, in the Comparison which he makes, of the lives of Aristotle and Demosthenes, [to the first year of the 114 Olymp. and Mathias Radernus, upon Curtius, lib. 10. cap. 7.] As for Craterus and his old souldiers sent away with him into Macedon, though Justin, and Arian, and Plutarch, report this passage, as of a thing done before the death of Hephæstion; yet that it ought to be referred to this time, and not to that, appears, as by many other arguments, especially by this; for that at the time of Alexanders death, Craterus with his old maimed souldiers was not come into Macedonia, but was still in Cilicia.

Those that would of the Macedons, which found themselves disabled thorough age or other impotency of body to follow the war any longer, were dismissed by Alexander, to return into their own country: and the number of them at this time, came (as Diodor. lib. 17. year 2. Olymp. 113. says) to 10 thousand; or as [Justin, lib. 12. cap. 12.] to 11 thousand: to every of which, he not only gave their full pay for the time past, but also money in their purses, to carry them home withal: And if any of them had children, begotten of wives which they had married out of Asia, he willed them to be left with him, leaving least that mungrell kind might happily in time stir up some rebellion in Macedon, in contending with the wives and children which were left there: and promised that when they were grown up, and trained in Marthal Discipline after the Macedonian manner, they should have them again sent home unto them, Justin saith, that such as returned, had their full pay continued to them, as before, during life. Plutarch, that the children of the deceased, succeeded in their fathers pay: adding further, that Alexander wrote to Antipater, that they which lo returned, should have the prime places assigned them in the Theaters, and should there sit with Garland upon their heads; and that at their parting, they all wept, and so did the King himself.

Together with these, were dismissed also, sundry of the Nobility, upon the same occasions, as Clytus, Gorgias, Polydamas, Adamas, Antigènes, and the principal of all, Craterus, who was assigned as a Captain to conduct them, as a man of all others most loyal, and most dear unto the King, and next unto him Polyperchon; least it Craterus should happen to die by the way, as he was at that time but weak and sickly, they should want a noble Commander to conduct them. Then commanded he Craterus to take charge of Macedon, Thrace, Thessaly, and of the liberty of Greece, in Antipaters room, lending for Antipater to repair to him; and to bring with him an army of young lusty Macedons, in lieu of these old ones which he had sent home unto him.

Craterus, when he was sent to carry some certain old decayed souldiers into Cilicia, he received some instructions and commands from Alexander in writing, the chief heads whereof, Diodorus Siculus, out of the Kings own Commentaries related to be these, That he should cause a thousand tall ships somewhat bigger than the ordinary sort, of 3 tire of oars, to be built in Phœnicia, Syria, Cilicia, and Cyprus for his wars against the Carthaginians, and others bordering upon the sea coasts of Africk and Spain, and Islands adjoining as far as Sicily: To take order, that his way along the sea coast of Africa, as far as Hercules his Pillars, might be ready for him; to lay out 1500 talents, upon six Magnificent Temples to be built: And that he should make Ports in several places fit to receive so great a Fleet. That he should transplant men out of Europe into Asia, and likewise out of Asia into Europe, to inhabit such new Cities as he should build in either of them, to the end that by enter-marriges, and mutual affinites, he might establish a peace and concord between the two main Continents of the World. These were his then designs, of which Lucan speaks, in this manner, [lib. 10.]

— Oceano classes inferre parabat: (i. e.)

His purpose was th' Atlantic Sea to sail;
Nor fire, nor water, nor the Libyan sand,
Nor Ammons Syrtis could bound his vast designs.
He would into the Western Clime have gone,
Where the Sun floops to fall in: Tetris lap;
And to have marcht quite round about the Poles,
And drunk Niles water, where it first doth rise,
Had not death met him, and his journey stayed.
Nothing but nature could a period bring,
To the vast projects of this mad-cap King.

A little before his death, came Ambassadors to him out of Greece, to acknowledge him for a god, and they wearing Crowns themselves, set all Crowns of gold upon his head.

And Pencestes, returning out of Persia, with about 20 thousand Persians, brought also also a great company of Cossians, and Tapurians along with them to Babylon for his service, because these nations bordering upon Persia, were reckoned the most warlike of any other. To him also came Philoxenus, bringing an army out of Caria, and Menander with another out of Lydia, and Menidas with an army of Horfe: Alexander commended the forwardness of the Persian nation, and especially Pencilles for his just discreet government among them, and ranked both them, and also those which came from the sea side with Philoxenus and Menander, with his Macedon Squadrons. Also he caused his navy to be often exercised; and whereas there were often sea fights made in the river of Euphrates, between the Tirimenes, and the Quadrimenes, (i.e.) between the ships of three, and those 4 of tire of oars, upon the River Euphrate, and as well the Mariners, as the Commanders in them laboured hard to outdoe their adveerse party, he ever bestowed Crowns, and honoured them that did best therein.

When upon a time, as he was bestowing those companies which came with Philoxenus and Menander, among his Macedon Squadrons, he happened to be a thirft; as Ariaricus reports out of Aristobolus, and went a little aside, from the throne whereon he sat, and some also of his Nobles which fate on either hand of his throne, left their seats also and attended him, it fell out, that a certain mean party, (some say one that was committed to custody, but withoutrons upon him) came through the middle of all the bed-chamber-men, and other Officers, which stood thick about the throne, and fate himself down upon the Kings seat: and when the Bed-chamber-men, durst not pull him out, because there was a Persian law to the contrary, they rent every man his cloaths, and beat their faces, and thump their breasts, as at a thing exceeding ominous to the King; which when Alexander heard, he caused the fellow to be had presently to the rack, to know whether he had done it upon any designe or compact with others or no, and for what purpose: But when he answered that what he had done was only out of a light humor, and toy which came in his heart, the warders told him that it was by so much the worse signe; and Diodorus faith, that by their advice, the poor fellow was presently killed for his labour; to the end, that if there were any ill luck in it, it might all fall upon his own head: The same also, faith Plutarch, adding, that upon the rack, being asked who he was, answered that his name was Dionylus, a Macellianus born, with some other answers which he made them.

Some few dayes after, when the King had sacrificed to his gods, in thanking for his good successes; and had added thereto something more than ordinary by the advice of the Priests or Warders, he fell a feasting with his Nobles; and fate up at it, till late in the night: he also distributed beafts for sacrifices among the souldiers, and gave wine among them to be drunk. And when he was now breaking up, and going away one Medius a Thessalian, had prepared a banquet, and invited him and all his company to it; at the banquet there fate twenty guests; to every of which, Alexander drank a several health, and they fate to him again, as Athenæus reports out of certain memorials, commonly attributed to Nicobolus, [lib. 10. cap. 11. & lib. 12. cap. 18.]

Now when Alexander had called for a cup, containing two gallons and an odd quart, as Euphrius Olynthius, in a book which he wrote of the deaths and burials of Alexander and Hephæstion, reported by Athenæus, [lib. 10. cap. 11.] and commanded Proteas a Macedon, to pledge him; Proteas cried, let come, and having in many words spoken much honour of the King, took the cup, and drank it off with such a grace, that all the table commended him highly for it: a while after, Proteas called for the same cup again, and drank it off to the King; and Alexander took and pledged him a great draught, but could not drink it off, but let the cup fall out of his hand, and lay along upon the cushion, and presently fell sick and dyed; and this was that Herculean fatal cup to Alexander, of which besides Diodore, and Plutarch, Seneca also in his 83 Epistle, maketh mention; with which we may compare also, what Athenæus faith, [lib. 12. c. 17. and Macrobius, l. 5. Saturnal. c. 21.]

Aristobolus faith, that when he grew light headed with his fever, and withal very thirsty, he called for a draught of wine, and that cast him into a phrenic; and upon the 30 day of the month Desius, that is, upon the 24 of our May, departed. Others say that he dyed upon the 6 day of the month Thargelion, with the Athenians, as Elian hath it, [lib. 2. Var. Histor. cap. 25.] which answers to our 18 of May: In the Daries or Day books, kept of the Kings actions, it is said that he died the 28 of the month Desius, or 22 of our May: wherefore sure it is, that dye he did in the month Desius, according to the Macedon account, and in the month of May with us; though upon what day of the month, Authors do not agree.

Out of the said Diaries, what things fell out in the time of his sickness, Ariaricus and Plutarch do very particularly declare, but who was the true author of those Daries, or daily remembrances of what he did or said, neither of them tells us; whether Eumenes Cardianus, or Diodorus Erythreus; or else Stratus Olynthius: for he also wrote a Diary of his actions in four books, and one particular book of his death, as Suidas teacheth us: But whosesoever Diaries they were, forasmuch as we can have nothing more plainly or more assuredly delivered, than what we find in them, therefore have I thought it good here to set down what I find in Plutarch, delivered out of them, comparing all along, the dayes of the Macedonian Desius and our month of May, together, out of my own discourse of the Macedonian year.

Oxythen in desius Desius par, &c. (i.e.) the eighteenth day of the month Desius (May, 12.) he slept in a bath for his fever. The next day (May 13.) having washed, he went to his chamber, and spent that day there at dice with Medius, then walking again, toward the evening, and having been at his devotions, he ate his supper somewhat greedily, and the night following had a forefit of a fever. Upon the 20 day (May 14.) having washed, he offered sacrifice very solemnly again, and lying along in a bath, he heard Nearchus while he related to him such things as had happened in his voyage; and what wonders he had seen in the Ocean, (in desius Desius) (i.e.) (our May 15.) when he did the like, his fever increased upon him. The day after (May 16.) his fever grew very sharp upon him, and he was carried to lie in a chamber near the great pool, or swimming place, where he had speech with his Commanders, of putting approved men in places of office, when they happened to fall void, εὐχρη (Desius) (i.e.) upon the 21. (May 18.) finding his sickness, to increase upon him, he offered sacrifice, to which he was carried, and commanded the chief Commanders and Captains which were then in Court, to stay with him; but the Centurions and Corporals, to attend without and watch. Being carried into the innermost lodgings of the Court, (in desius Desius) Upon the 25 day (May 19.) he had a little ease, but his fever left him not. But when the Captains came to him, he spake not at all unto them, οὐκ ἔμελλεν, and likewise upon the 26, (May 20.) whereupon the Macedonians, thinking that he had been dead, came flocking with a great noise to the Chamber door and threatened the Nobles which were there, if they would not let them in. The doors hereupon being set open, every common souldier passed by his bed side. The same day, Pithon and Seleucus, who were sent to Serapis his temple, to know whether Alexander should be removed thither or no, brought answer back from the Oracle, that he should stay where he was, οὐδὲ γὰρ (Desius) οὐδὲ γὰρ ἀνίστασθαι, (i.e.) Upon the twenty eighth day, (May 21.) in the evening he died.

Now whereas I said, that the Macedons all passed by the Kings bed side, it is to be understood, that they came in at one door, and went out at another, [Lucian in Pseudom.] And albeit he was grown weak and faint with the violence of his sickness, yet he raised himself upon his elbow, and gave every one of them his hand to kisse as he passed by, [Valer. Max. lib. 5. cap. 1.] and which is more, and may seem incredible in it self, look in what posture he put himself, at their first coming in, in the same he continued, till every man to the very last, of all that army, had kised his hand, [Curt. lib. 10. c. 7.]

When the souldiers were gone, he then turned him to his Nobles, and demanded of them, whether they thought they should find them a King like to himself or no? and when no man answered him to that question; then again he said, that as he could not tell that himself, so that one thing he foresaw, and could foretell, how much Macedon blood would be shed, before this controversy he would receive an end, and with what vast laughter, and effusion of blood, they would solemnise his funeral, and sacrifice to his ghost, when he was gone; and to give order for his body to be carried to the Temple of Ammon, and there buried, [Justin l. 12. c. 15.] And when his Nobles asked him to whom he would leave his Kingdom, his answer was, fortissimo, (i.e.) to the strongest; and withall, took off his signet, and gave it to Perdicas: whereby they all conceived, that his meaning was, to commend the government of his kingdom to his care and trust, till his children should come to age, [Emil. Probus in Eumene.] And again, when Perdicas asked him, when he would have Divine Honours performed to him? his answer was, when they were all grown happy.

Eratosthenes in his Canons, (mentioned by Clemens Alexandrinus lib. 1. Strom. faith) that 12 years passed between the death of Philip, and the change, (i.e.) the decease of Alexander, which is the very number given him, lib. 1. Macabe, cap. 1. 8. and in both the Chronicles of the Jews, as also in Tertullian, lib. cont. Judæos, cap. 8. in Porphyrie, cited by Euseb. pag. 124. in Scaligers Greek edition of him, in Rufinus, in Josephus, his Antiquities, lib. 12. cap. 2. in Orosius, lib. 3. in Jerom and Theodoret upon Daniel cap. 11. I thought A. Gellius, [lib. 17. cap. 21.] giveth him but 11 years, Julius Africanus, and out of him Eusebius, 12 years and six months, [Diod. Sic.] 12 years and seven months, Livie, and after him Emil. Probus in Eumene, allow him 13 years.

Nor is there any lesse difference among Authors, concerning the years of his life, than there is of his reign. Whereof Cicero in his fifth Philippic speaking, faith, what shall I speak of Alexander the Macedon, when he set himself upon great achievements from his very youth, was he not taken off by death in the 33 year of his age, which is lesse by ten years, than then with us a man can by law, be made a Consul. Justin [in the last chap. of his 12 book,] saith that he died at the age of 33 years and one month: yet [Philostrophus, lib. 2. de Vita, Sophista: in Herodes, Euseb. in Chron. and in his first book, de Vita Constanti, and Jerome, upon c. 8. and c. 11. upon Daniel's,] and sundry other writers following Euseb. in Chron. allow him to have lived no more than 32 years: All which are nevertheless to be reduced to that rule delivered by Arianius, [lib. 7. pag. 167.] Ætatis huius ætatem non habet, (i.e.) He lived 32 years, and took up 8 months of the 33 year: as Aristobolus saith; But he reigned twelve years, and those 8 months over.

Immediately upon Alexander's decease, there arose such a difference and dispute between the Horse and Foot Companies of the army, for the settling of the present State of things, that they were ready to fall all in pieces, and to take up arms about it. Yet by the advice of the Nobles and Commanders, it was at length accorded, that the Supreme authority, or rather a bare name and shadow thereof, should be committed to Aridaeus, brother to Alexander, and son to his father Philip, begotten upon one Philina of Larissa, a common dancer; as [Athenæus, lib. 13. cap. 13.] reports out of one Ptolemaeus, son of Agæfarchus, in his History of Philopater, and a whore to boot, [as Justin, lib. 13. cap. 2. and Plutarch in the end of his Alexan.] say. And having by common consent proclaimed him King, they called him by the name of Philip; to whom also was joyned, the son that Roxane then went withal, and was eight months gone with child, begotten by Alexander, as Justin in the place aforesaid hath it, or fix, as Curtius, [lib. 10. cap. 10. says.] As for his son Hercules, who then lived at Pergamum, because he was gotten upon Barine, who was never married to Alexander; therefore was there no regard had of him in this settlement of the kingdom. And because Aridaeus himself was but a weak spirited man, nor thorough any natural infirmity of his own, as Plutarch noteth in the end of the life of Alexander; but by such flibber-lances, and drugs as Olympias had procured to be given him, therefore was Perdicas, to whom Alexander desired his Signer at the hour of his death, made Regni interitus: (i.e.) Lord Protector, or Steward, and in effect absolute King of it self. The charge of the army, and of all affairs, was committed to Meleager, the son of Neoptolemus, with or under Perdicas. The command of the Horse, which was the most Honourable charge in all the army, and which after Hephaestions death was given to Perdicas, was now assigned to Seleucus, the son of Antiochus, yet with or under Perdicas, as the other was. The oversight also of the kingdom and treasure thereof, was committed to Cræneus his trust, [Diod. in the beginning of his 18 book, Justin, lib. 13. cap. 1, 2, 3, 4. Curt. lib. 10. cap. 10, 11, 12. Plutarch in Eumene & Alexan. Dioxippus and Arria, in their books written of what passed after the death of Alexander, in Phot. Biblot. cod. 81. & 92. Appian, in his Syriacæ pag. 120, 124.]

Centurius in his discourse, De die natali, notes, that the years of Philip, are to be reckoned from the death of Alexander, taking always the rise therein from the first day of that month, which with the Egyptians is called Thoth. For the Egyptian Astronomers applying this computation of times for more exact reckoning sake, to their own account, make the head thereof to be the first day of Thoth, in the beginning of the 425. year of Nabonassar; to wit, upon the 12 of November, according to the Julian account, 4390. in the seventh month before the true time of Alexander's death. And from the beginning of that month Thoth it is, that Ptolemy in his Manual Canons of Astronomy (nor yet published) deducteth the Epochs or risings of all the Stars, of which he in his Preface Ad Syrac, saith, Ætatem hanc ab Ægyptiis, &c. Here are fixed the Epochs, or heads of all accounts, according to the Meridian of Alexandria, which is in Egypt, from the first day of the Egyptian month Thoth, of the first year of Philip, who succeeded Alexander, the Founder of this City. Not of Philip the father of Alexander, (as some have imagined) but of Philip, brother and next successor unto Alexander; whom the Alexandrians for Honour sake, call, as indeed he was, their Founder: adding, anno Ægyptiæ regis, &c. (i.e.) For from the first day of his (meaning Philip Aridaeus) reign, the times of the Manual Canons of Ptolemy, (who in them followeth the common account, or Calendar of the Egyptians) being taken, and according to the rectifying of the Egyptian year (reduced to the Alexandrian account, which Theon also used in his Canon) are reckoned; as we find also, in the Greek Collection published by Scaliger, in his Eusebian Fragments, [pag. 48.] Whence it is also, that in the Epistle to Apollonius (falsely attributed to Dionysius Areopagita: found in Hilduinus, in his Areopagica) these Astronomical Tables are called, The Canon of Philippus Aridaeus.

And now had the dead body of Alexander lain seven dayes, as Justin says, (for Elian says 30.) [Var. Histor. lib. 12. cap. 64.] upon his Throne, whiles all mens thoughts were taken up about the settling of the present state, and could not heed, what belonged to the solemn Obsequies belonging to the deceased: and yet was there not in all that time found any putrefaction, or the least discolouring of the flesh upon his body: but the very vigor of his countenance, which is the proper effect of the spirit that is in a man, man, continued still the same; wherefore the Chaldeans and Egyptians, were commanded from thence forward to take care of the body; and they when they came about it, durst not at first approach to touch him, as if he had been still living: but anon after, saying their prayers, that it might be so to him, when they being but mortals to lay their hands upon it, to divine a body, they fell to work, and dissected him: and the golden Throne wherein he lay, was stuffed all with Spices, and hung about with Pennants and Banners, and other emblems of his high State and Fortune, [Curt. lib. 10. in fi.]

The care of his funeral, and providing a chariot to carry the body into the Temple of Ammon, was committed to Aridaeus, whether the King, as Justin hath it, [lib. 13. cap. 4.] and Dexippus, as we find in Scaliger's Greek fragments of Euseb. [pag. 84.] or rather to some other Aridaeus, of whom we shall see more anon, out of Diodorus, year 2. Olymp. 114.] in which provision making, he spent two whole years, [Diod. year 3. Olymp. 114.] and Olympias seeing him lye so long unburied, in great grief of heart, cried out, and uttered these words: O my son (said he) thou that wouldst needs be counted among the gods, and keepst such ado about it, canst not now have that which every poor man hath, a little earth and burial, Elian, Varia. Histor. lib. 13. c. 32.]

Mean while Silygambes the mother of Darius, hearing of his death, sunk under the burden of her sorrow for it; and covering her self with mourning attire, when her niece and nephew, Drypetis and Oxathres, came and fell at her knees, she looked away from them, and would neither eat nor feed the light any more, and so the fifth day after, dyed of hunger, [Diod. 17. in fi. Curt. 10. cap. 8.]

Roxane being great with child, and fearing her self therefore, courted by the Macedonian army, grew into emulation with Statira, eldest daughter to Darius, and one of Alexander's wives, as her self was: and by her letters invited and requested her to come unto her: but as soon as she came, she caused both her and her sister Drypetis, Hephaestions Relict, to be murdered; and threw both their carcases into a well, and cast earth upon them: not without the privy and assistance of Perdicas, as Plut. [in the end of the life of Alex.] saies.

Roxane was a while after, delivered of a son, whom they named Alexander: and the common soldiery proclaimed him King, [Arria, in B. lib. Phot. ca. 92.] with Paulianus in his Attica, and Dexippus, in Scaliger's Greek fragments of Euseb. [pag. 48.]

Perdicas gave order for the purification or cleansing of the whole army by a solemn sacrifice: because of the death of the King, and great distention taken among them thereupon. Now the Macedonian manner of cleansing the army was this: They cut a dog in two: and laid the one half on the one side, and the other, on the other of the field, where the army was to come, and to make them pass forcibly, and, as it were, in procession between them: Now as the army passed, Perdicas caused some 300 soldiers, which followed Meleager, when in the first assembly of the Macedons, after the decease of Alexander, he arose, and in a mutinous manner left them, and threw them among the Elephants, to be trod in pieces by them: all which he did in the open sight of the army, and in the presence of Aridaeus himself, whom (nothing differing from a very Innocent) Meleager had caused to be, as it were, wrapt in purple cloths like a child, and put into the Royal Throne, as Plutarch [lib. 2. de fortuna Alexandri:] saith: And Meleager for the present, because no violence was offered to his own person, stirred not: but presently after, seeing his life was sought, fled to a Sanctuary, and was there taken and slain; [Justin, lib. 13. cap. 4. Curt. lib. 10. cap. 12. Arrianus in Photius.]

Dodorus [lib. 2. year 4. Olymp. 18.] affirmeth that Alexander made his last Will and Testament, and left it to be kept at Rhodes; and Ammia, [Marcellinus, lib. 23.] seems to say, that therein his will was, to leave all in the hands and power of one man: and Q. Curtius Seme, saith he, have been of opinion, that a distribution of the Provinces was made by Alexander, in his last Will and Testament: but we have found, that, that was but an idle report, though delivered by sundry Authors, [lib. 10. c. 13.] Nevertheless, the Author of the first book of Machabees, seemeth to follow that first opinion, as delivered and believed by so many Authors, as it was; and saith that Alexander in his own life time, parted his kingdom among his most illustrious and noble officers. And the Chronographer of Alexandria (out of whom, those barbarous and broken Latin fragments published by Scaliger, pag. 58, and 59 are taken) affirmeth, that, that division of the Provinces, which Justin [lib. 13. cap. 4. Curtius lib. 10. cap. 13. Arrianus in Phot. B. lib. ca. 92. Dexippus lib. ca. 82.] and other writers report to have been made by Perdicas, was none other than that which was compiled in that will: which, as may be gathered out of them all, comparing one with another, was in this manner.

In Europe all Thrace, with the Cherfonele and other nations bordering upon Thracæ as far as Salmysdellus, a city standing upon the Euxin sea, was committed to Lythimæus, the son of Agathocles, a Pelagian born: but that Region which lay beyond Thrace, belonging to the Illyrians, Triballi, and Agrians, and Macedonia it self, and Epirus, stretching as far as the Ceraunian mountains, with all Greece, was assigned to Antipater, and Craterus: and so much for Europe.

In Africa, all Egypt, and what ever else Alexander had gotten, in Cirenaica, or Lybia, with all that part of Arabia which borders upon Egypt, was allotted to Ptolomei, the son of Lagos, who, as Paulanus in his Attica laces, was by the Rhodians, honour'd with the surname of Σωτήρ, (i. e.) a Deliverer. The truth is, that the Macedons ever held Ptolomei for a base son of Philip, Alexander's father: for his mother Adinoe, being great with child by Philip, was by him put off, and married to a poor fellow of Macedon, called Lagos: whereupon it was, that when after a while, (as Plutarch in a discourse of his, De ira cohibenda: (i. e.) of suppressing a man's choler, saith, Ptolomei to put a jeer upon a poor schoole-master, would needs ask him, who was Pelous his father: he asked him again, and I pray Sir, I said he, who was Lagos his father? intimating thereby the balenelle of his birth by the fathers side, [See Curtius, lib. 9. cap. 1. Paulanus in his Attica, pag. 5. in the Greek edition of him as Fracford, and Suidas in the word Lagos.]

But, to return to where we left, Cleomenes, who was left by Alexander, to gather up the tributes and other incomes of those parts, was commanded to deliver over that Province unto him, and to hold his office, as under him: and because Ptolomei presently upon the death of Alexander entered upon that Province, and died not till full 40 years after; thence it is that Lucian, in Macedonibus (i. e.) in his discourse of long-lived men and in the fragments of Eusebius, published by Scaliger, [pag. 49. and Porphyrie, ibid, pag. 225. and Clemens Alexan. Stromat. 1. and Euseb. in Chron. and Epiphanius in his books of weights and measures:] and others say, that he reigned 40 years in Egypt after whom his posterity down to Cleopatra, held that kingdom, under the title and name, and common notion, of Ptolomeis.

In the lesser Asia, all Cappadocia and Paphlagonia, and all the Regions lying upon the Euxin Sea, as far as Trapezond, a Colony of the Sinopenes, which Alexander, being taken up with the more weighty war against Darius, had not leisure to subdue as he went, were assigned to Eumenes Cardianus; with a charge to make war upon Ariarathes, who onely ever stood out against Alexander. As for Antigonus, he was made Governour of Pamphylia, Lycia, Lycania, and Phrygia the Great. The lesser Phrygia, which lies upon the Hellespont, was committed to Leonatus. The government of Lydia, not onely of the inland country, but also along the sea coast, taking in Eolia and Ionia, was given to Menander; who had it formerly by grant from Alexander himself, [as Ariannus, lib. 3. pag. 56. saith,] for whom, the name of Meleager, is mis-put by Diodorus. Caria was given to Cassander the son of Antipater, and Cilicia, and Iauria, to Philotas.

In the upper and greater Asia, all Syria, and Phoenicia, was committed to Laomedon, a Mitylenian borne. The petty kings of the Isle of Cyprus, for a while held every man his State, as they had it granted to them respectively by Alexander. Neoptolemus was set over Armenia, Artaxerxes over Mesopotamia, Archon over the Province of Babylonia; Atropates, father in law to Perdiccas, was left Governour of Media by Alexander himself. In this parage making, [Justin, lib. 13. cap. 4.] and Orosius [lib. 3. cap. 23.] say that Atropates was made Governour of Media the greater, and Perdiccas his father in law, of the lesser; not remembering that Atropates, and Perdiccas his father in law were all one man. But having afterward better considered of the matter, in a second distribution made by Antipater in Triparadiso, he acknowledgeth that Media was assigned to Pithon, [lib. 15. pag. 660.] Nor is it likely, that the son in law would any way diminish the authority of his father. The Rule and Government of the hither Bactria and Sogdiana, was put into the hands of Philippos: yet so, as that Oropus was joyned with him in the Sarrapie of Sogdiana, who yet as Dexippus saith, when he had received that kingdom of Alexander's bounty, was put from it again for treason: But in the Government of Persia, Pencetes of Hircania, and Parthia, (for they went together, as Strabo, lib. 11. pag. 514. misseeth) was Phrataphernes, in Carmania, Tlepolemus, in the further Bactria and Parapanitis, Oxartes, or Oxathres, the father of Roxane, Alexander's wife, in Asia and Drangiana, and Gedrosia, S byrtius, as they were there placed by Alexander, so were they now suffered to continue in them. All the coast of India from Paropamisus, and from the place where the Accestines and Indus meet, down to the very Ocean, was committed to the charge of Pithon the son of Agenor, as that of the Oxhydracans and Mallians to Eudemus, of Eudemus, Commander of the Thracian companies: and the rest of India, to King Ptoles, and Taxiles, and to the son of Abilatus, who, as appears by what hath been said before, were all placed in those charges, by Alexander himself in his life time.

When

When, upon this division so made, everyman had his share, as it were allotted him from heaven, they hence took occasion to encrease their power, at their pleasure for the most part: for not long after, as if they had not had governments, but kingdoms given them, they bare themselves not as Deputies, but as absolute and soverign Kings and did not onely acquire great matters to themselves, but also left the fame to their posterities after them, [Justin, lib. 13. cap. 4.] and so that vast Empire and name of the Macedons, immediately upon the death of Alexander, came to be rent and torn into several kingdoms, [Livy lib. 45.] yet no man took upon him the title of a King, so long as any of his children, survived, so respective were they of him, that though they had every of them the power of a King in his hand, yet they willingly retained the title, so long as he had a lawful heir of his body living, to succeed him, [Justin, lib. 15. cap. 2.] All which was long before foretold by the Holy Ghost, [Daniel 11. 4.]

Concerning the instructions given by Alexander to Craterus, Perdiccas referred the consideration of them, to the general assembly of the Macedons; which though they could not mislike, yet because they were exceeding high, and difficult beyond measure, to be brought to passe, therefore they ordered by a general consent, that none of them should be gone in hand withall, [Diodorus year 2. Olympiade 114.]

The old Greek souldiers, which Alexander had left and planted in garrisons and colonies in the upper Asia, and several provinces thereof, being toucht with a desire of returning home, and seeing their native Country the rather for that they saw themselves, as it were ejected and cast out into a far remote corner of the World, joyned in an association, and revolted from the Macedonian state, chusing for a head of this conspiracy, one Philo an Eujan borne: and now they were gotten to the number of 20 thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse together, all old tried and expert souldiers. Against these, Perdiccas dispatched away Pithon, who had been one of the squires of the party to Alexander, and a man of a high spirit, and long versed in the mystrie of war, with three thousand Macedon Foot, and eight hundred Horse, drawn out by lot, with letters and instructions to the governours in all those parts, to furnish him with 10 thousand Foot, and eight thousand Horse more. Now Pithon purposed to win unto him by all fair means possible, those old Grecians, that to joyning them with such other forces as he had of his own, he might be the better able to set up for himself, and reduce all those upper provinces, under his own subjection: which Perdiccas perceiving, to crosse his purpose therein, gave him expresse order; that having overcome those Rebels, he should put them every man to the sword, and divide the Spoil of them among his souldiers. But Pithon, having by intelligence, with one Lipodorus, who commanded a brigade of three thousand men among the Rebels, gotten the victory of them, went no further, but upon capitulation, licensed them to repair every man to his own home: which notwithstanding the rest of the Macedons, remembering the order given them by Perdiccas, fell upon them, and slew every man of them, and shared what they had among themselves. So Pithon, failing of his ends, returned with his Macedons to Perdiccas, [Diod. ibid, Prelog. Trog. lib. 13.]

As for Ptolomei, he, having quietly gotten into the possession of Egypt, demeaned himself fairly in all things toward the people of the land; and possessing himself there of eight thousand talents, got an army together, of such as would serve for pay, sundry others also, for pure love, seeing his fair and impartial distribution of justice in his place, came into him. And being duly enforced that Perdiccas had a purpose, to wrest Egypt out of his hand, he leagued himself firmly with Antipater, [Diod. ut. sup.] and by good turns and gratifications, obliged the neighbouring Kings and Princes to his devotion, [Justin lib. 13. cap. 16.] and finding that Cleomenes, whom Perdiccas had put to him for a Lieutenant, was no better than a spie upon him, cut his throat, and placed strong garrisons of his own, over all the land of Egypt, [Pausan. in Attic. pag. 5. in the Greek and Latin edition.]

Leonatus and Antigonus, were commanded to put Eumenes by strong hand into the possession of Cappadocia and Paphlagonia. But Antigonus, out of the haughtinesse of his spirit, and presuming of himself, related to obey Perdiccas his command herein. But Leonatus, coming with his army down out of the upper provinces, promised Eumenes to undertake the service for him. Nevertheless, when Hecataeus, Tyrant of the Cardians, coming to Leonatus, advised him rather for the present to go and aide Antipater, and relieve the Macedons, which were besieged in Lania; he relived forthwith to crosse the sea, and to put over into Macedonia; and moved Eumenes himself, to go along with him, and to make an end with Hecataeus. But when Eumenes would not, and alledged withall, that he stood in some fear of Antipater, Leonatus believed him, and kept nothing from him, of all that was in his heart: yet finding that he could not draw him over to his party, went about privily to murder him, and had done it, had not Eumenes, perceiving his purpose, got him privilege out of his quarters, for he stole away by night, with his carriages, having only 300 Horse in his company, and 200 of his guard; and five thousand talents in gold, after the rate of silver. And so coming to Perdiccas, disclosed all Leonatus his counsels to him; whereupon Perdiccas took him in for a boldness friend and swore him of the Council, [Plut. and Emil. Pro. in Eumene.]

Leonatus, coming to help Antipater, was there slain in a fight by the Grecians, [Diodorus year 2. Olymp. 114. Justin. lib. 13. cap. 5. Plutarch in Phocion, Arrianus in Phocion.]

Thimbro, having caught Harpalus in Crete by a flight (which Harpalus had, as I shewed before, fled thither out of Asia, and carried all the Kings money with him) flew him, and got into his own hands all that treasure; and with his army and fleet, left Cydonia, a city in Crete, and with 6, or (as Diodorus hath it) 7 thousand men, sailed to the country of Cyrene, being invited thither by the banditers of the Cyrenians, and the Barcenles, [Diodorus & Arrianus, ut supra. Strabo, lib. 17. cap. 837.]

There, in a fight against the Cyrenians, Thimbro made a great slaughter of them, and took many prisoners; then seizing of their Port, and ready to take the City it self; he drew them to a composition, upon these terms, That they should pay him down five thousand talents ready money, and deliver into his hand, half their chariots ready furnished for a service: He sent Embassadors also to other neighbouring cities to joyn with him, pretending that he would make war upon Lybia, and subdue it: and moreover he laid hold on all the Merchants goods, that were in the Port, and gave them to the souldiers, to scramble for, thereby to make them the forwarder in his service, [Diodor.]

Mnasicles, a man of Crete, one of Thimbro's Captains, but of a turbulent disposition, fell off from him to the Cyrenians, and by declaiming against Thimbro's cruelty and perfidiousness, persuaded them to break covenant with him, and to stand for their former liberties and freedom; whereupon, when they had payed only six hundred of the five thousand talents, they would pay no more. And Thimbro, to cry quitance with them, seized on 800 of their men, whom he found in the Port; and coming with his own men and the Barcenles, and Hesperians, all which joyned with him before the walls of the City, did what he could to take it; but failing of his purpose, retired to the Port, [Id.]

The Cyrenians, leaving a sufficient guard to keep the town, drew out the rest, and went a foraging into the neighbouring parts, and when these sent to Thimbro for help, he presently went with all the strength that he could make to relieve them against the Cyrenians: Mnasicles, seizing this opportunity, and that there were few or no souldiers left in the Port, moved those who were left in the City, to fall out, and set upon the Port: and they being quickly persuaded, followed him, and fell upon it; and by reason of Thimbro's absence with his men, easily took it: and such goods as they there found in specie, belonging to the Merchants, restored it all faithfully to the owners; and Mnasicles fell presently to work, and fortified the Port against Thimbro, if he should return: This went ill on Thimbro's side, for that he had not only lost the place, but with it, all his Provisions that were in it; yet upon the taking of another town called Taricha, he renewed his hopes again, [Id.]

Thimbro's Mariners and sea Souldiers, being turned out of the Port, knew not what to do for victuals, but were fain to go a free-booting into the country for it: and this, when they were daily forced to do, at last the Boors of the Country, knowing their haunts, laid wait for, and slew a great number of them, and took as many prisoners, as they had slain: They that were left, got a shipboard, and sailed away toward other confederate places. But being on their way, there fell a violent tempest, which sunk many of them in the sea; those that escaped, some were driven a shoate in Egypt, and some in the Isle of Cyprus: All which put such heart into the Cyrenians bellies, that they stuck not now to encounter Thimbro in the open field; which they did, and in a battle slew many of his men, [Id.]

Craterus departing from Cilicia, with six thousand of those old Souldiers, which came at first with Alexander into Asia, and four thousand more, of such as came to him upon the way, besides 1000 Persian Archers and Slingers, and 1500 horse, halloed all he could to the succour of Antipater, and came into the Italy: where yielding the precedence in all things to Antipater, they both late down in camp together, upon the bank of the river Peneus. And in the month of Munichion (our April) next, fought a battle with the Grecians, and overthrew them, [Id. with Arria, and Plut. in the lives of Phocion and Demosthenes.]

After Jaddus his son Onias succeeded in the Priesthood at Jerusalem, [Joseph. Antiq. lib. 11. in fi.] and there late one and twenty years, [Scalig. in Grec. Ensebius, pag. 50.]

Thimbro

Thimbro, having hired new souldiers from Tannarus in Laconia, where they wandered up and down, out of pay, began a fresh to make war upon the Cyrenians, and they on the contrary, praying in aide from the Africans and Carthaginians, made up an army, with their own men, to the number of 30 thousand, and put all upon the hazard of a battle: wherein after a long and bloody fight, they lost a many of their men, and Thimbro had the better of the day. Then the Cyrenians, having lost all their own Commanders, made Mnasicles their General. Thimbro growing proud of this victory, set upon the port of Cyrene, and took it, and made every day an assault upon the City it self, to take it. But the siege continuing, and provisions failing, the Cyrenians began to mutiny among themselves; the end whereof was, that the common people, who bare the way for matter of power, thrust the richer sort out of the City, and they, being to thrust out, repaired, some to Thimbro, and others into Egypt, [Diod. ut. sup.]

They who fled into Egypt, dealt with Ptolemei, to restore them into their Country; and by his means, returned with forces both by land and sea under the command of one Ophellus a Macedon, which coming to the ears of those which were gone to Thimbro, they prepared to fly over, and to joyn with Ophellus, but their intention being disclosed under hand to Thimbro, he put every mothers son of them to death. Then the leaders of the Commons of Cyrene, taking a fright at the return of their banditers, made their peace with Thimbro, joyned with him, and in a main battle, were all utterly vanquished, by Ophellus, [Id.]

Thimbro, in his flight, was lighted on by some certain African Carters, who took and carried him to one Epicides, who held a Town, called Tuschira, in those parts under Ophellus: and the men of that place, with Ophellus his leave, first scourged him with whips, and then sent him to be crucified at the port of Cyrene. But for as much as the Cyrenians continued still in combustions among themselves, therefore Ptolemei himself made a journey thither by sea; and having by his presence settled all matters there, came back again by sea as he went, [Arrianus, in Phoe. Biblio.]

Perdiccas, having King Philip, and the Royal Army all at his command, made a journey against Ariarathes, the petty King of Cappadocia, for that he had not received Eumenes for Governour there, as he was commanded. Ariarathes, at that time, had gotten together a great army, 30 thousand Foot, and 15 thousand Horse: In two several fights, Perdiccas slew four thousand of his men, and took six thousand prisoners; and among them Ariarathes himself: and both him and all that were allied to him, he first tortured, and then crucified. The rest he pardoned, and having settled all matters in Cappadocia, committed the Government of it to Eumenes, according to the first establishment, [Diodor. with Arria, and Plut. in Eumene, and Appian in his Misbridates, pag. 175.]

Eumenes committed the several cities of his Government, to his most trusty friends, and appointed them Garrisons, with Judges, and gatherers of his tributes, such as pleased him best, without any interposing of Perdiccas: which done, he returned with Perdiccas, both in respect to him, as also, that he might not be a stranger at Court, [Plut.]

Perdiccas, and Philip the King, leaving Cappadocia, went into Pisidia, with a purpose there to destroy two Cities, one of the Laranadians, the other of the Haurians, for these in Alexanders life time, had slain Balacrus the son of Nicanor, whom he had let over them. Laranada therefore they took at first assault; and putting all that were of age to the sword, they sold away the rest for slaves, and laid the City level with the ground: those of Haurius, seeing themselves besieged, let the City on fire over their own heads, with purpose to consume both it and themselves with it, to ashes. But the souldiers, to whom Perdiccas had given the spoil of the City, quenched the fire, and by that means, found great store of silver and gold there, [Diodorus year. 2. Olympiade 114.] Justin sayes, that this was done by the Cappadocians, when they saw Ariarathes overcome, [lib. 13. cap. 6.] and Orosius, reading in his steps, sayes the same. [lib. 3. cap. ult.]

Jollas, the son of Antipater, and Archias, came to Perdiccas out of Macedonia, bringing with them Nicæa, Antipaters daughter, to be his wife. Perdiccas, long before, whilst his estate was yet unsettled, had betrothed her. But now, that he had gotten the Royal Army, and administration of the Kingdom quietly into his hands, he purposed to marry Cleopatra, daughter to Philip, the father of Alexander, and Alexanders own sister, especially by the procurement and setting on of Eumenes, yet that he might the more easily procure a supply of the Macedonian youth, and that he might not have Antipater for an opposer in his undertakings, he married Nicæa when she came, being drawn therto principally by the advice and persuasion of his brother Alceus, [Diod. and Arria, with Justin, l. 13. c. 6.]

Cinna

Cinna also, another daughter of Philips, and sister likewise of Alexanders, but not by the same mother, brought her daughter Adea, which was afterward called Euridice, to be married to Philipus Aridus: But Perdiccas and his brother Alcetes, between them, dispatched her out of the way: whereupon the Macedons began to grow into a combuit on, and Perdiccas to quiet them, was fain to give her daughter in marriage to Arideus, [Arrian, in Phasius.] where she is named, not Cynna, but Cynane: which yet in the same Arrianus, [lib. 1. de Geff. Alex. p. 5. is called Cyna: and by Diod. year 1. Olymp. 116. and by Athen. l. 13. c. 20. Cynna.]

Perdiccas sent away Eumenes out of Cilicia, under a colour of looking to his own government in Cappadocia, but indeed, that he might have a care of Armenia, to keep it in due order; because Neoptolemus sought to make some innovations there: But Eumenes by fair words, prevailed to far with him, though a man of a high, and an impatient spirit, as to keep him quiet, [Plut. in Eumene.]

Eumenes, finding that the Macedonian Squadron grew insolent and fierce, raised an army of horse out of the Provincials in those parts, remitting to them all payment of tribute, and granting them other immunities. He furnished also them whom he most trusted, with horses at his own charge; kindling their affections towards himself with his large and bounteous favours bestowed among them, and keeping them in breath and exercise, by continual labours and journeys, which he put them upon: so that in a short time he had gotten together fix thousand three hundred and sixty Horse, [Ibid.]

Antipater and Craterus together in Greece, made war upon the Ætolians; whom when Craterus his old souldiers, compelled by continual alarms, to lye abroad in the snow, in the winter season, they were ready to perish for want of victuals, [Diodorus, Ibid.]

Eumenes carried Perdiccas his presents to Cleopatra lying at Sardes; for that Perdiccas was now resolved to rid his hands of Nicæa, Antipaters daughter, and to take Cleopatra to be his wife, and so much Menander, the Governor of Lydia, signified to Antigonus, who was an intimate friend to Antipater, [Arrianus.] And when Perdiccas, laying every day false crimes to Antigonus his charge, fought unjustly to put him to death, he made shew, as if he desired to come to a hearing; but under hand, finding a ship of Athens in the road, got privily into her, with his son Demetrius, and some other of his friends, and fled away into Europe, there to join with Antipater, [Diodorus.]

When Aristander, a Southsaier of Telmessa, had given it out, that it was revealed to him by the gods, that the land where Alexanders body should rest, should prove the most happy of all others, and forever free from all foreign invasions and incursions of the enemies; much emulation grew among the Nobles of Macedon, who should get the body of him into his hands: but principally between Perdiccas and Ptolomei the son of Lagos, [Elian. l. 2. c. 64.] Perdiccas dealt with his friends to have it carried to Egos, [Pausan. in his Attica, p. 5.]

But Aridus, who had the body in his keeping, contrary to Perdiccas his will, went and carried it to Ptolomei: taking his journey, from Babylon, by Damascus, into Egypt. And although he met with many rubs cast in his way by Polemon, a fast friend of Perdiccas yet he went through with it, and carried it into Egypt, as his purpose was, [Arrian, in Phas.]

For having spent two full years in preparations for this funeral, the sumptuousness, and magnificence whereof is at large set down by Diodorus; at length he removed the body out of Babylon, with an infinite company of workmen, to open and level the waies where need should be, and others to attend the funeral following him: But Ptolomei with his whole army, went as far as into Syria to meet him, [Diod. year 3. Olymp. 124.] and there receiving the Corps, buried it first at Memphis, with all rites and ceremonies, after the Macedonian manner, [Pausan. in his Attica, pag. 5.] and some few years after, removed it to Alexandria, [Curt. l. 10. c. 14.] which removal of it, yet was made by his son Ptolomeus Philadelphus, and not by the father, [as Pausanias intimates in his Attica, p. 5. of which, see more in Strabo, l. 17. p. 194.]

Perdiccas, calling a Council of Captains and friends in Cappadocia, propounded to them, whether he should march with his army first into Macedonia against Antipater, or into Egypt against Ptolomei: some were of opinion to passe over first into Macedonia, but it was resolved, that it was the best way to begin with Ptolomei in Egypt, least when he had put over into Europe, and was engaged there, Ptolomei should come and possesse himself of Asia. Hercules, Perdiccas gave unto Eumenes, besides what he had already, the provinces of Caria, Lycia, and Phrygia, and the government of all that part of Asia which lyeth between the mountain of Taurus, and the Hellespont, commanding him moreover to take charge of all the gendarmery in Cappadocia and Armenia in chief, and with them to attend the motions of Antipater and Craterus, and and to fortifie all places upon the Hellespont, and to stop their landing, in case they should offer to passe the sea in those parts. Moreover Perdiccas gave orders to his brother Alcetes, and Neoptolemus, that they should in all things attend the commands and orders of Eumenes; but Eumenes he willed to do things, as he should think fittest for the present service, in his own discretion, Cilicia was taken from Philotas, and committed to Philoxenus: And Perdiccas himself moving from Damascus, to the end he might seem to have the better colour for what he went about to do, took Aridus, and Alexander the son of Alexander the great by Roxane, along with him; and to set forward towards Egypt, to fight with Ptolomei, [Diodor. Jusin. lib. 13. cap. 6. Arrian, Plut. Ensil. Probus, in Eumene, Pausan. in his Attica, cap. 5.]

When Antipater and Craterus had heard by Antigonus, that Perdiccas having married Cleopatra, purposed to come for Macedon, and there as absolute King to remove them from their Governments; they presently struck up a peace with the Ætolians, and leaving Polysperchon, to manage all matters in Greece and Macedon, halted into Hellespont in Asia side, amusing and abusing those who were appointed to keep that passage, by sending daily Embassies unto them. They sent also Ambassadors to Ptolomei, who was otherways a deadly enemy to Perdiccas, and a friend to them, and in like danger of Perdiccas, as they themselves were, and desired him to join with them. As also to Eumenes and Neoptolemus; both which, were at that time at Perdiccas his devotion: and with Neoptolemus they prevailed to fall over unto them; but with Eumenes they could not, [Diodorus, Jusin. in sup. and Arrianus.]

Alcetes, Perdiccas his own brother, flatly refused to bear arms against Antipater and Craterus: and Neoptolemus envying the power of Eumenes, did not only understand join in society with them, but laid a traine to have blown up Eumenes, and to have taken his life, and to have betrayed all his army into their hands: which when Eumenes had discovered, he was forced to fight it out with the traitor in a pitch field: wherein he made a great slaughter of Neoptolemus his men, took all his baggage, and drew the residue to serve him, and grew strong by the access of so many good Macedon souldiers to his former army. Neoptolemus getting away with 300 Horse only, fled to Antipater and Craterus, and they again sent Ambassadors to Eumenes, to draw him over to their Party, promising that he should not only hold what he had, but also have more Provinces added to him. But when he answered, that he would rather lose his life than break his word to Perdiccas, they divided their army in two; with one Antipater marched into Cilicia, that going from thence into Egypt, he might there join with Ptolomei, against Perdiccas; and the other stayed behind with Craterus, to try it out with Eumenes.

Eumenes (seeing the enemy coming on, and fearing least his souldiers, knowing against whom he was to go, would not only not go with him; but dissent and flee from him, led them about by unknown wayes, where they might not easily hear how the squares went: and the rather for that there was a buzzing already among them, that Neoptolemus was recruited, and came on together with Pigris, with an army of Cappadocian and Paphlagonian Horse: and wital he so wrought it, by chusing his ground every where as he went, that he could force the enemy to come to a battle of Horse, wherein he knew he overtopp his enemy, and not of Foot, wherein he knew he was the weaker. His Foot was 30 thousand strong, some of one nation, some of another, and 5 thousand Horse; upon whose valour he principally relied for the victory. Craterus had but little above 2 thousand Horse, and as many Foot as Eumenes: but they were all Macedons, old souldiers all, and of approved valour, and such as he well durst put the day upon.

These met in Cappadocia; Craterus had the right wing, Neoptolemus the left. Eumenes put none of his Macedons to fight against Craterus, but only two Regiments of foreign Horse, led by Pharnabazus, the son of Artabazus, and by Tenedius of Phoenicia; willing them, without any shouting, or word speaking, to fall on roundly upon him: and himself with a company of 300 Horse, flew in like lightning upon Neoptolemus. And Craterus truly for his part, led on very bravely, and in his own person valiantly behaved himself, but his Horse floundering, a certain Thracian, or rather as Arrianus, a Paphlagonian ran him into the side with his Lance, and bare him to the ground: In the fall, one of Eumenes his Captains knew him, and did what he might to have saved him, all wounded as he was, and giving up the ghost. Mean whiles Eumenes and Neoptolemus met, and grappling each with each, fell both off their horses to the ground; that a man might easily see with how deadly a hatred they encountered each other, and that their spirits were more hostile than their bodies could be: being down, Eumenes wounded Neoptolemus in one of his hams, and his hamstrings being cut, he fell along; yet his courage bearing him up, he raised himself upon his knees, and fighting on, gave Eumenes three wounds, one in his arms, the other two in his thigh: but none of them being any way mortal, at the second blow,

Eumenes

Eumenes made a full blow at him, and strook off his head; which was about ten dayes, after the former victory which he gat of him, [Id.]

Eumenes, seeing Craterus brought half dead out of the field, did what possibly might be done, to have laved his life: but when it would not be, he wept bitterly over him, and with out-spread arms lamented his case; and in regard both of his high place, and also, of the former love that had been between them, buried him honorably, and sent his bones home into Macedon to his wife and children, [Plut. and Emil. Pro. in Eumene.]

Both the Leaders being slain, and many others, especially of the better sort, taken prisoners; the rest of the Horse fled back to the main Squadron of the Foot, as to a sure defence: and Eumenes contenting himself with what he had done, founded a retreat, and set up a trophy upon the place, and buried the dead. But the Foot army, which was brought as it were, into a noose, whence they could not escape, without Eumenes his leave, desired quarter: and taking their oaths for their loyalty towards him, had leave to buy victual, in the places adjoining. But having gotten victual, and recovered their strength, contrary to their oath, they went away, and returned to Antipater, [Diod. with Arrian, and Emil. Probus.]

Perdiccas, with the two Kings, Aridaeus, and Alexander a young child, coming with his army into Egypt, encamped not far from Pelusium: where, while he busied himself in fowling an old ditch, an extraordinary inundation of Nilus, spoiled all his work. And although Ptolemei cleared himself, to the world of all those crimes which Perdiccas laid to his charge, yet contrary to the good liking and will of his Army, Perdiccas would needs proceed and make a war upon him, [Diodorus and Arrianus.]

When Perdiccas at last saw that many of his friends forsook him, and fled over to Ptolemei, he assembled all his Commanders and Captains, and what with gifts, what with large promises, what with fair words, and his sweet behaviour towards them, made them all turn to himself again. And then removing his Camp without any noise, in the grasp of the evening, encamped upon the bank of the River Nile, not far from a certain Castle, called Murus Camelorum, (i.e.) a wall of Camels. And at day break, crossed the River with his Army and Elephants, and set upon the Castle, but was valiantly repulged by Ptolemei, and glad to retreat to his Camp again. And the night following he removed, and with all silence possible, came to a place over against Memphis, where the River parting, made an Island, fit to encamp in, but in passing the River, to come at it, he lost above two thousand of his men, of which no less than one thousand being long lost up and down in the water, were devoured by Crocodiles, and other monsters of the River. But Ptolemei took such bodies as were cast a shoar on his side the River, and bestowed all solemn Rites and Ceremonies of funeral upon them, and sent their bones to their friends and kinsmen in the Army. Whereupon, the minds of the souldiers, grew much more enraged against Perdiccas, and inclined to Ptolemei than before, [Diod.]

Then arose there a mutiny and sedition in the Camp, wherein the chief Commanders, to the number a hundred, fell off from Perdiccas, and among them, Pithon himself; than whom there was not a braver man, for virtue and valour, and high esteem, among all Alexanders Nobles. But some of the Horse, conspiring together, made no more ado, but went to his pavilion where he lay, and there slew him; when he had now held that principality three full years, at least, the third year running, [Id. with Arrianus and Justin, lib. 13, cap. 8. Pausan. in Attic. pag. 5. and Emil. Prob. in Eumene.]

The next day, when the whole army was called together, Ptolemei crossed the River, and came to the two Kings; and presenting both them, and other of the Nobles with honourable gifts, and behaved himself in all fair and humble manner to them all. And when he had excused himself for what he had done, finding that the army was destitute of provision, he supplied them with plenty of corn, and all other necessities for their use. And he made it openly to appear, that he was heartily sorry, and bemoaned the present state and condition of Perdiccas his friends: and as he saw any Macedon in any distresse or danger, he did, what possibly he could, to relieve him, and help him out. Now albeit, being so gracious with all there, as he was, he might easily have gotten to be L. Protector of the two Kings, as Perdiccas was, yet he so prevailed by his counsel with them, that when they met about that matter, all with one accord, cast the Protectorship of the two Kings, Aridaeus, and Alexander the young child, upon Pithon, who was the man that had formerly quieted the commotions of the Greeks in the upper Asia, and Aridaeus, which had formerly the charge of conveying the body of Alexander from Babylon, with sovereign power over all the armies; in such manner and form, as Perdiccas had, according to the first establishment, [Diodorus and Arrian.]

Two

Two daies after the death of Perdiccas, there came news of Eumenes his victory, gotten in Cappadocia, and of the death of Neoptolemus and Craterus, which had it come but two dayes sooner, had, no doubt, laved Perdiccas his life, for who, upon that successe, durst have stirred against him? But the Macedons, enraged for the death of Craterus, declared Eumenes for an open enemy, with 50 other Noble persons that were near about him; among which, was Pitho Illyrius, (for so I read them jointly, in Justin as also in Arrianus his Indica, [pag. 185.] Πίθων Κεγρίη Ἀλλυριανός: (i.e.) Pithon, the son of Craterus, of Alcomene; which in Stephanus de Urbibus, is a City in Illyria) and Aleetas the brother of Perdiccas: Generals, against them, were Antigonus and Antipater; and to this purpose was Antigonus sent out of Cyprus, and commanded, together with Antipater, to come to the two Kings presence in all haste, [Diod. and Arrian, with Justin, 13, c. 8, and Plut. in Eumene.]

In Egypt also were put to death, all that had any reference to Perdiccas, and his sister Aitalas, whom Attalus the Admiral of Perdiccas, lying then with the fleet before Pelusium had married: He hearing of the death of his wife, and of Perdiccas, weighed anchor, and came to Tyrus, where Archelaus a Macedon, and Governor of the place, entertained him with all respect and love, and gave up the City, with 800 talents, which Perdiccas had deposited and left in trust with him, into his hands.

Attalus, staying at Tyrus, recieved and relieved all such of Perdiccas his friends, as could escape and get away from the Camp, lying before Memphis, [Diodorus.]

Euridice, the wife of King Aridaeus, would not that the two Protectors should do any thing of moment without her: and they at first said no Nay thereto. Yet afterward, they told her plainly, that she had nothing to do with matters of State: only they said, they would have a care of her, till Antigonus and Antipater came. [Arrian.]

Pitho and Aridaeus, the two Protectors, removing from Nilus with the two kings, and the army, came to Tripardisus in the upper Syria: where, when Euridice would needs be over-busy and meddling in matters of state, and would many times crosse the Protectors in their waies, Pithon, offended therewith, and the rather, for that he saw the Macedons inclined to obey her commands, called the Macedons together, and before them all, resigned his Protectorship: Thereupon they chose Antipater to be Protector in his place, with all sovereign power belonging thereunto, [Diodorus.]

The army now demanded of Antipater, performance of all those rewards for their long labour in the wars, which Alexander had made them. Antipater, when he had nothing to give them for the present, told them that their demands were just and reasonable, and that he would shortly look into the Kings Treasure, and find out whatever he had laid up: which speech of his gave the army little satisfaction: whereupon when Euridice also helped to lay load upon him, the minds of the common souldiers were stirred up to a mutiny and sedition against him. At the same time Euridice made an open declamation against him, which was pronounced in the peoples hearing, by Alcibiadus her Secretary. And Attalus seconded her, with another of his own; so that Antipater had much ado to escape alive out of their hands: But Antigonus and Seleucus stood up in his defence, and therein ran a hazard of their own lives also.

Wherefore Antipater, having thus got clear of them, got him presently away to his own army, and then the chief Commanders of the Cavalerie coming together, with much ado, pacified the multitude, and so Antipater was sent for again, and willed to retume the sovereign power, and use it, as formerly he had done, [Diod.]

After this, Antipater made a new distribution of the Governments of the Provinces in Tripardisus: wherein he partly ratified what had formerly been done in that kind, and made some alterations, as the present state of things required: And for Ptolemei, he was bid to hold what he had, for it was hard to remove him to any other Government, seeing he had in a manner gotten Egypt by way of conquest to himself. But Melopotamia, and the Country of Arbela, were assigned to Amphimachus the Kings brother, Babylon to Seleucus, Parthia to Philip, Asia and Drangiana to Stalander of Cyprus, Bactria and Sogdiana to Stalander of Solos in the same Island, Media, as far as to the Caspian Gates, Perdiccas his son in law being now dead, was taken from Atropates, and given to Pithon the son of Craterus, or Cratenas, whereupon Atropates, calling the lesser Media from his own name Atropetia, turned it quite away from the Macedonian Government, and made himself absolute King of it: and in succession from him, it continued down to Sirobo his time, as himself testifieth, [lib. 11, pag. 523.] Antigones, (for whom Antigonus is falsely written in Diodorus) Captain of the silver Targateers, because he was the first that set upon Perdiccas, had the Province of Sula given given him for his pains; and three thousand of the most turbulent Macedons in the late sedition to carry with him: The rest of the Provinces of the upper Asia, were left in the hands of such as had them before, save that Patala, the greatest City of all India, was upon this settlement assigned to King Porus: as Arrianus saith; which we can hardly believe.

In the lesser Asia, Cappadocia, and Lycia with Paphlagonia, were taken from Eumenes, and given to Nicanor. Lydia, (not Lycia as it is read in Diodorus) to Cymus; Phrygia the lesser, as far as to Hellepont; to Aridaeus. Caria to Cassander, with Phrygia the greater, Lycaonia, Pamphylia, and Lycia, to hold them as he did before. In Diodore, is here read Cilicia, instead of Lycia: which himself a little before said was given to Philoxenus; or rather as Arrianus hath it, was confirmed to him: for I shew'd a little before out of [Justin, lib. 13, cap. 6.] that Perdiccas had taken that Province from Philotas, and given it to Philoxenus.

This Antigonus (who because he wanted one eye, was nick-named, the Cyclops, [Elian, lib. 12, Var. H, § cap. 14.] was by Antipater made General of the Kings army, and Commander of those Forces in particular, which Perdiccas had. He committed to him also the care of the two Kings, and lent him to make war upon Eumenes, being of himself very desirous of that employment: whereupon it is, that [Appianus in his Syriaca, pag. 121.] says, that Antipater made him, 'Εὐμένην ὁ δὲ βασιλεὺς Ἀντίγονος' (i. e.) Overlord of all Asia: and [Diod. lib. 18, pag. 626.] calls him 'ἐπὶ πάντων Ἀσιας ἀρχηγός' (i. e.) absolute Commander of all Asia: but joyned with him also son Cassander (the Governour of Caria) as his Master or General of the Horse; to the end, that if Antigonus should go about to set up for himself, he might have an eye upon him, [Diodor. and Arrianus.]

At the same time Antipater made Autolychus the son of Agathocles, Amyntas, the son of Alexander, and brother to Penefta, Ptolemei the son of Ptolemei, and Alexander the son of Polypercon, Squires of the body to the two Kings, [Arria,] and having gotten a great applause among all sorts of men for his well ordering, and due administration of things in his Prefectorship, he set onward of his journey with the two Kings, toward Macedonia, [Id. & Diodor.]

Eumenes, hearing that he was declared an enemy by the Macedons, and that Antigonus was sent against him, declared the matter of his own accord to the army; least perhaps the fame of it coming otherways to their ears, might make matters worse than they were; or the novelty of it should damp their courage: at least he should thereby find how his army stood affected to him, and to dispose of himself, as he should see an occasion, upon the general carriage of them thereupon: yet he told them plainly, that if an mans heart failed him upon this news, he should have free leave to depart, and go whither he would; with which word, he lo wan and fastned all mens hearts unto him, that they all bad him be of good cheer, saying, That they would cut that Decree of the Macedons in pieces with their swords, [Justin, lib. 14, cap. 1.]

Moreover when news of that Decree came to Alcetas the brother of Perdiccas, he presently fled, and ingratiated himself with the Pisidians; for whiles he was among them, when ever he got a booty from the enemy, he gave one half thereof to them, and was ever affable and courteous to them in his speech, often inviting the principal of them to Feasts, and honouring them with gifts and presents, whereby he wan the hearts of all unto him, [Diodor, pag. 623.]

Atralus also, who was chief Annular of the Navy, and who was with the first of them that fell off from Antipater, fled and banded himself with the rest of the now Banditoes: and gat together an army of a thousand Foot, and 800 Horse; and with these going to possess himself of Cnidus, Caunus, and Rhodes, was by Demetrius the Annular of Rhodes valiantly put off, [Arrianus.]

Eumenes took as many horses, as he wanted out of the Kings breed, which was in the mount Ida: And when he sent an account for them in writing to the Kings Officers of the Revenue, Antipater laugh'd at it, and said, that he wondered to see Eumenes so cautious, as to think, that either he himself would ever be accountable to them of the Kings goods, or look for an account of them from others.

From hence he marcht with his army, into Etolia, as it is in the printed Copies of Justin; but as a Manuscript Copy hath it, into Eulia, or Eulane, which is a part of Armenia the lesse in Cappadocia (as Ilaacus Vossius a most learned young man, and my very good friend, observed out of Ptolemei) and there levied monies of the Cities in those parts: and if any refused to pay contribution, he plundered them as so many enemies. And from thence again, he went to Sardes, and to Cleopatra, sister to Alexander the great, hoping that her presence would confirm his Centurions and other Officers of his army in their obedience unto him, as supposing that the right of Royal Majesty was on that side, on which the sister of Alexander stood, [Justin, lib. 14, cap. 1.] And when it so fell out, that Antipater took also Sardes in his way to Macedonia, Eumenes

Eumenes would fain have put the matter upon a battle, in the fields of Lydia; both because he was the stronger in Horse, and because also he was desirous to let Cleopatra see, of what metal he was made. But Cleopatra, fearing lest Antipater and the Macedons might hereupon charge her to have been the author and auctor of this war against them, perwaded Eumenes to leave Sardes, [Plutarch and Arrianus.] Nevertheless Antipater when he came, forbore not to reproach her, with many fowl words, for having held correspondence with Eumenes and Perdiccas. But the, beyond what could have been expected from a woman, answered him again very stoutly justifying her own actions, and laying the fault upon Antipater: yet so, as at last they parted fair, and upon good terms, [Arria.]

Eumenes therefore left the Country of Lydia, and marcht away into the upper Phrygia, and there took up his winter quarters in Celene, [Plut.] and dispatcht away messengers to Alcetas, and his associates; advising them to draw their forces into a body, and to make head against a common enemy. But when they could not agree among themselves; nothing was done, [Arrian.] for Alcetas, and Polemo, and Docimus, could not agree, who should be chief: Whereupon Eumenes cryed out and said, This is according to the old saying, Exoni nulla habetur ratio, (i. e.) There is no fence against destruction, [Plutarch.]

Eumenes promising to pay his army within three dayes, for all the Towns and Cities of that Country, which was full stored with men and Cattle, to sale. Whereupon the Captains and Commanders took them off his hands, and receiving Engus of battery from him, went and entered by force upon them, and making sale of all, paid every man his company to the full, [Id.]

Antipater, not daring as yet to fight with Eumenes himself, sent Cassander, to try the fortune of a battle with Alcetas and Atralus; and fight they did, and parted upon equal termes, yet so as Cassander had the worse of it, [Arria.]

Cassander, falling out with Antigonus, upon his father Antipaters perwasion, grew friends again with him; yet meeting with his father in Phrygia, he advised him, nor to keep himself far off from the Kings, nor to rely too much upon Antigonus. But Antigonus by his temperate and discreet carriage, and obsequious behaviour upon all occasions, did what he could, to make Antipater have a good belief of his sincerity to him, and loyalty to the cause. Whereupon Antipater, putting of all displeasure towards him, delivered into his hands, of those forces which he had brought with him out of Asia, 8500 Macedons, and as many Horse of his confederates, with one Moeis of his Elephants, being 70 in number, that with them he might go thorough with the war against Eumenes; so Antigonus took upon him the management of that business; and Antipater with the Kings, took his journey to returne to Macedon, [Id.]

But then his whole army cryed out for gelt, and he promised them pay, when he came to Abydus; and told them, that perhaps he would there bestow on them the whole donative, which Alexander had promised; if not, yet at least the greater part thereof, feeding them therefore with this hope; he drew them on quietly to Abydus; but when he came thither, he with the two Kings in his company, staid away by night, and put over the Hellepont, and went to Lymachus. And the morrow after they followed him, without any further calling for their pay. So saith Arrianus [in Biblio. Theoi, cap. 92.] and here Arrianus ends his ten books, which he wrate of the gests of Alexander.

Antigonus drew all his forces out of their winter quarters, to march against Eumenes, and to subdue him, who at that time lay in Cappadocia, [Diodor.] Now there were billets cast about every where in Eumenes his Camp, promising 100 talents, and good conditions and offices besides: to him that would bring in Eumenes head to Antigonus, [Justin lib. 14, cap. 1. Plut. in Eumene.] Which when Eumenes perceived, he forthwith called all the souldierie together, and first thanked them all, for that in so great a multitude, there was none found, that would falsifie his oath taken to him, in hope of so bloudy a reward; and yet withall cunningly intimated to them, that these billets were of his own devising, to found thereby their affections toward him, to the end, that if the enemy should do the like hereafter, the army might imagine, that it was still but a device of his to try them: Whereupon they all cryed out, and vowed their service, in the defence of his person, and preservation of his life, [Justin.] And thereupon they decreed among themselves, that there should out of the principal of the army, be chosen a thousand men, for his dayly guard; and that they should watch every night by turns about him, and they which were so chosen, were glad of the employment, and willingly received from his hands, such gifts, as the Macedon Kings used to bestow upon their Nobles: for Eumenes now took upon him scarlet Hats, and robes upon them, which among the Macedons was ever esteemed for a principal favour from their King, [Plut.] yet one of his chief Commanders, called Perdiccas, with 3 thousand foot, and 5 hundred horse fell from him, and was gotten 3 days journey on his way: and Eumenes dispatched away Tenedius a Phœnician, with 4 thousand choice foot, and a thousand horse to overtake them: which he did, and falling on them unawares, in the night time, while they were all asleep, took Perdiccas prisoner, and brought back all his followers to Eumenes, who pickt out the chief Authors of that detection, and put them to death, and distributed the rest by small parcels, among his other companies, speaking them faire, & using them courteously, and thereby wan their affections to himself again, [Diadormus.]

After this Antigonus dealt, by a privie messenger, with Apollonides, one of the commanders of the Horse, under Eumenes, and by large promises, drew him to play the traitor with Eumenes, and in the midst of the fight, to forsake, and turne against him. Eumenes at this time encamped in the country of Orcynia, in Cappadocia, a place fit for horse to fight in; and thither came Antigonus with his army, and took up all the upper ground, near the foot of the mountains, his army consisting of 10 thousand foot, most part whereof were Macedons, and men of admirable force and courage, and two thousand horse, and 30 Elephants: And Eumenes in his army had no less than 20 thousand foot, and 5 thousand horse. The battle began very fiercely on Eumenes his side: but Apollonides with his regiment of horse, falling suddenly off to the enemy, gave the victory to Antigonus: in that fight Eumenes lost 8000 men, and all his Carriages, [Id.]

Yet Eumenes suffered not the traitor to escape, but whiles he was in acting of that villany, took him, and hung him up: Himself fled by a contrary way to that which they that pursued him took, and turning back short, passed by the enemy, and came to the place where the battle was fought, and there encamped, and gathered together the bodies of his slain, and for want of other fuel in the place, took the doors and gates of the towns and villages thereabouts, off their hinges, and cleft them, and made piles of them to burn his dead withal, the Captains by themselves, and the common soldiers by theirs. In so much that Antigonus coming to the place afterward, stood amazed at this bold attempt of his, and undauntedness of his high courage, [Plur.]

After falling by chance upon Antigonus his carriages, though he might have taken many a prisoner, many slaves, with much stiffe, yet fearing lest his men, having gotten so much wealth, should grow leste forward to fight, and if need were, leste able to fly, by reason of their luggage, gave order that every man should see his horse well fed, and refresh himself, and then be ready to set upon the enemy: mean while he privily sent to Menander, who was let to keep the enemies luggage, to remove immediately out of the plain, to the foot of the mountain, for fear of being suddenly surrounded by the enemies Horse, which when he, seeing the danger, speedily did, the enemy said that they were very much beholding to Eumenes, for saving their children from slavery, and their wives from ravishment: But Antigonus told them that Eumenes did it not for their sakes, but to the end he might not flake & hinder himself thereby in his flight, [Id.]

Eumenes went from thence, skulking here and there, and perswaded a great many of his men to leave him for the present, and to get them gone: whether out of an honest care which he had of them; or because they were now grown too few to oppose the enemy, and yet were too many to conceal him in his flight. But when he was come to Nora, which was a strong castle, and which Strabo, [l. 12.] saith in his time, went by the name of Neroasius, a place leated upon the confines of Cappadocia and Lycaonia, with 500 horse, and 200 foot (though Diadormus saith that there were not above 500 in all there,) as many of his friends as desired his leave to be gone, because they could not brook, either the desolatenesse of the place, or the scarcity of victuals, that they there found, he gave it them freely, and embracing every one of them, in all faire and courteous manner sent them away: For the place it self was not above two furlongs in bignesse, and there was in it provision enough of corn, and sale, and water, but there was no store of fresh Cates to be had, [Id. with Diadormus, and Justin, lib. 14. cap. 2.]

Antigonus, coming to the place, before he began any siege, sent to Eumenes to come to a parley, and when he required hostages, Antigonus refused, but bad him come out as to his Superior: But Eumenes sent him word again, that as long as he were a sword by his side, he would acknowledge no Superior. Whereupon, when Antigonus sent him his own brothers son, called Ptolemei, as was required, Eumenes came forth: and they embraced each other very lovingly, and in all familiar manner. And having disputed of sundry matters, when Antigonus saw that he never mentioned any thing of his own security or pardon, but still demanded his former Governments to be confirmed, and recompence for his losses to be made unto him, the standers by stood amazed at it, and wondred at the constancie of his courage and magnanimity that was in him. And Antigonus

Antigonus told him, that concerning these articles, he would advise with Antipater: And so with much ado, returned him again into his Castle, safe from the violence of the multitude: And having built a double wall, with trenches round about the Castle, and left men enough to maintain the siege, removed his Camp, [Ibid.]

After a while Eumenes sent messengers (among which, one was Hieronymus the Historian, a town-born child of Cardia, as himself was) to Antipater, for a pacification, [Diadormus, and Justin, lib. 14. cap. 2.] and in the mean time, he provided victuals for his company, and though his tate was short, yet he made good cheer with what he had, admitting them all in their tunes to his table, where he entertained them with pleasant discourse, and familiar speeches, instead of better meats, [Diad. and Plur.] and then as often as he had a mind to it, out he would fall, and either burn or overthrow Antigonus his works, [Emil. Prob.]

But fearing leste by lying alwayes in one place, he should dry founder and lose all his horses, for want of breathing them, he gave order every day once to truffle up his horses with their fore feet above ground, and made them stand upon their hinder; that so with striving and much struggling, they might gather heat and tall a sweating; and gave them boiled barley to eat, that they might the sooner dispatch it, and the better digest it: whereby it came to passe, that when at last he came out of the Castle every man wondred to see his horse so fat and sleek, as if they had been all the while kept in the best pasture of the country, [Diodor. l. 14. Frontin. Strateg. lib. 4. cap. 7. Plin. and Emil. Prob. in Eumene.]

Ptolemei the son of Lagus, perceiving that Phœnicia, and Cœloxyria, would be very commodious to him, both for the keeping of Egypt, and also for the acquiring of Cyprus bet his brains about it, how he might compass it. Wherefore he tried, whether he could draw Laomedon, who was made Governour of those two Provinces, first by Perdiccas, and afterward by Antipater, to deliver them into his hand: offering him a vast summe of money for it. But not able to compass it that way, he raised a greater army, made his trusty friend Nicanor General of it, and sent him to wrest it by pure force out of his hand: and he marching into Syria, took Laomedon prisoner; but he by bribing his keepers got away, and fled to Alectus where he was in Caria: and Nicanor having in a short time subdued all Phœnicia and Syria, and put Garrisons in them, he returned into Egypt, [Diodor. with Appian, in Syriac. pa. 121. and Pausan. in his Asia, pag. 5.]

Ptolemei, setting upon the parts of Phœnicia and Syria, and having gotten Hierusalem by a slight, carried thence to the number of 100 thousand men into Egypt: out of which, he selected 30 thousand of the ablest of them, whom he armed, and took into his army upon greater than ordinary pay, and committed his Garrison Towns and Castles in Egypt, especially to their trust. The rest he gave away for slaves among his soldiers, not so much of his own accord, as upon their importunity, who desired to have them rather than any others, for their necessary uses, and attendance in things belonging to the wars, [Aristot. in lib. de 70. interpret. with Prob. Philadelph. his epistle, cod. lib. Joseph. Antiq. lib. 12. cap. 1. Euseb. 2. in Chron.]

Of his taking of Hierusalem, Agatharchides Cnidus, writeth in this manner, in his book of the successors of Alexander the great, in Josephus lib. 1. cont. Apion, pag. 1050, with lib. 12. Antiq. cap. 1. They which are called Jews, saith he, dwell in a most fortified City, which the natives call Jerusalem: these keep every seventh day Holiday: and meddle with no armes upon that day, nor with any part of husbandry, or any other manner of work whatsoever: onely holding up their hands in balauced places, they there stay praying till the evening with out stretched hands. And when Ptolemei the son of Lagus entered their City with his army, all men observed the folly of them that were set to keep it, and so the country came enslaved under a bitter master, and their law was found, to be naught else, but a foolish custom. Appian adds, that Ptolemei demolished the walls of the City: and that leaving Garrisons in Syria, he returned into Egypt by sea, [in Syriac. pag. 129, 121.]

Of his carrying away the Jewes captive into Egypt, Josephus speaketh in th's wife, [lib. 12. Antiq. cap. 1.] Ptolemei, saith he, carried away many captives out of the hill-country of Judæa, and places bordering upon Jerusalem, and from Samaria, and the mount Gerizim, into Egypt, and made them to dwell there. And finding that they of Hierusalem were most strict observers of any oath which they had taken, by the answer which they made to Alexander's Messenger, after the last overthrow of Darius, he thought fit to place many of them now in his garrisons, and castles: and when he had planted many of them in Alexandria, there to live enjoying the same privileges which the Macedons had: he bound them all with an oath to be true legie men to his posterity, that had bestowed so great favours on them. And again in his 2 book cont. Apio, pag. 1063. Ptolemeus Lagus, saith he, committed all his castles and places of strength to his Alexandrian Jewes, conceiving they would be kept most safe in their hands, in regard of their fidelity and manhood: and to the end he might reign most securely in Cyrene, Cyrene, and other parts of Libya; he therefore sent many of those Jews to inhabit in that country. And from thence believed that Jason Cyrenensis out of whose writings was collected the second book of the Maccabees; [2 Maccab. cap. 2, v. 24.] and Simon Cyrenensis, who bare the cross of Christ; [Matth. chap. 27, v. 32.] and of whom mention is made, [Acts, 2, v. 10, and cap. 6, v. 9.]

Antigonus, while Eumenes kept in Nora, besieged there with a double wall round about him, marched with his army against Alceas, and Attalus, and first into Pisidia, where Alceas with his strength lay; and having in seven dayes space marched two thousand and five hundred furlongs, he came to a City called, The City of the Creteses: and coming thus speedily and unawares upon them, he possessed himself of some sitting hills and places of advantage thereabouts; and had in his company besides his Elephants, 40 thousand Foot, and 7 thousand Horse; yet durst Alceas meet him in the open field, having but 16 thousand Foot, and 900 Horse of his friends in his army. But Antigonus having the advantage of the ground, and by far the stronger party routed him, and took both Attalus and Docimus and Polemon, and many other great Captains prisoners; all which he took to mercy, and used great clemencie and humanity towards them, and disposed of the rest among his companies, and thereby much encreased his own army.

Alceas himself with his life-guard, and sons, and other Pisidians which served him, fled to Telmessus a city of Pisidia, which the Pisidians, being to the number of 6 thousand, and all very strong and valiant men promised never to forsake him; and therefore when Antigonus with all his army came before the walls of Telmessus, and demanded Alceas to be delivered up unto him, and the elder sort thought it fit so to do by the younger crew met together by night, and there bound themselves each to other by an oath, not to forsake him, for any danger that might come thereof: which notwithstanding, the Elders of the City sent a messenger privily to Antigonus, to let him know that they would deliver Alceas into his hands alive or dead, if he would but toll out the soldiers to a skirmish, and making as if they themselves fled, draw them a reasonable distance off from the walls of their City; which was done accordingly; and in the mean time, the Elders fell upon Alceas, with their men, which he perceiving, rather than he would fall alive into his enemies hand, drew his own sword and slew himself: His body laid upon a beer, and wrapt in a vile cloth, while the young men were fighting, was sent and presented to Antigonus, which he having for three daies together, exposed to all the contumelies and indignities that could be imagined, at last caused it to be cast out unburied. The younger crew returning from the fight and hearing what had passed in their absence, grew enraged against the elders; and seizing upon a quarter of the city, resolved at first to set it all on fire, but changing that purpose, they all fell to waite and spoile the enemies country thereabouts; and finding that Antigonus had left the corps of Alceas behind him, they took it up, and buried it as honourably as they could devise, [Id.]

Antipater falling sick, and drawing to his end, ordained Polyperchon to be Protector of the Kings, and sovereign Commander in his room: which Polyperchon was almost the eldest man of all that ever served under Alexander; and was in very great esteem among the Macedons: But Cassander, Antipaters son, not content with the office of General of the Horse, which he held, but forming to see that Polyperchon was preferred before him in the Protectorship and sovereignty of the realm, began to treat with his friends, of getting the kingdom into his own hands, and sending understand his Agents to Ptolemei, renewed his former friendship with him, and desired that he would make an association of armes with him, and come away with his fleet out of Phenicia into Hellespont; The like he did to other Commanders and Cities; intreating them to joyne in armes with him, [Idem, with Plutarch in Phenicia.]

When Antigonus, returning with his army out of Pisidia into Phrygia, came to the City of the Creteses, he was there advertised of all these matters by Aristodemus of Miletum; which pleased him well, for hereupon he presently founded his hopes of sovereignty in his mind, [Diodorus, with Plutarch in Eumene.] for being left sole and absolute Commander over all Asia by Antipater, and having a greater army there, than any other, he made no doubt of seizing upon all the Kings treasure there, whiles there was none to oppose him. He had then in his army, 60 thousand foot, and 10 thousand horse, and 30 Elephants; and saw that he had means to encrease, if need were, his army at pleasure: for that drawing foreign Nations to his service, Asia was well able to feed and pay them all abundantly: Wherefore calling a Council of his friends, he declared to them, That his purpose was, to put for all, and thereupon, assigned such and such of his friends, to several Offices and Commands, and desired them with huge promises made to every of them, to stand by him and assist him what they could, in what he went about; for that he resolved to go thorough all Asia, and to put out such Governours, as were then in office, and to put others of his own choice in their rooms, [Diodor.]

Antias, who had the government of Phrygia upon the Hellespont committed to him, perceiving what Antigonus went about, and purposing to provide for once, went and set upon Cizicum, which was a great City, and of all others lay most opportunely for his occasions. He had in his company above 10 thousand mercenary Foot soldiers, and one thousand Macedons, Persian archers and slingers five hundred, and eight hundred Horse, with all manner of Engines of battery, and in great abundance. And the men of Cizicum, under a colour of a treaty for a pacification, obtained of him cessation of arms, for a time, and then drave out the time in drawing up articles upon which the surrender was to be made; but had in that time sent to Byzantium for aide and supplies of men and munition, of all sorts for their defence: and sailing along their own coasts with their men of war, took in men out of the Country, and stored the city with them, and with such provision as they brought with them. The ead was, Antias having been tooled by the men of Cizicum, and lost many of his men upon the place, was faine to leave Cizicum as he found it, and to return to his own government again, [Id.]

Antigonus, being then at Celenæ, halted him away, with 20 thousand choice foot, and three thousand Horse, to the relief of Cizicum, thinking hereby to have that City hereafter at his devotions. But coming a little too late, he sent messengers to Antias, to expostulate the matter with him, and why he did it: and withall, to require him, to give up that government which he had into his hands; and to live there hereafter, in the quality of a private man, contenting himself with the revenue of one only City to live upon. That he refused to do, and presently disposed guards about the gates and walls, and other places of the City, wherein himself was; and then dispatched away a part of his army, with a Commander over them, to joyne with Eumenes, and to raise the siege from before Nora Castle, and having rid him out of that danger to draw him into a league and association of arms against Antipater, [Id.]

Emili. Probus tells us, that Eumenes toward the beginning of the Spring, under colour of submitting himself to Antigonus, and treating of conditions from day to day at last put a trick upon him, and got both him self and all his people safe out of the Castle, [in Eumene.] But Justin, [lib. 4, cap. 2.] says, that Antigonus, when he found that Antipater had sent relief to Eumenes, raised his siege. And Diodorus, and Plutarch deliver, that Eumenes by the Mediation of Hieronymus Cardianus, his contrinman and true friend, was suffered to come out upon his word, and thus it was.

Antigonus casting with himself how to get all into his own hands, sent for Hieronymus the Historian, to come unto him, and employed him in a message to Eumenes, to deal with him to this effect, to wit, that forgetting what had passed between them two in the fight at Cappadocia; he would now be pleased to joyne with him in a firm league of love and friendship, and association of armes; offering to restore him far more wealth than he had lost, and a greater Province and Dominion, than ever he had before; and to make him chief of all his friends, and partaker of all his desires and fortunes. [Diodor.] And when Antigonus had drawn up a form of an oath, whereby to bind each other to a strict performance of conditions, and sent it to Eumenes; Eumenes took and corrected them in some points; and then put it to those Macedon Captains, which were in the siege against him; to judge which of the two was the better, and more indifferent draught. For Antigonus among other things, made mention of the Kings pertunctorily, and as by the way, but performance of all services and conditions, referred only to himself, and were made in his own name: whereas Eumenes in his draught, first joyned Olympias with the two Kings: and then secondly drew the oath in such terms, as purported that he would reckon them all friends and foes, as were friends and foes, not to Antigonus, but to Olympias and the two Kings. And when this seemed to be the more reasonable of the two; and Eumenes took his oath, to that they presently raised their siege, and sent to Antigonus, praying him that he would bind himself in the same form of oath to Eumenes. Mean whiles, Eumenes, what ever hostages he had of the Cappadocians, sent them all home again. And Antigonus wrote back a sharp and a taunting letter to those Macedons, for presuming to amend or alter any thing in the form of the oath, which he had prescribed for Eumenes to take, and willed them to besiege him again, as close as ever they did; but this came too late, [Plut.]

Eumenes, having after a years close siege, got out at last beyond expectation, stayed a while in Cappadocia: and there gathered together, such of his old friends and soldiers, as were now scattered about the Country, [Diodor.] And to begin the world anew, the friends of those hostages which he had restored, lent him old Horses, and carriages, and Tents: and in a short time, there came into him, of his old Regiments, which

		which hitherto lay culling up and down the Country, to the number of 1000 horse [Plut.] For in regard that he was of himself a motive and industrious man, and sundry others there were, who were in like manner affected to the state, as he himself was: hence it came, that great multitudes of souldiers came flocking to him. To be short, within a few days, besides those five hundred friends, which were with him in the Caffle, he had gotten together two thousand men, all ready bent to serve him, [Diodor.] Antigonus, having sent some of his forces to besiege Aridaeus, the Governour of the lesser Phrygia, marcht himself with a mighty army into Lydia, to turn Clinus out of his Government there, but Clinus having gotten notice aforesaid of his coming, presently stuffed every Town of his, and place of defence, with a strong garrison, and went himself into Macedon, there to acquaint the Kings, and Polyperchon the L. Protector, with Antigonus his doings, and how his purpose was to revolt, and fall off from the Macedonian Government, and thereupon prayed aide against him, [Diodor.] Then did Antigonus take in Ephesus at his first coming, having some within the city, which help to bring him in, But a while after, when Eicylus of Rhodes came thither, and in four ships brought with him six hundred men out of Cilicia, and 400 talents, which from thence were sent to the Kings in Macedon; Antigonus seized on it all for his own use: saying that he had need of it, to raise and pay foreign souldiers withall: by which act of his, he plainly discovered his intention to be, wholly to set up for himself, and to rebell agai. st the Kings. This done, he then proceeded to take in the rest of the Cities, some by force, others by fair words, [Id.] And from this revolt it is, that Dexippus, Porphyric, and Eusebius, reckon the 18 years of his principality in Scalgers Græca Eusebiana [pag. 48. 164. 2:6.] Cassander, crossing the Hellespont, went to Antigonus, in Asia, desiring his assistance, and assuring him of Ptolomeis concurrence therein. Antigonus was glad of his coming, and presently offered to assist him by land and sea. This he did under a colour: as if he would help him for his father Antipaters sake; but his main drift was, to imbroile him in as many wars and troubles, as possibly he could in Europe: to the end, that he might the more freely go on, and compass his own ends in Asia, and make himself King there, [Diodor.] Polyperchon, Protector of the Kings, and ἐπιμεντής, (i. e.) Curate of the Macedonian Empire, wrote away a letter to Eumenes, in the two Kings names, requiring him thereby to stand firm to the Kings, and to make a party against Antigonus, as hitherto he had done; and therein to take his choice, whether he would come over into Macedon, and there joyn with him in maintenance of the two Kings safety, or would stay in Asia, and have supplies sent him thither of men and money, and munition, to oppose Antigonus, who had now openly declared himself a rebel against the Kings, And that if he stood in need of greater forces, himself would be ready with the Kings, and all the power that the kingdom of Macedon could make, to cross the seas, and to come into Asia, to joyn with him. The like letters were sent to the Treasurers in Cilicia, requiring them, out of those monies, which were at Quindis (where the Kings exchequer for Asia was kept, as Strabo lib. 14. p. 72. testifieth) forthwith to furnish him with 500 talents toward the reparation of his losses lately sustained, and out of the rest of the Kings monies, as much as he should call for, to hire and pay foreign souldiers withall. He also wrote his letters to Antigones and Tentamus, who between them, commanded three thousand silver Targateers under Antigonus, that they should put them over to Eumenes, and be assistant to him all that possibly they might; as the man, that was made absolute Commander and Governour of all Asia, under the Kings. And Olympias the mother of Alexander the Great, failed not on his part, to write the like letters, requiring all men to come and aide both herself, and the Kings, [Diodor. with Plut. and Emil. Prob. in Eumenes.] Eumenes hereupon removed out of Cappadocia, having 500 Horse, and two thousand Foot onely in his company; for he had not the leisure to attend their coming, who had promised to lift themselves under him, but were not then come: because Menander was coming on with a great army, which would not suffer him to nestle in Cappadocia, having professed himself an open enemy to Antigonus. But those who were left behind, following Eumenes three dayes journey, when they saw they could not possibly overtake him, returned into Cappadocia, [Diodor.] Eumenes, making long stages, passed the mount Taurus, and came into Cilicia. Then came to him Antigones, and Tentamus, Captains of the silver Targateers, with their friends; in obedience to the command of the Kings, and having congratulated his happy escape out of so many and imminent dangers, they offered him their service, and promised to stand by him in his utmost dangers, and then came the Regiment of the silver Targateers, all Macedons, to the number of about three thousand, to present themselves, with promise of all duty and service to him, [Id.]			3986.	Eumenes, fearing the envy of the Macedons, if he being an alian borne in Cardia, in the Cheroneze of Thracia, should bear himself as absolute General in the place; first waived the receipt of those 500 talents, which were ordered to him for his losses, saying that he needed not to great a summe, seeing he pretended to no principality there, [Diodor. and Plutarch.] Then pitched he his tent in the name of Alexander, and called it Alexanders pavilion, pretending that he was warned to do so, by a vision in a dream: and there caused a golden Throne to be set, with a Scepter and a Diadem; and there they met every day to consult of matters, hoping the envy towards him would be the less, if he seemed to administer all things, under the majesty and title of Alexander, [Diodor. Plutarch, Emil. Prob. Polyanus, lib. 4. Strabon.] By this means therefore, and by carrying himself in all meetings, as an ordinary man, and by speaking every man faire, and with courteous language, he put off all envy from himself; and carrying himself in like manner toward the silver Targateers, being all Macedons, he grew very far into their books, so that every man said, that he was of all men most worthy to have the tuition of the Kings, [Diodor.] For in the fairness of his language, he stuck not to call them sometimes, his fellow souldiers, sometimes his masters, and companions of his, in those Eastern wars; telling them, that they were the onely men who conquered the East: the onely men who out-wear Bactrus and Hercules, with who conquered the East: the onely men who made Alexander Great. That by them it was, that he attained divine honours, and immortal glory in the World: desiring them withall, that they would not look upon him, as upon their Commander, but as upon their fellow souldier, and a man of their own company and body, [Justin. lib. 14. cap. 2.] Then pickt he out certain choice men of his friends, whom he furnished with money in abundance, and sent them to take up and hire souldiers, upon large pay. Whereupon they presently dispersed themselves, some going into Pisidia and Lycia, and places bordering upon them, others into Cilicia, Cæloxyria, Phœnicia, and the Isle of Cyprus, and did their utmost endeavour to lift what souldiers they could get; many Grecians also, seeing what large pay was offered, lifted themselves; so that in short time, they had gathered together 10 thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse: besides the silver Targateers, and those which Eumenes brought with him out of Cappadocia, [Diodor.] Ptolomei, coming with his Navy to a Port called Zaphyrium in Cilicia, sent some of his Agents, to sollicite the silver Targateers, not any longer to follow or look after Eumenes, a man long since, proclaimed and devoted to death. He sent also to the chief officers at Quindis, advising them not to issue out any monies to him: But no man hearkened to one word he spake, because the Kings and their Governour Polyperchon, and Olympias her self, had written to, and required them to be obedient in all things to Eumenes, as to the Commander in chief and General of the kingdom, [Id.] After this Antigonus sent one of his chief friends Philotas, with 30 Macedons in his company, to the silver Targateers, to feel the pulse, first of their Captains and principal souldiers among them, if by any largesse, or hope of reward, they might be drawn to destroy Eumenes, now that he was in their hands. But they found no man pliant to their desires, save onely Tentamus, one of the Captains of the silver Targateers; who not only promised for himself, but undertook also to draw over Antigones his colleague, to their ioull design. But Antigones was so far from hearkning to him therein, that on the contrary he prevailed with Tentamus, to give off his purpose; shewing him that there were better things, and upon better grounds to be hoped for and expected from Eumenes, a man of a moderate fortune and a limited power, than from Antigones, who was already grown too great; and that he, having once gotten all into his hands, would presently thrust them out of their places, and put in whom pleased himself of his own friends. Then did Philotas deliver to the chief Captains Antigonus his letters, directed to the souldiers in general, whereby he required them upon sight thereof, to lay hold on Eumenes, and kill him; threatening withall, that if they did it not, he would come presently and fall upon them with his army, and do exemplary justice on them for their disobedience herein: whereas they were not a little terrified; but Eumenes, coming in upon them, perswaded them, rather to follow the command of their Kings, and not hearken to the words of a man who had now professed himself an open rebel. And in the end, having spoken many things pertinent to the present purpose, he not onely saved himself from an imminent danger, but also, obliged the multitude to him in a firmer band of duty and affection, than ever they were before, [Id.] And presently gave order to march, and went into Phœnicia, and there gat together what ships possibly he could put off of all the sea towns, and made him a strong Navy: to the end, that Polyperchon having a Fleet at command, might upon all occasions put over with his forces out of Macedon into Asia against Antigonus. This therefore was the cause which made him stay the longer in Phœnicia, [Id.]		3996.	318.	Poly-

Polysperchon, mean while, made Clitus the Governour of Lydia, Ammiral of the Fleet, and sent him into the Hellespont, commanding him to stay thereabouts, and to take care, that no shipping passed that way out of Asia into Europe: willing him moreover to assist Aridæus Governour of the lesser Phrygia, and who was at that time fled with such men as he had into the City of the Cyonians for fear of Antigonus, [1d.]

After that Clitus was come into Hellespont, and had taken the Cities of Propontis into his protection, and had joyined Aridæus his army to his own, then did the Captain of the Garrison of Manychium, sent by Cassander, with all his Navy put to sea likewise, taking with him also Antigonus his Fleet, so that he was in all above one hundred ships; coming therefore to a sea-fight not far from the City of Byzantium, Clitus had the better of it, and sunk 17 of the enemies ships; and took no less than 40 more with all the men in them, [1d.] whereat if he grew over-joyed, it is no marvel, considering that having but a little before taken but three, or at the most four ships of the Grecians near the Isle of Amorgus, one of the Cyclades, he was content and suffered himself to be called Neptune, and bare a Trident in his hand; as Plin. lib. 2. De form. Alexan. scrib.

Antigonus, hearing of the losse of his Navy at sea, sent for certain Barques from Byzantium, and put into them archers and slingers, and such light armed men, as many as he thought fit, and landed them in Europe side; and these setting upon Clitus his men who were gone ashore, and busie in making their Camp; put them into a fright, and thereupon they halted to their ships again: but were sore troubled, what for losse of their baggage, what for the misse of their fellows, many of which were taken prisoner. And in the mean time he provided other ships of war; whereinto he put many of his principal best fouldiers, and sent them to the same place, with a strict charge to set valiantly upon their enemies; for that in so doing, they should no doubt overcome them. These therefore, coming thither by night, under the command of Nicagor their Captain, set upon their enemies at the break of day; put them to flight at the very first assault, and bilging some of them with their beakes, took others with the men in them, which called for quarter: and at last, took all the rest of the ships and men, save only the Ammiral. Clitus himself left his ship, and fled to land, thinking to get into Macedonia; but in the way fell among Lyfimachus his fouldiers, who slew him, [Diodor.]

Antigonus, having given the enemy this great blow, bare himself for master of the Sea: and hasted now to make himself absolute Monarch of all Asia: Wherefore, taking with him 20 thousand foot, and 4 thousand Horse, the best of both sort, that he could pick out of all his army, he marcht away towards Cilicia, to disperse those companies of Eumenes which there were, before his whole army came together, [1d.]

Julie 23.

Eumenes, knowing Antigonus his design, endeavoured to reduce Phœnicia where he then was, to the obedience of the Kings; because at that time it was unjustly possessed by Ptolemei: but failing thereof, he removed thence, and went thorough Crete, Syria, purposing to get into those parts, which are called the Upper Provinces, [Diodor. lib. 18.] and having the silver Targateers with him, with their Captain Antigènes, wintered in a country of Babylonia, which is called Cares, [1d. lib. 19.]

Eumenes, being there, sent to Seleucus the Governour of Babylonia, and to Pithon the governour of Media, to come, and together with himself, to assist the Kings, against Antigonus, who rebelled against them. Seleucus sent him word that he would do what service he could for the Kings; but commanded by Eumenes, who stood long since a condemned person by the Council of the Macedons, he would not: and withal sent under-hand to Antigènes and the silver Targateers, to depose Eumenes; but they would not, [1d. lib. 19.]

Eumenes, commending the loyalty of his fouldiers, went forward to the bank of Tigris, and there encamped, 300 furlongs off from Babylon: and there lost some of his men, by the rising of the Natives upon him. From thence he purposed to go forward to Susa, both that he might there recollect his fouldiers out of the upper Provinces, and also take and make use of the Kings monies, which lay there, for his urgent and necessary occasions. But Seleucus coming upon him near the Euphrates, he was put in danger of losing his whole army by a sudden inundation, which Seleucus brought upon him, by opening the head of an old dam or sluice, and letting in the water upon his Camp, which was ready to drown all. Wherefore he and his men were faine to flee from thence to a piece of upper ground, and there they spent that day; casting in their minds, how to remedy this inconvenience. And the next day they got 30 furlongs out of the boats, wherein they transported the chief part of the army, without impeachment of the the enemy: For Seleucus had nothing but horse with him, and them also far inferior to Eumenes in number: And now the night came on, when Eumenes, taking care of his carriages which were left behind, went back with his Macedons again over the river, and there by the means of the Natives, found a place, where to let out the water another way, and so to make all that country dry and passable again: which Seleucus perceiving, and withal, desirous to rid his country of such guests, as soon as possibly he could, sent messengers to offer them a truce, and to suffer them to march away without interruption. And lo Eumenes, having escaped out of Seleucus his hands, beyond expectation, came with his army into Persia; or rather into the country of Susa, having then with him 16000 Foot, and 1300 Horse, and then, having refreshed his army after their hard and miserable march, he sent to the Commanders of the upper Provinces, to send him in, forthwith, both men and money, for the service of the Kings, [1d. lib. 18. and 19.]

Attalus Polemo, Antipater and Philotas, all Captains, taken in the overthrow of Alcetes, and committed to prison in an exceeding strong Castle, hearing that Antigonus was marched up into the upper Provinces, [Diodorus saith, that at that time he was in Melopotamia] and having gotten every man a sword, and being but eight in number, at midnight, set upon 4 hundred men, then in the Garrison; and seizing first upon Xenophites, the Captain of it, threw him down the rock of the Castle, which was one furlong high, & having killed some, & forced the rest, for fire on the houses within the fort, whereupon they which were without, attending the issue of their attempt, came, and were received into the Castle, to the number of fifty men; But being in, and not agreeing among themselves, whether they should make good the place, attending supply from Eumenes, or leave it, and shift every man for himself, the fouldiers of other Garrisons, not far off, to the number of 500 foot, and 400 horse, and upwards, and the Natives thereabouts, to the number of 3 thousand came in, and making a Captain one of themselves, besieged the place round; Docimus, who advised to leave the place, cpying a way down the hill, without a guard to keep it, treated by a messenger with Statomice the wife of Antigonus, who lay not far off, and with one only in his company, gate out, and went to her: but she, not keeping her word with him, laid him fast again; But he that went with him, made himself a leader and guide to the enemy, and led them up the castle, and with them, being a considerable number, possessed himself of a strong place in it. Nevertheless Attalus, with the rest, which were of opinion to maintain the fort, kept on fighting from day to day, in manifold way, [1d. lib. 19.]

Pitho, who was Governor of Media, having slain Philotas, who was Governor of the upper provinces, put his own brother Eudramus in his room: Whereupon the other Governors combined together, fearing least they might also be served with the same fauce, because Pitho was a man of a turbulent humor, and used to put himself upon great matters, and having overthrowen him and slain a great part of his men, they drave him quite out of all Parthia: whereupon he came into Media, hoping to have relief there, but finding none, he retired to Babylon, and there desired succour from Seleucus his hand, [1d. lib. 19.]

Eumenes, continuing in the Country of Susa, for want of victuals, divided his whole army into three brigades, and yet for marching through the country, found great scarcity of corn every where; but was faine to give them instead thereof, rice, and a kind of Indian wheat, and the fruit of palm tree, whereof there was great abundance in those parts. Now although he had afore-hand sent the Kings leutenants them of the upper Provinces, to be aiding to him; yet he again sent other letters to them of his own, to request them to come unto him with all their power into the country of Susa. But his Agents found them all in a body, met together against Pitho, [1d.]

The chief among them all, and the man on whom allies were most fixed, was Penceltes, whom Alexander had heretofore made the chief Squier of his body, and Governor of Persia: he had about him Persian Archers, and Slingers, to the number of ten thousand, and of other Nations, taken into the rank of Macedons, 3 thousand, with 6 hundred horse, of Greeks and Thracians together, and of Persian horse, 4 hundred; Polemon a Macedon, Governour of Carmania had 1500 foot, and 700 horse; Sibyrus the Governour of Arachosia had one thousand foot, and 610 horse. Androbarus was there, with 1200 foot, and 400 horse, sent from Oxyarta, the Governor of Parapamylus; Stalanor the Governor of Aria, and Drangia, with some Bactrians, made 1500 foot, and one thousand horse. Out of India came to them, Eudamus (whom Attianus calleth Eudemus, and Curtius Eudemus,) Governor of the Oxydracans and Mallians, with 300 horse, and 3 thousand foot, and 120 Elephants, which he got, when he treacherously slew Porus the King of Indians: so that they amounted in all, to 18700 foot (though the particulars make 21000.) and 4600 Horse, [1d.]

These, when they were all come to Eumenes, in the Country of Sufiana, called a publick council, where arose a hot dispute, especially between Peneftes and Antigonus Captain of the river Targateers, about the choice of a General. But Eumenes had long before taken away all occasion of that dispute, by erecting a pavilion for Alexander, and erecting his throne therein, wherein all meetings were to consist of publick affairs as in his presence, [Id.]

And then coming all together to Sufa, Eumenes took out of the Kings treasure there, so much as the Kings service then necessarily required, for the Kings letters to the keepers of their treasure there, had required, that they should issue to Eumenes alone, so much money, without stint, as he required. Wherefore he gave the Macedons six months pay before-hand, and to Endamus, which brought thole Elephants out of India, he gave two hundred talents, under colour of defraying the charge of thole beasts, but indeed to oblige the man himself to his devotion: for he saw well, that if any controversy should arise among them, that party was most like to carry it, to which he with his beasts should apply himself. The rest of the Governours paid every man his own soldiers that he brought with him. This done, Eumenes continued a while in Sufiana, to refresh his army after their hard journey, [Id.]

Philippos Aridaus (one of the two Kings) with his wife Euridice, by the command of Olympias, were murdered: having reigned six years, after the death of Alexander, [Justin. lb. 14. cap. 5.] and four months over, as [Diodor. year 4. Olymp. 115.] Id. and Porphyrie [in Grec. Ensch. pag. 228.] about the 22 day of our September.

Cassander, the son of Antipater, besieged Olympias with her grand-child Hercules, the son of Alexander the Great, and his mother Basiline, in a Town of Macedonia, called Pydna. In the beginning of the Spring following, all provisions failing, Olympias was forced to dismiss her soldiers; and her self shortly after, upon promise of life, which she could hardly obtain, yielded her self into Cassanders hands, [Diod. and Justin. lb. 14. cap. 6.]

Antigonus, removing out of Mesopotamia, came into the Country of Babylonia, and there confederating with Seleucus and Pitho, and receiving some supplies from them, he made a bridge of boats over the River Tigris; and there crossing the River, he marched away with all speed against Eumenes, wherefore Eumenes being before-hand advertised, gave in charge to Xenophilus the keeper of the Cattle in Sufa, to issue out none of the Kings monies to Antigonus, nor to come out to a party with him, at any hand; and so went with his armies, and manned the bank of Tigris all along, from the head thereof, to the very sea, with forts every where built upon the bank thereof: and because that work, by reason of the length thereof, required no small number of men, therefore Eumenes and Antigonus obtained of Peneftes to lend them 20 thousand archers more out of Persia, [Diodor. year. 1. Olymp. 115.]

Antigonus, going with his army to the Kings palace in Sufa, there made Seleucus, Governour of that Country, and leaving a sufficient army with him, willed him to besiege the Cattle there: and when Xenophilus the Treasurer, refused to obey his commands, he about the rising of the dog-star, with his army marched by night-journeys to the River Copates, where it falls into the Tigris; but lost a great multitude of his men, by the way, in regard of the excessive heat of the season: and whereas he thought that river, when he came to it, to be four acres broad, therefore he got together a small quantity of flat-bottom'd boats, and in them put over some of his Foot, bidding them there to attend the coming of the rest. Whereof Eumenes being advertised by his scouts, (and he was at that time but 80 furlongs off from the place) presently with four thousand Foot, and 1200 Horle, passing the bridge of Tigris, found three thousand Foot, and three hundred Horle, of Antigonus his army put over, and no less than six thousand of others, who were foraging about the Country; all these he suddenly let upon, and routed them. As for the Macedons which made resistance, he forced them to the river; where running headlong into their boats, and overcharging them, they sunk, so that few of them escaped: and they that would not venture upon the River, were taken prisoners; to the number of four thousand: so saith Diodorus. But Plutarch saith, that when Antigonus passed the Pafitigris, and the rest of the army perceived it not, Eumenes himself met him, with his own company, and slew many of his men, and filled the River with dead carcasses, and besides, took four thousand prisoners.

Antigonus, seeing he could not passe that River, retired with his army toward a city called Balaca, seated upon the River Ulaie, where staying some certain days, he refreshed his army, which wastired out with the vehemencie of the heat, and purposing from thence to go to Ecbatane, he went not by the high-way, both by reason of the immoderate heat, and because it would take him up no lesse than 40 dayes journey, in going: but by the Collians, which was the shorter way, and not so exposed to the scorching of the sun, as the other was, wherein nevertheless, he lost a multitude of his men, men, and hazarded all the rest, and yet at nine dayes end, hardly came to any habitable place in Media: where when the whole army began to grumble, for that within the space of 40 dayes, they had received three such blows, he commanded Pithon to go over all Media, which he did, and brought him in two thousand Horle, and a thousand Horles ready furnished, and so many loads of munition, that all the army might thereof be compleatly furnished; and withall, five hundred talents out of the Kings treasure. Antigonus disposed of those Horle among his other Troops; and distributed the Horles, among those who had lost their own, and gave the beasts of draught or carriage, freely among those that wanted them, whereby he quickly regained the love and favour of his army again, [Diodor. year 1. Olymp. 116.]

Eumenes with his men, removing from Paltigris toward Persia, came to the Regal seat of the kingdom, called Perlepolis at the end of 24 dayes march; where his whole army was entertained, and most magnificently feasted by Peneftes the Governour of that Province, after sacrifice offered to the gods, and among them to Alexander and Philip; and as Plutarch adds, a shew was given to every man of them, for his own particular sacrifice. But when Eumenes perceived that his purpose was hereby to ingratiate himself with the army, and to gain to himself the overreign power and command thereof, he caused a forged letter to be written to himself in the name of Oroates the Governour of Armenia, an intimate friend of Peneftes, in Syriac characters, purporting that Olympias, with Alexanders youngest son, having destroyed Cassander, had recovered again the kingdom of Macedonia, and that Poly(perchon, with the main power of the Kings army and his Elephants, had put over into Asia, against Antigonus, [Diod. lb. Poly. strateg. lib. 4.] These letters therefore going for current, every man cast in his mind, that Eumenes would be all in all, and the great man to advance whom he pleased, and to punish whom he thought fit, and therefore resolved to depend on him: and he, as he found any averse from him, called them in question, in form of law; beginning with Sibyrus the Governour of Arachosia, and so made them all afraid; and in the mean time courted Peneftes, and held him on, with all terms of love and friendship: telling him what heaps of honour and wealth he would cast upon him when time should serve; and by that means held him quiet, from attempting any further against him, as he had begun to do, [Diod. lb.]

And being further desirous to oblige the rest of the Governours of Provinces, and Commanders to himself, he made as though he had wanted money; and therefore exhorted them to contribute what they could spare, for the Kings service: and having by this means gotten out of them to the summe of 400 talents, he made them who seemed most fickle to him before, most sure to him now, for fear of losing the monies which they had lent, [Id. lb. and Plut. in Eumene.]

In the lesser Asia Attalus, and the rest of the Commanders with him, after one year and a months siege endured, and much hardship suffered therein, were forced at last to render themselves, [Diodor. year 4. Olymp. 115.]

In the greater Asia, Antigonus removing with his army out of Media into Persia, Eumenes preparing to march against him, and offering sacrifices, fell a feasting with his Captains: and herein following their humor, over-drunk himself so far, that he was faine to lye by it, and so hindered his march for certain dayes: Whereupon his soldiers said, that other Generals could feast, but Eumenes could do nothing but command and fight. Yet after a little while, he recovered himself, and went on upon his march, wherein Peneftes and Antigonus led the Van: and he in a Lictor came after with the Elephants. And now the two armies were within a dayes journey each of other: when the scouts came in, and brought tidings of their approach, and what numbers they were, and what ways they took; whereupon each party prepared for the field. But when Eumenes, lying in his Lictor, came not into the Camp among them, the chief soldiers in every company, resolved not to stir a foot further, unless Eumenes himself came into the Camp among them. Whereupon he was carried in his Lictor, and so went from one quarter to another throughout the army, and gave order every where for the ranging of it, whilst Antigonus lookt on, and laughed at him for his labour: and so the batties were ranged on both sides, but could not come to fight, the ground was so bad that lay between them, [Diodor. year 1. Olymp. 116. Plut. in Eumene.]

Wherefore drawing off each from other three furlongs (pace) they spent four dayes, in light skirmishes, and forraging the Country thereabouts, being pinched on either side, with hunger, and want of other necessities: and on the fifth day, Antigonus fell again a practising with Eumenes his army to betray him, upon hopes of huge rewards: his agents were sent away by the Macedons with great indignation and threats, if they offered to come again in that errand. After which Eumenes, having gotten intelligence that Antigonus had a purpose to remove his Camp, by night, three dayes journey off, to a place called Gubiene, a country abounding with all provisions, sent some trusty men under colour of run-aways, to inform Antigonus, that Eumenes would told him, that they would neither flee now they had lost their wives and children, nor bear arms against them; and withal fell a railing at him. Then Teutamius, of his own accord, sent a messenger to Antigonus to desire him to send back their goods again which he had taken; and so the bargain was driven between them, that giving up Eumenes into his hands, they should receive every man his own again: And so the Macedons, and ten thousand Persians which came with Pencestes, and the other Governors of places, and souldiers for the most part, left Eumenes, and went to Antigonus in his Camp, [Idem, with Justin lib. 14. cap. cap. 3.]

The silver Targateers therefore, before they went, broke in upon Eumenes, and wrested his sword out of his hands, and bound his hands behind him with a garret; and upon the fourth day after the fight, delivered him bound to Nicanor, who was sent by Antigonus to receive him; Eumenes desired nothing of Nicanor, but that he would lead him through the midst of the Macedons, and give him leave to speak his last unto them: which done, he went before his keepers into Antigonus his Camp, then followed the army which had betrayed their own Commander, and who were now themselves no better than so many captive slaves; and went in triumph of themselves, into their Conquerors Camp; and to make it a compleat triumph of themselves, the Elephants allos, and the auxiliaries out of India, brought up the rear. But Antigonus, for very shame and reverence of the old familiarity and friendship that had been between them two, would not suffer him to be brought unto his fight, but assigned him certain souldiers to keep him, [Plutarch in Eumene: Justin, lib. 14. cap. 4.]

Among those that were wounded, was brought also Hieronimus of Cardia, the Historiographer, who having been ever in great esteem with Eumenes during his life, found after his death, great favour also at Antigonus's hand, [Diodor. lib. 19. year 1. Olymp. 116.] This Hieronimus wrote a book, ἡ δαδύρις as Diodorus, [lib. 18. p. 62.] and Josephus, [lib. 1. cont. Apionem, pag. 1050.] terme it, or εὐρυδία (as Dionysius Halicarnassensis in the poem of Roman Antiquities calls it) both importing as much, as Of the Successors of Alexander the Great, with the general History of his own time.

Antigonus, having now gotten both Eumenes and all his army into his hands, laid first hold of Antigones, the Commander of the silver Targateers, and putting him alive into a coffin, there burnt him to ashes: and then put Eudamus, who brought Eumenes his Elephants out of India, and Celbanus, and some others whom he always had found his opposites, to death, [Diodor.]

When Onomarchus the Captain of the warch asked Antigonus, how he would have Eumenes to be kept? his answer was, as you would keep (said he) a raging Lyon, or an unruly Elephant: yet afterward, relenting a little toward him, he commanded his heavy chains to be taken off from him, and a boy of his own to be left to attend him, and to help to anoint him; and gave leave to his friends, that would, to visit him, and to supply him with necessities. And now, although his own son Demetrius, and Nearchus the Cretian, were desirous, and laboured to save his life, yet almost all the rest that were about him, pressed him by all means to rid him out of the way: yet for all this, Antigonus took seven days time to think upon it; and then, fearing least his Army might happen to grow into a mutiny about it, he gave order that no man should be suffered to come at him, and command his daily diet to be withdrawn from him: for he said, that sure his hand should never be upon him, who had formerly been his friend; and when he had neither eaten nor drank in 8 dayes space, and the camp was suddenly to move, one was sent in to him, unknown to Antigonus, and cut his throat. Antigonus, in respect to his former familiarity with him, commanded his corps to be delivered to his nearest friends, to be buried as they thought fit: and they buried it, in an honourable, but a military way, all the army following the bier, and burnt it, and gathered his bones into a silver Urne, and took care to convey them to his wife and children in Cappadocia, [Diodorus, year 1. Olymp. 116. Plutarch and Eumel. Prob. in Eumene.]

Antigonus, returning into Media with his whole army, spent the rest of the winter in a towne not far from Ecbatane, and distributed his army here and there over all that Province, and especially in the country of Rages, so called from ῥαγ because there had been above 2 thousand cities and towne destroyed by earth-quakes in those parts, as Strabo saies [lib. 11. pag. 514.] out of Perfidious; where, when he discovered that Pitho, the Governor of Media, sought to oblige many of the souldiers by large gifts, and larger promises, to his own devotion, and to persuade them to a revolt from him, he dissembled the matter very handsomely, and gave it out, that he purposed to make Pitho Governor of the upper Provinces, and to leave a sufficient army with him, to maintain them: He wrote also his letters to Pitho, and therein earnestly entreated him to come away in all haste unto him, to the end (said he) that having consulted together upon some necessary matters, he might forthwith march away into the lesser Asia. Whereby, and by other letters sent him from friends, as he took them to be, Pitho, who was then in the furthest parts of all Media, in his winter quarters, being grieved, came to Antigonus, who, so soon as he had him, called him before a Council of war; and they quickly found him guilty, and chop off his head, [Diodorus, ut supra.]

Antigonus, gathering all his army together, committed the Government of Media to Oromobazes, a Median born, but General of his army he made Hippostratus, who had 3500 foreign Foot souldiers under him. Himself taking with him the body of his army went to Ecbatane, where taking into his hands five thousand talents of massic silver, he marched into Persia, and it cost him 20 dayes journey before he arrived at Persepolis, the Capital City thereof, [lib.]

While Antigonus was upon his way thitherward, the friends of Pitho, and such as were his conforts in the plot which he was about, the chief whereof were Meleager, and Menoetas, with other well willers both of him and Eumenes, but were scattered abroad into corners, met together, to the number of 800 Horse, and fell first upon the lands and possessions of such of the Medes, as refused to joyn with them in this combination, and then set upon Herophilus, and Oromobazes his Camp by night, and missed very narrowly of the prize they came for: but being over-laid with the multitude of their men, and having only enticed some of the Medes to run with the same course with them, were faine to retire; yet some of the nimblest of them, (and the same course with them, were faine to retire; yet some of the nimblest of them, and raised many hubbubs among them; but were at last enclosed in a place compassed about with Rocks, like a pinfold, and were there partly slain, partly taken. But Meleager and Cranes, and the better sort of them, that would not yield, died like men, with their swords in their hands, [lib.]

So soon as Antigonus came into Persia, the people there did him all kingly reverence and honour, as to the man that was now, without controversy, sole Lord of all Asia; and there calling a Council of his Nobles together; he propounded to them the matter of the government of the severall provinces to be considered of: in which consultation, they left Carmania to Eupolemus, Bactria to Stasandrus, and Parapamitis to Oxyartes the father of Roxane, because they could not well be taken from them, to hold as they did before. Into Aria was sent Eutius, and he coming shortly after to die, Eutagoras was put in his room, a man of wonderful valour; and grave wilddom withal, [libid.]

Antigonus sent for Sibyrtius, a well willer of his, out of Arachosia, and confirmed him in his government of that province, and gave him a whole thousand of the most turbulent and seditious silver Targateers, which had betrayed Eumenes; these he appointed to him, under a colour of serving him in the war, but indeed of purpose to destroy them; for he gave Sibyrtius instructions withal to employ them in all break-neck services, till he had consumed them, that there might not a man of them ever return into Macedon, or see the Greek coast again, [Diodor. libid. with Plut. in Eumene and Polyanus, Strateg. lib. 4.]

Antigonus, finding that Pencestes was very much beloved in Persia, made it one of his first works to strip him of that government. And when all the natives there, repined at it, a certain chief man among them, called Thespias, spake openly against it, and said, That the Persians would be governed by no other man but Pencestes: whereupon he slew Thespias, and made Alcibiades Governor of Persia, and held on Pencestes with vain hopes, of preferring him to higher preferments elsewhere, until he had drawn him quite out of the Country, [Diodor. libid.]

Whiles Antigonus was upon his way to Susa, Xenophilus, who had the keeping of the Kings treasure there, being sent by Seleucus, went and met him at Palitigris, and offered him his service, in whatsoever he should be pleased to command him. Antigonus received him very graciously, and made as if he honoured him above all the friends he had; fearing least he might happily alter his mind, and keep him out when he came thither. But when he came into the Castle of Susa, he possessed himself of it, and there got the golden vine, and store of other suchlike rarities, to the value of 15 thousand talents, all which he turned into ready coin, besides Crowns of gold, and other presents, and spoils taken from the enemy, which amounted to five thousand talents more, besides a like quantity which he collected out of Media, so that in all he made 25 thousand talents, [Id. libid.]

Antigonus left for Governour of the province of Susa, one Aspisus, a native of the Country: but purposing to carry away all this money to the sea side in Asia, he caused carriages to be provided for that purpose, and so taking all along with him, he took his journey toward Babylon, [Diod. Olymp. 116. year 1.]

When at 22 dayes end he arrived at Babylon, there Seleucus, the governour of that province,

St

Province, received him with all royal presents, and feasted his whole army; but when he struck one of the Captains without acquainting Antigonus therewith. Antigonus would him to give an account of all the monies of the publique stock, which he had there received since his coming to the place: But Seleucus answered him that he was not bound to make an account for that which was given him by the Macedons, for the service which he had done to Alexander in his life time: and when grutchings grew daily between them, Seleucus, finding himself too weak for Antigonus, and fearing lest he might happily be sent packing out of the World, as Pitho, the Governor of Media, was, he fairly stole away with 50 horse only in his company, and betook himself to Ptolemei in Egypt; for now all the world talked of his dejection, and how propitious he was to all, who in their necessities fled unto him, [Id. Ibid. and Appian in his Syriae, p. 121.]

When Antigonus grew now very jolly, for that without being forced to draw blood of his old friend, and without stroke striking, he had quietly gotten into the possession of Babylon, the Chaldeans told him, that if he let Seleucus go, all Asia would be his; and himself should one day lose his life in a battle against him, he repented him that he had let him go, and sent men after him, to take and bring him back again; but they, having pursued him awhile, gave him off, and returned without him to Antigonus, [Diodorus, ibid.] And he thereupon turned Bithyres the Governor of Melopotamia out of his place, for suffering Seleucus to pass that way, [Appian, ib.]

Seleucus, having got safe into Egypt, was entertained by Ptolemei, with all expressions of love that might be: and having laid open the proceedings of Antigonus against himself, stirred up Ptolemei to engage in a war against him, [Diod. ib. with Pausanias in his Asiae, p. 5.]

Seleucus, from thence sent some of his trustie friends into Europe, to persuade Cassander, who then commanded all in Macedonia, and Lyfimachus, who did the like in Thracia; to make war upon Antigonus: and Antigonus, guessing what his intentions were, sent his Agents to Ptolemei, and Cassander and Lyfimachus, to entreat them all three, to continue their love and friendship to him as in former times, [Diod. ut sup.] But Seleucus had so wrought with them, that they all joyned together with him in a firme league, against him, [Appian, ut sup.]

Antigonus, having made Pitho, who came out of India, Governor of Babylon, marched forward toward Cilicia; and coming to Mallos, which is a city in Cilicia; there he distributed his army into their winter quarters, it being then the time when Orion rises, (i.e.) in our month of November: and he received in the city of Quindi of the same Province, 10000 talents: and 11000 talents more out of the yearly revenue there [Diodorus, ibid.]

And now Antigonus was removed into the upper Syria, when Embassadors came to him from Ptolemei, Cassander and Lyfimachus, who being brought into him as he sat in Council, made their demands according to their instructions, which were that he would deliver up all Cappadocia and Lycia to Cassander, Phrygia bordering upon Hellespont to Lyfimachus, all Syria to Ptolemei, and the Province of Babylon to Seleucus; and all the common stock of monies which he had encroached upon since the death of Eumenes, to be shared equally amongst them: whereunto he answered roughly, that he was now upon making a war against Ptolemei, and that his purpose was not to have any sharers therein with himself, either of peril or profit, [Diod. and Appian, ut sup. Justin, l. 15, c. 1.]

The Embassadors returning with this answer, Ptolemei, Cassander, and Lyfimachus, buckled themselves instantly to a war against him, by sea and land, [Id.] And Antigonus, perceiving what a storm was ready to fall upon him, sought the alliance and confederacie of other Cities and Nations, and Princes, for his assistance in this war: and to this purpose, he dispatch away Ageilaus to the King of Cyprus, Idomeneus and Molchion to Rhodes, and one Ptolemei, his own brothers son, into Cappadocia, with an army, Aristodemus into Laconia, with a thousand talents, to hire souldiers from thence, and disposed Becons and Curriers throughout all Asia, which was wholly at his command, thereby to give and get knowledge of all things that passed, in a moment.

Having taken this order, and being upon his march into Phenicia, there to provide him of a fleet, and encamping near to Tyrus, in Phenicia, he sent for the petty Kings and Governors of those parts, to come unto him; and when they came, dealt with them to joyn with him, in furnishing out a fleet, and in building of more ships, because all the ships that belonged to Phauicia, were at that time with Ptolemei in Egypt. He gave them order likewise, to bring him in, 450000 bushels of wheat (for to so much, came the yearly expence of his army) and then let men on work, to fell timber, and to build ships, and to draw the materials for them, from mount Lebanon to the sea side, employing therein 8000 men to work, and 1000 beasts for carriage, [Id.]

Whiles

Whiles Antigonus was thus employed, and had his Camp by the sea side, came Seleucus with an hundred ships royally furnished, and in a scornful manner, skirted along under the noles of them; which when it seemed not a little to trouble the minds of his new associates, Antigonus had them be of good cheer, laying, that ere the end of that Summer they should see him put to sea with a fleet of 500 sail, as good as those. Mean while returned Ageilaus with his Embassie out of Cyprus, and brought word that Nicocreon, and the most potent Kings of that Island had already confederated with Ptolemei, nevertheless, that Citicus and Laphicus and Marrus and Circenyes, would joyn with him: whereupon he left three thousand men under the command of Andronicus, to maintain the siege against Tyrus, and with the rest of the army marched against Gaza and Joppe, which stood out against him, and took them by force, and such of Ptolemeis men as he found there, he took and distributed them among his own companies, to serve him in his wars, and placed Garrisons in both places to keep them in obedience: which done, he returned to his standing Camp before Tyre, and prepared all necessaries for a siege against it, [Id.]

At the same time Aristo, who was entrusted to carry Craterus his bones, delivered them to Phila, the daughter of Antipater, who was married first to Craterus, and afterward to Demetrius; whose father Antigonus had perfwaded him to marry her, and when he shewed himself avers from the match, by reason of the inequality of years between them, the being by so much the elder of the two, he would always round him in the ear with that saying out of Eurypedes,

Ὅρα τοὺς γάμος ποῖον γαμνῶν, (i. e.)

In marriage look unto thy gain,

Though nature sometimes doth restrain.

Where he prettily put in γαμνῶν, (i.) to marry, instead of γαμνῶν, (i.) to serve, meaning that a man must do any thing to serve his own turn: but this Phila was a woman which was reputed to excell both in wit and wisdom, whereby the often repressed the tumultuous spirits of the most turbulent souldiers in the army, and preferred in marriage at her own cost, the sisters and daughters of the poorer sort among them, [Id. with Plut. in the Life of Demetrius.]

Aristodemus, being sent with other Captains into Laconia, and having there gotten leave of the Spartans, to raise souldiers there, got together eight thousand men out of Peloponnesus, and upon conference with Polyperchon, and his son Alexander, joyned them both in a firm league of amity with Antigonus, and made Polyperchon their General, and Polyperchon he there presently made Commander over the forces which he had raised in Peloponnesus, but prevailed with Alexander to passe over into Asia, to Antigonus, [Diod.]

Ptolemei, another of his Captains, going with an army into Cappadocia, and there finding the City Amisus besieged by Alcipodotus, a Captain of Cassanders, raised the siege, and secured the place: and so having sent Alcipodotus packing, upon certain conditions, recovered that whole province to Antigonus, and marching from thence thorough Bithynia, came upon the back of Zibytes, King of Bithynia, whiles he was buile in the siege of two cities at once, that of the Afflacians, and the other of the Chalcidians, and forced him to raise his siege from both, and then falling to captulations both with him and with the cities that were besieged, and having received hostages of them, removed thence toward Ionia and Lydia, for that Antigonus had written to him, to secure that coast, with all possible speed, having intelligence that Seleucus was going into those parts with his fleet, and thither indeed Seleucus was come, and besieged the City Erythræ: but hearing of the approach of Ptolemei, the nephew of Antigonus, left it, and went his way as he came, [Id.]

Mean while Alexander the son of Polyperchon came unto Antigonus; where, calling together the whole army, with the strangers that were in it, he opened to them what Cassander had done, protesting before them, that he would revenge the murder by him committed upon Olympias, and deliver Alexander his Kings son, with his mother Roxane, out of prison, in Amphipolis, and break off that yoke, which Cassander had laid upon all the Cities of Greece, by his putting his garrisons into them, and then sent back Alexander, Polyperchon's son, with five hundred talents more, into Peloponnesus, [Id. with Justin lib. 15. cap. 1.]

Then, having gotten a fleet from Rhodes, with other new built ships of his own, he set sail for Tyre: and having all the sea at his command, kept it so, as no supply of victual, or other necessaries, could come thither, whereby that city fell presently into great distress, [Diod.]

Ptolemei of Egypt, hearing what a declaration Antigonus with the Macedons had made concerning the deliverie of all Greeks from the thraldom of Cassander, made the like declaration for himself, as desirous that all the world should take notice, that he was a no less zealous for the liberty of all Grecians, than Antigonus was; and then joyned to his party, Cassander the Governour of Caria, who was a man of a great power, and had many great Cities under his command. And although he had formerly sent three thousand soldiers to the Kings of Cyprus, yet he now sent them so thousand more under the command of Myrmidon an Athenian born, and an hundred saile of ships, commanded by Polyclus: but Generall over all, he made his brother Menelaus, [Id.]

These coming into Cyprus, joyned there with Seleucus and his Fleet, and in a Council of War, advised together what course was fit to take. The result of all which deliberation was, That Polyclus with fifty sail should passe into Peloponnesus, and there make war upon Aristodemus, and Polypercon, and Alexander his son: That Myrmidon with an army of foreign nations, should go into Caria, there to help Cassander the Governour of that Province, against Ptolemei, a Captain of Antigonus, which lay heavy upon Cassander; and that Seleucus, and Menelaus, staying in Cyprus, should bear up Nicocreon the King, and the rest of their confederates against their enemies, which warred upon them. Having therefore thus divided their forces, Seleucus went and took Cerynia and Laphus; and having drawn over Statæus King of the Malenies to his party, he forced the Prince of the Amathusians to give him hostages for his fealty in time to come: as for the City Citium, seeing it would come to no agreement with him, he fell to besiege it with his whole army, [Id. ibid.]

About the same time, came 40 sail of ships, out of Helleipont and Rhodes, under the command of one Themison their Ammiral, to Antigonus: and after them, came Diofcorides, with 80 sail more; though Antigonus had already a Navy of his own, new built in Phœnicia, to the number of 120 ships, reckoning in those which he left at Tyre: so that he had in the whole, 240 ships of war, of which there were 90 of four tire of oares: 10 of five, 3 of nine, 10 of ten, and 130 open gallees. Then dividing this Navy, into parts, he sent 50 of them into Peloponnesus, and the rest he committed to Diofcorides, his own brothers son; with this charge, that he should keep the Seas, and help his friends as their occasions required; and that he should gain unto his party such of the Islands, as hitherto stood out against him, [Id. ibid.]

Polyclus, Seleucus his Lieutenant, sailing from Cyprus, came to Cenchrea, which was a Port of Corinth; where when he found that Alexander, Polypercon's son, had fallen off from Antigonus, to Cassander, so that he now found no enemy there to encounter, as he expected, he changed his course, and set sail for Pamphylia; and from thence, sailed to Aphrodisiades in Cilicia, and there understood, that Theodorus, a Captain of Antigonus's Navy, passed by from Patara, a Port of Lycia, with the Rhodian Fleet, furnished with Mariners out of Caria, and that Perilaus with a land army, coasted along by the shoar, for the defence of the Fleet, if need should be. In this case he used his wits, to save himself out of this brake; for he landed his men, and laid them close in a fitting place where the land army must needs passe: and himself with the Fleet went and lay behind a Foreland, near to the place, waiting for the coming of the enemy: and so it fell out, that Perilaus coming along, fell into the ambushment that was laid for him: where himself was taken prisoner, and of his men, some were slain, and the rest fell alive into their enemies hands. The Fleet at sea, seeing the land army engaged, halted to their relief: but then Polyclus, coming upon them in this confusion, with his Ships in good array, put them easily to flight: so it came to passe that Polyclus took all their ships, and the most part of the men in them: and among the rest, Theodorus himself their Ammiral, sorely martyred with wounds, of which he shortly after died, [Id. ibid.]

Polyclus, having sped so well on all hands, sailed back first to Cyprus, and after that to Pelusium in Egypt: where Ptolemei richly rewarded him for so great a service: and withall, promoted him to a far higher dignity and place of honour than he was in before; as the author of so great a victory: but released Perilaus, and some other of the prisoners, which Antigonus desired by a messenger sent to him for that purpose. And then himself going to a place called Ectregma, came to a parlie with Antigonus; but Antigonus refusing to grant him what he demanded, he left him, and returned, [Id. ibid.]

369. Cassander put over an army out of Macedonia into Caria, both to help the Cities there which had confederated with Ptolemei, and Seleucus, and also to find Antigonus work there, that he might have no leisure to come into Europe: and the Commanders of this army, Cassander the Governour of Caria, and Prepelas, hearing that Ptolemei, Antigonus his General in those parts, had laid up his army in their winter quarters, and that himself was now busie in the burying of his father, lately deceased, sent away Eupolemus, with 8000 Foot, and 3000 Horse, to a place called Caprima in Caria, to lie in ambushment for him there: but Ptolemei, getting notice thereof by some that fled over to him, got together out of the next quarters 8300 Foot, and some 600 Horse, and with them falling unlookt for into the enemies trenches, and finding them there all fast asleep, took Eupolemus prisoner, and forced all the rest to submit to his discretions, [Diodor. year 3 Olymp. 116.]

Antigonus, seeing that Cassander put in for the Sovereignty of Asia; left his son Demetrius in Syria, with instructions, to intercept Ptolemei's men, which he suspected were then coming with an army further up into Syria; and to that purpose, left with him 30 thousand Foot of other nations, and two thousand Macedons, 500 out of Lycia and Pamphylia; Persian archers and slingers 400, and moreover five thousand Horse, and upward of 40 Elephants, and four men for his counsellors, Nearchon, Pitcho, who came lately from Babylon, Andronicus, and Philippus; all men of mature age, and judgement, and such as had attended upon Alexander in all his wars: for Demetrius himself was but a young man, not passing the age of 22 years, [Id. ibid.]

Upon Antigonus himself, whilst with the rest of the army, he went to passe the Taurus, there fell a mighty grow, wherein he lost a multitude of his men: whereupon he returned back into Cilicia, where he advised himself of a better way to passe that mountain, and with less damage to his army; and so coming to Celenæ in Phrygia, he there bestowed his army into their winter quarters, [Id. ibid.]

Tyre, when it had stood out the siege one whole year and three months, at last surrendered to Antigonus upon articles, by which Ptolemei the King of Egypt's men, went away with their bag and baggage: and Andronicus was left to hold the place with a Garrison, [Id. year 2. Olymp. 116. and Olymp. 117. year 1.]

Medius, being sent for by Antigonus to come to him with his fleet, which he had in Phœnicia, upon his way met with the fleet of the City Pydna, and brought both it, and all the men in it, under his subjection, [Id. year 3. Olympiad. 116.]

Cassander, the Governour of Caria, being over-laid by the enemy, came to this agreement with Antigonus, that he should give up all his army to Antigonus, and suffer all the Greek Cities there to live after their own laws, and should hold the government which he there had, as by grant from Antigonus, and should carry himself as a friend to Antigonus in time to come, and for performance hereof, gave his own brother Agathon in pledge; yet shortly after, repenting him of his bargain, got his brother again out of their clutches, that had him in keeping, and sent his agents to Ptolemei and Seleucus, to come speedily and help him; when Antigonus took in such ill party, that he forthwith sent both by sea and land his forces, to set the Greek Cities at liberty; and to that purpose made Medius his General by land, and Docimus his high Ammiral by sea. These coming to Mileum, dealt with the inhabitants to stand for their liberty; set upon the Castle and took it, with the Garrison that was therein, and restored the City to her pristine liberty, [Id. year 4. Olympiad. 116.]

Mean while Antigonus took Tralles, and going before the walls of the City Caunus, and sending for his fleet, took that likewise, all save the Castle: and having cast a trench round about that also, he made continual assaults upon it, where there was any hope of entry. He had sent Ptolemei to the City Iassus, but he was faine to come back and joyn again with Antigonus; and so all these Cities came at that time into his subjection, [Id. ibid.]

369. The Cyrenians, falling off from Ptolemei, besieged the Castle there, so fiercely, as if they would presently have taken it: and when messengers came from Alexandria, persuading them to desist, they struck off their heads, and fell to work against the Castle harder than ever. Ptolemei, exceedingly moved herewith; sent thither one Agis, a Captain of his, with an army; and withall, a navie to assist him by sea, under the command of Epeneus. Agis pursuing the war against these rebels vigorously, took the City of Cyrene by strong hand, and committed the authors of this sedition to prison, and then sent them bound to Alexandria, and disarmed the rest: and so having left things in order there, as he saw cause, returned into Egypt, [Id. year 1. Olympiad. 117.]

Ptolemei, having had this good success at Cyrene, took shipping, and with his fleet passed over into the Isle of Cyprus, against those who rebelled there against their Kings; and having gotten Pygmalion, who traded with Antigonus, into his hands, put him to death: then took he Praxippus King of the Laphri, and Prince of Cerynnia, who was suspected of a revolt, and laid them fast: he took likewise Statæus, a petty King of the Malians, and destroying their City, removed the inhabitants from thence to Paphos: which done, he made Nicocreon Commander over all Cyprus; and gave him the Cities together with the revenues of all the Kings which he had cast out of their dominions, and then went with his army into the upper Syria, and sacked the Cities of Posideum and Potamos in Caria; and that done, he went with a flying army, and took Mallus in Cilicia, and sold away all the inhabitants thereof for slaves, and wasted all the region thereabouts: and having stored all his army with wealth, sailed back again to Cyprus, [Id. ibid.]

Mean

4407. 312.

Mean while, Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, kept in Cœlœsyrta, expecting the coming of the Egyptians: but hearing what work Ptolemei had made of so many Cities in Syria, he left Pithon to command in those parts, leaving his Cornelletes and Elephants with him, and he with his Horse, and companies of light armed souldiers, heightened him away in all speed toward Cilicia, to aide them which for want of help were distressed there: but coming too late, and finding the enemies all gone, he returned speedily to his Camp again, spoiling many of his Horse by the way; for in six days space, he marched from Malus, 24 dayes journey by their ordinary stages, so that thorough immoderate travel, none of the servants or Horse-boys were able to keep them company. [Id. lb.]

Ptolemus, seeing all go every where as he would have it, for that present, returned into Egypt; but not long after, being put on by Seleucus, for the hatred he bare to Antigonus, he resolved to march into Cœlœsyrta, and there to try it out with Demetrius; wherefore gathering all his army together, he marched from Alexandria to Pelusium, having with him 18000 foot, and 4000 horse, whereof some were Macedons, and some hired souldiers: the Egyptians, some served to carry their darts and weapons, and other luggage of the army, and some for souldiers, and having passed the desert from Pelusium, he encamped near the old city of Gaza in Syria, not far off from the enemy. And Demetrius on the other side, called all his army out of their winter quarters and appointed them their rendezvous at Gaza; there to attend the coming of the enemy. [Id. lb.]

In the 117 Olympiade, Ptolemei overthrew in a main battle near Gaza, Demetrius the son of Antigonus, surnamed afterward, Poliorcetes, (i. e.) the City-taker; as Castor, the Historiographer reporteth, cited by Josephus, [lb. 1. cont. Apion. p. 1048.] the particulars of which fight are related by Diodorus Siculus, in his history of that Olympiade, where he saith that there were taken prisoners of Demetrius his men, to the number of 8000 and upward of 500 slain; but that is to be amended, and made 5000 out of Plutarch. But among the Nobles that were there slain, one was Pithon, who was at that time joyned in commission with Demetrius, and Bocotus, a man who had long lived with Antigonus the father, and was ever privie to all his designs, and partaker of all his counsels.

Ptolemei and Seleucus took Gaza, but Demetrius, by the help of a good pair of spurs came to Azotus: about midnight following, having road 270 furlongs, and from thence sent to beg the bodies of his dead for burial: which Ptolemei and Seleucus not only at first word granted, but also sent him back his own pavillion, with all the furniture thereto belonging, free, and without ransom, adding therunto a generous message, that they fought not for pray, but for honour, and to see who should wear the Garland. [Diodorus, Ut. Sup. Plutarch, in Demetrio, and Justin, lib. 15. cap. 1.]

Demetrius, being no longer able to hold out, in the case he was in, dispatched away a messenger with his letters to his father, who lay then in Phrygia, to pray in aide of him, and to come away speedily to his help; and he himself coming to Tripoli in Phœnicia, sent for the souldiers that were in Cilicia, and elsewhere in Garrisons remote, and far distant from the enemies quarters, to come unto him, [Diodorus.]

But Antigonus, when he heard the news, said that Ptolemei had now gotten the victory, of a company of bearded boys; but that he should fight next time with men: yet that he might not quell the courage of his son, and because he to desired, he gave him leave to fight again with him himself, if he saw cause. [Plutarch, in Demetrio.]

Ptolemei sent the prisoners which he had taken into Egypt, there to be distributed, among the several regiments of his fleet: and when he had honourably enticed his own that were slain, he went forward, and set upon the Cities and strong places of Phœnicia, besieging some, and persuading others of them to yield unto him, and having taken Sidon, he went and encamped before Tyre, and sent to Andronicus, Captain of the Garrison, there to render up the City to him, tendering him large promises both of wealth and honour: but he not onely answered, that he would never betray the trust which Antigonus and his son Demetrius had put him in, but also used many reviling speeches against Ptolemei, but yet a little after, when surprised by a mutiny of his own souldiers, he fell into his hands, Ptolemei forgetting that by-past railing of his, highly rewarded him, and took him into the number of his friends, and honourably preferred him. [Id.]

Seleucus, taking with him 1000 Foot of Ptolemeis men, (as Appian hath it: for Diodorus saies but 800.) and 200 Horse, went with so small a train to recover his Government of the Province of Babylon; and coming with them into Mesopotamia, he there dealt with such Macedons as he found dwelling in Carran, and some of them by

by perswasions, some by plain force, he drew to go along with in this journey of his. Now no sooner had he set foot within the territory of Babylon, but the inhabitants came flocking to him, and offered him their service in the recovering of his right. Polyarcus also, who bare some kind of office among them, came unto him to receive his commands, with a full thousand of men completely armed. But they who stood for Antigonus, when they perceived the general, and irresistible inclination of the multitude toward him, fled all to the Castle, which was commanded by Diphilus, and Seleucus, fell presently to besiege it; and having taken it by force, he there delivered such children and friends of his, as Antigonus, when Seleucus for fear fled away into Egypt, had there committed to prison. This done, he then fell to raising of souldiers in the Country, and having bought Horics, distributed them, among those who were fit to ride them. And withal, carrying himself fairly and amiable unto all forts, made them all ready to run any hazard with him, and so in a trice recovered all his government of Babylon again. [Diod. with Appian, in his Syriae, pag. 121.]

But then Nicanor, whom Antigonus had made Governour of the province of Media, marched against him with 10 thousand Foot, and seven thousand Horse, and Seleucus made no tarrying, but went out to meet him, having with him in all little above three thousand Foot, and four hundred Horse, and passing the River Tigris, when he heard that the enemy was not far off, he hid his men in the fennes thereby, purposing to set upon Nicanor at unawares, and Nicanor, when he came to the bank of the Tigris, and found no enemy there; went and encamped near to a post-house of the Kings; little thinking the enemy had been so near. But the night following, when contemning his enemy, he cared not to keep a due watch, after a military manner, Seleucus fell upon him, and raised a great tumult in his army, for when the Persians put themselves forward to fight, Euager their General, with sundry others of their Commanders, happened to be slain: after which broile, the greater part of Nicanors army, what for the present danger they were in, what for the mislike they had of Antigonus his government, left him, and came to the service of Seleucus. Whereupon Nicanor, fearing left at the next hours, his souldiers would deliver him up to Seleucus, fairly stole away with some few of his friends, and fled thorough the desert home into Media again, [Diodorus.]

Seleucus, having by this means gotten a potent army about him, and continued his fair carriage to all men as before, easily procured the provinces of Media and Sula, and other countries bordering thereupon, to come under his subjection, and then sent Ptolemei word, how he had sped, having now gotten a full royal power and majesty into his hands, as [Diod. year 1. Olymp. 117.] declareth. From whence it is, that from this year, Eusebius deduceth Seleucus his principality or reign; and with all notes, that the Edesseni begin their Epoch, and the story of the Maccabees their account of the Grecian reign. And out of doubt from the Assumme of this very year, that is, from Septemb. or Octob. of the year 440a, according to the Julian Calendar, it is, that the composer of the second book of Maccabees reckons his Grecian years; & the Jews there, eram Contrañum, (i. e.) their account of Contracts, and those of Edessa, and other Syrians, their Epoch of the Seleucian race, and the Arabians, the years of Alexander Dehikarnain, as they term them, and yet the writer of the first book of Maccabees begins his account of the Grecian year, from the Spring precedent to this autumn, and Ptolemei of Alexandria, in his great Syntaxis begins his Chaldean account, from the Spring following.

Ptolemei of Egypt, staying still in Cœlœsyrta, sent one of his Nobles about him, called Gilles, a Macedon born, with a great army against Demetrius, who lay encamped in the upper Syria, willing him to fight with him, and to turn him quite out of all, that is called Syria, or to coup him up, and tread him to dirt, where he lay. Demetrius understanding by his spials, that Gilles with his army lay at Myus carelessly, without keeping watch or ward, leaving his carriages behind him, marched away with a company of light-footed lads, which travelled all night; and a little before day fell in upon Gilles his Camp, put all in a confusion, took it, and Gilles himself prisoner, and with him seven thousand souldiers, and a great booty besides: yet because he thought Ptolemei himself was coming after with all his army, he therefore pitch his Camp in a place where he had a bog on the one hand, and a great Lough on the other to secure him. [Diodorus, year 1. Olymp. 117. and Plut. in Demetrio.]

Demetrius sent news of this his good successe to his father Antigonus, where he lay at Celene in Phrygia, soliciting him by his letters, either to send an army speedily, or to come himself in person into Syria. Antigonus, having read the letter, was wonderfull joyfull at the news, both because the victory was gotten by his sons own conduct and ordering of matters in the fight, and also for that he had the sweetest himself a man worthy hereafter, to wear a Crown upon his head. [Diodorus.] But Demetrius, with his fathers leave, sent back Gilles and all his friends to Ptolemei again, thereby, not to lie any longer longer in his debt, and to cry quittance with him for his former kindness in that kind, [Plut.]

Antigonus with his army removed out of Phrygia, and having in few dayes passed the Taurus, came to his son Demetrius, and Ptolemy, by the advice of his Council, thought fit to leave Syria; but before he went, he laid waste and destroyed the principal Cities which he had there at that time in his possession; as Acon in Syrophenicia, and Joppa, and Samaria, and Gaza of Syria: and then taking along with him out of the country, whatever he could drive or carry, laden with wealth he returned into Egypt, [Diodor. year 1. Olymp. 117.]

A multitude of men there was, who seeing his good disposition, and clemency of nature, would needs along with him into Egypt; among whom there was one Ezechias ALEXANDRUS, (i. e.) a high Priest (perhaps a secondary one; for the chief High Priest at that time was Ousai the first) of the Jews: a man of about 66 years of age, and much respected among his people, very eloquent, and of much experience in the affairs of the world. This and much more of this Ezechias is related by Hecataeus the Historian (who conversed with him in Ptolemy's army) in a peculiar Treatise which he wrote, of the Jews: where he also maketh a large narration of another Jew, which he grew acquainted with, called Mosollamus, al. Mosollamus: as followeth.

When I went, saith he, toward the red Sea, there was one among the rest of a Troop of Horse of the Jews, which went to convoy us, called Mosollamus, a high-spirited man, and the best archer of all the company, who espied a certain wizard in the company which stood still, and desired all the company to do the like, while he observed a certain bird that flew, to divine thereby: and asked him the reason why he stayed: and when the wizard shewed him the bird which he had in his eye, and said withal, that if it were expedient for the company to stay there, that bird would stay where he was: but if the rase, and flew before them, then they should do well to go forward too: but if he flew back, then all the company ought also to returne. Then this Mosollamus said nothing, but drew his bow, and shot, and killed the bird, and when the wizard and others there present grew angry at it, and cried, because of him for so doing: Why are you so angry, quoth he? and why do you take this unwise bird into your hands? Could he that knew nothing of what was to befall her self, tell any thing of what would befall us in this our journey? for if she had had any knowledge of things to come, she would never have come hither, here to be shot to death by Mosollamus a Jew.

Many things besides there are, which [Josephus in his book, contra, Apion,] recites, out of the same book concerning the Jews. As namely, that at that time, there were to the number of 1500 Priests, which received tithes, and governed all things belonging to the common wealth: and Demetrius Phalarus, in his Epistle to Ptolemy Philadelphus, (found in Aristas his book of the 70 Interpreters, and in the same Josephus, lib. 12. Antiquit. cap. 2.) out of the same Author, yields the reason why no heathen Poet, or Historian, makes mention, either of those sacred books, or of those men who lived according to the rule delivered in them: to wit, for that they contain a sacred and a venerable rule, which was not to be taken into, or uttered by unallowed mouths.

Antigonus, when he had without stroke striking recovered all Syria, and Phoenicia, into his hands; took a journey into the country of the Arabians, called the Nabatheans: for, conceiving that they never much favoured his proceedings, he appointed one of his Nobles called Athenæus, with 4 thousand Foot, and 600 light-Horse, to fall in upon them, and to bring away what spoile he could get out of their Country. And now the time grew near when all bordering Nations used to come thither as to a common Mart, to sell off to them their commodities, and to buy from them the merchandise of their Country. To this Mart therefore the Nabatheans now went according as they were wont, leaving their wealth, and old men with their wives and children, upon the top of a rock: Athenæus, watching this opportunity, marched speedily to this rock, and having marched out of the Province of Edom, the length of 2200 furlongs, in three dayes and three nights space, late in the night, the Arabians knowing nothing of his coming, possessed himself of it. The soldiers which he there found, he partly put to the sword, and partly made prisoners of them, and such as were wounded, he there left behind him; and carried from thence the greatest part of their mirth and frankincense, with 500 talents of silver, and staying there not past three hours, for fear of the countries coming in upon him, returned presently again: and now, he with his soldiers having gone 200 furlongs, could go no further for very weariness, and therefore rested them there, keeping neither watch nor ward; as presuming that the country people could not reach thither in two or three dayes after, [Diodorus, year 1. Olympiade 117.]

The Arabians, being accertaind of what had fallen out, by those which had seen the army of the enemy: left the Mart, where they were met, and returned to the rock, and being there more fully informed by the wounded persons which were left, what way they

they were gone, incontinently followed after them: and because Athenæus his men kept no watch, and after their long journey lay weary and fast asleep, some of their prisoners stole away from them: from whom when their country men, whom they met, had learnt how the enemies Camp lay, they halted to the place, and coming upon them at three of the clock in the morning, fell into their trenches, to the number of 8 thousand of them, and cut the throats of some snoring in their cabins: others that made resistance, they slew: to make short, they utterly destroyed all their Foot, only 50 of their Horse got away, and they wounded too, for the most part; and to the Nabatheans, having recovered their goods again, returned to the Rock: and by a letter of theirs written to Antigonus in Syriac characters, complained of Athenæus, and his wrong doing, and excused themselves: to whom Antigonus wrote back again cunningly, telling them, that Athenæus was well enough served by them: blaming him for doing what he had done, and assuring them, that he had given him no such order, [Id. ibid.]

But Antigonus, having for a time made fair weather with these poor Nabatheans, shortly after, chole out all his army, 4 thousand Foot, light-armed, and the twelfth of foot that he could find, and to them added 4 thousand Horse, willing them to take in their knapsacks, as many dayes victuals as they could well carry, and such as needed no cooking; and assigning Demetrius, his son, to command them: he sent them away in the first of the night, with this charge, that he should by all means be revenged of them. He therefore travelled 3 dayes journey thorough the Desert, halting to fall upon them at unawares: but their scouts perceiving the first approach of the enemy toward their borders, made fires, and by them gave notice of their coming to the Country: whereupon they presently gat them to their Rock, to the top whereof there was but one way up, and that made by hand too; and there leaving their baggage, left withal, a sufficient guard to keep it; and the rest went and drove away their cattle, some to one place, some to another in the Desert. Demetrius, when he came to the Rock, and saw all the cattle driven away, presently went to besiege the Rock; but when they that were in it manfully defended it, and by the advantage of the place, had all the day long the better of it, Demetrius at last was fain to draw off: and seeing he could do no good upon them, made a peace with them, upon hostages given him, and such gifts as were agreed upon between them, and to removing with his army 200 furlongs thence, encamped near to the Lake Alpharais, or Dead Sea, [Id. ibid.] but Plutarch saies, that he went thence, with a huge booty, and 7 hundred Camels.

Antigonus at his return to him, having heard the relation of his voyage, blamed him for his making a peace with the Nabatheans: saying, that those barbarous people, having escaped, would thereupon grow more insolent than before: yet commended him for discovering the Lake Alpharais, seeing that from thence he might raise some yearly revenue to himself: and made Hieronymus Cardianus the Historian, his Treasurer for that revenue; whom [Josephus, lib. 12. contra, Apion.] noteth to have been made President of Syria by Antigonus: and very deservedly blameth him, for that in his History he maketh no mention of the Jews, considering that he lived near unto, and almost among them; this Hieronymus was commanded to build ships, and to gather together in one place all the bitumen, or liquid brimstone that could be gotten out of that Lake: But the Arabians coming together to the number of 6 thousand men, set upon them as they were in their ships gathering this brimstone, and shot them almost all to death with their arrows; whereby Antigonus lost all hope of making any standing revenue that way, [Diod.]

Antigonus, understanding by letters from Nicanor the Governour of Media, and others, how Seleucus prospered in those parts, sent his son Demetrius with 5 thousand Macedon Foot, and 10 thousand mercenaries, and 4 thousand Horse; with charge, that he should march to the very walls of Babylon: and having recovered that Province, should from thence march down to the Sea: and he, parting from Damascus in Syria, went vigorously on to fulfil his fathers commands. But Patrocles, whom Seleucus had left President of Babylon, so soon as he heard that Demetrius was falling into Mesopotamia, not daring to stay his coming, because he had but a small power about him; commanded the rest to leave the City, and that passing the Euphrates, they should flee, some into the Desert, others over the Tigris, into the Province of Susa, and to the Persian sea: and himself with a company which he had about him, rushing in the bars of the Rivers, and dikes of the Country thereabouts, instead of so many Fortresses and Bulwarks for his defence, kept himself still within the bounds of his own government, and cast about, how to entrap his enemy; sending ever and anon tidings to Seleucus in Media how things went with him, and desiring aid to be speedily sent unto him, [Id.]

Demetrius, when he came to Babylon, and found the City it self void of inhabitants, fell presently to besiege the Forts and Castles that were therein: and having taken one of them, gave the spoile thereof to the soldier; and turning out Seleucus his men, put therein therein a Garrison of his own, consisting of seven thousand souldiers; but not being able to take the other, in half, after some few days siege, departed, leaving Archelaus, one of his trusty friends, to maintain the siege about it, with five thousand Foot, and 1000 Horse: and himself (seeing the time run out, which his father had appointed him, to finish his work in, bad his souldiers rap and read what ever they could light on in all that province, and take it to themselves: and then took his journey back into Asia; whereby, he left Seleucus more grounded, and better settled in his government than before. For why, said men, should Demetrius wait and spoil the Country, if he took it for his own? [Id. with Plut. in Demetrius.] Whereupon the Chaldeans reckon the Epocha, or beginning of the Seleucian reign in Babylon, from this time; rather than from the former.

Demetrius returning into Asia, quickly raised the siege, which Ptolemy had laid to Halicarnassus, [Plut. in Demetrius.]

And now Cassander, Ptolemy and Lyfimachus, made peace with Antigonus, upon such articles, as follow, to wit, That Cassander should command all in Europe, untill Alexander the son of Roxane, came to age. That Lyfimachus should hold Thrace; and Ptolemy Egypt, with the bordering Countries of Lybia and Arabia: And Antigonus should have the command of all Asia to himself: but this compact between them held not long, for every one took one occasion or other, to encroach upon more than his part came to, [Diod. year 2. Olymp. 117.]

Cassander, seeing Alexander the son of Roxane to grow up, and hearing a bruit cast abroad among the Macedons, that it was high time, that the young King should now be freed from his prison, and take the rule of the kingdom into his own hands, took a flight heretofore, and gave order to Glaucia the keeper, to murder Roxane, and the King her son, and burying their carcases, in some secret place, should by all means possible conceal their deaths. [Id. ib.]

Parysades the King of Bosphorus Cimerius dying, after that he had reigned 38 years, left his kingdom to his eldest son Satyrus, which he held nine years onely, [Id. year 3. Olymp. 117.]

In Peloponnesus, Ptolemy a Captain of Antigonus, falling off from him to Cassanders side, sent souldiers to a most trusty friend of his, called Phenix, and one to whom he had committed the managing of the government of Hellespont; advising him withal to man his Forts and Cities, and to stand upon his guard; and no longer to be at Antigonus his command, [Diod. year 2. Olymp. 117.]

On the other side, Ptolemy of Egypt cried out upon Antigonus, for that he, contrary to agreement, had put Garrisons of his own, into sundry Cities of the Greeks in Asia side: and thereupon sent Leonides, a Captain of his own, into Cilicia Aspera, and there possessed himself of certain Cities and places belonging to Antigonus; and moreover sent his agent to some Cities appertaining to Cassander and Lyfimachus, that they would follow his advice, and not suffer Antigonus, to grow too fast in power. [Id. ibid.]

Antigonus sent his younger son Philippus, to make war upon Phenix, and others who had revolted from him in Hellespont, but his son Demetrius, he sent into Cilicia against Ptolemy of Egypt, who going in hand with the errand he was sent in, routed the Captains of Ptolemy, that there were, and recovered the Cities which he had taken. [Ibid.]

Polypercon in Peloponnesus cried out in like manner upon Cassander, and affecting the government of Macedon, sent for Hercules, a son of Alexander the Great, begotten upon Barine, and now of the age of 17 years; and sent about to those, who were enemies to Cassander, to help to let this young man in his fathers kingdom, [Id.]

Ptolemy of Egypt, having all Cyprus under his command, and finding that Nicocles the King of Paphos, negotiated under hand with Antigonus, sent two confidants of his own, Argaeus and Callicrates, with instructions, to make away Nicocles; wherefore passing into Cyprus, and taking with them a certain number of souldiers from Menelaus, who commanded the army there: they beset the house of Nicocles, and then telling him, what Ptolemy's pleasure was, advised him, to dispose of himself for another world. And he at first went to clear himself of what was laid to his charge, but when he saw that no man hearkened to what he said, drew his sword and slew himself. Axiothea his wife, hearing of her husbands death, took her daughters, who were all young, and virgins, and slew them, and was earnest with the wives of Nicocles his brothers, to accompany her in her own death. Whereas yet Ptolemy had given no order concerning any of them, save only to preserve them. The brothers also of Nicocles, thus every man his own doom upon him, and set fire thereon, and slew themselves, and to the whole race of the Kings of Paphos, came to a tragick and lamentable end. [Diod. ib. and Polyæ. Strateg. lib. 8.]

Agathocles King of Sicilia, failing about this time into Aric, there to make war upon the Carthaginians, there fell to great an Eclipse of the Sun, that the Stars appeared every where in the firmament, and the day was turned into night, [Diod. year 3. Olympiads. 117. Justin. lib. 22. cap. 6.] which dreadful Eclipse of the Sun, the Astro-nomical tables shew to have fallen upon the 15 day of our August, 111 this year. Epicurus, being now 32 years of age, read publicly both in Mitylene and Lampsacus five years together, [Diog. Laertius, in the Life of Epicurus.]

In Bosphorus Cimerius, Eumelus, younger brother to Satyrus, compacting with some of the natives adjoining, laid claim to the kingdom against his elder brother, whereof Satyrus being informed, went against him with a great army, and passing the river Thapfus, when he came near his quarters, fortified his Camp, with his Carrs and Waggon, wherein he had brought an infinite quantity of provisions: and ranging afterward his army in the field. Himself, as the manner of the Scythian Kings was, led the main battle, in his Army, he had not above two thousand Greeks, al. one thousand; and as many Thracians, all the rest were Scythians, which came to assist him, to the number of 30 thousand, and no less than ten thousand Horse. Eumelus was borne up, by Ariophanes King of Thracia, with 2000 Horse, and 2000 Foot, Satyrus encountered first with Ariophanes, in a skirmish of Horse, and routed him; and then overthrew his brother Eumelus with his Foot, and forced all to retreat into the Kings palace, which was environed with a river, and steep rocks, and thick woods about, [Diod.]

Satyrus at first went and wasted the enemies Country, and set fire on their villages, and drew from thence a huge spoil, and then making away thorough their ten country, came to their wooden Castles, and took them, and crossing a river, felled a vast wood, thorough which he must needs pass, that would come to the Kings palace, in which work the whole army, spent three days, and so came to the walls of the Castle. There Meniscus, who led the mercenary companies, having gotten in at a passage, though he fought very manfully, was nevertheless, being overland with the multitude within, forced to retreat: and Satyrus coming to his relief, was wounded in the arm with a spear; which was so fore, that it forced him to retire to his Camp, and the next night, died thereof. And Meniscus breaking up the siege, drew off the army, to a City called Gargaza, and from thence carried the Kings body down the river, to a City called Panticapæum to his brother Prytanis: who having magnificently buried it, and laid up the reliques, in the Kings Sepulchre, went presently to Gargaza, and there took into his hands the army, and the kingdom withal. [Ibid.]

Then came the Agents of Eumelus to him, to treat concerning a partage of the kingdom between them two; which he would not hearken to: wherefore leaving a strong Garrison at Gargaza, he returned to Panticapæum, there to settle the affairs of his kingdom. But a while after, Eumelus, by the help of some Barbarians, possessed himself of Gargaza, and of sundry other Towns and Castles: and after that, overthrew Prytanis in a battle, and having shut him up in a neck of land, near the lough of Mæotis, forced him to render himself upon condition, which were, to give up all his army, and to depart the kingdom. Nevertheless, when Prytanis returned to Panticapæum, which is the place where the Kings of Bosphorus keep their standing Court, he there endeavoured again to have recovered his kingdom: but being slain there again, he fled to a place there called the Gardens, and was there found, and his brother Eumelus reigned in his stead, five years and five monthes, [Ibid.]

Eumelus, to establish his kingdom, put to death all the friends, and wives and children, of both his brothers, Satyrus and Prytanis, onely Parysades, Satyrus his son, being but a very youth, escaped his hands: for, by the benefit of a swift Horse, he got away to Agarus King of the Scythians. But when Eumelus law that the people repined at the losse of their friends which he had murdered, he called them all together, and there excused himself, and restored to them their ancient form of government; and restored moreover to the Citizens of Panticapæum, their former immunities, and promised to discharge them of all kind of tributes, (sparing for no fair words, which might reconcile the hearts of the people to him: whereby having gotten all their good will again, he held a just and moderate hand over them, and grew afterward into no small admiration for all kind of virtue among them, [Ibid.]

Ptolemy of Egypt, hearing that he had lost all again in Cilicia, put over with his fleet to Phaelis, and took that City by force; and from thence passing into Lycia, took Xanthus by assault, and the Garrison of Antigonus that was therein; then sailing to Caunus, took the City upon surrender, and then set upon the ciadels and forts that were in it, and to it them by assault, as for Heracleum, he utterly destroyed it, and the City Pericum came into his hands by the surrender of the souldiers that were there put to keep it, [Diod. year 4. Olymp. 117.]

Then failing to Coos, he sent for Captain Ptolemei to come unto him: that fame was Antigonus his brothers son, as was said before; and had an army committed to him by Antigonus: but now forsaking his Uncle, he came to Ptolemei, in all his ways, Putting there one from Chalcis, and arriving at Coos, Ptolemei at first received him in all courteous manner: yet after a while, when he saw the insolency of his carriage, and how he went to allure the officers by gifts, and secret meetings with them, fearing the worst, he clapt him up in prison, and there poisoned him with a draught of hemlock: as for the soldiers that came with him, he made them his own by large promises which he used towards them, and distributed them by small parcels among the rest of his army. [Id. ibid.]

Callander, fearing lest the Macedonians would fall out to Hercules, the son of Alexander the Great, who was then fourteen (as Justin, or rather Eusebius, as Diodorus hath it) years of age, struck in with Polypercos, and by his means procured both him and his mother Barine to be privily murdered, and their bodies to be hid deep enough in the ground, lest by their solemn Funerals the truth might happily come to light. And how that Alexanders two sons were both rid out of the way, and dead, and no fear of his body left to succeed him, every Governour made himself a King of the Province which he held, not more, nor lesse, than if he had won it by the sword, and right of war. [Id. ibid. and Justin, lib. 15. cap. 2.]

3696. Ptolemei, failing from Myndus along the Islands which lay in his way, came to Andros, and putting out the Garrison that there was; restored it to her former liberty; [Diodorus, Olymp. 118. year 1.]

Cleopatra, the Daughter of Philip, and Sister to Alexander the Great, being incensed against Antigonus, of her own accord, inclined to Ptolemei and left Sardes, to go unto him: but the Governour there, to whom Antigonus had given in charge not to hurt her, for notwithstanding her going, and afterward by his command, and the help of some of her women about her, privily got her to be murdered: But Antigonus, who would no way be thought guilty of her death, put some of those women to death for having a hand in her murder: and buried her with all the magnificence that might be. [Id. ibid.]

Ophellias, who had thrust out Timbro, and reduced the Cyrenians under the obedience of Ptolemei, challenged now, Cyrene itself, with the Cities and Regions thereunto adjoining, as his own: and not therewith content, began to look after greater matters, and to have higher projects in his braines: and whilst he was casting these imaginations in his mind, one Otho of Syracuse, came to him in a message from Agathocles, soliciting him to join in armes with him against the Carthaginians; telling him therein, that if he subdued them, he would make him Sovereign of all Afric. This therefore coming in the way, so heightened him in his former hopes, that he readily hearkened to him, and sent his Agent to Athens, from whence he had married his wife Eucride, the Daughter of Miltiades, to pray their aid and affection in this war. [Id. ibid.]

3697. Many there were of the Athenians, and other Grecians, which willingly hearkened to this motion, hoping thereby to have the sharing of the richest pletes of all Afric, with all the wealth of Carthage amongst themselves. And now Ophellias, being fully provided of all necessaries for such a voyage, drew out his army, consisting of 18 thousand Foot, and six or seven hundred Horses, and one hundred Chariots, with above 300 murtherers, and soldiers to manage them: besides extraordinaries and followers of the Camp, to the number of 10 thousand more; many of which, drew their wives and children with their stuff and baggage along with them: so that they looked more like a Colony going to be planted, than an army marching against an enemy. Having therefore marched 18 dayes journey, and in them gone 3 thousand furlongs, they came to a City called Autokimilis, in the westerne border of Cyrenaica; and there they encamped, and rested themselves: then removing again, they travelled thorough a dry and thirly Country, and full of noisome Serpents, and came at last, after two months miserable travel, with much adoe, to Agathocles his Camp, where they pitch their Camps at a small distance each from the other. [Id. ibid.]

Agathocles, hearing of his approach, went to meet him, and advised him by all means to have a care of his army after so tedious and hard a journey, and to see them well refreshed, and having often supped together, at last Ophellias adopted Agathocles for his son: but he, when upon a time the greater part of Ophellias his army was gone a foraging into the Country, suddenly called an assembly of his own army, and before them accused Ophellias, for that being called for an assistant in this war, he went about to betray him: and having incensed the multitude, drew out his whole army in battalions against him and his Cyrenians: Ophellias growing amazed at this unexpected alteration, put nevertheless himself, and the men he had with him into a posture of defence; but the enemy being too quick for him, and he too weak for them, he was there there slain upon the place; and Agathocles, when he was dead, perfwaded the rest that were left, to lay down their arms, and then telling them what great things he had done for them, perfwaded them to take his pay, and to send back of Ophellias, and got all his army to himself: but such of them as he found not fit and serviceable for the war, those he sent away to Syracuse, of which few yet arrived there, being for the most part cast away in a fierce tempest, as he fell upon them as he lay. [Id. lib. with Justin, lib. 21. cap. 2.]

After Ophellias his death, Cyrene and all Libya returned to Ptolemeis obedience again. [Suid. in Cephalus.]

3698. Demetrius Poliorcetes, or as Pliny renders it, Expugnator Urbium, (i. e.) the City taker, being furnished with two strong armies, one by land, and another by sea, and provided of weapons, and all other necessaries for the war, set forth from Ephesus; to recover the Grecian Cities at liberty. [Diod. year 2. Olympiade 118.] and carrying with him five thousand talents of silver, came to Pyreneus, the port of Andros, with 350 Galleys of ships, upon the 26 day of Thargelion, (A. C.) about the 31 day of our May, as Plutarch in the Life of Demetrius, saith. And having been received into Athens, took the City of Megara; and because Callander had put a Garrison into Munichium, which was the Fort or Castle of Athens, under the command of one Dionysius, therefore he raised it to the ground.

In the year when Anaxicrates was L. Chancellor in Athens, as among others, Philochorus hath it, who lived at this very time, in his Attic History, [Lib. 8. cited by Dionysius Halicarnassus, in his Dinarchus] reporteth, as wit, toward the end of his Chancelorship, and within [year 2. Olymp. 118.]

When Eucride, the relict of Ophellias, or Ophellias, Prince of Cyrene, who was slain the year before returned to Athens, Demetrius the son of Antigonus married her; which marriage, the Athenians took as a great honour done to them: and thereupon they began, and were the first that honoured Demetrius and Antigonus, with the title of Kings; who otherwise refused that title, as the only mark of regality, which hitherto remained entire and untouched to the stock and lineage of Philip and Alexander his son. [Plut. in Demetrius.]

Demetrius, being re-called out of Greece by his father Antigonus, to make war upon the Captains of Ptolemei, in the Isle of Cyprus, put over first into Caria, and from thence went into Cilicia, and furnishing himself there with shipping and men, sailed thence into Cyprus, with 15 thousand Foot, and four hundred Horses, and a fleet consisting of 110 ships, of three tire of Oares a piece, of singular swiftnesse, and 53 not so swift, as the other, yet men of war, as the other were, besides ships of burden of all sorts answerable to so great a multitude of Men and Horses, as were in them to be waited over.

Being landed, he first encamped near the shoar, not far from Carpassia, and drawing up his ships to land, fenced them there with a deep trench, and ramparts, and then went, and by force took Uraania and Carpassia, and leaving a sufficient guard to defend his trenches about the fleet, marched forthwith to Salamis. [Diodor. year 2. Olympiade 118.]

Meneclaus, the brother of Ptolemei, and chief Commander of the Isle, being then in Salamis, and seeing the enemy, within 40 furlongs of the City, drew out of the Garrisons adjoining, to the number of 12000 Foot, and 800 Horses, and went to meet him: but not able to endure the impetion of the enemy, fled, and Demetrius following him hard at heels, so the very gates of the city, took to the number of three thousand of his men, and slew one thousand more upon the place: the prisoners he distributed among his own companies to serve him: but finding that they were ever ready to fly over again to Meneclaus, because their wealth was in Ptolemeis hands in Egypt, he shipped them all away to Antigonus his father. [Id. ibid.]

Antigonus at that time was building a City in the upper Syria upon the river Orontes, called after his own name, Antigonia, laying out great sums of money upon it, and taking in within the walls 70 furlongs of ground: for the place it self was very opportune, to lie as a yoke, both upon Babylon, and the upper provinces, and also upon the nether, as far down as Egypt. [Id. ibid.]

Meneclaus, flying back to Salamis, resolved there to endure a siege, and dispatch away a messenger to Ptolemei, for more help, telling him what danger he was in. And Demetrius fell quietly to work, drawing his Engines of battery, so take it by force: among others he had one special Engine, which he called Helepolis, (i. e.) one that would not fail him in taking any City, which it was sent against, besides sundry other great rams and galleries for them. But they within, in the night threw three fire-works upon them, and consumed the principal of them, with the greatest part of the men that kept them: yet Demetrius would not off, but pressing the siege both by sea and land, thought at time he should not fail but have it. [Id. ibid.]

Ptolemei

4408. 306.

Antigonus, gathering together his ships which came, though late, to him; went to a place called Pseudostomon, thinking there to have landed some of his men: but found a strong Garrison of the enemy there, and was beaten off from thence with bows and slings, and other Engines of war; and therefore the night drawing on, he went his way, giving order to the masters of every ship to follow the lantern of the Ammiral, and to come to the mouth of the river Nile, which is called Phageticum, but the next morning, finding that a many of his ships had lost their way, and were gone he knew not whither, he was fain to come to anchor there right, and to send away the swiftest ship he had, all the sea over, to look out, and bring in the rest unto him. Mean while, time ran on, and Ptolemei, being advertised of the approach of the enemy, went forth with to the relief of his men, and ranged his army all along the shoar, in the enemies fight. Then Demetrius, finding no possibility of landing here neither; and being informed, that if he should land, yet the Country adjoining was naturally fenced and fortified with fens, and moorish grounds, set sail, and returned, [Ibid.]

But, as he was going, the wind struck up to the North, and with a mighty tempest, drove three of his ship, of four tire of oares, and some others of his men of war, upon the shoar, all which came into Ptolemeis hand; the rest, with much ado, recovered Antigonus his Camp. Now Ptolemei had placed strong Garrisons, at every one of the mouths of the river Nile, and had an infinite number of river boats every where ready, and stored with darts and slings, and men which knew right well how to use them, which troubled Antigonus very sorely, for the mouth of the river at Pelusium, being strongly guarded by Ptolemei, he could make no use of his ships at all: and for his land forces, the river Nile, which beginneth always at the coming of the sun into Cancer to swell, but at his entering into Leo, overfloweth all his banks, was now grown to that height, that they could do little, and, which was worse, with his long lying both food for men, and fodder for cattle, began to fail, [ib.]

Wherefore Antigonus, seeing his army to hang the head, called them all together, and before them all, propounded it to the Captains, whether of the two were best, to stay and fight it out now, or to return into Syria for the present; and to return again better provided the next year, and when the waters should be lower. And when every mans voice was to be gone; he had his soldiers truss up their trinkets, and his Navy keeping still along the shoar by them, he returned into Syria, [Ibid.] Which fruitless issue of this journey, Medius one of his Nobles, is said to have fore-seen in a dream: for it seemed to him, that he saw Antigonus with all his army to contend in a race at Olympus, called Dianalus, (i. e.) a double course, wherein at the first setting out, they seemed to run exceeding well, but after a while, to grow somewhat wearish: and when they came to the race-post, and were to turn about it, and return to the barriers whence they set out, (for that was the manner of this double course) they grew for out of breath, that they could go no further, [Plut. in Demet.]

Ptolemei, growing glad at heart, that the enemy was thus gone, offered sacrifice to his gods, for this great benefit bestowed upon him; and made withall, a magnificent feast for his Nobles: and wrote away letters to Seleucus, Lyfimachus and Cassander, of his prosperous success; not forgetting to tell them what a company of Antigonus his men, had fled over to him. And now having refused, as it were, Egypt, a second time, and gotten it by his sword; he thought he might lawfully reckon it his own, and returned in triumph to Alexandria, [Diodor.] Wherein it is that Cl. Ptolemeus, in his Reg. Cano. counts the beginning of his reign over Egypt, from this time, reckoning from the death of Alexander the Great to this time, full 19 years: for the 19 year from the death of Alexander the Great ends just, according to his account, with the sixth day of this present November, which we are now upon, of the year 4409, according to the Julian account.

Whiles these things thus passed in Egypt, Dionysius the Tyrant of Heraclea in Pontus, (as Diodorus writes) dyed; having then reigned 33 years, as Athenius lib. 12, cap. 26. recordeth: though Memnon saith, that he reigned but 30, and Diodorus but 32 years: of whole incredible fardels, besides Memnon, Nymphis, Heracleotes, in his book of the City Heraclea, cited by Athenus in the place aforesaid, maketh mention: and to doth Elia Var. Histor. lib. 9, cap. 13. To him were born two sons by Amastri, al. Amestris, the daughter of Oxethras, brother to Darius the last of Persia, which was at first given in marriage to Craterus, by Alexander: the eldest of these sons was called Clearchus, the younger Oxathras; and by Diodor. Zathras: Dionysius, therefore by his last will, left the government of his kingdom, and charge of his two children, who were yet very young, to his wife, joining some other in commission with her, [Memnon in Excerpt. Photii, cap. 5, with Diodorus, year. 3, Olympiade 118, and 119, year 3.]

Menedemus going from Patara in Lycia, Commander of three ships, each of them between two and three tire of oares apiece, took a ship of four tire of oares, coming out of Cilicia, wherein were found letters from Phila, together with rich and royal apparel, and other furniture most curiously and costly wrought, sent to Demetrius Poliorcetes: all which Menedemus sent to Ptolemei in Egypt. This affront envenomed Demetrius against the Rhodians, as he then lay in siege before their City to take it: yet after a years time spent about it, by the mediation of the Athenians, they came to this agreement, That the Rhodians should assist Antigonus and Demetrius, in their wars against any, save only Ptolemei: and to the siege brake up, [Diod. Olymp. 119, year 1, and Plut. in Demet.]

The Rhodians, so soon as the war was ended, sent some of their Priests to consult the Oracle of Ammon, whether they should worship Ptolemei as a god or no; and being answered, yes, they presently consecrated to him a four-square Grove in their City; building on every side thereof, a gallery of a furlong in length, and called it Ptolemeum, or Ptolemeis gallery: and then was also the surname or title of Sarapis (i. e.) Saviour, first given him by them: to wit, for that he had saved them from the force and violence of Antigonus and Demetrius, and not by the soldiers, for, his saving of Alexander in the City of the Oxydracans, (of which before) as some have imagined, [Arria, lib. 6, pag. 131. and Steph. in the word Oxydras, Diodorus, ut supra.]

Eumelus, the King of Bosphorus Cimmerius, having now reigned there 6 years, came to his end by a mischance: for, making haste homeward out of Scythia to a certain solemn sacrifice that was then to be offered, and was in a Coach running upon four wheels, and drawn with four horses, and covered over with a Canopie, coming to his Palace, the horses took a fright, and ran away with him: and when the coach-man could not hold them, Eumelus for fear lest they would run down some precipice or other, leapt out of the Coach; but his sword hanging in the wheels, he was whirled away with it, and so killed; after whom, succeeded Spartacus his son, who reigned 20 years, [Id, year 3, Olymp. 117, and year 1, Olymp. 119.]

Seleucus, crossing the River Indus, made war upon Sandrocottus, al. Androcottus; for that he, at the same time when Seleucus laid the foundation of his greatness in the East, had murdered all the Governours, which Alexander had set there, and took all India into his own possession, [Justin, lib. 15, cap. 4, Appian, in his Syriacae, page 122, 123.]

Now as he was going to make this war, a wild Elephant of a vast bignesse came to him upon the way, and as if he had been tame, and brought up to it, suffered him to get up, and proved a prime and singular Elephant for the war, [Justin, ibid.] Whereupon, traversing all India over, with 600 thousand men, brought it entirely into his own subjection, [Plut. in Alexan.] and then making himself King over them, freed them from a yoke of strangers, to bring them under another of his own, [Justin, ut sup.]

Megasthenes, in his Indica, writes, that he oftentimes repaired to him, whiles he remained with Sibyrtyus Governour of the Arachotians; as [Arria, lib. 5, cites him] and withal saies, that he had seen in his army 400 thousand soldiers, [Strabo, lib. 16, page 709.]

Cassander, King of Macedon, sending his Ambassadors to Antigonus, desired him to make a peace with him. But when he would not, unless Cassander would absolutely stand to his mercy: then, upon conference with Lyfimachus King of Thrace, they both agreed to send their Ambassadors to Ptolemei, King of Egypt, and to Seleucus, King of the upper Provinces of Asia, crying out upon the pride and turquetry of Antigonus, expressed in his answers, and remonstrating to them, how far this war concerned them both, [Diodor, year 3, Olymp. 119.] Wherefore perceiving that Antigonus his purpose was to take them to task one after another, whiles they never cared to make it a common cause; they heartened each other by their misfives first, and then appointed a place where all were to meet; and resolved to contribute their several stocks to the maintenance of this war: but because Cassander himself could not be there, by reason he had an enemy so nigh at hand, therefore he sent Lyfimachus, with all the power which he was able to make, and infinite provisions for them, [Justin, lib. 15, cap. 2.]

Seleucus, having made affinity with Sandrocottus, King of India, gave him all those Regions lying upon the bank of Indus, which Alexander had taken from the Arians, and made them Colonies of his own, letting Governours over them, and received of him for a present 500 Elephants, [Sira, lib. 15, pag. 724, Plut. in Alex. and Appian, in Syria, pag. 123.] And to having made all peace in the East, prepared himself for the war against Antigonus, with his consorts, according to agreement in the West, [Justin, lib. 15, cap. 4.]

Lyfimachus, putting over into Asia side with his own army, came before Lampacus and Paros, and because they submitted readily to him, he restored them to their ancient liberty; but having taken Sigzeum by force, he put into it a strong Garrison of his own own, and then committing six thousand Foot, and 1000 Horse, to the charge of Prepelus, sent him to take in the Cities of Ionia and Eolia; and himself went before Abydos, carrying all manner of Engines of battery, and other necessaries with him. Nevertheless, when an army sent from Demetrius for the defence of that place arrived, he gave off that siege; and having taken in Hellepont and Phrygia, he went on and besieged the City Synada, where the king Antigonus his Magazin lay, and the same time drove over Docimus, a Commander of Antigonus his party, to stand for the common cause, and by his help, took both Synada and other Forts and places belonging to Antigonus; and where his treasures were laid up. [Diodorus, year 3. Olympiade 119.]

Mean while, Prepelus, who was sent to make war upon Ionia and Eolia, by the way, took Adramitium, and besieged Ephesus, and so terrified the inhabitants, that they submitted to him; and finding there the hostages which the Rhodians had given, he sent them all home again to their friends: nor did he any hurt at all to the Ephesians themselves in their persons; only set on fire all the ships which he found in their harbour; because the enemy commanded, as yet, all at sea: and for that, the issue of the war was hitherto uncertain: after this he joynted to him, and the common cause, the Teians, and Colophonians; but as for Erythræ, and Clazomenæ, they had succor sent in to them by sea; and therefore he could not take them: but having wasted their territories, he departed, and went for Sardis, and there he drew over by fair words, two of Antigonus his Captains, Phœnix and Docimus; and took the City itself, all save the Castle, into his protection; as for the Castle, Philippus, a friend of Antigonus, kept it, and would not betray the trust which he had reposed in him. [Ibid.]

3703. Antigonus was at that time, wholly taken up in making sports and feasts, at his new City of Antigonía; and had proclaimed great prizes for such as would put in for them, and huge wages to all cunning artificers, that could be gotten. But when he heard how Lyfimachus was come into Asia, and by what munificences his soldiers revolted to him, he brake off his sports, and yet disturbed among the wrestlers, and artificers: that were already thither come, to the sum of 300 talents; and then taking his army with him, he marched away, and by long journeys, hastened to meet the enemy; and so soon as he came to Tarsus in Cilicia, he there out of the monies, which he took with him out of the City Quindî, he gave his army three months pay before hand: and besides this, brought three thousand talents along with him from Antigonía, to the end he might not be to seek for money, if need should be; then passing the Taurus, he hastened into Cappadocia, and reduced (such as in the upper Phrygia and Lycaonia, had revolted from him, to serve him in the wars, as they did before. [Ibid.])

Then Lyfimachus, hearing of the enemies approach, tell to consult with his council, in this imminent danger, what were fittest to be done: and their advice was, by no means to hazard a battle, till Seleucus came down out of the upper provinces; but to possess himself of the surest places, and to intrench himself in the strongest manner that possibly he could, with ramparts, and palisades and stakes: and there expect the coming of the enemy. Lyfimachus having heard this advice, put it seriously in execution, and Antigonus on the other side, so soon as he came in sight of his Camp, drew out in battalion, and provoked Lyfimachus to a fight, but seeing he would not, he went and kept all the passages, by which any victual might come unto the Camp, whereupon Lyfimachus, fearing least, food failing, he might happily fall alive into Antigonus his hand, removed by night, and having marched 400 furlongs, came to Dorylaeum, and there encamped: for that in those parts, there was store of corn, and other provisions in abundance, having a river at the back of him: wherefore, having there raised a work, and enclosed it with an exceeding deep trench, and three rows of stakes upon the top of it, he made all as sure as art could make it. But Antigonus, finding the enemy goes pursued after him with all speed, and coming near the place where he lay entrenched, and seeing no disposition in him to fight, he presently fell to work, and drew another trench round about his Camp to besiege him there, and to that purpose caused all kind of instruments of a siege, as darts, arrows and Catapults thither to be brought, and though many skirmishes were made about the trenches, because Lyfimachus his men fought from their work, to hinder the enemy in making theirs, yet it so fell out, that Antigonus his party had still the better of it. [Ibid.]

But in process of time, Antigonus his works came to be almost finished round about, and Lyfimachus's provision began to fail; wherefore Lyfimachus, taking the advantage of a tempestuous night, gat him away with his army, and thorough mountainous countries, came to his winter quarters. But when Antigonus the next morning found that the enemy was gone, he also marched after him thorough the champion country. But by reason there fell great store of rain, and the ways were foul, and full of sloughs, he lost many of his carriages, and some of his men all in that journey: and the whole army army was distressed therewith: wherefore, both to spare his army, and because the Winter quarter came on, he gave off the pursuit of him, for that time; and casting about for the fittest places to winter in, distributed his army into them. [Ibid.]

And Lyfimachus, in like manners, sent his army to be quartered in the country of Salmonia, having made large provision for them out of Heraclea: for that he had made an alliance with them of that City; by marrying Amestris, the widow, as was said before of Dionysius, and tuxix of his two young children; and Governelle for the present of that City. [Id. ibid. with Memnon, in Photius, cap. 5.]

At this time Demetrius, being sent for by his father out of Greece, made peace with Cassander; and, steering a straight course thorough the Islands of the Egean Sea, came to Ephesus: and there landing his army, encamped before it, and reduced it to their former obedience; and suffered the Garrison which Prepelus had put therein, to depart with safety. And putting a strong Garrison of his own into the Castle there, marched away with the rest of his army as far as Hellepont, and reduced the Lampræcians and Parians to his subjection. And from thence going to the mouth of Pontus, encamped near to a place called the Temple of the Chalcedonians, and there fortified: which done, he left there 3 thousand Foot, and 30 sail of good ships to keep it; and sent the rest of his army to quarter for that Winter, in sundry places therabout. [Diodorus, year 3. Olymp. 119.]

About this time, Mithridates who was subject to Antigonus, being suspected of favouring Cassanders party, was slain at Cius, in the country of Mylia, where, as also at Artinus, he had continued Prince 35 years. [Id. ibid.] Of whom divers Authors speak diversly. For this Mithridates, is that son of Ariobarzanes, a man of the Royal blood of Persia, and descended from one of those seven which destroyed the Magi there: as we may gather out of Polihinus, lib. 5. pag. 388. and Florus, lib. 3. cap. 5. and Sext. Aurelius, Victor, de Vir. Illust. cap. 76. (named Krsht: (i. e.) the Builder; and lost the succession of the kingdom of Pontus after him down to Eupator, at that Mithridates, who maintained to long a war against the Romans: as Strabo tells us, [lib. 12. pag. 562.] whence it is also that Tertullian, [lib. de Anima.] Ulcari (saith he) out of Strabo, that Mithridates got the kingdom of Pontus by a dream: the Story is this; Antigonus in a dream, thought that he had a field full of a golden harvest: and that Mithridates came and cut it, and carried it away into Pontus: whereupon he purposed to apprehend and kill him; whereof Mithridates being advertised by Demetrius, fled away with six horse only in his company, and fortified a certain Town in Cappadocia, where many men joynted with him: and so he obtained to himself, both Cappadocia, and also many other Countries of Pontus, and left them to the eighth generation after him; and then it was extinguished by the Romans. [Plut. in Demetrius. and Appian, in his Mithridatica, pag. 176.] Lucian, [in his book of Long-lived men, pag. 176.] out of Hieronymus Cardianus, and other Writers reporteth, that he lived, to the age of 84 years; and that his son, called also Mithridates, succeeding him in his Principality, added to his Dominions Cappadocia, and Paphlagonia; and held them 36 years. [Diodorus, ut sup.]

Cassander sent one Pleistarchus into Asia, with an army of 12000 Foot, and 500 Horse, to assist Lyfimachus; and he, coming to the mouth of Pontus, found that straitly by the enemy: and thereupon despairing of any passage that way, went to Odeskepi, which lies between Apollonia and Galatia, over against Heraclea, where a part of Lyfimachus his men lay: but finding no ships there, for his transportation, he divided his army into three parts; and the first part that set out, landed safely at Heraclea; the second miscarried by the enemy, which were let to keep that strait of Pontus. The third, wherein Pleistarchus himself was, was so overtaken with a violent tempest, that the greatest part of the ships, and men in them, perished; and the ship wherein himself was, being a goodly ship of six tire of oars, was cast away likewise: and of all the men in her, which could not be less than 500, only 33 escaped, of which Pleistarchus himself was one, who getting upon a plank of the ship when it split, was cast on board half dead: yet being a little recovered, was carried to Heraclea; and there growing strong again, went to Lyfimachus in his winter quarter, having lost the greater part of his army by the way. [Id. ibid.]

About the same time Ptolemei, coming with an excellently well appointed army out of Egypt, reduced all the Cities of Cælo Syria, to his obedience, but when he lay in siege before Sidon, there came a false rumour to his ear, that a battle had been fought, wherein Seleucus and Lyfimachus were beaten, and fled to Heraclea; and that Antigonus thereupon was halting into Syria with his victorious army. Ptolemei, giving over-light credit to this report, made a Truce with the Sidonians for five months; and putting Garrisons into the other Cities which he had taken in those parts, returned into Egypt. [Ibid.]

While these things thus passed, 2800 of Lyfimachus his chief soldiers fled over to

Antigonus, and Antigonus entertained them very courteously, and furnishing them with such pay as they said Lysimachus ought them, gave them also for a reward of their fo doing, large monies over and above, [Ibid.]

At the same time also, Seleucus with a great army came down out of the upper provinces into Cappadocia, and wintered his army in tents, which he brought ready made for them. His army consisted of 20 thousand Foot, and 12 thousand horse, (reckoning in with them his archers on horseback) and 480 Elephants, and iron Chariots one hundred, thus their Kings forces came together, purposing the next summer to try for the mastery between them.

Pythagoras the soothsayer, as formerly for Alexander the Great, and for Perdiccas, so now for Antigonus, fell to his divinations by the bowels of beasts offered in sacrifice; and finding the strings or fillets wanting in the liver of them, told Antigonus that his death was thereby portended, [Arrian, lib. 7, pag. 160.]

Alexander the Great also appeared to Demetrius in his sleep, all gloriously armed, and asked him, what was the word which he and his father purposed to give; and he answered, Love and victory; then replied Alexander, Therefore will I go over to thy enemies, for they will take me for theirs. [Plut. in Demetrius.]

Antigonus, hearing that there were to many Kings gotten together against him, vanishingly said, that he would scatter them all like to many birds out of a bush, yet the enemies approaching, he was observed to be more lumpish and silent than he used to be, and shewing his son to his army, told them that this was the man, that must be his successor. And, which they marvelled at, more than all at the rest, had speech with him in his tent often times all alone, whereas formerly, he would never impart any secret at all unto him. And when his army was all ready ranged in battle, and he going out of his pavilion to them, he stumbled, and fell all along upon his face, and being sorely troubled therat, and got up again, he begged of the gods to send him either a victory that day, or a death void of pain, [Plut. lib.]

This fight, between these to many Kings, was fought at Iplus, a Town in Phrygia, [Arrian, lib. 7, Plutarch in Pyrrhus, Appian, in Syriac, pag. 122, Diod. and Porphy year 4, Olymp. 119.] to wit in the beginning of that year. In which battle Antigonus and Demetrius us between them had above 70 thousand Foot, 10 thousand Horse, 75 Elephants, and 120 Chariots, and Demetrius with the best part of his Horse, charged upon Antiochus the son of Seleucus, and his successor afterward in his kingdom, and having most valiantly routed him, but over rashly pursuing him, and too far, was the cause of the loss of that victory to his father; yet in that pursuit, Pyrrhus made his brave valour and worth, conspicuously to appear, who being then but 17 years of age, and thrust out of his kingdom by the Epitrotes his subjects, joyned himself with Demetrius, who had married his sister Deidamia, who was intended for Alexander, the son of Alexander the Great, by Roxane, [Ibid. in Pyrrhus.]

Seleucus, seeing Antigonus his battalion destitute of all help from their Horse, made as if he would have fallen upon them, but withal, very advicely invited them rather to fall over unto him: whereupon a great part of them did so, and the rest fled; and turning upon Antigonus, one of them cried out, laying, I help come upon thee, O King; and he answered, But Demetrius will come and help us; and whilst he stood looking still for Demetrius his return to rescue him, the enemy came on, and powd on their darts; as thick as hail upon him, and in that storm, he fell: whereupon all took him, and thrust for themselves, only one Thorax of Larissa staid by the body of him, [Ibid. in Demetrius.] His body was afterward taken up, and buried in a royal manner, [Diod. lib. 21.] Plutarch tells us, that when Antigonus was upon his late voyage into Egypt, he was then little less than 80 years of age; Appianus that when he came upon this journey, he was upward of fourscore years old. But the whole term of his life, was 86 years, as Porphyrie affirms, cited by Scaliger in his Greek fragments of Eusebius, lib. III. But Hieronymus Cardanus the Historiographer, and one who lived with him (as Lactantius in his book of Long-Lived men, voucheth him) affirmeth, that he lived 81 years, and no more.

Demetrius, seeing all lost, with five thousand Foot, and four thousand horse, fled away with all possible speed to Ephesus; where, when all men began to fear, lest for want of monies, he would fall a plundering of the Temple of Diana, and he himself thought he should not be able to hold his soldiers hands from it, he hastened thence with all speed, [Plut. in Demetrius.] and taking his mother Stratonice, and all his treasure with him, sailed to Salamis, in the Isle of Cyprus, which was at that time under his command, [Diod. lib. 21.]

The Kings that had gotten this great victory, fell presently a sharing this great kingdom of Antigonus and Demetrius, among themselves and laid every man his share, to the dominion which he formerly possessed, [Plut. in Demetrius, Appian, in Syriac, pag. 122, with Polyb. lib. 5, pag. 410.]

But

But when they could not agree about the partage of the spoils, they fell again into two sides between themselves; for Seleucus joynd presently with Demetrius; and Ptolemy with Lysimachus, [Iustin, lib. 15, cap. 4.] for Seleucus and Ptolemy, were, without compare, the two mightiest of them all; and therefore the contention between them was propagated, and continued to their posterities, under the names of the Seleucians, Kings of the North, and the Ptolemies Kings of the South; as we find recorded in the 11 chapter of the prophesie of Daniel.

After Onias, his son, Simon, succeeded him in the Priesthood at Hierusalem: furnished the Juss; because of his great zeal and fervency in the worship of God, and the exceeding love, which he ever expressed to his country-men the Jews, [Iosephus, lib. 2, cap. 2.] of whom in the book of Ecclesiasticus, [cap. 50, v. 1.] we find this testimony given; Simon, saith he, the High-Priest, the son of Onias, who in his life time repaired the House again, and in his dayes fortified the Temple; and by him was built from the foundation the double height (or curtaine) the high fortress of the wall about the Temple. In his dayes the cistern to receive water, being in campasse at the sea, was covered with plates of brass. He took care of the Temple that it should not fall, and fortified the City against besieging. How was he honoured in the midst of the people at his coming out of the Sanctuary? [See Sallian, his Annals, To. 5, year of the World, 3675, and Scaliger, in his Animadversions, upon Euseb. an. 1785.] This man is said to have been High Priest there 9 years by Scaliger, in Grace, Euseb. pag. 50.

Seleucus, upon the 23 day of our April, offering sacrifice to Jupiter in the mount Casius, consulted him also concerning a place, where to build a City in; when presently an Eagle came and caught away a piece of flesh from the altar, which the is said to have left all, in a place near the sea, below Palaeopolis, (a little city built in former times by Syrus, the son of Agenor, on a hill thereby) in a sea town of Pietra: Whereupon, Seleucus fell presently to lay the foundation of a great City, which he built there, and called it after his own name, Seleucia, [Johannes Malela, in his Chron. not printed.] wherein yet, others say, that he followed not that act of the Eagle, but the flash of some lightning that appeared to him, and that thereupon the lightning was ever after in that place celebrated with set hymns and praises, as if it were a god it self, [Appian, in Syriac, pag. 125.]

Seleucus himself proceedings, came to Iopolis, a City built in the hill Country of Silphium; and there the third day after his coming, falling upon the first of Artemisium; (i. e.) of our May, offered sacrifice to Jove the Thunderer, in a certain Chapel, said to have been anciently there built by Pericles the son of Danae: And afterward coming to Antigonis, and there offering sacrifice to Jove, upon the alters newly then built by Antigonus, he together with Amphion the Priest, prayed that Jupiter would show him by some sign, whether he should inhabit Antigonis it self, calling it by some other name, or whether he should go and build a new City in another place: and then again it is said, that an Eagle came and caught away a piece of flesh from the alters and let it fall near the hill of Silphium. Whereupon it was, that over against that Hill and Iopolis therein built, near the River Orontes, where was a Town called Bortzia, he laid the foundation of his wall, upon the 22 day of the month Artemisium at the rising of the sun: which City he called after the name of his son Antiochus; and therein afterwards erected a Temple to Jupiter Bortzia. Thence and many more like things, doth Johannes Malela an Antiochian borne, deliver concerning the regime of this City; which Eusebius also in his Chron. affirmeth to have been built by Seleucus in the 12 year of his reign. Now this Metropolis of Syria, was afterward made a Tetrapolis; (i. e.) a fourfold City, being divided into four Regions; making, as it were, to many Cities: for that every one of them, had a proper wall built about it self, and one common one, which enclosed them all: of which, the first onely was built by this Seleucus Nicator: The second was the work of the Inhabitants themselves. The third was finished by Seleucus Callinicus: And the fourth, by Antiochus Epiphanes, [Strabo, lib. 16, pag. 750.]

Now that Seleucus called this City after the name of his son Antiochus, besides Malela and Cedremus, Julian also the Apostata, in his Misopogon teacheth us: whereas yet Strabo, and Appianus and Trogus Pompeius tell us, that he called it Antiochia, after the name of his father Antiochus, [Iustin, out of Trogus Pompeius, lib. 15, cap. 4.] saith, that herein he consecrated the memorial of a twofold beginning; for, saith he, he called the City after the name of his father Antiochus, and consecrated the fields about it, to Apollo; became too soon, his mother Laodice, would needs make him believe, that he was begotten on her by Apollo: and therefore Daphne, a suburb of Antioch, a place much renowned for the Grove of Laurel trees that there was, and no less than 80 furlongs in compasse, was consecrated to Apollo: whence as this day it is called Cadmus with Antiochian names (i. e.) Daphne near unto Antioch, [2 Maccabees chapter 4, verse 33.] So the City it selfe of Antioch, is called called Αντιόχεια ἐν τῇ Δαφνῇ: (i.e.) Antioch near unto Daphne, by other Writers.

Seleucus, utterly demolishing Antiochia, conveyed the materials down the river Orontes, unto Antioch; and transplanted from thence, to the number of 5300 Macedonians and Athenians, which Antigonus had there planted, unto his new city [Jo. Malela], though Diodore saith indeed, that Seleucus did destroy Antiochia, but adds, that he transported the inhabitants thereof, to his new city Seleucia, [120 year, 2. Olym. 118]. But Strabo also maketh mention of the inhabitants of Antiochia, removed to Antiochia, [16 p. 750], where he also adds, that some of the race and off-spring of Triptolemus, and Argivians, which were long ago sent with him to seek out Io, were there planted by Seleucus; which yet were none other than those Grecians out of Peloponnesus, which Stephanus Byzantius saith, were placed to dwell in Antioch, ἐν τῇ Δαφνῇ, (i.e.) in Antioch by Daphne. To which purpose also is that saying of Jo. Malela, ἡγοῦντο ἂν αὐτὸς τὸν Σελεύκον ὡς τοῦ ἀργεῖος, τοῦ λαοῦ, &c. (i.e.) Seleucus himself besought some of the Grecians of Ionia, and translated those Grecians which dwelt in Iopolsu, to make them inhabitants of Antioch, and whom he made Citizens there, as men of a more sacred and generous kind, than the rest: compare this here with Scaliger's note, upon the 1713. number of the Euseb. Chron.

Lysimachus the King of Thrace took to wife Arsinoe, the daughter of Ptolemei, son Ptolemei Philadelphus, as in Memnon, [cap. 5.] but of Ptolemei the first, the son of Lagus, furnished the deliverer, as we learn out of Plutarch in Demetr. and Justin, [lib. 17. cap. 2. and lib. 24. cap. 2.] and even out of Memnon himself, in Excerpti, [cap. 9.] of Ptolemei the first, I say, and Eudicite, as we find in Paulan his Attic, [pag. 8.] whereat his former wife Amestris, the relict of Dionysius, the King perforce, or tyrant, or a usurper of Heraclea, grew so offended, that he left him, and returned to Heraclea, and there built a City near the Euxian sea, which he called after his own name Amastria, and sent for men out of Scamius, Cytorus, Cromnus and Teios, and other places to inhabit it, [Memnon, Excerpti, cap. 5. with Strabo lib. 12. pag. 544.]

3705. Seleucus, following the example of Lysimachus, sent his Ambassadors, and by them desired to have Stratonice, the daughter of Demetrius, furnished Poliorcetes, and Phila, for his wife. Whereupon, Demetrius, taking his daughter along with him, took shipping, and with his whole fleet which attended him at Athens, set sail for Syria. But by the way touched in Cilicia, which Ptolearchus, the brother of Cassander, then held, as allotted to him by a general consent of the Kings, after the battle wherein Antigonus, his Grandfather was slain. This Ptolearchus conceiving himself wronged by Demetrius his setting foot upon his land, went and complained thereof to Seleucus, and expostulated the matter with him; for that without the consent of the other Kings, Ptolemei and Lysimachus, he had entered into a league and alliance with Demetrius, a common enemy to them all. Hereupon Demetrius in a rage went from thence to Qinda, where when he found yet remaining of the old treasure of Alexanders, 200 talents, he took them all away with him, and weighed anchor, and to sea, as fast as he could high him, [Plut. in Demetr.]

Seleucus came to meet Demetrius, and his wife Phila, at a place called Orofius, and first invited them to dine with him at his pavilion in his Camp: after which Demetrius invited him aboard his ship of 13 tuns of oares high, after which they spent whole dayes in familiar discourse together, without arms or guard about them, till at length Seleucus married Stratonice, and with her returned in great pomp and magnificence to Antioch.

Demetrius, having possessed himself of Cilicia, dispatch away his wife Phila to her brother Cassander, to execute such matters as Ptolearchus, might happily have laid unto his charge, and whiles the way was away, his other wife Deidamia came to him to Athens, where after a short while, he died. [Ibid.]

3706. Seleucus desired Demetrius to let him have Cilicia for a certain sum of money, which when he would not grant, Seleucus in a choleric way, demanded to have Sidon and Tyre cut of his hands, and this seemed an injurious act of his, that having made himself Lord, and possessing all from India, to the Syrian sea, yet he was of so poor a spirit, as to trouble his father in law, being otherwise under a cloud of adverse fortune, for two such poor Cities, as Tyre and Sidon were. Wherefore Demetrius stoutly answered, that if he were a thousand times overcome, yet he would never buy a son in law at so dear a rate; and thereupon fell presently a fortifying of those two Cities, which were such forces in Seleucus his eyes, [Ibid.]

3707. Cassander, having had the rule and government of things in Macedonia 19 years, died, leaving three sons, Philip, Antipater, and Alexander, begotten on the body of Thessalonice, the sister of Alexander the Great, all which reigned after their father three years and six moneths only, [Dexippus and Porphyrius in Scaliger's Greek Eusebians, pag. 48. 288.]

Philip

4415. 299.

4416. 298.

Philip the elder of the three, coming shortly after his fathers death to fall away and die of a consumption, his two younger brothers, Antipater and Alexander, fell together by the ears about the kingdom, [Justin lib. 16. cap. 1. Paulan, in his Best. pag. 287. and Plut. in Pyrrho & Alexan.]

This Antipater, Dexippus, and Euseb. in Chron. call by the name of Antigonus: nor could Hermippus understand any other, where he saith, that Demetrius Phalereus, after the death of Cassander, for the dread he had of Antigonus, fled to Ptolemei, furnished the Deliverer, [Diog. Laertius, in Demetr. Phil.]

Pyrrhus also, at the same time, remained with Ptolemei, as a hostage in Egypt: where he married Antigone the Daughter of Berenice the Queen by Philip her former husband, [Plut. in Pyrrho, Paulan in Attic, pag. 10.]

Pyrrhus, by the help of Antigone his wife, having obtained both a Fleet of ships, and store of money withal, from Ptolemei; set sail for his old kingdom Epirus; and there came to a composition with Neoptolemus, who had usurped his kingdom, upon termes, to hold it joyously with him, [Id. ibid.]

Eupolemus, the Historian, deduceth his Chronologie from Adam, and the coming of the children of Israel out of Egypt, down to the fifth year of this Demetrius, reckoned from the death of his father Antigonus, and to the 12 year of Ptolemei, reckoned from the utter extinction of Alexander the Great, his Race, of which I spake toward the end of the year of the World, 3695, in his book of the Kings of Juda; as we find in [1 book of Strom. of Clem. Alexan.]

3708. Demetrius, Poliorcetes, (i.e.) the City sieger, wasted the City of Samaria, which Ptolemei had formerly new rebuilt, [Euseb. Chron.]

3709. Velleus Paterculus, in the first book of his History, tells us, that Pyrrhus began his reign, when Fabius Max. and Q. Decius Mus, were each of them, the fifth time Consul of Rome; to wit, when Neoptolemus being slain, Pyrrhus took the sole possession of Epirus into his hands: and then, remembering how much he had been beholding to Berenice and Ptolemei, by whose favour it was, that he had thus recovered his kingdom; he called his son, which Antigone now bare unto him, by the name of Ptolemei; and having built a new City in a neck of land in Epirus, he called it after the name of his wives mother, Berenice, [Plut. in Pyrrho.]

3710. In the 36 year of the Periode or account of Calippus, the 5 day of the moneth Posidion, in the year 454. of Nabonassar, the 16 day of Paophus, 3 hours after midnight, the 21 day of our Decemb. Timochares observed at Alexandria in Egypt, that the Moon rising to her utmost height northward, touched upon the most northerly Star of those which are in the head of Scorpio, [Ptol. in his great Synaxis, lib. 7. cap. 3.]

In the same year also, upon the 15 day of Elaphebolion, the 5 of Tybus, four hours before midnight upon the 9 of our May, the same Timochares observed the conjunction of the Moon with Spica Virginis, [Id. ibid.]

Thessalonice the Queen, and relict of Cassander, the Daughter of Philip, father of Alexander the Great, begotten upon the Daughter of Nicaipolus, was murdered by Antipater her own son; yea, though she begged the life of him by those paps which gave him luck: the reason was, for that in the partage of the kingdom, made between him and his brother, she seemed a little inclined to her youngest son Alexander. And Alexander, to revenge this murder of his mother, prayed in aid of all the friends he could make; of Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, of Demetrius Poliorcetes, in Peloponnesus, [Justin, lib. 16. cap. 1. Plut. in Pyrrho & Demetr. Paulan in Best. pag. 287.]

Lysimachus the King of Thrace, for the dread he had of Demetrius his coming, per-suaded with his son in law Antipater, rather to agree with his brother, than by killing out with him to draw upon himself an old hereditary enemy of his father, [Justin, ibid.] And knowing well, that Pyrrhus would do any thing for Ptolemei sake; he sent certain forged letters to him, as sent from Ptolemei, wherein he advised him, to receive a gratuity of 300 talents from Antipater, and to give off his journey into Macedon for the support of Alexander against his brother. But Pyrrhus perceived this trick of his; for opening the letters, he found not there the usual salutation from Ptolemei to him: which was, Pater filio, (i.e.) The father to his son: instead whereof, it was there written, King Ptolemei to King Pyrrhus, friends greeting: and withal Demetrius his sudden falling in upon Macedonia, brake off all these devices of Lysimachus, [Plut. in Pyrrho.]

Ptolemei of Egypt, took the whole Isle of Cyprus out of Demetrius his hands; the City Salamis only excepted, where he besieged Demetrius his mother and children that were therein: and them, having at length taken the City, he sent home unto him honourably attended, and with rich presents bestowed on them, for their journey, [Plut. in Demetr.]

Demetrius, having gotten Alexander into his hands, and slain him, possessed himself self of the kingdom of Macedon, [Justin, lib. 16. cap. 1. Pausan. Boeot. pag. 287. Plut. in Pyrr. & Demetr. and in his Treatise, with downwards: (i.e.) of shamefastness; and held it seven years, as the same Plutarch affirmeth.

Lyfimachus, being at that time engaged in a war which one Dromichetes a King of the Getes made upon him, lest he should be forced to maintain a war against the King of Getes, and Demetrius both at once, gave up that part of Macedon, which belonged to his son in law Antipater, and to made peace with him, [Justin lib. 16. cap. 1. with Strab. lib. 7. pag. 302. & 305.]

Dromichetes his hap was to take Lyfimachus prisoner, but used him very kindly [Strabo, lib. supra. Diodorus, in Excerpt. H. P. lib. 257. & 58.] and Lyfimachus gave him his daughter to wife, and gave up into his hands that part of Thrace, which lay beyond the Ister, for a dowrie with her. [Pausani. in Attica. pag. 8.]

Clearchus, the King perforce, or Tyrant of Heraclea in Pontus, going to help Lyfimachus in his war against the Getes, was taken prisoner together with him, and when Lyfimachus was gotten at liberty himself; he, by his wildome, used the means to procure his liberty also, [Memnon, in Excerpt. cap. 6.]

3712.

When Simon, surnamed the Jutt, the High Priest at Jerusalem, was dead, leaving behind him one onely son Onias, then an infant, his brother Eleazar, the son of Onias the first, took upon him the high priesthood of the Jews, [Joseph. lib. 12. cap. 2.] and is said to have late there 32 years, in Scaligers Greek Eusebian fragments. [pag. 50. and 162.]

After the return of Lyfimachus from the Getick war, Agathocles, his eldest son, and who was taken prisoner in the first battle that ever he was in, as some report, took to wife Lyfandra, the daughter of Ptolemy of Egypt, surnamed the deliverer, and of Euridice his wife, [Pausan. in his Attic. p. 8.]

After this, Lyfimachus, passing with his Navy over into Asia, seized on such as there were in subjection to Antigonus and Demetrius, [Id. lib. with Plut. in Demetr.] where whilst he lay before Ephesus, and they had to help them one Mardroch, an arch Pirate, who often brought in thither rich prizes which he had taken: Lyfimachus fell a bribing of him, and won him over to betray the City to him, and for the effecting thereof, put into his hands certain valiant Macedons, whom he with their hands bound behind them, brought like prisoners into Ephesus; and they spying their time, got arms in the City where they were, and took the City for Lyfimachus, [Jul. Fronti. Strateg. lib. 3. cap. 3.] and whereas the City of Ephesus being seated in a low ground, was a while after infinitely annoyed by an inundation of the sea coming in upon it, and being drowned by it, of which deluge we may read an epigram in Stephanus Byzantinus, made by one Duris, Lyfimachus now removed it into another place; and being new built, called it after the name of his new wife Aspinos, though after his death, it quickly returned to her former name and appellation of Ephesus, [Strabo lib. 14. p. 640. and Stephanus in Ephesus.] and to replenish his new City with inhabitants, he demolished the two Cities of Lebedus, and Colophos, and removed the dwellers in them to it; which destruction of those two famous Cities, Phoenix in his Iambicks, grievously deplored, [Pausan. ut sup.]

Seleucus, to fill such Cities as he had built in Asia, and the lower Syria, and especially Antioch, the Metropolis of all the rest, removed the Jews from their own dwellings into them: giving them every where equal privileges, prerogatives and immunities with the Macedons, both in Towns and Cities, [Euseb. Chron. Joseph. Antiquit. lib. 12. cap. 3. & lib. 2. Cont. Apion. pag. 1063.] But of the Cities which he built, he named 16 after the name of his father Antioch, Antiochia; and six others after the name of his mother Laodice, Laodicea; nine of them from himself, Seleucia; three from his wife, Apamea; and one from his last wife, Stratonice; and to the rest, he gave certain Greek and Macedonic names, as came in his head: as Berræa, Edessa, Pella, and the like, [Appian, in Syria.]

3715.

Agathocles, the Tyrant of Sicily, coming to die, shipt away his wife Thoxena, with his two children, which he had by her, being very little ones, with all his treasure and family, and rich furniture, wherein he exceeded all other Kings, and sent them into Egypt, from whence he took her, fearing lest to soon as he was dead, they should be made a spoil to some or other, together with his kingdom. Though his wife, entreated hardly, that at least he her self, might not be forced to leave him, whilst she breathed in his body: pleading for her self, that when she married him, she contracted a society with him of all fortunes, as well bad as good, and that she would willingly hazard her own life, to be with him at the hour and instant of his death, and his children, little though they were, yet hardly could they be drawn off from holding by him, and in the end, parted from him with a dolefull cry, and with lamentation, when the wind ceased, and they must be gone, and so soon as they were gone, he breathed out out his last, and gave up the ghost, [Justin, lib. 23. cap. 2.]

Clearchus and Oxathres, the two Kings of Heraclea in Pontus, when their mother Ameltris had gotten a ship-board to be gone from them, in a most barbarous manner, caused her to be thrown over-board, and drowned in the sea, [Memnon Excerpt. cap. 6.]

3716.

Lyfimachus, desirous to revenge the death of Ameltris, sometime his wife, came into Heraclea, and shewing there all fatherly affection to Clearchus and those who were nearest about him; first slew him, and then his brother Oxathres, [Id. cap. 7.] seventeen years after the death of Clearchus their father: as may be gathered out of [Diodor. year 3. Olymp. 118.] and so, having reduced that City and territory therunto belonging into his own power, and obliged it to himself, he took all the treatise belonging to those Tyrants, and whatever they had scraped together, into his own hands, and leaving the City in full liberty, and to live after their own laws, he returned into his own kingdom, [Memnon, ut sup.]

Strato of Lampacus, the son of Arcesilaus, and surnamed Physicus, succeeded Theophrastus in his school; which Strato was the teacher and bringer up of Ptolemaeus Philadelphus, who gave him for his pains, taken in his education, as it is said, fourscore talents, [Diog. Laert. in Strabone.]

Demetrius Poliorcetes, seeking to recover all his father Antigonus his Dominions, was now ready to land in Asia, with so huge an army, as no man after the days of Alexander the Great, to that time, had the like; for in his army he had no less than 100 thousand Foot, wanting two; and little less than 12 thousand Horse: in his Fleet he had full 500 ships; whereof some were of an excessive bignesse, as of 15 or 16 tuns of oares. Before his going, he made a firm league with Pyrrhus; for fear least he, moving some troubles in his absence, might interrupt, and hinder him in his main design, [Plut. in Demetr. & Pyrrho.]

Seleucus, Ptolemy, and Lyfimachus, fearing, as well they might, whether this excessive preparation tended: combined together, and making one body of all their Forces, began to find him work, and to make war upon him in Europe; and in all their three names sent Ambassadors to Pyrrhus in Epirus, advising him to invade Macedon: nor should reckon that a league, which he had made with Demetrius, since he therein had no intention of peace; but only a purpose to be at liberty himself, to make war upon whom he pleased: Pyrrhus easily assented herunto; debauched Demetrius his army, put him to flight, and took the kingdom of Macedon into his own possession, [Id. ibid. Justin, lib. 16. cap. 2.] And this was the first time, as [Pausan. in Attic. pag. 11.] noteth, that ever Pyrrhus was Master of some few Elephants.

But when Lyfimachus came, and pretending that he had a hand in the quashing of Demetrius as well as Pyrrhus, and therefore craved halles with him in the kingdom of Macedonia; Pyrrhus, doubting of the firmity of the Macedons unto him, yielded thereto, and so came to a division of the kingdom of Macedon with him by Cities and Regions, [Plut. ut sup.]

But in this mangling of things, Lyfimachus, finding that his son in law Antipater, complained openly that his father in law had cheated him of the kingdom of Macedon, made short work, and slew him: and because his daughter Euridice Antipaters now Relict, repined at the death of her husband, therefore he committed her to prison. And to the whole house of Cassander paid Alexander the Great the price, whether of his own death, or whether of the destruction of his Race, partly by murders, partly by toments, partly by partiall acts committed in his own family to the utter extirpation of it, [Justin, ut sup.]

This Demetrius, being in an infant stripe of his kingdom, fled to Cassandria. But his wife Phila swallowed up with grief, and not enduring to see her husband fall again into the condition of a private man in a foreign country, and despairing of all better success in time to come, poisoned her self, and died, [Plut. in Demetr.]

When Demetrius lay at the siege of Athens, which had revolted from him to Pyrrhus, Crates the Philosopher, being sent in Embassy to him, perswaded him to raise his siege: whereupon, getting all his ships together, and putting aboard them eleven thousand Foot, besides his Horse, he sailed away into Asia, there to get all Caria and Lydia from Lyfimachus. There Euridice the sister of his wife Phila, met him not far from Mileus, bringing with her Ptolemaus, her daughter by Ptolemy of Egypt, whom his son in law Seleucus, had formerly spoken to Ptolemy to bestow on him. Demetrius therefore now married her, by the good will of Euridice; and of her Demetrius begat Demetrius, who afterward reigned in Cyrenia, [Ibid.]

In this voyage, Demetrius took in many Towns and Cities, some by fair means, some by force, and some tell over from Lyfimachus to him, who also brought great force of men and means with them. But when Agathocles the son of Lyfimachus came towards him with an army, he marched up into Phrygia, purposing to invade Armenia, and Seleucus, to fit his Chitac as he had built in Asia, and the lower Syria, and especially Antioch, the Metropolis of all the reft, removed the Jews from their own dwellings into them; giving them every where equal privileges, prerogatives and immunities with the Macedonians, both in Towns and Cities, [*Euseb. Sirato of Lampsacus, the son of Arcefilaus, and surnamed Phyliscus, succeeded Theophrastus in his schoole; which Sirato wasthe teacher and bringer up of Polemaus Philadelphus, who gave him for his pains, taken in his education, as it is said, four score talents. Diog. Laert. in Strabone.

Demetrius Pious, desirous to recover all his father Antigonus his Dominions, was now ready to land in Asia, with a huge army, as no man after the days of Alexander the Great, to that time, had the like; for in his army he had not less than 100 thousand Foot, wanting 20, and little less than 12 thousand Horse: in his Fleet he had full 500 ships; whereof some were of an excessive bignesse, as of 15 or 16 tire of oares. Before his going, he made a firm league with Pyrrhus; for fear least, moving from Greece, he might interrupt, and hinder him in his main deliue, [Plut. in Demetri. & Pyrrho.]

Scleus, Ptolemeus, and Lyfimachus, fearing, as well they might, whether this excessive preparation tended to combined together, and making one body of all their Forces, began to find hard work, and to make war upon him in Europe; and in all their countries (sent Ambassadors to Pyrrhus in Epirus, advising him to invade Macedon) three names first, Ambassadors to Pyrrhus in Epirus, advising him to invade Macedon) he could reckon that a league, which he had made with Demetrius, since he therein had no intention of peace; but only a purpose to be attorney himself, to make war upon whom he pleased: Pyrrhus easily affected thereby: debauched Demetrius his army, to him to fight, and took the kingdom of Macedon into his own possession, [Id. lib. i. iust. lib. 16. esp. 2.] And this was the first time, as [Paulus, in Attic. pag. 17. note], that ever Pyrrhus was Master of some few Elephants,

But when Lysimachus came, and pretending that he had a hand in the quashing of Demetrius as well as Pyrrhus, and therefore craved halves with him in the kingdom of Macedonia; Pyrrhus, doubting of the firmity of the Macedons unto him, yielded thereto, and so came to a division of the kingdom of Macedon with him by Cities and Regions. [Plut. ut sup.]

But in this mangling of things, Lyfymachus, finding that his son in law Antipater, complained openly that his son in law had cheated him of the kingdom of Macedonia, that he had fled, and flew him: and because his daughter Euridice Antipaters now King, was wed at the death of her husband, therefore he committed her to prison. And to the whole house of Cassander paid Alexander the Great the price, whether of his own death, or whether of the destruction of his Race, partly by murders; partly by toments, partly by perniciatious accidents committed in his own family to the utter extirpation of it. [Lyfymachus, us [sup.]]

This Demetrius, being in an instant stript of his kingdom, fled to Cassandria. But his wife Phila swallowed up with grief, and not enduring to see her husband fall again into the condition of a private man in a foreign country, and despairing of all better success in time to come, poisoned her self, and died, [Plut. in Demetr.]

When Demetrius lay at the siege of Athens, which had revolted from him to Pylæus, Crates the Philosopher, being lent in Embassage to him, persuaded him to raise his siege: whereupon, getting all his ships together, and putting aboard them eleven thousand Foot, besides his Horle, he sailed away into Asia, the one to get all Caria and Lydia from Lymnachus. There Euridice the sister of his wife Phila, met him not far from Mileus, bringing with her Ptolemaïs, her daughter by Ptolemei of Egypt, whom his son in law Seleucus, had formerly spoken to Ptolemei to bestow on him. In this voyage, Demetrius took in many Towns and Cities, some by fair means, some by force; and some fell over from Lyfimachus to him, who also brought great store of men and means with them. and thereby to make a combustion in Media it self, and consequently to feel the pulse, of the upper provinces of Asia, and how they stood affected to him; for that there he might happily find many a lurking hole, if need should be: as for Agathocles, who followed him, he often worried him in small encounters, but never came to a main battle with him. [Ibid.]

Nevertheless, failing many times of food for himself, and fodder for his Horse, he found himself sorely distressed, especially by an error committed in passing the Lycus, he lost many of his soldiers, which that fierce river swept away. And at last by a pestilence following the same in his army, he lost eight thousand of his company, and was fain with the rest to come back to Taurus in Cilicia, where his purpose was to refrain all kind of injury and oppression of the people, as appertaining to Seleucus, whom he would not offend in any kind. But that could not be; considering the extreme necessity his army was in, and Agathocles kept all the passages of the Taurus, wherefore he wrote his letters to Seleucus; wherein complaining of his own hard fortune, he humbly besought him to compassionate his case, as a poor kinsman of his, and one that desired to be pitied, even of an enemy. [Ibid.]

Seleucus, taking into consideration the distressed estate of his father in law, wrote to his Commanders and officers in those parts, to supply him with all necessities in a kindly manner, and not to suffer his army to want in any kind. But there was one Procles, an intimate friend and familiar of Seleucus who wrought so far with him, by suggestions which he put into his head against Demetrius, that he presently led an army against him into Cilicia. Demetrius, wondering at this sudden alteration in Seleucus, drew off presently into the craggy mountains of Taurus, and from thence sent his agents to him, to desire, that by his good leave, he might fall upon some free state or other, among the Barbarians; and there spend the remainder of his life, without ranging the world over any longer: but if not yet that he would suffer him to winter quietly where he was, and not to expose him, in the extremity he now was in, to the force and fury of his enraged enemy. Seleucus made an ill construction of all these motions; and therefore granted him only, that giving up into his hands the principal of his friends which he had about him for hostages and pledges of his good abearance, he should spend two months of his winter quarters in Caracena, which was a country bordering upon Cappadocia, and withall, stop up all passages which led from thence into Syria. [Ibid.]

And now Demetrius, being thus closed up like a wild beast in a den, having Agathocles the son of Lytimachus on the one hand, and Seleucus on the other, to watch him; turned himself to try what he could do by force, and wasted some of the provinces belonging to Seleucus, and in every encounter, had the better of him; and when Seleucus let his lion Chariots fly upon him, Demetrius sundry times routed them also, and put his enemies to flight; and took the passages of the mountains, casting out the Garrisons which Seleucus had there placed for the keeping of them. And growing now confident of his own strength, resolved to throw at all, in a pitch battle with Seleucus, when upon the sudden, a grievous sickness fell upon him, which utterly overthrew the state, both of his body, and also of his affairs, and hopes in the world; for that during his sickness his soldiers all abandoned him, some falling away to his enemies, and others disbanded, and went where they pleased. [Ibid.]

Whiles Demetrius thus lay under the lash of sickness in Syria, Lytimachus set upon Pnythus, in Macedonia; and in five years and six months space, won it all from him. [Devis. and Porphy.]

Demetrius, at the end of 40 days, being recovered of his sickness, taking such soldiers with him as were left, removed his Camp, making as if he would march into Cilicia; and the night following, without sound of trumpet, turned short another way; and having passed the hill Amanus, ravaged and plundered all that Country as far as Cyncephica, a region in Syria. And when Seleucus came thither with his army, and encamped not far from him, Demetrius with his men came upon him by night, whiles he slept, yet he getting notice of his coming by some that fled over to him, start out of his bed, and commanded an alarm to be sounded; and whiles he was putting on his shoes, cried out to his friends, that he had to do with a fierce wild beast: and Demetrius, finding, by the noise which he heard in the enemies Camp, that his coming was discovered, retired presently, and went his way. [Plut. in Demet.]

So soon as it was day, Seleucus followed and overtook him; and Demetrius giving one wing to be led by a captain of his, led the other himself, and routed the wing of the enemy, on his side; then Seleucus kept off his Horse, and took off his helmet, and with a target in his hand, shewed himself bare faced to the mercenaries of Demetrius his army, and exhorted them to leave Demetrius, and fall over to him, and to be once to wife, as to understand, that it was more in favour of them, than of Demetrius, that he had restrained thus long from falling on them: whereupon they all cried out, God save save Seleucus, and calling him their King, abandoned Demetrius, and served him. [Ibid.]

Demetrius, supposing this to be the last reverse of fortune, and worst that could befall him, retired to the streits of the mount Amanus, and there spent that night in a thick wood, with those few friends which he had about him: purposing from thence to go to the City Caunus, and hoping there to get shipping for some other country to flee unto. But when he saw that he had not so much as one dayes provision for them neither; it fell out so luckily with him, that an old friend of his, Sotigines, came and brought him 400 Crowns. This supply he hoped would carry him to the sea side; and therefore went by night, to pass the top of the mountain: yet because he saw by the fires every where made, that the enemy lay in his way, in great despair he was in to return to the place whence he set out. And there, when one of the company told him, he should do well to put himself into Seleucus his hands, he drew his sword, and would have there present fallen upon it; but being persuaded by his friends about him to forbear, he went to Seleucus, and submitted both himself and all that he had to his will and pleasure. [Ibid.]

Seleucus, having heard the message, gave order presently to his servants, to fit up a Royal Pavilion in most princely manner to receive Demetrius in; and dispatch away one Apollonides, who had formerly been an intimate friend of Demetrius, to comfort him, and to tell him, that there was no cause of fear, seeing he was to come to an old friend and son in law of his: when this came to the eares of Seleucus his servants, first by one and one, and anon after, they all flocked in great multitudes to Demetrius: which act of theirs, instead of compassion, caused envy towards him, and made his foes to alienate Seleucus his good intentions, from him; telling him, that no sooner should Demetrius be seen in the Camp, but he should find strange alterations, and innovations in it. [Ibid.]

Hieropon, Pausanias was sent with a traine of about a thousand men, Horse and Foot together; who put all others from him, and instead of bringing him to Seleucus his presence, carried him away to a certain Fortland lying out into the Sea, in Syria. In that place was he kept ever after, with a strong guard upon him; but sufficient allowance made him, wanting for no monies, no walks, no gardens, nor places of hunting, or other recreations, that his heart could wish: and his friends that had followed him, had free leave to have access unto, and converse with him: nor passed there a day, wherein some or other came not unto him, to see him from Seleucus, with friendly messages from him, and to bid him be of good comfort, and to put him in hope of his further liberty upon reasonable conditions: so soon as Antiochus (which was Seleucus his son) and his wife Stratonice were come to Court. [Ibid.] yet [Diodorus, lib. 21.] tells us, that he was all this while kept prisoner at Pella. [Hen. Vales. in Excerpt. pag. 262.]

Demetrius, being fallen into this condition, wrote to his son, and other Captains, and friends of his at Athens, and Corinth, and other places, that they should give no credence to any letters that might happen to come to them as sent from him, or sealed with his seale: but should look to, and order all, for the behoof of his son Antigonus, as if himself were actually dead. [Plut. in Demet.] from whence it is that Porphyrie deduceth Antigonus his reign over Greece from this time: to wit, from the tenth year before he added the kingdom of Macedonia to his other Dominions: which Porphyrie telleth is further, that this Antigonus, from a place called Goni in Thessalia, where he was bred and brought up, was turnamed Gonaire. [Scalig. in Græc. Enschia, pag. 226.] Now Antigonus, hearing the news of his fathers captivity, took it very heavily, and put himself into mourning weeds, and wrote away his letters, as to sundry other Kings, so to Seleucus himself, in all humble manner and suppliant-like, offering himself, and whatever he could call his, in pledge unto him for his father; the like letters and messages came to Seleucus from sundry Cities and Potentates, on his behalf. [Plut. in Demet.]

Only Lytimachus by his letters advised Seleucus to take heed how he let a man go, of so ambitious and turbulent a spirit, so ambitious of Sovereignty, and so encroaching upon the rights of all other Kings; and offering him a thousand talents gratuitly, if he would send him packing out of the World: but Seleucus, who had never any good opinion of the man, upon this letter of his, grew into utter detestation of him, as of a barbarous and execrable person, and spared not to let fall foul words to his Ambassadors, for that they went about to persuade him, not only to break the word and promise which he had given, but also to commit to prodigious a murder upon a person, so many wayes and so nearly allied unto him: nevertheless he wrote away his letters forthwith to his son Antiochus, who was then in Media, for his advice, what he should do with Demetrius now he had him: for that of himself, he was purposed to let him go at liberty, and to restore him in all points to his former state and glory of a King; which he therefore thought fit to communicate to him, because he had married his daughter did he another brother of his, born of Euridice, as detected for soliciting the Isle of Cyprus to revolt from him; [Pausan. in Attic. pag. 6.] Whereby it seems, that he little deserved that specious name of Philadelphus, (i.e.) a lover of his brethren. Theocritus in his 17 Idyllion saith, that he had in his dominions 33339 Cities, and is said to have been of to great power, that he exceeded therein, his father Ptolemy the first: which Jerom confirmeth out of Histories, upon [Daniel, cap. 11.] and so doth Appianus Alexandrines, out of the Records of the Kings of Egypt, in his preface to his History of the Romans, unto whom for this purpose we may adde, what Athenæus, [lib. 5, Deipnosoph. cap. 5.] relateth of his feets, and the unmeasurable bignesse of his ships.

In the year 47 of the first Periode of Calippus, in the eighth day of the month Anthelion, 465 years of Nabonassar's account, the 29 day of the month Athyr, three howers before midnight, in the end of the 29 day of our January, after the Julian Calendar, Timochares observed at Alexandria. That the fourth part of the Moon covered the following part of the Virgilia's, to a third part or near half. [Ptolem. lib. 7, cap. 3.]

Lysimachus, now King both of Thrace and Macedon, being drawn thereto by the persuasion of his wife Arsinoe, (by whom he had also children born) murdered his son Agathocles; his eldest son, and whom he had ever designed to be his successor in his kingdom, and by whose conduct he had achieved so many glorious victories, but whether by poyson, or by the hand of Ptolemy Ceraurus, brother to his said wife Arsinoe, I cannot say; [Strabo lib. 13, p. 623, Justin lib. 27, cap. 1, Pausan. in Attic. pag. 9, Memnon Excerpt. cap. 9.]

But having thus begun with his own son, he fell afterward to act the like upon his Nobles that were about him, for no other cause than for that they lamented the death of his son. Whereupon they which escaped his hands, and the Captains of his armies in all parts, fled away to Seleucus, [Justin Ibid.] and when upon these murders of his Nobles, all the people fell to have him in abomination, now not single persons only, but whole Cities fell off from him, and revolted to Seleucus. [Memnon Ibid.]

Lyandra, the daughter of Ptolemy Soter, and sister to Arsinoe, with her children begotten on her by Agathocles, and her brothers with her, fled away all to Seleucus; and with them Alexander also, another son of Lysimachus, but by the venter of Odrissia, another wife of his, fled also for company to him; all which coming to Babylon, joined in petition to him, to make war upon Lysimachus, [Pausan. Ibid. with Appian in Syriac. pag. 130.]

At the same time also, one Philiterus a Paphlagonian born, and an Eunuch made, but one who had had good education in his youth, and whom Lysimachus had made keeper of all his treasure laid up in Pergamus, repining at the murder acted upon Agathocles, and therefore laid at by Arsinoe, who daily accused him to Lysimachus, seized himself of the city Pergamus, which stands upon the river Caicus, and then sent to Seleucus, offering himself, and all the treasure which he there had under his charge, belonging to Lysimachus, to his disposing, and to holding in still with the strongest, and him that was next at hand, and bearing them in hand, with fair promises, and good offices, as occasion was offered, kept the Castle there, and principality of the place, 20 years long. [Pausan. in Attic. pag. 7, and 9, Strabo lib. 13, pag. 623, and Appian in Syriac. pag. 129.] calls him, no thesauri Pervasiorem, (i.e.) the Prince or Potentate of Pergamus, but certain old choiciness in Huber, Gulfius Theauro, have him, Regem, (i.e.) King: For indeed this was the man that was the founder of that new principality in Pergamus; being 60 years of age, as Lucian, in Macrobii affirmeth of him.

In the year 48 of the first Periode of Calippus, on the 25 day of the month Pyanepsion, 466 year of Nabonassar, the seventh day of the month Thoth, three howers and one half before midnight, the ninth day of our November, Timochares at Alexandria observed the conjunction of the moon with Spica Veneris, in the northern part thereof. [Ptolem. lib. 7, cap. 3.]

Antiochus, surnamed Soter, son of Seleucus Nicator, falling in love with Stratonice, his Step-daughter, and one by whom his father had a son born, being conscious to himself, of the feditie of his own desire, neither attempted any thing upon her, not disclosed ought of that which troubled him, but lay gnawing his feets, and in that melancholy, would fain have died. But Lepidus, a Mathematician, or as others say, one Erasistratus, a Physician, Aristotles grandchild by a daughter of his, and a disciple of Chryppus, as Plinius hath it, [lib. 29, cap. 21] to wit, of Chryppus a Cnidian born, and by profession, a Physician likewise as Laertius in the life of Chryppus saith, though some others say he was a scolar under Theophrastus, as the same Laertius, in the Life of Theophrastus toward the end thereof noteth, against whole followers, going by the name name or sect of Erasistratus, Galen afterward wrote a book of Phlebotomie, or opening of a vein, yet extant; this Erasistratus therefore, sitting upon a time by Antiochus, observed, that at the coming in of Stratonice his colour ever roset, and his pulse beat high, and when he went away, he grew pale and wan again, and fetcht his breath short, and panted, found thereby what ailed him; and opened the matter to Seleucus: who thereupon was content to part with her, though most dearly beloved, to his son, and calling his army together, before them all, married her to his son. And whereas he had at that time 72 Provinces under him, he gave up the greater part of them, in Asia (i.e.) the upper provinces, which were all to the eastward of Euphrates, to his son, referring to himself only such countries as lay from the Euphrates westward, to the Mediterranean sea, [Appian in Syriac. with Valer. Max. lib. 5, cap. 7, Plut. in Demetrius, De Syria Dea, Galen, in de morbis, (i.e.) of foreknowing, and Julia in Metapogone.]

Lysimachus, passing over into Asia, made war upon Seleucus. And this was the last battle fought between the Survivors of Alexander the Great: of which there were now already 34 extinct and dead, these two only survived: This battle was fought in Purygia, lying upon the Hellespont, οὗτις κίπρ πύριος: as we read, [in Porphyrie, in Grec. Euseb. Scaliger, pag. 228.] wherein Lysimachus fighting very valiantly in his own person, and having lost many of his men, was struck thorough with a great Spear, by one of Heraclea, whose name was Malacon: and so having seen the death of fifteen of his children, before him, remained as it were the last stone of his house, to be pulled down, [Pausan. in Attic. pag. 9, Memnon Excerpt. cap. 9, Appian in Syriac. pag. 128, 131, Justin lib. 27, cap. 1, & 2, Oros. lib. 3, cap. 21.] Appian saith, that he had then lived 70 years, Justin, and Orosius, 74, but Hieronymus Cardianus, the Historian, who then lived in great esteem, saith that he was at that time 80 years of age, as [Lucian, in Macrobii,] reporteth out of him.

When Lysimachus was fallen, a dog of his kept by the body, and beat off all birds and beasts from it: till at length one Thorax, of the country of Phardalia, having long sought for it, found it out, when it was almost perished, and knew it principally by his dog that lay by it; and Alexander his son by Odrissia, with much ado, and after many entreaties, gat it of Lyandra, and carried it into the Chersonese of Thrace, and there buried it: his bones were afterward translated to the Temple in Lysimachia, by the Citizens of the place, and there laid up in an Urne: which Temple, went afterward by the name of Lysimachium; [Pausan. and Appian.]

When he was dead, his kingdom accrued to Seleucus, as an addition to his former Monarchie, [Memnon,] with which, so great a victory he much pleased himself: and thereafter, for that he now saw himself the last alive of all that company, which went by the name of Alexander's fellows, or companions in arms; and a Conqueror of Conquerors, which he said, was a gift not of man, but of god himself, [Justin.]

The men of Heraclea in Pontus, hearing that Lysimachus was dead, and that he was slain by a country man of theirs, in the 34 year after that Clearchus had first usurped the Sovereignty over them, fell into a desire of recovering their native liberty, which after their town-born tyrants were extinct, Lysimachus had again taken from them; and in the recovery thereof, they showed themselves right valiant men for Lysimachus, though upon the death of the two Brothers, Clearchus the second, and Oxathres, he restored their liberty to the Citizens for a while; yet afterward, through the importunity of his wife Arsinoe, he made war atreth upon them, which [Justin lib. 27, cap. 3.] mentions; and having taken their City, he made one Heracleus Cimeus a man wholly at Arsinoes devotion, Governour over them, After Lysimachus his death therefore, the men of Heraclea dealt with this Heracleus, offering him not only all security for his own person, but also a large summe of money to bear his charges on the way: provided openly, that he would be gone, and leave them in their pristine and native liberty. And he thereupon, grew into a rage, and commanded some of them away presently to be put to death: which the Citizens perceiving, and having formerly understood agreed with the chief officers of the Garrison under him, to make them free of their City, and to pay them all their arrears which had been detained from them, fairly took Heracleus himself, and put him in prison: where they kept him for a while; But seeing themselves anon after free from all danger, they demolished the Citadel, which Lysimachus had built upon them; and sending an Embassage to Seleucus, to satisfie him concerning what they had done, made one Ptoecius, Superintendent or Curator of their State, [Memnon Excerpt. cap. 8, & 10.]

Zizæus, a petty King of Bithynia, growing angry with the men of Heraclea, first for Lysimachus, and now for Seleucus his sake (for he was enemy to them both) made inrodes upon their land, and spared not for any mischief that he could do them; where in nevertheless his men escaped not foot-free: but received oftentimes, as much damage them.

themselves as they did hurt to them, [Ibid. cap. 11.]

Mean while, Seleucus sent one Aphrodisius to the Cities of Phrygia, and places adjoining, to look to his profits and affairs there; who having dispatched the business he was sent about, at his return, gave large commendations of other Cities, but laid made things to the Heracleians charge; especially that they stood ill-affected to Seleucus himself: whereupon the King growing into cholier, scorned the Embassy sent by them unto him; and used many rough and minatory speeches to them; but there was one of them called Camelon, who, nothing daunted therewith, spake to Seleucus in this wise, Sir, Hercules, Caron, (now Caron in the Dorian Dialect or language, signifies, him that is the strongest) which word, when Seleucus understood not, perceiving in his former cholier against them, turned away from them. Whereupon the Messengers that were sent, conceived that it was no boote for them, either to stay there, or to return home again; which tidings coming to Heracles, they not only fortified their City, the best they could of themselves, but also fell to procuring of forraign aides; and sent their Ambassadors to Mithridates King of Pontus, and to the States of Byzantium, and Chalcedon, to pray in aide of them, [Ibid. cap. 12.]

But those who were banished and lived in exile from the State of Heracles, met together, and came to an agreement among themselves, which was this. There was one Nymphidius, who perswaded them to labour for a restitution to their Country; and told them it would be no hard matter to effect it, if they would desire restitution of what their ancestors had lost in a fair, and not in a turbulent way: whereunto they were all easily perswaded; and when thereupon all things fell out happily, and succeeded according to their desires, it was hard to say, whether they that thus returned to their Country, or their Country which thus received them home again, were the gladder of it; for both they who returned, used the Citizens, who had expelled them, very lovingly; and the Citizens suffered none of them to want for any necessarie and convenient means to live withall; and by this means they grew all into a body again, and returned into their pristine state of nobility and government; as they were before. [Ibid.]

Seleucus, purposing to end his dayes in his old and native Country of Macedonia, passed over the Hellespont, and going from thence to Lyfimachia, espied by chance, a certain altar standing in a conspicuous place, and asked what the name of that altar was; it was told him, that it was called Argos. Now it is said, that he had been forewarned by an oracle, to beware of Argos. But he further asked, why it was called Argos, whether from the Argonauta, which passed that way in elder time, when they went with Jason to Colchos; or from the Argivi, who went to the siege of Troy; or for that the great Argos, wherein Jason went, was there cast away in their return, or for that it was the Country of the Attrida, Agamemnon, and Menelaus; and as he was thus questioning about the name of that altar, Ptolemeus Ceraunus, the son of Ptolemei the first, by his wife Euridice, and brother to Antiochus the Relict of Lyfimachus, standing behind him, ran him thorough with his sword, and slew him; having been his great benefactor, and who had ever borne him up, and maintained him, and who would never let him be from him. And so Seleucus within seven months after the death of Lyfimachus, lost both the kingdom of Macedon, which he had taken from him, and his life withall.

Arrianus tells us, that Seleucus was the greatest man that was, after Alexander the Great, and the most nobly spirited of all the rest, and the extent of whose dominions, exceeded all others, [lib. de Reb. Alexand.] He died in the 43 year after the decease of Alexander, the 32 year of the Grecian, or Seleucian Calendar, having spent in his life, as Appian sayes, 73 years, but as Justin intimates, 78. His body was buried by Philocrates the Potentate of Pergamus, which he redeemed out of Ceraunus his hand, with a great sum of money; and having buried it in all solemn wife, sent his ashes to his son Antiochus, who receiving it in Seleucia, which stands upon the sea coast; adding a consecrated Chapel to his tomb, which from his surname, was called, Nicatorium, [Appian, in Syriac, pag. 129.] Justin tells us, that both he, and his sons, and grand-children after him, were all born with the signe of an anchor in one of their thighs; as a naturall badge and token of that race, [lib. 15. cap. 4.] And Antonius in his book de Claris Urbibus, (i. e. of famous Cities, speaking of Antiochia, saith, [l. 2.]

—*Ille Seleucum, &c.
She for her founder did Seleucus praise;
Who wore a native anchor in his thigh;
A true impress of his nativity,
And cognisance on all his progenie.*

But Polybius, [lib. 2. pag. 128.] notes, that Ptolemei the first, and Lyfimachus, and Seleucus; and Ptolemeus Ceraunus, all died about the 124 Olymp. and that Ptolemei the

the first, died in the first year of it, and Lyfimachus and Seleucus in the last: But Ceraunus died not till the later end of the first year of the Olympiade following: and whom therefore Polybius, mentioning again the concurrence of their deaths in the [same book, pag. 155.] seemeth of set purpose to have omitted.

Ceraunus, having thus murdered Seleucus, by the help of a swift horse, gat him to Lyfimachia; where putting a Crown upon his head, and taking a fair guard about him, he went unto the army, where of pure necessity the army received him, and cryed, God save the King; who had but a little before, sworn fealty to Seleucus. [Memnon, Excerpt. cap. 13.]

Antigonus, surnamed Gonatas, the son of Demetrius Poliorcetes, hearing how Seleucus was murdered, made a journey into Macedonia, purposing to prevent Ceraunus in those parts, both by his land and sea Forces. But Ceraunus, having all Lyfimachus his Fleet in a readinesse, drew out, and met him in right good array at sea: in which among other forts, there were from Heracles in Pontus sent him sundry vessels, some of six, some of five tire of oares, and such as were called Aphraë; and above all one of eight tire of oares, called the Leontifera, which for her great bulke, and exquisite buildings, was much admired by all that beheld her; for in her were an hundred oares, so that on each side there were 800 rowers, which made 1600 in all: and upon the upper deck or hatches, there were 1200 fighting men; under two special Commanders: inasmuch, as when they came to grapple, Ceraunus had by far the better of it; and Antigonus was faine to flee, with all his Navy. In this fight the ships from Heracles, did best; and among them the Leontifera best of all. Antigonus therefore being thus routed, fled into Bœotia, and Ptolemeus Ceraunus went into Macedonia, where he remained quiet by the space of two years, [Ibid. cap. 14. 15.] to wit, one full year and five months, as Dioxippus and Porphyrius, do more precisely relate this matter.

Ceraunus, growing now gracious in the eyes of the multitude, both in regard of his father Ptolemei the first of Egypt, and also for the revenge which he took of Lyfimachus his death, endeavoured first, to take in, and make faire with Lyfimachus his sons; and desired to marry Antiochus their mother, and his own sister, bearing them in hand, that he would adopt them for his children; and in regard that they were now to call him father, forbore attempting any thing against him. He also by his letters sought the love and friendship of his brother Ptolemeus Philadelphus King of Egypt, professing that he utterly forgot his losse of his fathers kingdom, and that he would never seek to get that from his brother, which he had already more fairly attained to, by getting it from an enemy. [Justin, lib. 17. cap. 2.] He made also a peace with Antiochus the son of Seleucus, whom he had murdered. [Id. lib. 24. cap. 1.]

Neither did he omit to sollicite Pyrrhus the King of Epirus to the same effect: supposing it would infinitely sway the scales, to which side soever he leaned. For as much as he also then lay at catch, to get any man estate that lay in his way; and offered himself to any man that would make use of him. In which humor, being to aid the Tarentines in Italy against the Romans, he sent to borrow ships of Antigonus Gonatas, to transport his army into Italy, to Antiochus the son of Seleucus deceased, to borrow money, because he seemed to be better stored of money, than of men; and to Ptolemeus Ceraunus, to furnish him with some companies of soldiers out of Macedonia: and Ceraunus presently sent him 5 thousand Foot, and 4 thousand Horse, and fifty Elephants; yet to serve him two years, and no longer. In requital of which favour, he took his daughter to wife, and left him Guardian and Protector of his kingdom of Epirus, during his absence; for fear, least while he was away, with the flower of his youth in Italy, some or other, might take advantage, and make a spoile thereof in his absence, [Id. lib. 17. cap. 2.]

Wherefore, leaving his son Ptolemei, whom he had by Antigone the daughter of Berenice, being but 15 years old, Governour of his kingdom, yet as it were under the tuition of the said Ptolemei Ceraunus King of Macedon, he took his journey, and with his army landed in the Port of Tarentum, now Otranto in Italy; taking with him his two younger sons, Alexander and Helenus, being very little ones, for his solace in so remote a war, [Id. lib. 18. cap. 1.] and never staying for the Spring, put over thither in the middle of Winter, as Zonaras reporteth, out of Dionysius Halicarnassensis in the 124 Olympiade, as [Polybius saith, lib. 2. pag. 129.] to wit, in the fourth and last year of that Olympiade.

Antiochus Soter, after his father Seleucus his death, held the kingdom of Syria 19 years. [Porphyrius, Eusebius, and Serv. Sulpitius:] who when, with much ado, and with many a battle fought, he had hardly recovered all his fathers Dominions: in the end, he sent an army under the command of Patrocles, to pass the mountain Taurus; and he chose him a Lieutenant, one Hermion, borne at Apudus. Now Patrocles his purpose was, to set upon Heracles, in the country of Pontus: but receiving satisfaction by an

Embatic

Embassy which they sent unto him, he forbear proceeding any further against them, and making a firme league with them, turned his counte, and passing thorough the country of Phrygia, came into Bithynia. But the Bithynians by an ambuscament which they laid for him, cutt off him, and his whole army, and utterly destroyed them; where in yet Patrocles himself played all the parts of a most valiant man, and did with his own hand many exploits upon the enemy. [Memnon, Excerpt. cap. 16.] and Zipates the King of Bithynia, having thus destroyed Antiochus his army, built a City at the foot of the hill Liparus, and called it after his own name. [Id. ibid. cap. 21.]

In the end of the fiftieth year of the first Periode of Calippus, being the 44 from the death of Alexander the Great, Aristarchus of Samos, took an observation of the Summer Solstice; and after that Meton did the like for 15 or 9 decades of years: as Cl. Ptolemaeus in his book De anni Magnitudine, reporteth out of Hipparchus, [ib. 3, Syn-tax. cap. 2.]

Artinoe, the Relict of Lyfimachus, being married to her own brother, Ptolemaeus Ceraunus, received him into her City of Cassandrea: and he presently, seizing upon the Castle there, took her two sons, which she had by Lyfimachus, the one called Lyfimachus of the age of 16 years, the other, Philipus, being but 3 years old, and slew them both in their mothers arms; and she her self rending her clothes and tearing her hair, was haled out of the gates of the City with two servants onely, and sent into banishment to the Isle of Samothracia. [Justin, lib. 24. cap. 2. & 3. Memnon, Excerpt. cap. 15.]

In the beginning of the second year after Pyrrhus his arrival in Italy, the Galls invaded Greece, [Polyb. lib. 1. pag. 6.] for they, dividing their whole army into three parts, and allotting to every part, their work to do; one fell in upon the Thracians and Triballi, under the conduct of Cerebrius; the second upon Pannonias, under Brennus and Acichorius; the third upon Macedonia and Illyrium, under Belgus, [for so Justin, lib. 24. cap. 5, and lib. 25. cap. 2, call him] not Belgus, as Paulianus names him, [Paulianus, in Phocis.]

Ptolemaeus Ceraunus, with a small company, and they not all of the best marshalled neither, (as it wars were as easily waged, as murders are committed) driven on with the furies of his wicked minde, went out against Belgus; and when the King of the Dardani offered to aid him against these new-come Galls, with 20 thousand men, he would none of them: and when the Galls sent Messengers to him, offering him peace for money, he sent them back word, that he would not give them peace, unlesse they delivered their armes, and the principal of their army, for hostages of their good abearing unto him. So to it they went, and the Macedons not able to endure the impression of the Galls, fled before them: Ptolemaeus himself being sorely wounded, and the Elephant on which he rode, being also wounded, and thereupon grown unruly, was cast off his back, and taken by the Galls, and by them torne in pieces; his head cutt off, and being taken upon the point of a Spear, was carried about for a terror to the enemy. Few of the Macedons escaped; the rest were either slain or taken prisoners, [Justin, lib. 24. cap. 4, 5, lib. 23. cap. 2, with Memnon Excerpt. cap. 15. Diod. Sic. lib. 22. Sec. 3. Paulianus in Phoc. pag. 335.]

After Ptolemaeus, in the kingdom of Macedon, succeeded his brother Meleager; and him the Macedons, after two months space, ejected, as a man unworthy of the place; and put in Antipater, the son of Philip, who was brother to Cassander; of whom, [Justin, lib. 22. cap. 14.] maketh mention: and whom they nicknamed the Eresian, because he continued in the place but 45 dayes, for therabouts it is, that the Eresian winds blew upon that coast to blow every year, and no more, [Porphy. in Grac. Ensch. pag. 228.]

Brennus, (who, some say, was by birth a Pausanias, as we read in [Strabo, lib. 4. pag. 187.] hearing of this great victory gotten by Belgus, fretting in himself, to see that he had letten slip out of his hands to faire an opportunity of getting so great a Prey, as the whole riches of the East: gathered together 150 thousand Foot, and 15 thousand Horse of his Galls, and marched in all haste into Macedonia, Justin, lib. 24. cap. 6.] but coming into the country of the Dardani, a people in Illyrium, was forced to stay there, by reason of a mutiny which rose in his army: for to the number of 50 thousand of his men, (which number Suidas also, in the word Galatz haz) with Leonorius and Lutarius their Captains, fell from him, and went away into Thracia; and what with fighting, what with selling peace to those that would buy it of them, came at length to Byzantium: and having for a while wasted the country of Propontis, and making it tributary to them, possessed themselves at last, of all the Cities in those parts, [Liv. lib. 38.]

Softhenes, a chief man in Macedonia, gathering together the youth and lusty gallants of the country, made head against those Galls that there were, and quelled them in many encounters, and defended the country from their further plundrings. For which which great service, when many of the Nobles there strove for the kingdom, he being a man of obscure place and parentage, and of no Royal blood, was yet preferred before them all; and when they would have made him King, he refused it, and made them take their oath to him, as to their Captain or Commander onely, [Justin, lib. 24. cap. 5.] and in that capacity, he governed that country two years, [Porphyrie and Ensch.]

When Brennus came into Macedonia, and there fell to spoiling and ravaging of the Country, Softhenes met him with his army; but so few as they were against so many, and heartlesse against men grown haughty upon so many victories, the Macedons were quickly overthrowne, and fled to their Cities; where whilst they kept themselves, not daring to peep out, Brennus with his army, overran and plundered all the Country, [Justin, lib. 24. cap. 6.]

Leonorius and Lutarius getting by a trick, into Lyfimachia, and possessing themselves entirely of the Chersonese there, came down from thence into Hellepont, and there finding how little a cut it was over into Asia, had a great mind to passe over into it; and sent their Agents to Antipater the Governour of Hellepont, to treat with him about their passage, [Liv. lib. 38.]

Zipates, having now reigned in Bithynia, full 48, and lived 76 years, died, leaving four sons: the eldest of which, was called Nicomedes, who succeeded his father in the kingdom, and proved to his brothers, not a brother, but a butcher, [Memnon, Excerpt. cap. 21.] but the younger who was called Zipates, and whom [Liv. lib. 38.] calleth Zabaz, held the sea coast of Bithynia, which went by the name of Thracia Thyniacas, et Asiatica, [ib. cap. 18.]

Now, when after Zipates his death, Antiochus Soter prepared to make war upon Bithynia, Nicomedes sent and prayed in aid of the City of Heraclea; promising to do the like for them, if they ever happened to stand in need of him: whereupon they sent him aid at that present; and by this occasion they afterward, though with great expence of monie, recovered Cierus and Tius, and the land of Thinis: But when they went about to recover the City and Territory of Amestris, (which had also been taken from them) and spared neither for war nor money to recover it: Eumenes who held it, as Governour onely, chose for very spite to give it up to Anicibrazanes the son of Mithridates, then King of Pontus, gratis, rather than to render it to the State of Heraclea, upon any termes, [Ibid. cap. 17.]

Brennus and Acichorius, with the Illyrians (as Appianus in Illyria telleth us) whom they call Autarians, and Celts, whom they call Cimbrians, left Macedonia, and went into Greece, with an army of 150000 Foot, and 20400 Horse, every of which Horse had two loomen attending on him, they on horseback likewise, to help their Masters, if occasion were, and to supply his place, if he happened to be slain: but, when they went to plunder the Temple at Delphos, they were terribly beaten off with Thunder and Lightning, with Earthquakes, and with the sinking of the ground under them in the Mount Olympus, and with bitter Frost and Snow, being then the Winter Season, and miserably distressed in all kinds: and they which were slain by the sword of the Phocetians themselves, were little less than six thousand men. There fell upon them likewise, a panick fear; and by a Frost falling in a night, they lost upward of ten thousand more, and as many more perished of very hunger in the place. Brennus their Leader, vexed with the wounds which he had received in his body, and for very shame of such his overthrow, having first fill'd himself with drink, fell upon his own sword and died: and Acichorius, seeing how the heads of this were punished, gat him hastily, with a company of 10 thousand poor maimed souldiers out of Greece; but the continual stormes of rain and snow, with bitter frosts and famine, and which was worst of all, perpetual waking, utterly consumed the reliques of this unlucky army; and all nations thorough which they passed in their return, fell upon them as they went, here and there scattered, and made a prey of them, [Paulian. in Phoc. & Attic. Justin, lib. 24. cap. 6, 7, 8. Eclog. Diodor. lib. 22. Sec. 13. Appian. Illyr. pag. 758.] which calamity Polybius, [lib. 2. pag. 108.] notes to have befallen them, year 2. of the 125 Olympiade, and when Anaxicrates was Lord Chancellor of Athens, [Paulian. in Phoc. pag. 340.]

As for those of Illyrium, called Autarians, which escaped this misfortune, when they came home into their own country, they found themselves there pestered with such a multitude of frogs, sent upon them, that they corrupted the very Rivers with their putrefaction; and then a vapour rising out of the earth after them, bred a pestilence thoroughout all the Country, till they were faine to flee from their native soile; but carrying the plague along with them, no Country would receive them, and so were they faine to go on 23 dayes journey, till they came into the country of the Bithynians, and there they built them cities to dwell in, moreover it is said, that the land of the Celts, was plagued with Earthquakes, and in them whole Cities swallowed

lowed up; and that these plagues still followed them, till at last they also were forced to leave their habitation, and went wandering till they came to the Country of the Illyrians, who were partakers with them in their action at Delphos; and them, as being already consumed with the plagues, they easily overcame, but taking the infection there by mocking with their goods, they were slain again to be gone from thence, and wandered till they came to Pyrene, [Appian, iii. sup.] of all which horrid, strange, and miraculous plagues and punishments falling upon these Galls and others formerly mentioned, or hereafter to be mentioned, for their sacrilegious acts committed against their Idols, we may truly say, and must conclude, that to be most true, which the wise man saith of them, who swear falsely by them, That it was not the power of them by whom they swear, nor of them, whom they thus robbed, but the just vengeance of God, from the true God, which punisheth always the offences of the ungodly, [Wisd. chap. 14. v. ult.]

As for the Cordixæ, who were a part of the Galls, which attempted the plundering of Delphos, it is said, that one Bathanius their Captain, leaped them near the bank of the river Ister, from whom it is, that the way by which they returned, was afterward called Bathanius his way, as Athenæus tells us, [lib. 6. cap. 4.] which are the same Galls, which Strabo calls, the Scordixæ, teased upon the Ister, and they put these Autariæ, or Autoriæ, from their possession, which they had there gotten, [lib. 7. pag. 293. 294. 313. 317. 318.]

And now for those Galls, who as I said before, went out of Thrace, down to the streit of Hellespont, upon a discord raised among them Leonoræ, with the greater part of his men, returned to Byzantium, from whence he came. But Lutarius took from the Macedons, who were sent by Antipater, to him, as [spies upon him, under the colour of Ambassadors, five ships, which he used to transport his men by some and some, day and night, till he had landed them all in Asia, [Livius, lib. 38.]

And now to return to where we left, the war growing between Zipetes, the Bithynian, and the state of Heraclea, Zipetes got the victory of them, but succours coming to them from other parts, Zipetes was slain to fly; whereupon the Heracleians, getting the bodies of their slain, burnt them, and carried their bones into the City, and laid them up in their charnel howles, as the bones of men, who among others had excellently well deserved of their Country, [Memorus Excerpt, cap. 18.]

About the same time, Antiochus Soter, and Antigonus Gonatas, making each of them great provisions for war, one against the other, Nicomedes, King of Bithynia, sided with Antigonus; but others with Antiochus, Antiochus therefore, forbearing Antigonus for the present, matched first against Nicomedes, whereupon he was slain to gather what aides he could from ether parts, and among the rest lent to his friends the Heracleians, and got from them 13 ships, of three tire of oars a piece, and then went to encounter Antiochus upon the sea, and their fleets met indeed, but having stood at gaze a while, and looking only one upon another, each party drew off again, and so nothing was done between them that time, [lib. cap. 29.]

They of Byzantium, wearied out with the continual incursions and plunderings of the Galls, sent their Ambassadors about to their friends, and got of the Heracleians a thousand, some say, four thousand Crowns; and not long after, Nicomedes dealt with these Galls, and upon terms, procured them to come to his help in Asia; which terms were these: That they should for ever continue firm and fast friends to Nicomedes, and his heirs. That without his privy and consent, they should lend no helping hand to any that by Embassies should implore their aid in their wars, but should be friends to his friends, and foes to his foes. Item, That they should help them of Byzantium, if occasion were. Item, That they should maintain league and friendship with the Thracians, and Heracleians, and Chalcidians, and some other States, which had other nations under their jurisdiction, [lib. cap. 20. 21.] and so Leonorius by the means of Nicomedes, King of Bithynia, put over from Byzantium into Asia side, [Livius lib. 38. Strabo lib. 12. pag. 566.] Now this passage of the Galls into Asia, Pausanias in Phoc. [p. 340.] tells us, was in the third year of 125 Olymp.

Neither yet were they of Byzantium hereby quite rid of those plundering Galls, for some of those who were at Delphos with Brennus, and escaped that danger, came into Hellespont under their Captain Comontorius, and they had no mind to go any further, but liking well of the Country which lay about Byzantium, there fate them down, and having conquered the Thracians, and made Tyla the head City of their kingdom, put Byzantium into as great a fear of an utter ruin, as they were in before, [Polyb. lib. 4. pag. 323.]

Ptolemæus Philadelphus, being a great favourer of learning, and all liberal, arts and sciences, built a most famous library at Alexandria, in that quarter of the City which was called Brachium; and having committed the care of getting books of all sorts, and out of all Countries, to Demetrius Phalerus, upon his advice, he also sent to have the holy writings of the Jews to be translated out of Hebrew into Greek by 72 interpreters, preters in the seventh year of his reign, as Epiphanius in his book, de mensuris & ponderibus, (i. e.) of weights and measures, reporteth, of which Tertullian, [cap. 18. Apologies,] thus writeth: The most learned King, saith he, of all the Ptolemies, surnamed Philadelphus, and most exquisitely seen in all kind of literatures, studying, as I conceive, to enlarge Philibris in the matter of libraries, among all other monuments, which either amicitie or civility could afford, for the eternizing of a mans fame to posterity, by the advice and setting on of Demetrius Phalerus, a most excellent scholar, and humanist in those days, whom he had set over that work, desired of the Jews to have their books also.

And verily that this Ptolemæus, if ever any King, was infinitely addicted to the studies of humane learning, is confirmed by Phylarchus, vouched by Athenæus, [lib. 12. cap. 17. Deipnosoph.] which is more fully delivered by Vitruvius, in his preface to his book of Architecture, where he sheweth, that having finished his great library at Alexandria, he instituted certain games in honour of Apollo and the Muses: whereunto he invited all writers in the common arts and sciences, (as others were wont to do, wrilters and the like) to put in for the prize; and appointed great rewards to them who were found to excell, and surpass the rest in them, and shewed how he entertained Zolius, surnamed Hemarmathæx, (i. e.) the scourge of Homer, when he came unto him.

For this collection of books, Aristotle shewed him the way, for he at his death, left his library to Theophrastus, and Theophrastus by his last will and testament, which we find in Diog. Laertius, left it to Nileus Scaphrus, [Strabo lib. 13. pag. 608. Plus in Sylla,] and from him Ptolemæus bought them, besides others which he bought at Athens and Rhodes; and brought them all to Alexandria, as Athenæus, [lib. 1. cap. 1.] teacheth us, though Strabo and Plutarch in the places above mentioned, and Athenæus himself elsewhere, to wit, [lib. 5. cap. 11.] say, that Theophrastus his books, and with them all Aristotles library, came to the hands of Neleus his heirs, and were by his successours, and long after in the dayes of Sylla, sold for a great sum of money, to one Apellion the Teian.

Keeper of this great library after Demetrius Phalerus, (who was not only a great Grammarian, for which only Tertullian commends him, but also a singular Philosopher, and one who had been formerly a great States-man, and an excellent Governour in Athens) was one Zenodorus of Ephesus, (the first Corrector of Homers books) as Suidas saith, and after him Ariftothæus, who with great diligence and industry, read over all the books of that great library, in order as they stood; as Vitruvius in his forementioned Preface to his book of Architecture affirmeth. But this was afterward: and therefore to return to the time we are now upon. Ariftothæus in his Treatise of the 70 interpreters, and after him Josephus, lib. 12. Antiq. cap. 2. and Ensch. lib. 8. de Prepar. Evangelii, speak, as followeth.

Demetrius Phalerus, being upon a time asked by King Ptolemæus, how many Myriads or ten thousands of books he had gotten together, answered, about 20 Myriads, but hoped ere long, to make them 50 Myriads, which number of 200000 books, since we find, not only in Ariftothæus, which we now have, but also in those Copies which Josephus and Eusebius heretofore used, that that lesser sum of 54800, found in Epiphanius, who wrote long after them, is in no wise to be admitted.

Demetrius Phalerus, advised the king, as I said before, to ask those sacred writings of the Jews; but Ariftothæus, who was an attendant about him, at that time, advised him, for the purchasing of them, to set all the Jews, who were then [slaves in Egypt] at liberty, and send them home; and it is said that the number of them came to 10 Myriades, (i. e.) one hundred thousand soules; and in our copy of Ariftothæus, it is said: that every one of them cost the King 20 drachmaes, or 200, as it is in Josephus: now 200 drachmaes, make 30 sicles, or staters, or tetradrachmaes in silver, which was the full price of a slave in Exod. c. 21. 32. [at which rate our Saviour also, what time, for our sakes, he took the form of a slave upon him in the flesh, was sold by Judas the traitor, now those 20 drachmaes which we find in our Ariftothæus, being multiplied by 10 Myriades (i. e.) 100 thousand amount to 2000000 drachmaes, which again being divided by 6000 which make just an Attick talent, make 333; Attick talents; now the price which Ptolemæus paid to redeem the Jews from their masters, came to above 400 talents, both by Josephus his and also by our Ariftothæus his account: because it is said that there were above 10 Myriades paid, in which redemption of the Jewish slaves from their masters the like price was paid for every sucking child of them, together with the mothers which they suckt on over and above, whence it is that Josephus saith that Ptolemæus paid in this kind, upward of 460 talents, in stead of which our vulgar editions of Ariftothæus have 460 talents.

Of these Jews Ptolemæus took the younger sort and ablest of them into his army, and of the rest, such as he thought fit, he employed in his private affairs, as in his letters to Eleazar the High Priest, himself affirmeth, for which one true letter of the Kings, Epiphanius Epiphanius giveth us two forged ones, far different both in stile, and meaning, from that which we find in Aristeas, and Josephus, the latter of which beginneth thus, ὁμοῦν τὸ χρησθένος, &c. (i. e.) of a treasure that is hidden, and of a fountain sealed up, what profit is there? whereas in the greek one attributed to the king, who doth not perceive a manifest Hebraisme, and that taken out of Ecclesiast. [c. 20. 30.] Wisdom is if it be hidden, and a treasure unseen, what profit is there of either of them?

But together with that Epistle, he sent also rich presents to the use of the Temple at Jerusalem, by Andrazas, and Aristeas his two servants; to be delivered to Eleazar the High Priest, as namely, a golden table of two cubits long, (and an ials, as Josephus addeth) and no less than half a cubit thick, all of solid gold, and not covered over only with plates of gold; with 80 goblets of like gold, and 30 of silver, for the making of all which, he allowed over and above, 50 talents weight of gold, and 70 of silver, and precious stones to the number of 5 thousand, so that these stones amounted in the value of them, to five times as much as the gold which he sent, came unto, and the workmanship thereunto belonging, besides all which he sent 400 talents for sacrifices and other uses of the Temple.

Eleazar the Priest, receiving these presents, out of every tribe, (for that after the captivity there remained some of 10 tribes of the twelve, I shewed before in the year of the World 3468. c.) he chose first principal men, most eminent above all others, for ripeness of age, for nobility, for learning and experience; which should translate Gods Law, out of Hebrew into Greek; the particular names of the which 72 elders are expressly delivered by Aristeas; the last of which called Ezekiel, I conceive to be none other but him, whom Eusebius in the ninth book, de Prepar. Evangelic. reporteth to have written a Tragedie of the bringing forth, or deliverance of the children of Israel out of Egypt; for the very name of Ezekiel sheweth, that he was of the Jewish race, and not a Greek; as Clemens Alexandrinus, and Eusebius, thought he was.

Eleazar also wrote back a letter to the King, the beginning whereof, as we find in Aristeas, was this, Αὐτίς τιμήσω, (i. e.) God save you, or as Eusebius, more rightly, Εὐχὴς τιμήσω, &c. (i. e.) If your self are well, and the Queen Aristeas your sister, all is well, and as we desire it should be: for Philadelphus after the death of Arsinoe, the daughter of Lyfimachus King of Thrace and Macedon, by whom he had Ptolemaeus Evergetes, and Berenice (of whom more in their proper places) married a second Arsinoe, his own sister, which after the death of Lyfimachus her first husband was married to Ptolemaeus Ceraunus her own brother, but the dyed, before he bare any child to Philadelphus, on whom he lo doted, that he called a province in Egypt, Arsinoitis, after her name, [Pausan. in Attic. pag. 7.] and made her a statue of 10 paces stone, four cubits high, and consecrated her in a Temple, which was called the golden Temple, [Plinie lib. 27. c. 8.] and by his appointment, Dinocrates the Architect, set him to make an archroof over her, all of load-stone, to the end, that an image of her made of Iron, might cleave thereto, and seem there to hang in the air, [Id. lib. 14. cap. 14.] of which Dinocrates, Autonius in his 9 Idyllion, speaking, saith;

*Iustus ob incestu qui quondam factus amoris, &c.
(i. e.) Who for a monument of incestuous love,
By Ptolemaeus command did make to hang,
Arsinoe in the air of an Egyptian Kirk.*

These 72 interpreters entering into Alexandria, presented the King with such things as Eleazar had sent unto him, together with sundry parchments, wherein the law was written, with golden letters, in the language of the Jews, all curiously written, and the parchments so joyned together, that the seaming of them could not be discerned by the eye of man. and it fell out, that they came thither at a time, when news came to him of a great victory gotten by him at sea against Antigonus, of which sea fight, for want of writers in that time, I find no mention made in any other place but this, for I can no wayes approve their judgement, who refer it to that time, when Antigonus Gonatas making war upon the Athenians, besieged their Cities by sea and land, which we find by Justin, [lib. 26. and by Pausan. in Laconic.] was not till after the death of Pyrrhus, and before the death of Arctas, or Arcus the first King of Macedon, which was between the years 444, and 445, according to the Julian account: for albeit that Arcus with his land forces, and Patrocles with Ptolemaeus fleet, came at that time to the succour of the Athenians, yet seeing that Arcus returned home without any battle fought, Pausanias shewes, that Patrocles did nothing neither for their relief, [in Attic. pag. 7. and in Laonic. 87.]

But concerning our 72 interpreters, Ptolemy to entertain them, seafed them seven dayes, or as Josephus hath it, 12 dayes, in a most sumptuous and magnificent manner, and afterward appointed one Dorotheus to take care of them, and to supply them with with all necessities, nor letting them want for any thing, for their table or otherwise. And the King himself would now and then put them questions, some concerning affairs of State, some of morality; whereunto they extempore made him very prudent and well advised answers: as we find in Aristeas, who took all that he wrote out of the Kings Diaries, or Day-books; then caused he three talents to be given to each of them and the boy that carried them.

Three dayes after, one Demetrius walking along the caufway, called the H-Prastadium, that is a mile, wanting one furlong, with the Interpreters, led them over the bridge into the Isle of Pharos, and there placed them in a goodly house, up in the north hoar of the Islands, and far off from any noise or tumult; and they there let themselves every man to his work of the Translation, most exactly fitting it to the meaning of the Original: which done, Demetrius caused it to be laudably exhibited: every day they sat at it till three of the clock in the afternoon; and then went and took their repast: having all things abundantly provided for them, and especially their diet, of the same kind that was provided for the Kings own table, did Dorotheus see them furnished withal, by the Kings appointment. Moreover, every morning very early, they came to Court, and there having bid the King good-morrow, returned to their place: and there having walke their hand, as their manner was, and said their prayers, they let themselves to read, and to interpret from point to point; But Epiphanius, varying herein from Aristeas and Josephus, writes that they were put into 36 cells; to wit, two together in every one of them; and there continued from break of day, to the very evening; and that then they were put into 36 boats, (i. e.) two into a boat, and so brought back to the Kings Palace, and there ate of the Kings diet: in the former part of which Narration, he followeth I know not whom; but in the latter, it seems, as led by their Fables, which dream't that the caufway of 7 furlongs was not made, at least not finished, till Cleopatraes time.

And it so fell out, that this work of the 72 Interpreters was finished in 72 dayes, as if it had been so cast by them of set purpose; which done, Demetrius calling all the Jews together in the place where it was done, read it all over in the presence of the Interpreters themselves: and they as the authors and finishers of so great a good, were highly commended and magnified by all the Jews there present; Demetrius also himself wanted not his share of praises among them: and they bestowed him, that he would deliver a copy of the law, so translated to their Rulers. And when it had been all read over to them, then the Priests and Elders of the Interpreters, and the Magistrates and Officers of the Jews, stood up and said, Forasmuch as this Interpretation is religiously, and in every point accurately performed, it is requisite and fit, that it should stand as it is, and that no alteration be made in it. And when all approved that saying of theirs, with a great acclamation, then Demetrius required to lay a great curse (as the manner was) upon any man that should offer to alter it, by adding any thing thereto, or taking any thing therefrom.

And when all had been in like manner read over to the King, he infinitely admired the wisdom of the Legislator; and commanded all possible care to be taken of those Books, and that they should be religiously laid up and kept. He also desired the Interpreters themselves, that after their return home, they would not fail to come often to him again; and gave to every of them, three faire Gownes, two Talents of Gold, a Cup of one whole Talent, and the full furniture of a Chamber.

And moreover, to Eleazar the High Priest, he sent by them, ten beds with Silver feet, and rich furniture thereunto belonging: a Cup of 30 Talents, ten Raiments, with Scarlet, and a Crown richly wrought, and about one hundred pieces of Linen, as fine as Silke; and withal, Viols, and Mazers, and two golden Goblets, to sacrifice withal; and by his letters desired him, that if any of these men had at any time a desire to come and visit him, he would not hinder them; for that he infinitely desired to converse with such kind of men, and chose to spend his money upon them rather than any other way.

The Galls, which were left by Brennus, when he went into Greece, to keep Macedon, least they should seem to sit idle, whilst their fellows were at work, fitted out 15 thousand Foot, and 3 thousand Horse, and set upon the Getes, and the Triballi, and routed them, [Justin, lib. 25. cap. 2.]

Antigonus Gonatas, having lost a battle at sea, as was said before, by Ptolemaeus Philadelphus his men, made a peace with Antiochus Soter, as Justin, shewes, [lib. 25. cap. 2.] and went into Macedonia, where his father Demetrius Poliorcetes had sometimes reigned, and which himself, coming to it in the tenth year after his first being King of Greece, held 34 years, [Porphyria, in Graec. Encheiridion, pag. 229.] whose Heirs continued King there down to Pariceus; in whom, being overcome by the Romans, the kingdom of Macedon, was ending, [Plinie, in Demetrius.]

The Galls, having overcome the Getes and the Triballi, sent their Ambassadors to Antigonus

Antigonus the King of Macedon, to offer him peace for his money; but withal to give his army, and the manner of his Camp: These Antigonus entertained and feasted in sumptuous manner: but the Galls seeing the infinite store of Silver and Gold set forth for the feast, for greediness thereof, returned more his enemies than they came. And thereupon, resolved with one accord to set upon him: but he having got an inclining of their coming, gave order that every man should take with him what he could, and lie close in a wood adjoining the Galls came on, and taking what they there found, turned away to the sea side; where, whiles they were busy in rifling the ships, the Mariners, and a part of the army which was thither fled with their wives and children to save themselves, set upon them unawares, and slew them, and made such havock of them, that the reputation thereof secured Antigonus from thence forward, not only from the Galls, but also from all the nations round about him. [Justin lib. 25, cap. 10 & 2.]

Now as touching those Galls, who under their 17 Commanders, the chief whereof were Leonorius and Lutarius afore named, passed over it several times into Asia, they all came again into one body, and offered their assistance to Nicomedes against Zibæus, al. Zibetus the younger, who held the coast of Bithynia lying upon the sea; by these, and others which came from Heraclea in Pontus, was poor Zibetus crushed to pieces; and so Bithynia came all into the hands of Nicomedes. But the Galls having wasted that Country all over, shared the spoil thereof among themselves; and then dividing the kingdom between them and Nicomedes, called their portion thereof, by the name of Gallogracia. [Livie lib. 38, Justin, lib. 25, cap. 2. Memnon Excerpt, cap. 20.]

Of 20 thousand men that they were, there were not above 10 thousand armed; yet they struck such a terror into all the Nations and Countries on this side the Taurus as well the places which they went not to, as those they did go to, far and near, all submitted to them. And whereas they consisted of three nations of their own, to wit, the Tolistobogians, al. the Tolistoboiens, (coming, as was thought, from the Galls, which were called the Boii) the Trocmi, and the Teotolagi, they divided all Asia between them, according to the several parts thereof, where they planted themselves: to the Trocmies lot, fell Hellepont, and all that coast Eolia and Ionia, fell to the Tolistobogii, and the Teotolagi possessed the inland or middle part of Asia; but they made their chief seat upon the bank of the river Halys. [Liv. lib. 28, and Strabo in the word Galatia.]

Of this passing of the Galls out of Europe into Asia, Demetrius Byzantius wrote 13 books, as [Laert, in the Life of Demetrius Phalerus] sayes, which one Phacnis, who lived a whole age before this fell out, is said by way of oracle to have foretold, in these words,

Δὲ νῆρ' ἀπὸ τοῦ Ἰαννῶ, &c. (i.e.)
The Galls shall passe the streight of Hellepont,
And ravage all the land of Asia;
Yet worse things shall God in store for them,
Who on the sea coast of that land do dwell.

In the 126 Olympiade, Eratosthenes Cyrenæus, the son of Aglai, or, as others, of Ambrosius, was born. He was a scholar of Aristotle the Philosopher, and of Lyfianias of Cyrene the Grammarian, and of Callimachus of Cyrene a Poet, [Strabo, in the word Eratosthenes.]

3730. Curius Dentatus, this year fought with Pyrrhus in Italy: and having slain 23 thousand of his men, and taken his Camp, made him retreat to Tarentum. [Entrep. lib. 2.]

When the Ambassadors, which Pyrrhus had sent to the Kings of Asia, and to Antigonus Gonatas, to help him with men and money, and they returned without either, to him; he called the Princes of the Epixores and Tarentines together, and, suppressing the letters, told them, that supplies would come very speedily. But when the same hereof came among the Romans in their Camp, and that there were great supplies coming to him out of Macedon and Asia both, that report held them quiet from attempting any thing more upon him, [Pausan, in Attic, pag. 11.] But Pyrrhus, never telling why, made as if he would remove with his army from Tarentum. Mean while, willed his confederates to provide for war, and committed the keeping of the Castle at Tarentum to his son Helenus, and to one of his Nobles, whose name was Milo. [Justin lib. 25, cap. 3.] and when he had spent six whole years in the war in Italy and Sicily, and lost many of his men, and had no hope left, of doing any good, he returned into Epirus, with those eight thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, which he had left, [Plut in Pyrr.]

Curius

Curius in his Consulship triumphed of Pyrrhus; and was the first that brought Elephants (four in number) to be seen in Rome, [Entrep. lib. 2.] nor did the people behold any thing in that triumph more willingly, than those beasts with turrets on the backs of them, and which they were so much afraid of: which very beasts seemed to have a sense of their captive condition, by holding down their heads, as they followed the victorious horse in the triumph, [Florus, Rer. Rom. lib. 1, cap. 18.] which triumph, was made in the month of Jan, or Febr. as is gathered out of the Marble fragments of the Records of their Triumphs.

Pyrrhus, getting some of the Galls to joyn with him, made some inroads upon Macedonia, where Antigonus Gonatas then reigned. And having gotten many Cities, and two thousand of Antigonus his souldiers revolting to him, and his hopes still increasing, he marched directly against Antigonus himself to bid him battle; and put him with all his Forces, Macedons and Galls to flight, Of which Galls who brought up the reare, and fought that day very manfully, many were cut in pieces, and died in the place; and the Captains of the Elephants, being distressed by the enemy, yielded themselves and Elephants unto him. The Macedon Foot standing amazed at this overthrow, and hearing Pyrrhus calling upon them all in general, and upon their Captains, and chief Officers by name, to yield unto him, left Antigonus, and fell to him; and when Antigonus saved himself by flight, Pyrrhus pursued him to the sea side, [Plut. in Pyrrho, Pausan, in Attic, pag. 11, 12.]

After this victory to gotten, Pyrrhus took the richest and fairest spoils of the Galls, and hung them up in the Temple of Pallas of Ionia, which is between Phera, &c. Larissa: and brought all the upper Macedonia and Thessalie into his subjection, [Id. ibid.] and as if this had made him amends for Italy and Sicily, which he reckoned he had lost, sent for his son Helenus from the Castle of Tarentum where he had left him, [Justin, lib. 25, cap. 3.]

When Pyrrhus had spoiled the City Egeas, which was the Royal Seat of the late Kings of Macedon, and where they lay buried, he left there the Galls who had followed him in this war, to keep it, who when they had heard by some, that in the Tombs of the Kings which there lay, there was great store of treasure hid, according to the fashion of old times, they brake down the Tombs themselves, and took away such wealth as was in them; threw their bones about the streets, and basely trampled them under their feet. But Pyrrhus, though finding that by that act of theirs, he himself was ill spoken of among the Macedons, yet blamed he not them therefore openly, knowing what need he had of them in his wars, [Plut. in Diodor. lib. 22, in the Excerpt, by Valer. pag. 266.]

Antigonus, with some few Horse that followed him, came to Thessalonica, there to attend the event of things, and what would become of Macedonia, now he had lost it: purposing to put for it again, by the help of such mercenary Galls as he had taken into his pay. But being a second time utterly defeated by young Ptolemy, Pyrrhus his son, with seven only in his company, he skulkt up and down, seeking no longer now to recover his kingdom, but to save his own skull, [Justin, lib. 25, cap. 3.] And Pyrrhus reproached him, calling him an impudent fellow, for that, notwithstanding the condition he was in, yet he would not get him a cloak to wear, as other Grecians did, but continued still in his Scarlet Robe, [Plut. in sup.]

3731. In the year when Caius Fabius Licinius, and Caius Claudius Caninus, were Consuls of Rome, Ptolemy Philadelphus, hearing of the great overthrow of Pyrrhus by the Romans, and how they began to grow in the world, sent his Ambassadors, with presents from Alexandria to Rome, and made a league and covenant with them, [Entrep. lib. 2, Liv. lib. 14, Dio. in Excerpt, Legation, published at Rome by Fulvius Ursinus, ad Jo. Zonar. Chron. lib. 4.] and the Romans being glad to see that to great a King as he was, thus sought their friendship; sent likewise their Ambassadors to him, to wit, Q. Fabius Gurgus, Cn. Fabius Pictor, and Quin. Ogulnius. These, having received rich presents from the King, as soon as they came home, and before they went to yield an account of their Embassy to the Senate, went and gave up all that ever they had received from him into the Treasury; rightly conceiving, that out of a publick service for the Common-wealth, they ought not to reap any benefit of their well-doing, have onely praise and honour; but all was restored to them again, not onely by a Decree of the Senate, but also by the general vote of the people; and the Questors were commanded, to go and deliver to every of them his own again. So that in this one thing, the bounty and magnificence of Ptolemy, the sincerity of the Ambassadors, the equity of the Senate, and whole people of Rome, had every of them the praise due and belonging to them, [Diod. ut. sup. Valer. Max. lib. 4, cap. 3.]

3732. In the 13 year, according to Dionysius, on the 25 day of Egon or Capricornion, in the 52 year from the death of Alexander the Great, or 476 from the beginning of Naballassar account, on the 20 day of Athyr, (17 of our January) the Planet of Mars

		was observed to be in the morning, under the northerly part, of the forehead of the Scorpion. [Cl. Ptol. lib. 10. cap. 9.] Pyrthus, having obtained the kingdom of Macedon, began now to look after the sovereignty of all Greece and Asia. [Justin. lib. 25. cap. 4.] But before he had quite subdued all Macedon, he was sent unto by Cleonymus of Sparta to come and help him in his wars at Laconia. [Pausan. in Attic. pag. 12.] in the absence of Areus their King, who was then away in Crete, helping the men of Gortyna there, who were then oppressed with a war. Pyrthus therefore went, with 25 thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse, and 24 Elephants which great army put Pyrthus in mind not to recover Sparta to Cleonymus, but to get all Peloponnes for himself. [Plutarch in Pyrtho.]
3735.		In the 13 year of Ptol. Philadelphus (in some impressions it is falsely, and a half,) in the 476 year of Nabonassar, in the 17 day of the month Mafer, answering the 11 of our October, 12 howers after the setting of the sun, Timochares observed the star of Venus in the morning wholly to have eclipsed and darkned. [Cl. Ptolem. lib. 10. cap. 4.]
		While Pyrthus lay before Sparta, a company of women, whose Captainesse was Archidamia, defended it against him till the return of Areus out of Crete, and Acrotatus the son of Areus, valiantly repulsed Ptoleme the son of Pyrthus, when he made an assault, and would have broken into it, with two thousand Galls, and certain choice companies out of Chaonia : whereupon Pyrthus, despairing of any good to be done there, drew off, and took the spoils of the Country, purposing there to winter.
		Now whilst the war thus lasted in Laconia, Antigonus, having recovered the Cities of Macedonia, marched down with his army into Peloponnes, there to encounter again with Pyrthus, knowing that if he sped well there, he would presently return into Macedonia, to pursue the point of the war there. [Pausan. in Attic. pag. 12.] and when Pyrthus was upon his way to Argos, Areus the King fell upon the rear of him; and ever now and then cut off some of the Galls and Molossians, which brought it up, and one Orastis a Cretian born, slew Ptoleme the son of Pyrthus, valiantly fighting on his fathers behalf. [Plutarch] whose body brought off, when his father beheld, he said, that this death becidid him not so soon as he feared it would, or his overmuch gallantie did deceive. [Justin. lib. 25. cap. 4.]
		In the very night that Pyrthus entered into Argos, it is said, that a scrich-owle came and fate, upon the top of his Spear. [Euseb. de Hist. Animal. lib. 10. cap. 37.] and the day following, he was kill'd, with a brick-bat, which a poor old woman threw down upon his head; and his head was presently cut off by one Zophyrus, a souldier of Antigonus, and carryed to Alecyoneus, Antigonus the son, who took it, and darth it out on the ground at Antigonus his foot, where he fate, with his Nobles about him; and Antigonus rebuked him very sharply for so lavishly insulting over the fall of so great a person; not considering the casualty of human condition: and taking the head, put his hood over it, which he then ware for an attire, after the manner of the Macedons, and buried his body very honourable. And when his son Helenus was brought prisoner to him, he willed him to take upon him both the habit, and also the spirit of a King, and delivered into his hands the bones of his father, enclosed in a golden Urne, wiling him to carry it into Epirus, to his brother Alexander. And as for Pyrthus his Nobles and friends, for they also camp and all, fell into his hands, he entreated them with all the fair respect that might be. [Plut. in the end of his Pyrtho, lib. 25. cap. 5. Val. Max. lib. 5. cap. 1.]
		Those of Tarentum, hearing of the death of Pyrthus, sent to Carthage to crave aid thence, as well against the Romans, as against Milo, who held the City with a strong Garrison of Epitotes: and Milo being reduced to this exigence, and being enclosed on all sides, by the Romans at land, and Carthaginians by sea, delivered up the Castle to Pappus Curto, the Roman consul, upon this condition, that he and his souldiers, with their monies, and other stuff, might be suffered safely to passe into their own Country. The City thereupon was also surrendered to Pappus, by the Townsmen thereof; giving up their armes, their ship, themselves, and all into his hands: and this was the end of the war of Tarentum, against the Romans. [Zonaras out of Diogenor. lib. 4. cap. 3. Frontin. Strateg. lib. 3.]
3734.		After the death of Strato, who fate master of the school of the Peripatetics 18 years, Lycon of Troas, the son of Aftyanax, succeeded him; a man eloquent of himself, and very fit to instruct and bring up youth. [Laert.]	4444.	270.
3735.		Atrachus the younger, the brother of Philitarus had a son born him, whose name also was called atrachus, and reigned afterward in Pergamus, and lived 72 years, as we find in Polybins, in Excerpti, Hen. Vales, and Suid, in Atrachus, and Liv. lib. 33.]	4447.	269.

	This same year also, when Diogenus was L. Chancellor at Athens, the Chronologer of Paros, made his Canon or order of times; which the learned Mr. Selden, lately published in his Marmora Arundelliana .
3742.	In the 21 year, according to Dionysius, in the 29 (it should be the 19 or 20, according to the point of the sun assigned) of Hydron or Aquarion, in the 486 year of Nabonassar in the moneth Choeac, and 17 day thereof, (upon the 11 of our February) in the morning, and fourth of the moneth Tauron, or first of Phamenoth the Egyptian moneth, (for in Cl. Ptolem. we must here write A for A) that is, upon the 26 of our April, in the evening, and first hour of the night, and in the same year of Nabonassar, but the 24 of our August, in the evening, Dionysius the Astronomer, took the observations of the Planet of Mercurie, which Cl. Ptolemæus, relateth out of Hipparchus, [lib. 9. cap. 7.] of his book called his Great Work .	4452.	262.
	Nicomedes King of Bithynia, enlarging the City Aftacus, called it after his own name, Nicomedia. [Euseb. Chron. with Pausan. in his Eliac. lib. 2. pag. 159. Trebel. Pollin. in Gallienis, and Ammian. Marcel. lib. 22.] though Memnon, Excerpti, cap. 21. saith, that he built Nicomedia over against the City Aftacus, as indeed Strabo and Plinie both, make them two distinct Cities.
	Eumenes, 1. having gotten many Cities, and places near about Pergamus, idro his hands, fought a pitch field, with Antiochus the son of Seleucus, near unto Sardes, and overthrowed him in it. [Strabo lib. 13. pag. 624.]
3743.	Antiochus of Syria, having kill'd one of his sons, and declared the other his successor, died, [Prolog. of Trog. Pompeius. lib. 26.] who in his life time, for the great defeat which he gave the Galls, who came over out of Europe into Asia, was surnamed Soter, (i. e.) their deliverer. [Appian. in Syriac. pag. 130.] concerning which victory of his over the Galls, we may read more in Lucian, in his book, de lib. et is mris nrois qmpti nrois nrois , (i. e.) of sailling in mens speech , and in his Zeuxis , al. Antiochus . As for his son and successor Antiochus, whom he had by Stratonice, the Milefians were the first, who surnamed him Θις , or God, because he rid them of their Tyrant, Timarchus, [Appian. ut sup.] and Tatianus the Asyrrian, in his oration against the Gentiles intimates, that Berofus, who was a Priest of Belus in Babylon, dedicated his three books of the Chaldean History unto this Antiochus, by whom also, [Plinie. l. 17. cap. 56.] were published the observations of the Celestiall Motions, among the Babylonians, for 480 years, which number of years, it we deduce from the head or Epoch of Nabonassars account, as other learned men do, we shall find it to end but six years before the beginning of this Antiochus. But Porphyrie, Eusebius, Severus Sulpitius, Johannes Malela of Antioch, and all agree in this, that he reigned 15 years.	4453.	261.
	This man gave the Jews living in Ionia, equal rights and privileges with the Gentiles, and yet suffered them to live according to their own religion and customs of their nation. [Josephus lib. 12. cap. 3.] he made sundry times war upon Ptol. Philadelphus, and fought with him, with all the forces he could raise from out of Babylon, and all the oriental parts. Wherefore Ptolemei, desirous to put an end to this bloody war, gave him his daughter Bernice two wife, while his former wife Laodice was yet living; by whom yet he had borne him two sons, Seleucus Callinicus, and Antiochus Hierax, (i. e.) the Hawk. And Ptolemei accompanied his daughter as far as Pessinus, and there gave him an infinite masse of gold and silver, in dowrie with her, whence he was called εὐδοκῆς (i. e.) the dowrie giver, [Jerom upon Daniel. c. 11.] and took great care to his no small belides, that water out of the river Nile, might be carried to her, where ever she was, to the end the might never drink of any other water but that, as Athenius [lib. 2. c. 2.] reporteth out of Polybios. And Appianus is mightily overfree, where he saith, that Bernice and Laodice were both daughters to this Ptolemei, [in Syria. pag. 130.]

In the year 28, according to Dionysius his account, the 7 day of the month Didymon, in the 421 of Nabonassar, day 5 of the month Parmuth, the 28 of our July, the Planet of Mercury was seen near to the sign of Gemini, in the evening toward the fourth head thereof, [Cl. Prob. lib. 9. cap. 7.]	4457.	457.
3750.		This year the second Periode of Calippus began.
3753.		Aratus of Sicyone, at the age of 20 years, delivering his native country from the tyranny and oppression of Nicoteles, joined it to the body of the State or Commonwealth of Achaia, [Polyb. lib. 2. pag. 130.] and then sent to Ptolemei Philadelphus in Egypt, and got of him 150 talents, which he bestowed among his poor country-men; especially in redeeming such as had been taken prisoners. And because those that had been turned out of their Country, and were now restored, would never let them be quiet, who upon what title soever, were now possessed of their lands and estates; therefore he made a journey himself to Ptolemei, and desired more money of him, to make all even among his country-men, and to take away all sures of law and differences between them. In which journey, thorough violence of tempest, and contrary winds, he was driven upon the coast of Caria; in Asia; and from thence, having made along voyage of it, came at last into Egypt: where he obtained a boone of 150 talents more for his country's good; of which he took 40 talents presently along with him, and returned into Peloponnesus, [Plut. in Aratu.]	4454.	450.
3754.		This year, when Manlius Vulso, and Atilius Regulus were Consuls in Rome, which, as Polybius noteth, was the 14 year of this first Carthaginian war, the Parthians, under their Captain Artabaces, broke off the Macedonian yoke, and revolted from them, [Trog. Pomp. lib. 21.] This Artabaces, the later Persian Writers call Artak, al. Artak : and Mircondus Chapur , who, as he saith, began his reign there, in the 72 year after the death of Alexander the Great; which is one year before the Consulship of Manlius and Atilius in Rome, and 3 years before Olymp. 133. in which Eusebius in his Chron. noteth; that this Artabaces and his Parthians fell off, and rebelled against Antiochus Theos; nevertheless, because the Parthians keep the day, whereon Artabaces fought with Seleucus Callinicus, the son and successor of Antiochus, and overcame him, and took Callinicus himself prisoner, holidays, and make a great festival of it, as the very birthday of their liberty ; as Justin relateth out of [Trogus, lib. 41. cap. 4.] therefore both [Justin, and Appian, in Syriac, pag. 130.] thought that the Parthians began their revolt, under Seleucus, and not under Antiochus his father. And the Parthians moreover, did this Artabaces that honour, as to call all their Race of Kings after him, by the names of Artabaces, [Justin, lib. 41. cap. 5. Strabo, lib. 15. pag. 702.]
		Now that the Parthians, together with the Persians, which the later Persian Writers confound, and make one people with the Parthians, (of which we may see more in [Schikard, Tarich, pag. 101. and 102.] and our third note upon the Acts of Ignatius) fell off from the Persian Empire, Artabaces, in Persicus, sheweth, as we find him in [Photius, in Bibliotheca, cod. 58.] Where he also sheweth the cause of this their revolt from the Persian Empire, to have been this Artabaces and Tyridates, the sons of Phriapites, al. Priapatus , the son of Artabaces first had slain one Pherecles (al. Agathocles , as we find him styled by Geor. Syncellus) the Governour of that Country, appointed by Antiochus Theos; for that he offered to abuse the body of the said Tyridates in a sodomitical way, having five others in the plot with him. And then turning the Macedons out, took the Sovereignty to themselves; whose successors afterward stood it out also, against the Romans, and contended with them for the Empire of the World. See [Strabo, lib. 11. pag. 515.]
		At the same time also, Theodoros, who had under him 1000 Cities of the Baetrians, fell off, and revolted from the Macedons; and the whole East, following their example, did the like, [Justin, lib. 41. cap. 4. out of Trogus.] Others say, that the two Kings of Syria and Media, falling out, one Euthydemus persecuted the Grecians, which inhabited Baetria, to revolt from the Macedons, and to cast off their yoke; and that thereupon Artabaces, seeing Dionus, al. Theodorus , grow into such power among the Baetrians, drew the Parthians to a revolt likewise from the Macedons; Apollodorus also, in his books of the Parthian affairs, tells us; that those Greeks, which dwelt in the Baetria, growing strong, invaded India, and went to far therein, that, passing the River Hypanis, Eastward, went as far as the Hamus, and our-were Alexander in the conquest of India, [Strabo, lib. 11. pag. 515, 516, and lib. 15. pag. 686.]
		Seleucus

The year of the World.	The Macedonian Empire.	357	The Julian Period.	The year before Christ.
3758.	Seleucus King of Syria, overcome with love, sent for his former wife Laodice, and her children; to Court again; and the shortly after, fearing the fickleke of his mind; and least his affections might happily return again to Bernice, his second wife, poisoned him, [Jerom upon Daniel, cap. 11. Appian, in Syriac, pag. 130.] and to cover this sluttish of hers, the caused one Artermios, who was very like him, to lie in his bed, as if he himself had lain there sick: and so, what with his face, what with his counterfeit speech, concealed all that came to see and visit him in his sicknesse; and by this means, concealed the death of the true Kings (till he had taken order for out to succeed him in the kingdom, whom he thought fit) [Valer. Max. lib. 9. cap. 14. Plinius, lib. 7. cap. 11. Solim. cap. 1.] and by this means, Seleucus, the eldest (son) Seleucus by Laodice, came to succeed him in the kingdom, who from the many victories, which he got, (and they were none, that I know of) was surnamed Callinicus, and from his great beard, Pogon, (i. e.) which signifies a beard, as in Polyb. lib. 2. pag. 155.] and he sat King 20 years, [Enchiridion, Chroni.] Likewise in Egypt, Ptol. Philadelphus, who, living luxuriously, doctored not to say, that he should live ever, and that he only had found out the way to immortality, as Athenensis, lib. 12. cap. 17. reports out of Philarchus his History, lib. 22. in the 40 year after the decease of Ptolemei the first his father, dyed; and after him succeeded Ptolemei, surnamed Euergetes, his son, begotten of Arsinoe, the daughter of Lyfimachus, and reigned 25 years, as [Cl. Ptolem. in Canonem, Clement Alex. and in Strom. lib. 1. and Jerom upon cap. 9. of Daniel.] tells us; and in his time it is said, that there appeared a Phaenix, which came to Heliopolis, drawing with her a huge flock of other birds, all wondring at her beauty, [Tacit. Annal. lib. 6.] Laodice put Bernice with her young son, which she had by Ptolemei, into the hands of Icadion, and Geuncus, (al. Coenetus) two chief men of Antioch to be murdered. [Jerom upon Daniel, cap. 11. and Appian, in Syriac, pag. 130.] Bernice, when she heard that they were coming to murder her, shut her self up in Daphne, a Castle or Suburb of Antioch, of which I spake before. Where, when the Cities of Asia heard that she with her young son were besieged, they in remembrance and reverence of her high calling, and progenitors, out of more compassion, sent her in aides from all parts. Her brother also Ptolemei surnamed Euergetes, fearing the danger his sister was in, left his kingdom, and sped him thither, with all the forces which he could make, [Justin lib. 27. cap. 1.] but before any aides could come, the young son, by such devices as Laodice used, was taken and carried away; whereof Bernice the mother hearing, armed her self, and got into a Chariot, and pursued after Caneus, the butcherly minister of that cruel act; and overtaking him, when she could do nothing on him with her spear, took a stone, and with that, laid him all along; and forcing her Chariot over the very body of the knave, brake thorough the midst of the companies, and went directly to the house, where she heard say, they had laid the body of her son, whom they had already murdered, [Val. Max. lib. 9. cap. 10.] The murderers of the child, took another child very like him, and brought him forth, and shewed him to the people, with a royal guard about him, as if it had been the child indeed. But they set a strong guard of mercenarie Galls upon Bernice, and delivered up to her the strongest part of the place or Castle at Antioch, and gave her their oath to be true unto her, and entered into a covenant with her; for she gave ear to Aristarchus her Physician, who persuaded her to make a league and covenant of friendship with them, but they using their oath for nought else but a stratagem, to win to get within her, presently fell to cutting of her throat. The women about her stood to defend her, as well as they could, and many of them there dyed in the quarrel: but three of them, to wit, Panariste, and Mania, and Gercholyne, took her body, and laid it in her bed, as if she had been wounded onely, and not quite dead; giving it forth, that she might recover, and held the people on in that amusemēt, till the coming of Ptolemei, [Polybius, Strabo, lib. 1.] Now all the Cities of Asia, which were revolted from Seleucus, set ships to sea, and joined with Ptolemei, either for the defence of Bernice, if she were alive, or to revenge her murder, if she were dead, [Justin lib. 27. cap. 2.] and Ptolemei indeed, when he came, slew Laodice, and entering Syria, marched on as far as Babylon, [Appian, in Syriac, pag. 130.] possessing himself of Cœle Syria, with Seleucia, [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 402, 403.] Syria also and Cilicia, and the upper provinces beyond the Euphrates, and almost all Asia fell unto him, [Jerom upon Daniel, cap. 11.] even from Taurus unto India, without one battle fought, or stroke (stricken) for it; if we may believe Polyenus, in the place above cited, with which we may also compare, what we find in the monument of Euergetes, called monumentum Adulmenum, published at Rome, in the year 1651, by Leo Allatrinus, to wit, Having retrieved, saith he, the sovereignty of Egypt, Syria Phœnicia, Cyprus, Lycia, Caria, and the Cyclades Isles, from his father, he gathered an army of Horse and Foot, with a fleet of Ships, and Elephants out of Trogloditica, and Ethiopia parts of	4468.	446.

3747.		In the year 28, according to Dionysius his account, the 7 day of the moneth Didymon, in the 491 of Nabonassar, day 5 of the moneth Parmuth, the 28 of our July, the Planer of Mercury was seen near to the sign of Gemini, in the evening toward the fourth head thereof, [Cl. Prot. lib. 9. cap. 7.]	4457.	257.
3750.		This year the second Periode of Calippus began.
3753.		Aratus of Sicyone, at the age of 40 years, delivering his native country from the tyranny and oppression of Nicoteles, joyued it to the body of the State or Commonwealth of Achæa, [Polyb. lib. 2. pag. 130.] and then sent to Ptolemæi Philadelphus in Egypt, and gat of him 150 talents, which he bestowed among his poor country-men; especially in redeeming such as had been taken prisoners. And because those that had been turned out of their Country, and were now restored, would never let them be quiet, who upon what title soever, were now possessed of their lands and estates; therefore he made a journey himself to Ptolemæi, and desired more money of him, to make all even among his country-men, and to take away all forces of law and differences between them. In which journey, thorough violence of tempest, and contrary winds, he was driven upon the coast of Caria, in Asia; and from thence, having made along voyage of it, came at last into Egypt: where he obtained a boone of 150 talents more for his countries good; of which he took 40 talents presently along with him, and returned unto Peloponnesus, [Plut. in Arata.]	4454.	250.
3754.		This year, when Manlius Vulso, and Atilius Regulus were Consuls in Rome, which, as Polybius noteth, was the 14 year of this first Carthaginian war, the Parthians, under their Captain Artabaces, broke off the Macedonian yoke, and revolted from them, [Trog. Pomp. lib. 41.] This Artabaces, the later Persian Writers call Artaban , Artaban ; and Mithondus Chapar , who, as he saith, began his reign there, in the 72 year, after the death of Alexander the Great; which is one year before the Consulship of Manlius and Atilius in Rome, and 3 years before Olymp. 139. in which Eusebius in his Chron. noteth; that this Artabaces and his Parthians fell off, and rebelled against Antiochus Theos; nevertheless, because the Parthians kept the day, whereon Artabaces fought with Seleucus Callinicus, the son and successor of Antiochus, and overcame him, and took Callinicus himself prisoner, holidays, and make a great festival of it, as the very birthday of their liberty ; as Justin relateth out of [Trogus, lib. 41. cap. 4.] therefore both [Justin, and Appian, in Syriac, pag. 130.] thought that the Parthians began their revolt, under Seleucus, and not under Antiochus his father. And the Parthians moreover, did this Artabaces that honour, as to call all their Race of Kings after him, by the names of Artabaces, [Justin, lib. 41. cap. 5. Strabo, lib. 15. pag. 702.]
		Now that the Parthians, together with the Persians, which the later Persian Writers confound, and make one people with the Parthians, (of which we may see more in [Sebekardi, Tarich, pag. 101. and 102.] and our third note upon the Acts of Ignatius) fell off from the Persian Empire, Artabaces, in Persicis, sheweth, as we find him in [Phylius, his Bibliotheca, cod. 58.] Where he also sheweth the cause of this their revolt from the Persian Empire, to have been this Artabaces and Tyridates, the sons of Phriapaties, al. Priapatius , the son of Artabaces, first had slain one Pherecles (al. Agathocles ; as we find him stiled by Geor. Syncellus) the Governour of that Country, appointed by Antiochus Theos; for that he offered to abuse the body of the said Tyridates in a sodomitical way, having five others in the plot with him. And then turning the Macedons out, took the Sovereignty to themselves: whose successors afterward stood it out also, against the Romans, and contended with them for the Empire of the World, See [Strabo, lib. 11. pag. 515.]
		At the same time also, Theodoros, who had under him 1000 Cities of the Bactrians, fell off, and revolted from the Macedons; and the whole East, following their example, did the like, [Justin, lib. 41. cap. 4. out of Trogus.] Others say, that the two Kings of Syria and Media, falling out, one Euthydemus persuaded the Grecians, which inhabited Bactria, to revolt from the Macedons, and to cast off their yoke; and that thereupon Artabaces, seeing Dionus, al. Theodoros , grow into such power among the Bactrians, drew the Parthians to a revolt likewise from the Macedons; Apollodorus also, in his books of the Parthian affairs, tells us; that those Greeks, which dwelt in the Bactria, growing strong, invaded India, and went far therein, that, passing the River Hypanis, Eastward, went as far as the Iamus, and out-went Alexander in the conquest of India, [Strabo, lib. 11. pag. 515, 516, and lib. 15. pag. 686.]

Seleucus

The year of the World.	The Macedonian Empire.	357	The Julian Period.	The year before Christ.
3758.	Seleucus King of Syria, overcome with love, sent for his former wife Laodice, and her children, to Court again; and the shortly after, fearing the fickleness of his mind, and least his affections might happily return again to Bernice, his second wife, poisoned him, [Jerom upon Daniel, cap. 11. Appian, in Syriac, pag. 130.] and to cover this sluttish of hers, he caused one Artemon, who was very like him, to lie in his bed, as if he himself had lain there sick: and so, what with his face, what with his countenance speech, counted all that came to see and visit him in his sicknesse; and by this means, concealed the death of the true King; still he had taken order for one to succeed him in the kingdom, whom he thought fit, [Valer. Max. lib. 9. cap. 14. Plinius, lib. 7. cap. 11. Solinus, cap. 1.] and by this means, Seleucus, the eldest son of Seleucus by Laodice, came to succeed him in the kingdom, who from the many victories, which he got, (and they were none, that I know of) was surnamed Callinicus, and from his great beard, Pogon, (i. e.) which signifies a beard, as in Polyb. lib. 2. pag. 155.] and he late King 20 years. [Euseb. Chron.] Likewise in Egypt, Ptol. Philadelphus, who, living luxuriously, doubted not to say, that he should live ever, and that he only had found out the way to immortality, as Athenæus, [lib. 12. cap. 17. reports out of Philarchus his History, lib. 22.] in the 40 year after the decease of Ptolemæi the first his father, dyed; and after him succeeded Ptolemæi, surnamed Euergetes, his son, begotten of Arsinoe, the daughter of Lysimachus, and reigned 25 years, as [Cl. Ptolem. in Canonæ, Clemens Alexand. in Strom. lib. 1. and Jerom upon cap. 9. of Daniel.] tells us; and in his time it is said, that there appeared a Phenix, which came to Heliopolis, drawing with her a huge flock of other birds, all wondering at her beauty, [Tacit. Annal. lib. 6.] Laodice put Bernice with her young son, which she had by Ptolemæi, into the hands of Icadion, and Gumeus, (al. Coeneus) two chief men of Antioch, to be murdered. [Jerom upon Daniel, cap. 11. and Appian, in Syriac, pag. 130.] Bernice, when she heard that they were coming to murder her, shut her self up in Daphne, a Castle or Suburb of Antioch, of which I spake before. Where, when the Cities of Asia heard that the with her young son were besieged, they in remembrance and reverence of her high calling, and progenitors, out of more compassion, sent her in aides from all parts. Her brother also Ptolemæi surnamed Euergetes, fearing the danger his sister was in, left his kingdom, and sped him thither, with all the forces which he could make, [Justin lib. 27. cap. 1.] but before any aides could come, the young son, by such devices as Laodice used, was taken and carried away; whereof Bernice the mother hearing, armed her self, and got into a Chariot, and pursued after Ceneus, the butcherly minister of that cruel act; and overtaking him, when she could do nothing on him with her spear, took a stone, and with that, laid him all along; and forcing her Chariot over the very body of the knave, brake thorough the midst of the companies, and went directly to the house, where she heard say, they had laid the body of her son, whom they had already murdered, [Val. Max. lib. 9. cap. 10.] The murderers of the child, took another child very like him, and brought him forth, and shewed him to the people, with a roial guard about him, as if it had been the child indeed. But they set a strong guard of mercenary Galls upon Bernice, and delivered up to her the strongest part of the place or Castle at Antioch, and gave her their oath to be true unto her, and entered into a covenant with her; for she gave ear to Aristarchus her Physician, who persuaded her to make a league and covenant of friendship with them, but they using their oath for nought else but a stratageme, to win to get within her, presently fell to cutting of her throat. The women about her, stood to defend her, as well as they could, and many of them there dyed in the quarrel: but three of them, to wit, Panariste, and Mania, and Gerholynce, took her body, and laid it in her bed, as if she had been wounded onely, and not quite dead; giving it forth, that she might recover, and held the people on in that amusement, till the coming of Ptolemæi, [Polyarchus Stratag. lib. 1.] Now all the Cities of Asia, which were revolted from Seleucus, set ships to sea, and joyued with Ptolemæi, either for the defence of Bernice, if she were alive, or to revenge her murder, if she were dead, [Justin lib. 27. cap. 1.] and Ptolemæi indeed, when he came, slew Laodice, and entering Syria, marched on as far as Babylon, [Appian, in Syriac, pag. 130.] possessing himself of Celolyria, with Seleucia, [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 402, 403.] Syria also and Cilicia, and the upper provinces beyond the Euphrates, and almost all Asia fell unto him, [Jerom upon Daniel, cap. 11.] even from Taurus unto India, without one battle fought, or strok taken for it; if we may believe Polyenus, in the place above cited, with which we may also compare, what we find in the monument of Euergetes, called monumentum Admirandum, published at Rome, in the year 1631, by Leo Allatrinus to wit, Having received, (saith he, the sovereignty of Egypt, Libya, Syria Phœnicia, Cyprus, Lycia, Caria, and the Cycladian Isles, from his father, he gathered an army of Horse and Foot, with a fleet of ships, and Elephants out of Trogloditica, and Ethiopia, parts of	4468.	246.

of which Elephants had been there taken by his father, and the rest by himself, and brought from thence into Egypt, and there trained up to the war, all excellently well furnished, & with them sailed into Asia, and conquering all the land on this side the Euphrates, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Ionia, Hellespont, and Thracia, together with all their Forces, and other Elephants out of India, and all the King of the Nations, in his company; he put over the Euphrates, and there conquered Mesopotamia, Babylonia, Susa, Persia, Media, and all the country as far as Bactria.

This Euergetes, having conquered all Syria, came down to Jerusalem, and there offered many sacrifices of thanksgiving unto God, and dedicated to him gifts worthy of so great a Victory; as Josephus speaketh, [lib. 2, cont. Apion, pag. 1064.]

Euergetes, being called back by a sedition of his own people in Egypt, held Syria in his own hands, but trusted Cilicia in the hands of one of his Nobles, named Antiochus; and the Provinces beyond the Euphrates, in the hands of Xanthippus for the Government of them: and spoiling and wasting all the kingdom of Seleucus, carried from thence 40 thousand talents of silver, and all the rich vessels that was therein; and 2500 Images of their gods, among which, he carried away also, those Images which Cambyles heretofore, had taken out of Egypt, at his being there, and carried into Persia; and from thence it was, that the Egyptians, when they saw their gods come home again by his means, gave him the surname of Euergetes. [Jerom, upon Daniel, cap. 11.] of whom, in that Monument aforementioned, called Monumentum Adulitanum, we find it thus written. Ptolemei, habens receperat illos deos quibus Persiani had taken and carried out of Egypt in former times, with other treasures, there laid up; sent up his army, by ditches new cut, to let in the water for that purpose.

After the departure of Ptolemei out of Syria, Seleucus, having fitted up a vast Fleet to go against such Cities as had revolted from him: by a sudden tempest sailing at sea, lost all his Fleet: whereupon the Cities and Countries which for very hatred of his person had turned to Ptolemei's side: now in very commiseration of this his so great a calamity at sea, returned all to his obedience again. [Justin, lib. 27, cap. 2.]

In the year 67, according to the Chaldeans, on the 5 day of the month Apellus, and in the year 504 of Nabonazar, 27 of the month Thoth, the 18 of our November, the Planet of Mercury was observed in the morning to have been to the northward of the uppermost Star in the head of Scorpio, [Gl. Ptol. lib. 9, cap. 7.]

Seleucus Callinicus, beginning to make war upon Ptolemei Euergetes, was utterly routed in the field, and thereupon fled to Antioch, and from thence wrote to his brother Antiochus, and craved his help, offering him for his pains, all Asia on this side the Taurus: but Antiochus, being at this time, not above 14 years of age, yet immediately greedy of a kingdom, laid hold on the occasion, not with so brotherly a mind as he should have done: but like a very Laron, fought to strip his brother of all that he had, in his necessity; and though a child, yet put he on more than a man-like impetuous resolution: from whence it was, that even then, he gave the surname of Hircax; (i.e.) a greedy Hawke; or Harpyr rather, because more like a Hawke than a man, he was ever ready to fall upon every mans estate, [Justin, lib. 17, cap. 2, with Strabo, lib. 16, pag. 754.]

At this time, the people of Smyrna and Magnesia, in the month Lenæon, entered a league between themselves to maintain the honour and greatness of this Seleucus: which league and decree of theirs, we find preserved to this very day, transcribed out of those Marmora Arundeliana; (i.e.) those Marble stones which the Earle of Arundel caused to be brought out of those parts, and published in print by Mr. J. Selden, as before.

Ptolemei, when he saw that this young Antiochus took part with Seleucus; least he should be forced to have them both his enemies, at once, struck up a truce with Seleucus, for ten years, [Justin, lib. 27, cap. 2.] In which long time of peace, he sent for Eratosthenes Cyrenæus, from Athens, and made him keeper of his Library at Alexandria, [Suidas, in Eratosthenes, and in the word, Apollonius.] For this Ptolemei Euergetes, followed his father Philadelphus his steps, in promoting the magnificence of this Library, and with it, of all kind of learning besides: for he himself was a scholar of Aristarchus the Philosopher, and wrote certain Historical Commentaries with his own hand, [Athens, lib. 2, cap. 33.] And of his care in getting into his Library the works of ancient Writers, Galen, upon the 3 book of Hippocrates, [of Epidemical diseases,] saith, He gave order for all the books of them which came into Egypt, to be brought to him, and took out copies of them: and then gave the transcripts of them to the owners which brought them, but put the originals in his own Library, with this inscription, Ταῖς ἐκ τῶν ἰατρῶν: (i.e.) from out of ships; that it might appear, they came out of such ships as there arrived. And having gotten from Athens the works of Sophocles, Eurypides and Eclýtus, only to transcribe them, and left them 15 talents in pawn, till he restored the originals, which he had borrowed; he caused them to be written out most exquisitely in fair parchment, and then retaining

Eryniologie concurs with him; for there he notes, that Philopater was there called Gallus, because he was wont to go with an Irvic Bush about his head, and other parts of his body, after the manner of the Galli, (who were priests of Cybele) in the solemnities of Bacchus; for so effeminate and debauched was this man grown, with whoring and drinking, that when he was in his best wits, and extraordinarily sober, yet even then he would run about the streets, with the maudlin dancers, and belisgling about him. [Plut. in Cleom.] and so as Polybius observeth of him, he spent the whole time of his reign, in revellings and pastimes, giving himself over to all sensual and filthy lusts of the flesh, and to daily quaffing and carousing. [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 380, 381.] and Strabo adds, [lib. 17. pag. 796.] that both he, and all the Ptolemies that followed, grew luxurious, and never ordered that state well afterward. Now this Philopater reigned after his father 17 years, [Cic. Procl. in Reg. Canone. Clem. Alexan. Porphy. Euseb.]

Philopator, fearing Magas his brother, who by the means of his mother Berenice, was grown gracious in the army, took counsel with one Sosibius, (who was of chief credit with him) and others how to rid them both out of the way. But this employment troubled these men not a little, for fear lest, the high courage of Berenice considered, all this enterprise would come to naught, and therefore they were fain to flatter all the Court, giving them assurance of great matters in case the business went on, and succeed as they would have it. But Sosibius went farther; and finding Cleomenes the King of Sparta, who at that time stood in great need of the Kings help, to be a singular wife and politic man, and of great experience in matters of the world, brake the matter to him. But Cleomenes dissuaded him from it; saying, that the King had more need to beget him, if it were possible, more brothers, for the security and preservation of his kingdom, than to destroy those which he had. But when Sosibius had told him further, that the King could never be sure of the mercenary soldiers, so long as Magas was alive. Cleomenes then bad him, never fear that, for, faith he, among his mercenaries, he hath three thousand Greeks out of Peloponnesus, and one thousand out of Crete, who at one beck of his, would be ready to do what ever he would have them. Whereupon Sosibius took courage, and went on, and murdered Berenice and her son Magas, and all that belonged to them. [Polyb. lib. 5. ps. 380, 382. and lib. 15. in Excerpt. p. 65. and Plut. in Cleom.]

Philopator, having first murdered his father, then his mother, and now with her his brother, as if all had been well with him, gave himself over to his luxury more than ever; and in that way all the court followed him, and not only his Nobles in Court, and his chief Commanders in the army; but the whole body of the army, from the highest to the lowest, threw away all care of martial discipline, and lay lolling in Taverns and bawdy-houses at their pleasure, [Justin lib. 13. pag. 1.]

But to return to Antiochus, when he advised with his council, how to repress that rebellion of the two brothers, Molon and Alexander in Media and Persia, Epigenes (who was the man that reduced those forces to Antiochus, which were gathered together for Seleucus, and was of prime credit, and reputation in the army) advised, that Antiochus himself with his army, should presently march against them: but Hermias, on the contrary, advised the King, to go himself into Cætolylria, and recover that, and send Xenon and Theodoros Hemilius, to subdue the two brothers, [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 387.]

While this was in agitation, and the King lay at Zeugma in Seleucia, there came to him Diogenes his Ammiral, out of Cappadocia, conducting Laodice the daughter of Mithridates King of Pontus to the King; who, loon as ever she came, married her; and coming out of the upper regions unto Antioch, there caused her to be proclaimed Queen; and that done, prepared himself wholly for the war, [Ibid. pag. 388.]

At the same time Molo, having a sure card of his brother Alexander to help him at all adventures, marched with a great army against Xenon and Theodoros, the Kings Commanders, sent into those parts, which put them into so great a fright, that they durst not keep the field, but put themselves into walled Cities for their defence; and in this case Molo, having the Country of Apollonia at his back, wanted for no store and plenty of provision, [Ibid.]

Mean while, Philip the son of Demetrius, in Macedonia, upon the death of Antigonus his Guardian, and father in law, being then 14 years old, took the Kingdom into his own hands, [Justin lib. 18. cap. ult. & lib. 29. cap. 1.] and reigned there 42 years. [Dexip. Porphy. Euseb. and Polybius lib. 2. pag. 155.] observeth, that these three, Philip of Macedonia, Ptol. Philopator of Egypt, and Antiochus Magnus of Syria, came to their Crowns all within the compass of the same Olympiade, 139. for as Antiochus, came to the Crown in the first year of it, so Philopator succeeded his father in the third thereof, and Philip of Macedonia in the fourth, and the same Polybius, [lib. 4. pag. 271.] observeth observeth further, that about that time, almost all the kingdoms of the World, came to have a new succession of Kings in them: the like doth, [Justin. lib. 29. cap. 1.] where they both flow further, that Ariarathes, about the same time, came likewise to be King of Cappadocia.

Now when, upon the death of Antigonus, the Etolians joining with the Lacedæmonians, made a common war upon the Achæans and Macedons; Cleomenes sought Philopator of Egypt, that he would furnish him with certain necessities, and some soldiers, and dismiss him to return into his own country; but when he perceived, that Philopator lent but a deaf care to that motion of his, he then began to be an often and earnest suitor to him, to suffer him with his own small train, to be gone. And the King, little caring which end went forward in any business of moment, and never forecasting what was to come, according to his wonted folly, never regarded what Cleomenes said unto him: but Sosibius, who, as I shewed before, was the chief man of all the rest about him in matters of the kingdom, advising with the rest of the Council, thought it no policy, to let Cleomenes go, [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 381.]

Molo, of whom I spake before, assailed to pass the River Tigris, and to besiege Seleucia; but being prevented by Zeuxis, who had gotten all the boats of the River into his hands, he turned his course, and went to Cætophon, and there made his provision, for his winter quarter, [lib. pag. 389.]

Antiochus, being advertised that Molo came on, and that his men still gave ground, resolved, to leave going against Ptolemy in Cætolylria, and to march in person against Molo. But Hermias, who would not off from what he once propounded, sent Xenon, an Achæan born, against Molo, with an army very well appointed, and with full and absolute power to do with it as he saw cause, without controule; and brought the young King back again to Apamea, and there gathered an army about him, [Ibid. pag. 390.]

Xenon, coming with his army to Seleucia, sent for Diogenes, the Kings Governour of the province of Sufa, and for Pythiades the Ammiral of the Red Sea; and with them drew into the field, and having the benefit of the River Tigris at his back, late him down with his army in the very face of the enemy: and the next day, (taking upon Molo his Camp, which he that night had left, there fell to drinking and rioting with his army, till Molo, spying his opportunity, came back the night following, and in the deep of the night, let upon them, when they little thought of him; recovered his own Camp, took theirs, and Xenon's himself fighting in the dark, was there also casually slain, and Molo presently with his army came before Seleucia, and took it at the first assault; because Zeuxis was fled out of it, and with him Diomedon the Governour of the place it fell: Then subducing the whole province of Babylonia, with that which lay upon the Red-sea, he took the City of Sufa, and leaving there some to besiege the Castle, wherinto Diogenes, their Commander, was fled, he returned to Seleucia upon the Tigris, and there refreshed his army. And indeed, in the Country lying upon that River, he took in all as far as Europus, a City in those parts, and in Mesopotamia, all as far as Dura, [Ibid. pag. 391, 392, 393.]

Cleomenes, after that consultation held by Sosibius, was committed to custody: but watching his time, when Philopator with his traine was gone to Canopus, he gave it out among his keepers, that the King would presently let him at liberty: and while they herupon grew careless of him, and lay fast asleep by their over drinkings, he with his friends, brake out of prison, at noon-day; and would faine have stirred up the people to a sedition, but could not: and therefore having no hope of escaping left them, he and his followers, slew themselves, [Ibid. pag. 385.] three years after his overthrow in Laonia, [Id. lib. 4. pag. 304.] whercof when Philopator heard, he commanded Cleomenes his body to be beaded, and to be hung upon a cross, and both his mother Cæleicea, and his sons, and all the women that attended on her, to be put to death, [Plut. in Cleome.]

Antiochus, setting out with his whole army from Laodicea, and having passed the Desert, came to the Dale of Marfyas, which lies between the Lebanon and Antilebanus. Spending therefore many dayes in marching thorough this Dale, and having taken in such places as lay in or near his way, he came to Gerza and Brochos, which are two Castles, built upon the mouth or narrow passage which leadeth into this Dale; and those he found kept by Theodoros, an Etolian born, but at that time, Governour of Cætolylria for Philopator, which when he saw, he first resolved to set upon them: but perceiving the natural situation of the place, to be very strong, and Theodoros his courage in defending them, to be no less, he drew off and went his way, [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 390.] For which piece of service yet, Theodoros was so far from receiving any reward or thanks from Philopator's hand, that being sent for afterward to Alexandria, he had much ado there to escape with his life for it, [Ibid. pag. 385. and pag. 405.]

Antiochus, hearing of the utter destruction and slaughter made of his men with their General Xenetras, and of Molo his victory, whereby all the upper Provinces were utterly lost, and fallen unto Molo, brake off his intended journey, and cast in his mind how to settle and secure the main of his estate, [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 390.] About which as he was in council, and Hermias could not stand alone against the general vote of all the rest which persuaded the King to go; yet to have his will in some thing, he forged certain letters, as written from Molo to Epigenes, and coming in a packet with other letters to him; and by that means, gat him to be put to death, as one that kept intelligence with Molo. And now the King marching against Molo, when he came to the River Euphrates, took into his army the remainder of his Forces that there were, and came to Antiochia, which is in Mygdonia, καὶ ῥέμας χυμύεται: (1. 6.) about the beginning of Winter, and there stayed till the next Spring, [Ibid. page 393; 394, 395.]

Then removing from thence, upon the fourth day after he came to Lyba, and there following the advice of Zeuxis, and not of Hermias, he put over the Tigris with all his army; and then marching toward Dura, at the first approach raised the siege, which was laid unto it by a Captain of Moles: and going again from thence, and never camping two days in one place, at 8 dayes end, they passed Oricum and came to Apollonia, [Ibid. pag. 395, 396.]

Molo, though he grew now much afraid, lest his army would leave him, yet he drew out against the King; and having two wings, he committed the charge of the left to his brother Neolaus, and led the other himself. But when the battel joyned, the right wing, wherein himself was, stood firm to him, and fought very stoutly against the Kingsmen, but the left fell over to the King: which when Molo perceived, and saw withal, that he was ready to be wholly surrounded by the enemy, he fell upon his own sword. The rest also of his friends, and which had been betrakers with him in this conspiracy against the King, gat themselves every man away to his own home, and there acted the like tragedy upon himself. His brother Neolaus also, when the wing which he led yielded to the King, gat him away into Persia, to Alexander Moles brother; and there having slain Moles mother, and his children, slew himself also over them: having first advised Alexander to do the like. The King commanded Moles body to be hanged on a cross in a high place, and having reproached his Rebel-army with bitter words, for their foul and disloyal carriage towards him; yet at last gave them his hand, and received them to his favour and service again: and appointed some to convoy them back into Media from whence they came, and to settle that Province again. Mean while, himself went down from thole upper parts to Seleucia, where the said Hermias using the inhabitants very hardly in other points, wrung out of them over and above a thousand talents, for a fine; which yet the King mitigated and reduced to 150, and then left Diogenes to govern Media, and Apollodorus to be President of the Province of Susiana; but sent Tychon, Master of the Scribes, and General of the army, into the Regions lying upon the Red Sea, to govern them, [Ibid. from the page 396. to the page 399.]

Now at what time Antiochus made this war upon Molo, Theodorus the Etolian, Governour under Philopator of Celosyria, returning from Alexandria, and casting in his mind, that Patropator was no better than a lost man, and despairing of any good from the Princes about him, with such company as he had with him, seized upon Ptolemais by himself, and upon Tyros, by one Panetolus, and resolved to come to some agreement with Antiochus, and to put all Celosyria into his hands: which he performed in a very short time after, [Id. pag. 385. and pag. 405.]

Unto Attalus King of Pergamus was born by Apollinis of Cyzicum a son called Attalus Philadelphus, who lived 84 years, as Lucian in his Maturbin reporteth; and about the same time, Antiochus likewise had a son born to him, called Seleucus, and surnamed (as it seemeth) Philopator.

Jubile 15.

Antiochus, having now gotten a son, resolved to set upon Ariobarzanes, who had obtained the Dominion of the Atropatians, and other Countries thereabouts: and Ariobarzanes fearing the coming of the King; especially because he was now grown old and decrepit, sought peace at his hands, and had it from him upon such terms as he was pleased to give it, [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 399. and 400.]

Whiles the war went on between Antiochus and Ariobarzanes, Achaus having shut up Attalus in his chief City of Pergamus, and taken all the places thereabouts, and entered into a league and confederacy with Ptolemy Philopator of Egypt, thought it no great matter to break into Syria, before Antiochus could return to rescue it; and by the help of the Cyrrelians, who were already revolted from him, to make himself

Master

Master of all that kingdom; and therefore with his whole army moving out of Lydia, marched thitherward: but when he came to Laodicea in Phrygia, he there took a Crown upon his head, and began to assume the title and port of a King, both when he received Ambassadors from other Princes, and also when he had occasion of writing unto them, one Simeon, who being banished out of his own Country, was entertained by him, egging him principally on thereto: and to go on-ward in his journey toward Syria, when he came near to Lycania, his army there began to mutiny, complaining that they were led to a war against him, who was their liege Lord, and natural King. Whereupon Achaus, seeing it went against the hair with them, gave off his purpose, and proceeded no further in it; and moreover told the army that he never purposed to lead them into Syria against Antiochus, but only to waite the Country of Phidia, to which he presently led them, and did it to the purpose, and to having enriched them with the spoyle thereof, and made all fair with them, returned home again. [Idem. lib. 4. pag. 371, 374, 375. and lib. 5. pag. 401, 402.]

When the war between Antiochus and Ariobarzanes was ended, Apollonides a Physician of Seleucia, standing in bodily fear of Hermias, wrought the means to bring him into suspicion with the King, whereupon the King faining himself sick, caused Hermias to be haled out of his house, and by a crew of certain men appointed for that purpose, to be murdered; and it to tell out, that at the same time, the wives of Apamea drew likewise his wife and children out of her house there, and stoned them all to death. [Id. lib. 5. pag. 400, 401.]

Antiochus, being now returned home, and having sent away his soldiery to their winter quarters, sent messengers to Achaus, with many threatening words, [Id. pag. 401, 402.]

Among the Jews, after the decease of Onians 2, his son Simon 2, succeeded in the priesthood, [Joseph. lib. 12. cap. 4.] and he is said by Scol. in Graec. Esayb. to have late 20 years.

Antiochus, calling all his army to Apameas, at the first of the spring, by the persuasion of Apollonides his Physician, removed to Seleucia, which is called Pteria, sending Diogenes his Ammiral thither with his fleet, and Theodorus Helimolus with a convenient company to possess himself of the cities of Celosyria. But himself, having intelligence with some of the Seleucians in the town, whom he had won unto him by large monies and larger promises, took first one of the suburbs, and then the City for open their gates unto him, and having gotten it, he entreated the inhabitants very kindly, but put garriisons into the Castle and port both, [Polyb. lib. 5. from pag. 405, to pag. 408.]

The King was busie in settling things here, when letters came to him from Theodorus the Etolian, to request him to go into Celosyria, for that he was now ready to deliver it into his hands: whereupon the King put himself upon a march thitherward; but Nicolaus a Captain of Philopators, having discovered this practise, besieged Theodorus in Ptolemais, where he was; so that he could not get out to act according to his intentions, and withall, sent Lagoras, a Cretian born, with Dorymon of Eolia, with a party to keep the passage entering into Celosyria, near unto Berytus, which Antiochus easily put to flight, and then Theodorus and Panetolus, seeing the siege raised from before Ptolemais, where they had hitherto been shut up with such friends as they had about them, went and met him upon his way, and delivered both Tyris and Ptolemais, with all that in them was, into Antiochus his hand: there were found in both ports, 40 ships, which were consigned into Diogenes the Ammirals hand, [Id. pag. 405, 406, with lib. 4. pag. 385.]

Antiochus, being certified that Philopator was gone to Memphis, that his forces were all met at Pelusium, that the sluices of Nilus were all opened, and the sea let in to spoil all the fresh waters there, changed his purpose of marching to Pelusium, and went into Celosyria, and there going from one place to another, sought to take in all, partly by force, partly upon conditions, which he offered very reasonable unto them. Wherefore the places, that were less strong, yielded for the most part, upon the first summons; the rest clave close to Philopator, whose subjects they were, and thole cost him much time in besieging them, [Id. lib. 5. pag. 408.]

Mean while, Philopator let all go at six and seven, and took no care of any thing: yet Agathodes and Solibius, who managed all under him, made all the provision they could for the war, keeping all close from Antiochus, as much as possibly they might, and under hand solicited the states of Cyzicum, Byzantium, Rhodes, Eolia and others, to mediate for a peace between the two Kings, whiles they, the mean time, made all provisions for the war, and trained and exercised their men in all kind of feats of chivalrie, and martial discipline, to the utmost of their endeavour, [Id. pag. 406, 407. cum lib. 4. pag. 385.]

But

But there happened at this time a new war to grow between the Byzantines, and the Rhodians; the ground whereof was, for that the Byzantines being fain to pay tribute and contribution to the Galls, which lay havoc upon them, laid a tole upon every ship that passed by them into the Pontick sea, [Id. lib. 1. p. 158. & lib. 4. pag. 305, 306, 314.]

Whereupon the Rhodians sent presently to Prusias King of Bythinia, (that Prusias which in Excerptis Memnon, [cap. 29.] is surnamed Kaxa, (i. e.) the Lame) and made an association of arms with him, who was otherwise mischievously enough bent against them, as for sundry other causes, to especially for that they laboured, all that ever they could, to make love and friendship between Attalus and Achæus, which he thought, in many respects would prove damageable to him, and his affairs. Wherefore he came to this agreement with the Rhodians, that they should take the charge of the war at sea upon themselves, and let him alone to plague the Byzantines at land. And to begin, he forthwith went and seized upon a port of theirs in Asia side called Hieron, which place belonged formerly in common to the Marchants which traded into Pontus: but the Byzantines had lately bought them out, and appropriated it to themselves, together with all that portion of Myfia in Asia, which they had many ages before enjoyed, [Id. lib. 4. pag. 314, 315, 316.]

The Byzantines, seeing what the Rhodians had done with Prusias, did like the with Attalus, and Achæus, and sent to crave aid of them, and Attalus was very desirous of himself to have hearkened to their motion, but Achæus lying to heavy upon him as he did, he could afford them but little help. Achæus, whose Dominions stretched far and near in this side the Taurus, and who had lately taken on him, (as I said before) the title of a King, promised them all the good that he could do them, [Id. pag. 314.] They lent also to Tibites, to call him out of Macedonia, to be their General in this war against Prusias; for it was conceived, that the whole kingdom of Bythinia, being longed as well to Tibites, as to Prusias, whole Uncle Tibites was. [Id. pag. 316.]

Prusias, fearing the coming of his Uncle, pulled down all Castles and places of any strength, that were in the kingdom, [Id. pag. 318.]

The Rhodians to draw away Achæus from the Byzantines, sent to Ptolemei, and desired him to bestow on them Andromachus, (who was at that time a prisoner in Alexandria) to present him as a gift of their own, unto his son Achæus. Which done, and some other offices of honour, done unto him by the Rhodians, the Byzantines lost the chiefest staff they had to lean upon: and withall Tibites, whiles they were conveying him out of Macedonia, dyed by the way, which infinitely crossed them in their designs. But Cavarus (a petty King of those Galls, who were in Thrace, (as Polybius, in Excerptis, Valerij pag. 26. and Athenas lib. 6. cap. 6. tells us) who at that time came to Byzantium, mediated a peace between them, and Prusias and the Rhodians upon condition, that the Byzantines should forbear exacting any more tole, or impose upon their ships, and Prusias should restore what he had taken from them of Byzantium. [Id. pag. 317. & 318.]

At the same time also Mithridates King of Pontus made war upon them of Sinope, who borrowed 140 thousand drachmas of the Rhodians, and therewith fortified their City against him: and all that Peninsula, or neck of land, wherein their City stood, [Id. pag. 323.]

Antiochus besieged Dura in Phœnicia, a City which Cl. Ptolemæus calls Dora, but to little purpose, for that the place was naturally strong; and Nicolaus, a Captain of Philopators, sent them ever and anon relief. Yet because winter now came on, he was contented to make a truce with them for four months, at the motion of certain Ambassadors sent by Philopator; for further term, he would not grant, nor spend more time there, than needs he must, out of his own dominions: for manifest it was, that Achæus intended to invade his whole estate; nor was there any doubt but that Philopator aided him therein: wherefore having sent away the Ambassadors, he disposed garisons in fit places, and leaving the care of all things there to Theodotus, he returned to Seleucia, and sent his army into their winter quarters: but taking no further care, of keeping them in military duties; supposing, that the rest would come on of it self, without any great fighting for it, because he had already gotten a part of Cœlœlyria, and Phœnicia; and thought the rest would submit unto him of their own accord, and for words only without blows, [Id. pag. 409.]

But when things came not on, in such sort, as he imagined, at the first of the spring, he drew out his army again, purposing to set upon his enemies by sea and land, and by force to subdue the remainder of Cœlœlyria that stood out against him, [Id. pag. 411.]

Philopator committed the main of all his wars to Nicolaus the Eriolian, made Gaza the Magazin, and there laid in all his provisions for the war, sent forth his armies by sea sea and land, made one Perigemes Ammiral of his forces by sea, who had with him 30 fighting ships only, but of vessels of burden, to the number of 400. [Ibid. pag. 411.]

Antiochus was marched as far as Marathos, when Ambassadors came to him from the Isle of Aradus, to desire his friendship, and he not onely took them into his allocation, but also took up the difference that was between them and their neighbours, which dwelt upon the continent, and made them live good friends ever after: and then entering by the way of Theu-propon into Phœnicia, came to Berytus, and in his way set upon Botrys, and took it, but burnt Treets and Calamus to the ground, [Ibid.]

But when he came at last to a main battle, he divided his army into three parts, the one he gave to Theodotus, the other to Menedemus, and the third he reserved for the sea, and commanded Diocles to take charge of them; which Diocles he had made Governour of Parapotamia, lying upon the Euphrates. But he with his Life-guard kept in the midst of all, as a reserve, to see how all things went every where in the battle, and to help where need should be: and withall Diogenes for him, and Perimenes for Philopator prepared for fight with their naval forces, keeping each of them as close to the land as possible they could; and at last, upon a general signal given, they fell to it by land and sea, and at sea neither party had the better, and parted upon even terms, but at land Nicolaus, after a strong fight, was routed by Theodotus, and in the chaff, lost 6000 men slain, and as many more taken prisoners, the rest fled into Sidon. Perigemes seeing all lost at land, retreated at sea likewise, and came to Sidon: and Antiochus without any delay came thither with his whole army, and fate down before it; but forbore assaulting it, both because it was studded with men, and had provision enough within to keep them, [Id. pag. 412, 413.]

When P. Cornel. Scipio, and T. Sempronius Longus, were Consuls of Rome, Hannibal, having with much difficulty passed the Alpes, came down into Italy, in the Summer of this year, [Liv. lib. 21.] in the latter end of the 2 year of Olymp. 140, from whence we reckon the beginning of the second Carthaginian war, 41, the war of Hannibal, described at large by Polybius, Livie, Siliu. Italicu. in verse, and Appianus Alexandrinus, in his Hannibalicæ: by which war, the name and fame both of the Carthaginians and Romans spread so far in the world, that in Greece first, and then in Asia, properly to be called, and the Islands thereto adjoining, all men, upon their several occasions, cast their eyes upon, and look after them, and not upon Philip, Antiochus, or Ptolemei, any longer, [Polyb. lib. 4. pag. 443.]

In the same Summer that Hannibal came into Italy, Antiochus also brake into Palestine; and having given order to Diogenes his Ammiral to approach with his Fleet to Tyrus, he with his army marched to Philoteria, a City seated upon the Lake of Tiberias, into which the River Jordan falleth: and from thence, runneth thorough the Country adjoining upon the City of Scythopolis: which Josephus calleth Betsan, in the Tribe of Manasses. And having taken them both, and put Garrisons in them, he passed the mountains, and came to Atabyrium; that is Thabor, a City seated upon a hill, the top whereof is reckoned to be 15 furlongs compass; where Antiochus toiling them out with small skirmishes, caused his Van to go close to the walls, and then to make as if they fled; which they did: and when the Towardmen came out and pursued them, others that lay in ambushment arose, fell upon them, and slew many of them, and then himself falling on with the rest of his army, assaulted, and took that City also, [Polyb. lib. pag. 443.]

At the same time, Keræa, a Commander of Ptolemei Philopator, revolted from him unto Antiochus; whole entertainment there, was to good, that presently Hippolochus a Thessalian born, with 400 Horse in his company did the like. And Antiochus, leaving a strong Garrison in Atabyrium, removed thence, and took in Pella and Camos and Gephros, upon surrender: which to prosperous successe of his, moved the Arabians, which bordered upon those parts, with one consent, to call themselves into his armies, and to joyn with him. Antiochus, borne up with these new hopes, and confiding in the riches of Arabia, marched into the Country of Galatis; and having made himself Master of the field there, took the City Abyia: and in it, all those, who under the command of Nicias came to succour them. There remained now only Gadaræa, a City in the opinion of the World, far stronger than any in all those parts: Antiochus therefore came and shewed himself before it; and beginning to call up his works, with the very sight thereof, he struck such a fright into them, that they presently lent, and rendered themselves unto him, [Id. pag. 444.]

In the same Summer also, in Pamphylia, the Pednelisenses, being besieged by the Selgenises, and in danger to be taken by them, sent and prayed in aid of Achæus; who forthwith sent them 6 thousand Foot, and 500 Horse, under the command of Garteries; who purposing to enter the Town, by the way of Mylias, found that passage blocked block up by the Selgenies: whereupon, he made as if he would be gone, and the Selgenies seeing him gone his way, brake up, and went their way too home to the Camp, and others to their harvest, which was then ready for the hook; which Gafieres perceiving, turned back short, and passed the streight of Mylias, near unto Climax, without impeachment; and left a strong guard upon it, and then committed the whole management of that war, and defence of Pednelissa, to Phaylus: who, going presently to Perga, stirred up the people of Pamphylia and Pisidia, to come and help the distressed: Whereupon they of Alpendus sent them in 4 thousand Foot, and they of Etenna 8 thousand; but the Selgenies instead of blowing the fire, blew it out, and by their rash and unadvised carriage of matters marred all, and being shamefully overthrown, lost 10 thousand of their men, and fled home to Selga: Phaylus followed them at the heels; wherewith they took such a fright, that they forthwith sent Logbafis to treat of a peace: and he instead of a traitor, played the traitor with them; for a truce was taken, in which time, the souldiers of their adverle party came freely into Selga; but they of the Town had underhand sent to Achæus, and put themselves wholly into his mercy, to deal with them as he would: mean while, Logbafis plotted the delivery of the Town to their enemies: and when things were now ready for their purpose, the plot was discovered; and so both he, and those of the Town, whom he had drawn into the conspiracy with him, and the enemies, which lurked there, in expectation of the event, were all taken, and put to the sword. Then began Achæus seriously to deal for a peace between them: nor were the men of Selga averse from the motion; Whereupon they were to pay down 400 talents ready money, and 300 more a while after; and the Pednelissians were to restore them all their prisoners without ransom. Achæus, having gotten Mylias, and the greatest part of Pamphylia into his hands, marched forth with to Sardes; where, harrowing Artalus with an unceasing war, he began at last to threaten Prusias also, [Ibid. from pag. 415. to pag. 420.]

Whiles Achæus was busied in making war against the men of Selga, Artalus fate not idle, but having the Galls, called the Tectolagi (whom for the reputation of their valour, he had sent for out of Europe, to serve him against Achæus) of Europe, with him, he marched thorough the Cities of Eolia, and others thereunto adjoining, which for pure fear had submitted themselves to Achæus: Cuma, Smyrna and Paocæa, all voluntarily joynted with him: those of Ecgea, and Lemnos, yielded to him for fear, at his first approach: Ambassadors also came to him from the Teians and Colophonians; whom, upon hostages given, he took in upon such conditions, and covenants, as before: and then going on still, and passing the river Lycus, he came into the Country, inhabited by the Mylians: and having gone thorough that, he came to the borders of the Carlenies, whom, together with those who kept Didyma-tiches, he so frightened, that Themi-floides, whom Achæus had left to keep them for him, gave them up both into Artalus his hand: and removing from thence, he ravaged all the region of Apia, and passed the hill of Pellicante, and encamped upon the bank of the river Megistus; and while he was there, the Moon fell into an eclipse: and thereupon his Galls, who were otherwise weary of so long trotting up and down, with their wives and children in their company, pretending they held this eclipse for some sad prodig, would go no further, [Ibid. p. 420.] for upon the first of our Septemb. the Moon, in the beginning of the night, was eclipsed for more than a whole hour long.

Artalus, fearing least his Galls, inclining to Achæus, would fall upon his Countries, yet because it was upon his word that they came out of Europe into Asia, would not fall upon them, and put them to the sword, but convoyed them all back safe to the Hellespont, where they first landed, and there laid them out lands to live and dwell upon; promising them further, that if at any time after, they should have occasion to see him, he would not in any reasonable matter be wanting to them. Then calling to him those of Lamplacus, Alexandria, and Ilium; and commending them for persisting so constantly in their loyalty to him, he returned with his army to Pergame. [Polyb. ib. pag. 421.]

Antiochus, being advertised, that a great army of the enemy was met in a City of Arabia, called Rabatamana, (al. Rabbath-Ben-Ammon) and there plundered all the Country thereabout, marched thitherward, and came near to the little hillocks of earth, whercon the City stood, and having gone about and viewed them, he found that there were two onely ways to get into it; and therefore planted his batteries against those places, committing the charge of the works of the one to Nicarchus, of the other to Theodotus, to make breaches in the wall: and when they were made, and the walls quite thrown down, sooner than could have been imagined: the Kings men laboured day and night without any intermissions and with all the might they possibly could, to get into the City, but could do no good, by reason of the multitude of people that were within to maintain the breaches. At last, one of the prisoners in the Camp shewed them a vault, or hollow way under ground, by which they came down to get them water.

water: which no sooner had he stooped up, but they were forced to yield for want of water. The King having thus gotten the place, left Nicarchus with a sufficient Garrison to keep it: and sent Hippolochus and Kiras, which had revolted from Ptolemy to him, with 1 thousand Foot to the Country joying upon Samara, to govern that province, and to safe-guard those, who were his friends in those parts, and acknowledged him for their Sovereign: and went himself with his army to Ptolemais, purposing there to winter, [Ibid. pag. 414, 415.]

Cn. Servilius, entered his Consulship at Rome, upon the Ides, or 7 day of March. Now among other prodigies, which were from sundry places certified to the Senate at that time, this was one, That in Sardinia, the body of the Sun seemed to be lifted, than it used to be: and another, from Arpi, that the Sun and the Moon, seemed to fight each with other. Ca. Flaminius the other Consul, who was with the army in the Spring of this year, fought unluckily with Hannibal, at the Lake of Thrafinence, in H. truttia, and was there slain with 15 thousand of his men, [Liv. lib. 22.] These was that year an Eclipse of the Sun seen in Sardinia, upon the 11 of our February, and [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 442.] I tell us, that as well that great battle at Thrafinence, as that other between Antiochus and Philopator, concerning Cælofryia, were both fought toward the later end of the 3 year of the 150 Olymp. the later of which, fought at a place called Raphia; is by him described in this wile.

In the beginning of this Spring, (saith he, Antiochus and Ptolemy, having all things provided for the purpose, were now upon the point to try it out for the mastery of Cælofryia in a main battle: Ptolemy therefore with 70 thousand Foot, and 5 thousand Horse, and 73 Elephants, set out from Alexandria, [Ibid. pag. 421.] and made his first encamping at Pelusium, where he stayed till the rest of his army came in to him: and having there given every man his allowance of corn, he marched on thorough a country destitute of water, near the mountain Caurus, and the Barathra, and so came to Gaza: and after five dayes march, came to the place which he intended; and there encamped, within 50 furlongs of Raphia, which is the first City of Syria, saving only Rhinocorura, which a man meets withal coming out of Egypt, to go into Cælofryia, [Ibid. pag. 422.]

Antiochus also at the same time, came thither with his army, consisting of 72 thousand Foot, 6 thousand Horse, and 102 Elephants: and passing by the walls of Raphia, encamped the first night about 10 furlongs, and the next day came within 5 furlongs of Ptolemy's Camp, [Ibid.]

At that time, Theodotus the Etolian, who was formerly a man well known in Ptolemy's Court, and one who had well observed his courtes and manner of doings: with two onely in his company, about break of day, came within his trenches, and the night following, got into the Kings Pavilion, hoping alone to have done the feat, and there to have slain the King: but Dositheus (who was by extraction a Jew, but one who had fallen away from the Religion of his fathers) removing the King to another Tent, had caused another man of mean quality, to lie that night in the Kings bed: Theodotus therefore, that night brake into the Kings Tent, and there wounded two of the Bed-chamber, and slew one Andrazes, the Kings chief Physician; and so returned untroubled into his own Tent again, [Ibid. and 1 of the Maccab. cap. 3. v. 3, 4.]

After they had there lain 5 dayes, looking one upon the other, they then both resolved for a battle, [Polyb. ibid.] and fight they did; in which fight, when Antiochus appeared to have far the better of it, Antiochus, Ptolemy's sister, went among the souldiers, with her hair hanging about her eares, and crying to them, that they would stand to it, and in that battle defend their own wives and children; promising them, if they came conquerors out of the field, to give every of them, two pounds in gold: wherby it came to passe, that the souldiers took fresh courage, and slew their enemies down-right, and took of them many prisoners, [1 Maccab. cap. 3. v. 7, 6. with Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 424, 425.]

In that fight, Antiochus lost little lesse than 10 thousand of his Foot, and upward of 300 Horse: besides prisoners taken, above 4000. of his Elephants there were 3 killed in the fight, two died afterward of their hurts. Of Ptolemy's side, there were slain 1500 Foot, and 700 Horse: of his Elephants 16 were killed on the place, and the rest for the most part taken, [Polyb. ibid. pag. 427.]

Antiochus, having buried his dead, returned home with the rest of his army; and Ptolemy took back again, both Raphia, and the rest of the places which had been taken from him, upon the voluntayr surrender of the inhabitants: every man striving who should be foremost, in acknowledging him their Lord, and returned to his subjection: especially the Cælofryians, a Nation naturally, and of themselves, ever inclined to the service of the Ptolemy; upon this occasion, exceeded all others, in honouring him, with Crowns, Sacrifices, Altars, and other such like expressions of their affection, [Ibid. pag. 427, 428.] And Ptolemy going to visit the Cities next adjoining to that place, bestowed gifts upon their temples, and thereby heartened up the people, people to continue in his service, [1 Maccab. 3. 7.]

When the Jews sent some of their Sanedrin, and Elders, to render him their service, and to present him with gifts, and withal, to congratulate him after a great victory; it fell out, that he was thereby made the more forward to go thither, and to honour the City with his presence: and when he came, fell into an admiration of the beauty of their temple, and would fain have gone into the sanctum sanctorum; whereunto it was not lawful for any man to go, save for the High Priest only, and that but once in the year neither. But when the Jews stoutly resisted that motion, and the King upon their refusal desired the more and more to go in, and now all the Temple was filled with crying and howlings, and the City, with tumult and sedition: then Simon and the High Priest, kneeling down towards the Temple, to wit, between the Temple and the Altar, poured out his prayer unto God, begging his help, in this needful time of trouble: whereupon, the King fell into such a horror of mind and body, that he was unable able to speak, and so was carried half dead out of the Temple, [3 Maccab. cap. 1. & 2.]

So soon as Antiochus was returned to Antioch, he sent Antipater, his brothers son, and Theodotus Hemilius: his Ambassadors to Ptolemei, to entreat of a peace between them. And Ptolemei, contenting himself with his unlookt for victory, and with the recovery of Cœlœsyrta, after a few high words to the Ambassadors used, and complaints against the unjust dealings of Antiochus, granted a truce for a year, and sent Solonius to ratifie it with him, [Polyb. lib. 5. pag. 428. with Justin lib. 30. cap. 1.]

Ptolemei, having spent three months in Syria, and Phœnicia, to settle matters there in the several Cities and States, left Andromachus of Aspendus in Asia, to govern all that Country, and so with his sister Antioch, and his Nobles returned to Alexandria; having put such an end to this war against Antiochus, as his subjects, who knew the course of his life, much wondered at it. And Antiochus having confirmed the truce in the presence of Solonius for himself presently to begin a war upon Achæus, as he formerly intended to do, [Polyb. lib. 5.]

Antiochus, having spent the winter in making his provisions, with all possible care, the next spring set forward, and passing the mount Taurus, made a league with Attalus, and began his war upon Achæus, [Id. ib. pag. 444. & 446.] whom, while he besieged in Sardes, there passed between them sundry skirmishes, day and night, without ceasing: the soldiers on either side omitting no opportunity, but striving by all means, and lying at catch to entrap one another, and to fight upon all advantages, [Id. ib. lib. 7. pag. 506.]

When the Gauls, whom Attalus had planned in Hellepont, besieged the City of Ilium, the Alexandrians, which dwell in Troas, sent their Captain Themistias with four thousand men, and turned them going out of all the territories of Troas, by keeping all provisions from them, and making head every where against them: and when they could stay no longer there, they went and possessed themselves of the City called Arifla, and the territories of Abidus; and from thence issued out, and fought to get the rest of the Country thereabout into their hands, making incessant war upon them. Whereupon Prusias, king of Bythnia, drew out against them, and fought with them, and first slew the men in fight: and that done, fell upon their Camp, and there utterly destroyed their wives and children, and all the race of them, and gave the spoils of them to the soldiers for their pains, [Id. lib. 5. pag. 44.]

Ptolemei, returning into Egypt, fell again to his old trade of living, casting off all care of any thing that good was, and wallowing in all filthery of gluttony and luxury, [Id. ib. lib. 1. in Excerpt. Hen. Vales pag. 62.] soon growing more and more mad in this kind, he honorably glutted himself with uncleanness and lechery, but also vexed the Jews of Alexandria, with infamous and false reports cast abroad against them, and sought all means to turn them away from the true worship of the living God, and such as would not, he commanded to be slain; and turning them out of all place of office or dignity, marked them with hot irons in the face, with the sign of an ivy leaf, because that was the badge of Bacchus: but they that would fall from their religion, those he suffered to enjoy equal rights and privileges with the native Macedons in Alexandria.

Hercupon, many there were that abandoned their religion, in compliance to the Kings will, and others bought their peace, and saved their lives, and continued in the religion of their forefathers, held themselves punctually to their allegiance to the King, but would not converse or communicate in any kind with those of their own nation, who had apostatized from their religion; whereof their enemy made presently this his advantage, as if they opposed the King in his power and government, and sought to destruction, as if they opposed the King in his power and government, and sought to turn away the subject from his obedience. Whereupon Philopator, growing wroth with with the Jews, not only of Alexandria, but even throughout all Egypt, sent forth order to have them all gathered together into one place, purposing there to destroy them all. Now there was an inventory taken of them by the Kings officers, 40 days long; to wit, from the 25 day of the month Pachon, to the 4 of the month Epiphi, that is, according to the first year of Alexandria; (which some later Chronologers without all reason, would have never to have been in use, till after the Sea fight at Actium, between Augustus and Antony) from the 20 day of our May, to the 29 of July following: and the day of the massacre was designated to have been for 3 days space; to wit, from the fifth of Epiphus inclusively, to the seventh of the same.

Upon the time appointed, the Jews of Alexandria were all brought, (as we would say) into Smithfield, there to be first reviled and let at naught, by all that passed by: then the King called for Hermon, Master of the Elephants, and gave him order against the next day to make his Elephants, to the number of 500, to drink and fill themselves with wine mingled with myrrh, or frankincense; that growing more fierce and stark mad therewith, they might be let go, and driven upon the Jews; and either reach or tread them all to pieces. But the next day, the King fell into a dead sleep, and awaked not till dinner time; and by that time all the people that came thither to see, seeing no thing done, were gone home again. And upon the third day, when the Elephants were all prepared, and ready to fall upon them; there appeared two Angels, very terrible to look on, coming down from heaven, which to amazed all the company there present, that they stood amazed, and stirred not: The King also himself fell into a trance, and his fury towards those poor prisoners, stented; but above all, the Elephants, instead of falling upon them, turned short, and fiercely ran upon the soldiers, that, according to the custom, came in the reare of them, and trod them under-foot, all save such as could shift for themselves by fleeing.

Then the King commended the Jews for their constancy, and caused their fetters to be knocked off, and acknowledged, that their God it was, that had so delivered them; and for 7 days long, to wit, from the 7 of Epiphus, till the 14 of the same, (i.e.) from the second of our July, to the ninth of the same, feasted them: after which, the Jews thus saved, obtained leave of the King, that they might do to death such of their own Nation, as had apostatized from their Religion; laying, that those who, for their bellies sake, had forsaken the Lawes and Commandments of their God, would never prove faithful to their King. Of this sort therefore they slew 300 in the way as they went; and came at last to Ptolemais, seated upon the River Nile, in Arphote Nomos, which from the abundance of Roses there growing, is named Rhodophorus, where their Fleet attended them 7 days. There they altogether made a feast of thanksgiving; the King himself making every man a large allowance for his charge upon the way homeward: Whereupon they returned joyfully home, some by land, some by sea, some by the River, every man as his way lay. All which is more at large set forth and described in the 3 book of the Maccabees, which Philostorgius in the beginning of his Ecclesiastical History, calleth Librum miraculorum, (i.e.) A book of miracles; and setting forth nothing like unto the first.

The Egyptians grown insolent, and proud with their successe at the battle of Raphia against Antiochus, never cared for Philopator afterward; but fought them a Head and Captain of their own, as having power enough in themselves to quell the like of him: which at last, and that not very long after, they did, [Polyb. lib. 5. cap. 444.]

Philopator therefore was now forced to make a war upon his rebelling subjects, [Id. ibid.] wherein there is no doubt, but the Jews upon this obligation to lately by him laid upon them, stood firm unto him. At least, this appears out of Eusebius, and Jordanes his Chron. that about this time, there were no lesse than 60 thousand of them slain in a battle; which so great a slaughter of them, caused perhaps Demetrius, who wrote a book of the Kings of the Jewes, to think it reason, to reckon the years, which ran from the captivity of Babylon, or the carrying away of the Jews into Assyria, downward to the reign of this Philopator: as we read in Clemens Alexandrinus, [lib. 1. Stromat.] Whence also we gather, that this Demetrius the Historian, wrote after the days of Philopator; and yet before that vast delolation brought upon the Jews by Antiochus Epiphanes: to which especially, it is had ever come to his knowledge, I could easily, and upon very good grounds imagine, that he would have applied the termes of those former calamities, which befel that Nation.

The City of Sardes, all save the Castle, was thorough the industry of Lagoras the Cretian, taken by Antiochus, in the second year after he began to lay siege unto it. [Polyb. lib. 7. 4. pag. 506. to pag. 510.]

Solobius, who managed all matters in Egypt, under Philopator; dealt with one Boris, a Cretian, how to deliver Achæus, who lay besieged in the Castle at Sardes, out of this danger. But he, treating with Cambylus, the Captain of the Cretians, which served under Antiochus, got Achaus out of the Castle, indeed by a train, but delivered him alive into Antiochus his hand : and Antiochus, having gotten him, caused his hands and his feet first to be cut off; then his head to be chopped off, and to be sowed up in an asses belly, and his body to be hung upon a cross. The rest in the Castle, some holding with Ariobazus the Governour of Sardes, others with Laodice, the now Reick of Achaus, and daughter of Mithridates King of Pontus, and both at variance among themselves, quickly resolved to put themselves, Castle and all, into the power of Antiochus, and so submitted all to him, [Polyb. lib. 8. pag. 522. and pag. 529.]

3790.		Lacydes of Cyrena, master of the new Academy, having spent 26 years in that place, was the onely man that ever in his life time gave over his place, and he resigned it to Teicles and Euander, both of Phocæa, [as Laert. in Lacyde. affirmeth.]	4500.	214.
3792.		Antiochus now set upon Media and Parthia and other provinces, which had revolted from his progenitors, [Appian. in Syriac. in Mithr.] whole expedition against Artaces, who was the chief and principall founder of the Parthian Empire, is at large let out by Polyb. in his 10 books. [from pag. 597. to pag. 602.]
3793.		When P. Sulpicius and Cn. Fulvius were Consuls of Rome, Lavius being then Pretor, made a league with the Eriolians in Greece and Attalus King of Pergamus in Asia. [Liv. lib. 27. Justin. lib. 29. cap. 4. Europ. lib. 5.] which league, Attalus kept most constantly with the Romans to his lives end, [Polyb. pag. 820.]	4503.	211.
3794.		M. Attalus, any Manius Acilius were sent Ambassadors from Rome to Ptolemei and Cleopatra, Kings of Egypt, in Alexandria, to put him in mind of, and to renew their former league, and they presented them; both him with a gown, and a robe of scarlet, with a chair of State, all made of ivory; and her with a gown embroidered, and a fur-coat of scarlet. [Justin. lib. 30. cap. 1. & 4.]	4504.	210.
3795.		Ptolemei Philopator had by his wife, and the same his sister, Euridice, a son called Ptolemei Epiphanes, who at the age of five years, succeeded him in the kingdom of Egypt, [Justin. lib. 30. cap. 1. & 2.] whole birth day was first solemnly celebrated by all the great men and others of Syria, and the Country therabouts of his dominion, at home, and then they made every man a journey to Alexandria, there to bid him joy of his young son. Among the rest, Josephus the Jew, the son of Tobias, and of the daughter of Simon, surnamed the Just, the High Priest, collector of his tributes thoroughout Syria, Phœnicia, and Palestine, sent his youngest son Hyrcanus, begotten of the daughter of Solymius, his elder brother, to kiss the Kings hand; with letters to his agent Arion, who had the managing of all his monies at Alexandria, amounting to no lesse than three thousand talents, to furnish him with monies, to buy the most rich and precious present for the King, that that place could afford. And whereas the others, that went highest, presented the King not with above 20 talents; Hyrcanus brought with him an hundred beautiful boys, and as many maidens, and put in each of their hands a thousand talents, to offer them the boys to the King, the maids to Cleopatra the Queen, for a present: which so great and unexpected a present, the King much admired, and not onely entertained the young man with all princely honors, and royal gifts, but also by him wrote his royal letters, commendatory on his behalf to his father, and brethren, and to all his Commanders, and chief Officers in those parts, and so dismissed him, with all kind of honour that he could do him. But his brethren, (who were seven in number, yet all begotten of another Venter) seeing what great honour the King had done him, agreed among themselves to meet him as he was upon his journey homeward, and to murder him, not without the privy of the father himself, who, being angry with him for the profligate expence which he made of his monies in his presents to the King, cared not now what became of him: but when his brothers set upon him, he slew two of them, and sundry others of their company. And when he came to Jerusalem, and saw that no man there would look upon him, for fear of the work, withdrew himself to the parts beyond Jordan, and there kept [Joseph. lib. 12. cap. 4.]	4505.	209.
		Philippus, King of Macedon, fought two several battles against the Eriolians, borne up though they were with succours from Rome, and from Attalus the King, and in both battles overthrew them: and received shipping from Prusias, King of Bithynia: and both Attalus, and P. Sulpicius, the Pro-consul in those parts, wintered that year in the Isle of Egina, [Liv. lib. 27.] See also [Polyb. lib. 10. pag. 612, 613, and 851.]
		In the beginning of the Springs, Sulpicius, and Attalus, joyning together, failed to Lemnos, and from thence coming into Eubæa, took Ocreum and Opus, And then Attalus hearing that Prusias had invaded the frontiers of his kingdom, left the Romans, and the war in Etolia, and failed into Asia; and Philippus came to Elatia, where he had appointed the Ambassadors from Ptolemei, and from the Rhodians to meet him, and there, when they treated of putting an end to the war war in Etolia, news was brought them, that Niachanidas the tyrant of Lacedæmon, was ready to fall upon the Eleans, whiles they were busie about their solemn Games at Olympus, [Id. lib. 28.] and this Summer began the 143. Olympiade.

3797.	[Polyb. lib. 15. pag. 719.] tells us, that Arinoe the Queen, and sister of Ptolemei, was murdered by one Philammon, set on by Sotibius. See also [Hen. Valef. Excerpt. pag. 65.] and we find also in [Justin. lib. 30. cap. 1.] that Philopator slew his wife and sister, Euridice: Whereby it should seem, that Polybius his Arinoe, and Justin his Euridice, and Livies and Josephus his Cleopatra, [Justin. in Mithr. 5794. and 3795.] were all one and the same woman.	4507.	207.
	But whatever her name was, when she was dead, Philopator, falling in love with one Agathoclia, a dressing woman, and with her brother Agathocles in a Isomolitical way, let this Agathocles, to the wonderment of all men, at the helme of his kingdom: being a man of no Court-wit at all, nor ever verfed in any point of State affairs; and with them took in also their mother Oenauthe, who, by her two childrens means, engaged the Kings affection to her self also. Agathocles, keeping always close to the King, ruled the whole State: and the women bestowed all offices of the State, with all commander-ships, and captain-ships in the army where they pleased; and the King himself, who was now in their hands, could do the least of any man, in his own kingdom, [Polyb. lib. 15. pag. 720. and in Excerpt. Valef. pag. 65. Justin. lib. 30. cap. 1. & 2. Plut. in Eritico, and in Clem. Athenæ. lib. 6. cap. 6. and lib. 13. cap. 13. Hieron. upon Daniel, cap. 11.]
	But when the people wanted a man, by whose hand to wreak their anger upon Agathocles, and Agathoclia, they were faine to be quiet for the present; yet had their eye still upon one Tlepolemus, and fed themselves with some hope in him, [Polyb. pag. 66. Excerpt. Valef.] This young man, who had ever carryed himself eminently, and with great honour in the war, had at that time the managing of the Kings treasure committed to him; which when he used, not as an officer, but rather like a young heir, mitted to him; which when he used, not as an officer, but rather like a young heir, he fell into the dislike and hatred of the Court: Whereupon, when Ptolemeus the son of Sotibius, (of whom I spake ere while) returned from Philippus: out of Macedon, with the other Ambassadors, it should seem, who had been sent thither the year before, began to speak his mind somewhat freely of Tlepolemus, he found every man at Court, ready to applaud him in his way, [Idem. lib. 16. pag. 82, 85. and Excerpt. Valef.]	4508.	206.
3798.	These coles kindling, and growing into a further flame, the Courtiers in an open assembly complained of Tlepolemus, and Tlepolemus upon the other side, set himself to frame one general accusation against them all to the King: which Sotibius hearing, (who had both the keeping of the Kings Scale, and custody of his person) gave up the Scale into Tlepolemus his hand; which he receiving, did all things afterward at his pleasure in the State, [Ibid. pag. 85, 86.]
3799.	In the Consulship of P. Corneli Scipio, and P. Licinius Crassus, there was found by the College of the Decemviri, a certain saying, written in the books of Sibylla, which were in their keeping, to this purport, and in these words. Quandocumque hostis alienigena, &c. That whensoever a foreign enemy should make war upon Italy, he might be driven out again and overcome, if the image of the Mother of the gods at Ida, which fell from heaven, were sent for, and brought to Rome. Whereupon, there were five Ambassadors dispatched away presently to King Attalus, to desire her of him, and to bring her by sea unto him. These five, had each of them a ship of five tire of oars to go in; to the end they might appear in a fashion answerable to the honour and dignity of the State of Rome, in those parts, where they were at their first arrival to ingratiate themselves, and to begget an opinion of the Roman name and Majesty of their State. Attalus received and entertained these Ambassadors at Pergamus, with all expressions of love and kindness; and then led them to Pessinuntis in Phrygia, and there delivered into their hands that sacred Stone, which the people there said, was the mother of the gods, and willed them to carry it to Rome, as they desired, [Lib. 29.]	4509.	205.
	In the prologue to the 30 book of Trogius, it is noted, that Antiochus in that journey of his, quitted all the upper Provinces of Asia, as far as Bactria. But there, when he long laboured, though all in vain, to turn Euthydemus out of that Province; he was faine, in the end, to come to an agreement, and make a league with him: for the ratifying whereof, when he sent his own son, called Demetrius, to Antiochus; Antiochus, seeing his behaviour, judged him a man fit to be a King, and first promised to give him one of his daughters to wife, and then gave his father leave to take upon him the title of a king; and lastly, having subscribed to the other articles of the league between them made, and taken his oath for the true observance of them, removed with his Camp; having first distributed provisions largely among his own soldiers, and received from Euthydemus all the Elephants, which he had with him, [Polyb. lib. 11. page 651.]			Then 3800.

Then passing the Caucasus, he re-entered upon India, and there renewed the league, and friendship formerly made with Sophagatenus their Kings; and there he received more Elephants from him, and then distributed a further admeasurement of corn among his army, and to returned, leaving Androthones of Cyzicum, to bring after him the treasure, which Sophagatenus had promised to put into his hand. [Id. lib. pag. 652.]

Then came he into Arachosia, from whence, passing the river Erymanthus, and going thorough the Country of Drangia, he came into Carmania, and there, because the winter season came on, he quartered his army about the Country, [Ibid.]

The Romans made a peace with Philippus King of Macedon; and into this league were taken by Philippus, Prusias the King of Bithynia, and by the Romans, the State of Ilium, and Attalus the King of Pergam. [Id. lib.]

Philopator died at Alexandria, leaving for his successor Ptolemaeus, surnamed Epiphanes, (i. e.) the Noble or Illustrious, whom Appianus in his Syriac, surnameth also Philopator, after his fathers surname. He succeeded his father at the age of four years, as Hieronym. upon the 11 of Daniel (ayes, or of five, as Justin, and he reigned 24 years: as [Cl. Ptolem. in Reg. Can. Clemens Alexandr. Porphy. Enchir. and Jerom] tell us.

Philopators death was concealed a long time, whilst Agathoclia and Oenanthe her mother, rifled the Kings coffers, and got all his monies into their hands, and so put the state and kingdom into the power of their own lewd comforts, [Justin l. 40. c. 3.] Till at length Agathocles, calling together the principal of the Macedons, came forth unto them, and bringing with him his sister Agathoclia, and the young King, tells them; That the King, when he lay a dying, delivered the child into his sisters bosom, and commended him to hers and his care; and withall produced the testimony of one Critolaus, who testified that Ptolemaeus was about to invade the kingdom, and to set the Crown of Egypt upon his own head. And when he fill continued to utter the same words in all places where he came; every man scorned him. And he, to make his disagreement with Ptolemaeus yet more apparent to the world, took Danae, Ptolemaus his mother in law, out of the Temple of Ceres, and dragged her thorough the open streets, and bare faced to prison; and then took Moeragenes one of the guard, because he gave information of all things to Ptolemaeus, and favoured his party, (as he could do no less, in regard of that intimacy that was between him and Adeus, the Governour of Babilonia) and delivered him into the hands of his Secretary Nicofraus, to be tortured: but when he strangely escaped the rack, and got out of their hands stark naked, as he was, he fled to the Macedons, and stirred them up against Ptolemaeus. [Polyb. lib. 15. pag. 712, 713, 714.]

And now when the people of all forts came flocking to the Court, in a tumultuous manner, Agathocles, taking the King with him, went and hid himself, in a place called Syringes, which was a gallery or walk, which had every way three walls and gates to passe, before one could come unto it. But the Macedons forced him to deliver up the King into their hands; and they, having gotten him, brought him out to the people, and there set him in a Royal Throne: to the great joy and comfort of all that saw him. And not long after, was brought fourth also Agathocles, well fettered; but the first that met him, cut his throat. Then came Nico, and then Agathoclia all naked with her sisters, and all the generation of them: and last of all, the old beldam Oenanthe, haled out of the Temple all naked, to the peoples pleasure, some fell a tearing their, and being all together delivered up to the peoples pleasure, some fell a tearing them with their teeth, some lanced them with their knives, others pulled out their eyes, and as any of them happened to be killed, they presently fell to pulling them in pieces, untill there was no signe of any of them left. At the same time also, the damsel, who attended upon Antiochus, whilst he lived, hearing that Philammon, whose hand was principally used in the murder of her, was come from Cyrene to Alexandria, brake principally used in the murder of her, was come from Cyrene to Alexandria, brake into his house, and there slew him, with staves and stones; and finding there a little child of his, strangled it, and dragged his wife stark naked into the street, and there cut her throat. [Ibid. pag. 716, 718, 719.] And then afterward, when the tumult, and fury of the people was over; the management of the affairs of the Kingdom, was committed to one Aristomenes, born in Acarnania, [Ibid. pag. 717. & lib. 17. pag. 771, 772.] and he being made governour of the King and kingdom, administered the affairs thereof, with a great deal of moderation and mildness [Diodor. Sicul. in Excerpt. Pales. pag. 294.]

Antiochus, King of Syria, and Philippus, King of Macedon, hearing of the death of Philopator, entered into a wicked consultation together, how to share his kingdom, between them two; encouraging one another, to begin with the murder of the young King that was, [Id. lib. 15. pag. 705, Livie, lib. 31. Justin, lib. 30. cap. 3.] whereof

Polybius

The year of the World.

Polybius in special, [lib. 3. pag. 159.] speaketh in this wise; Πτολεμαῖος τῷ Βασιλεὺς μακεδόνων & τῷ βασιλεὺς, &c. (i. e.) When Ptolemai the King was departed this life, Antiochus and Philippus, laid their heads together, to share the estate of the young King between them, and began a wicked practice. Philip laying hands upon Egypt and Syria, and Antiochus, upon Callosyria, and Phenicia. And Jerom upon 11. Dan. 1. Philippos faith h; King of Callosyria, and Phenicia. And Jerom upon the great, conspiring together, made war upon Agathocles, (he would have laid, Aristomenes) and the young King Ptolemaeus Epiphanes, upon this condition, that each of them, should take of his Dominions, what lay next him: which gives a light to that place in [Josephus, lib. 18. Antiquit. cap. 3.] whence he faith; When Antiochus Antiochus reigned in Asia, Judea and Callosyria both, lived in a continual trouble and vexation, by reason of the continual war which he had, first with Philopator, and afterward with Epiphanes his son, for whether he had the better of it or the worse, these countries were ever plagued by him, being tossed and tumbled between his prosperous and adverse fortunes, like a ship in the sea, between contrary waves: Yet at length, Antiochus had the upper hand, and laid Judea unto his Dominions. But when Philopator was dead, Epiphanes sent a great army into Callosyria, under his General Scopas, who recovered both Callosyria, and our Country also, to himself again, &c. For this is that he would, at least he should, say, that Antiochus after a long war with Philopator and Epiphanes, concerning the Dominion of the land of Judea, got it at last from Epiphanes; and Epiphanes by his General Scopas, recovered it from him again, and anon after, lost it a second time unto him: which Eusebius nor perceiving, in the 10 year of Philopater, faith, that Antiochus having overcome Philopator, joyned Judea to the rest of his Dominions. And an. 1. of Epiphanes, in his Chron. faith, that Ptolemaeus Epiphanes, by his General Scopas, took Judea. Whereas Antiochus, after his overthrow at Raphia, is no where read to have made war upon Philopator any more: and that the league, which was after that battle made between them, was first broken by Antiochus in the very first year of Epiphanes, (when Scopas was not yet employed in the management of that war, as hereafter shall appear) is shewed by Jerom upon 11. Dan. 1. where he faith, When Ptolemies Philopator was dead, Antiochus brake the league, made with him, and led an army against Ptolemai his sons, who was then but 4 years old, and was surnamed Epiphanes.

When Cn. Servilius Cæpio, and Cn. Servilius Geminus, were Consuls in Rom; it fell out, that at Frutino, the Sun seemed to be encompassed round with a little circle, and then that circle again, was surrounded by a greater body of the Sun, [Liv. lib. 30.] and it should seem, that was none other but that very Eclipse of the Sun, which the Astronomical tables shew us to have fallen this year, upon the 6 day of our May, according to the Julian Calendar.

The Carthaginians, worn out with the continual victories of P. Scipio, and despairing of all other safety against him; called Hannibal out of Italy, to their rescue: and he after 16 years stay in Italy; thereupon left it, and returned into Afric, [J. Id. lib. 1.]

Philippus, King of Macedon, sent one Heraclides a Tarentine born, and a most vicious fellow, to Rhodes, to destroy their Fleet; and then sent Ambassadors into Crete, to stir them up to a war against the Rhodians. [Polyb. lib. 13. pag. 672, 673.]

There was a sea fight between Philippus King of Macedon, and the Rhodians, near to the Isle of Lada; wherein he took two of their ships of five tire of oares apiece. The rest of their Fleet, fleeing into the open sea, were lighted on by a foul tempest, and driven ashore, first upon Myndia, and the next day upon Coos: But the enemy, trailing the ships which they had taken, at their pouce, went into Lada, which lieth over against Milietus, and refreshed themselves in the enemies Camp which they had left: which the Milesians perceiving, they pretended not Philippus onely, but even Heraclides himself, with Crowns, at their coming into Milietus, [Idem, in Excerpt. Pales. pag. 70, and 73.] out of Zeno and Antisthenes, two Rhodian Historians.

Philippus, wanting corn, ceased not to waste all Attalus his country, even to the very walls of Pergamus: but when he could neither take any one City of his, because they were so well fenced, nor get corn or other spoil out of the Country, by the exquisite order which Attalus had taken to prevent him: then he fell upon the Temple and Altars, and spoiled them, breaking the very stones of them in pieces, that they might never be put together again. And having utterly destroyed the Nicophorian Grove, planted near the City Pergamus, and laid many a Church and Chappel thereabout level with the ground: he went from thence first towards Thyatira, but then turned back again, and went to a field called Tibbes, hoping to get some great booty there; but failing there also, and coming to a place called Hiera-Come, he sent messengers to Zeuxis, Governour of Lydia under Antiochus, desiring him to supply him with provisions for his army, according to the articles of peace, between his Master and him: but Zeuxis made at first as if, by all means, he would do according to those articles: what else? but indeed resolved to do nothing whereby any good might come to

This Philippos had another sea fight against Attalus and the Rhodians, near the Isle of Chios; in which there were slain of the Rhodians 60, of Attalus his men to the number of 70 men, but of Philippos his part, were slain of his Macedons 1200, and of his aids and associates, to the number of 6000. There were also taken prisoners of the Macedon nation, with their fellows, 2000, and 700 Egyptians. Nevertheless, Philippos, though he had every way the worst of it, yet challenged the honour of the day to himself in two respects: one was, for that Attalus was forced to fly to Erythra, he had seized on his Admiral, and trailed her at one of his ships tails into his port; The other was, for that himself coming on board at Argentaum, a fore-land in Ionia, he there took up his landing, to recover what might be saved out of the naverage, [Polyb. lib. 16. from page 723. to page 730.]

When Philippos besieged Prinaffa, a City of Caria, and could do nothing upon it by plain force; yet at length he got it by a stratagem, [Id. ibid. pag. 730, 731.] and put Garrisons into Iassus, Bargyllis, and the City of the Euromenae; [Id. pag. 731. & lib. 17. page 744.]

P. Cornelius Scipio utterly overthrew Hannibal, in Afric, and this was the last battle of this second Carthaginian war; we read in Zonaras, that the Carthaginians were amazed at a total eclipse of the sun which fell at this time: but that this was no such great eclipse, we find by Livie, [lib. 30.] who saies, that indeed the body of the sun at Carme seemed to be somewhat lessened: and the Astronomical Tables shew as much, and tell us of a very small eclipse of the sun, this year, upon the 19 of our Octobr. Some there are, who say that Hannibal flying out of the battle, came to the sea side, where he found a ship laid for him; and therein sailed directly into Asia, to King Antiochus: and that when Scipio demanded of the Carthaginians, first, and above all things, to deliver Hannibal into his hand, answer was made him, that Hannibal not in Afric, [Liv. ibid.] But others more truly, that Scipio neither demanded him at all of them, nor any ways insulted upon his overthrow. [Plutarch in T. Q. Flaminio.]

When Philippos came toward Abydus, they shut their gates against him, nor admitting so much as his messengers, which he sent unto them: he lay long in siege before that place; and they might have escaped his hands, had Attalus and the Rhodians made any speed to their rescue. But Attalus sent them in only 300 men for a supply; and the Rhodians, who with their whole fleet lay at Tenodus thereby, sent them one onely ship of four tire of oars to help them. The men in Abydus, at first, having good store of Engines all about their walls, kept him off very manfully, not onely from making his approaches by land, but also, from coming into their port by sea. But afterward, when a breach was made upon the main wall, and they had cast up another within it, and the Macedons went to undermine that also, then were they fain to send to Philip, to treat of conditions for a surrender, one of which was, That the Rhodian ships with the soldiers and mariners in her, might depart in safety: the like for Attalus his men that were in the Town: and the last, That they themselves might depart with one suit of cloathes onely upon their backs. But when they could get no answer from him, unless they rendered themselves wholly and absolutely to his mercy; they, what with indignation, what with despair, grew into such a rage, that they made fifty of their principal men to swear openly, That if they saw the inner wall once taken by the enemy, they would presently go and kill every man his own wife and children, and throw his silver, gold, and jewels, into the sea: and that done, the soldiers bound themselves in common, each to other, that either they would vanquish their enemies, or die every man of them sword in hand, and fighting for his Country. [Liv. lib. 31. Polyb. lib. 16. pag. 736, 737, 738.]

About the same time came Ambassadors to Rome from Attalus and the Rhodians, both, complaining of the wrongs done them by Philippos and his Macedons, to whom answer was made, that the Senate, would take the affairs of Asia into their consideration and care. [Livie, lib. 32. with Justin lib. 30. cap. 33.]

Three Ambassadors were sent from Rome to Ptolemei and Antiochus, to put an end to all differences between them. The Ambassadors were, C. Clau. Nero. Mar. Emil. Lepidus, and P. Sempronius Tuditanus; who coming to Rhodes, and there hearing of the siege of Abydus, and desirous to have some speech with Philippos, as they had in their instructions to do, put of their journey to Ptolemei and Antiochus, for the present, and sent Emilius the youngest of the three, unto Philippos; and he meeting with him at Abydus, gave him to understand, that the senate of Rome had a purpose, to desire him to forbear making war upon any City of the Grecians, nor lay hands or touch any thing belonging to Ptolemei King of Egypt. This if he did, he

he might live in peace; if he did not, he should know, that the Romans were resolved, and ready to make war upon him: to whom Philippos returned this answer, Thy age, latitude, and comelines of thy person, and above all things, the name of a Roman, makes thee speak thus high: but I would advise you, to remember the league and covenant made, and to keep peace with me; if not, I am also resolved to do my endeavour, and to make you know and feel, that the power and name of a Macedon is no way inferior to, or less noble than that of a Roman is. [Id. lib. d. with Polyb. pag. 738, 739, 787, 388.]

Justin, [lib. 30. cap. 30.] tells us, that this M. Emil. Lepidus, was sent also by the Romans into Egypt, to govern the Kingdom of Egypt, on the behalf of the young Ptolemeus Epiphanes. Whether moved thereto by an Embassy sent to them from Alexandria, that they would vouchsafe to take upon them the patronage and tutelage of the Minor, and defend the kingdom of Egypt, which Antiochus and Philippos were said already to have shared between them, [Id. cap. 2.] or whether, the Minor himself was by the father in his death-bed committed to their care and trust, as he elsewhere intimates, [lib. 31. cap. 1.] whereof [Valer. Max. lib. 6. cap. 6.] speaking, uteth these words: When King Ptolemei had left the people of Rome Guardian to his son in his minority, the Senate sent M. Emil. Lepidus, High Pontif, and one that had been then twice Consul to Alexandria, there to take care of the Ward's estate, and was content to wait the holiness of a most honourable, and wishal, of a most upright man, and so long versed in their own affairs, to employ it in the exercise of a foreign charge, rather than suffer the faith and trust of our City to have been implored in vain. For he conceived that this man had executed the office of a Guardian or Tutor in Egypt, whilst he was High Pontif, and when he had been already twice Consul in Rome; when as yet Epiphanes was dead before that time, the reason of which error in him was; because it should seem, he had seen some coin, wherein, together with those titles of his honour and dignity, he found this office of his, Guardian-ship in Egypt, joyined; for to this day, there are extant to be seen some silver coins, with this inscription; on the one side thus, Alexandrea; and on the other thus, S. C. M. Lepidus Pont. Max. Tutor Reg. who also, in the Image side, is stamped, putting a Crown upon a young mans head, standing on his right hand, with a Scepter in his hand.

And now the Athenians, seeing their territory wasted all over by this Philip, sent and prayed in aide from all parts; from the Romans, from the Rhodians, from Attalus, and from Ptolemei, [Liv. lib. 31.]

Whereupon the Ambassadors of the Romans and Rhodians, meeting with Attalus at Athens, by a common consent, agreed to aide them: for which the Athenians presently decreed excessive honours, first to Attalus, then to the Rhodians; nay, they went so far, as to call one of their own Tribes, after his name; and made it superfluous to their ten, that were before, [Id. lib. Polyb. Legat. 3. pag. 786, 787.]

Whiles the Romans were busie in preparing war against Philippos, there came Ambassadors from Ptolemei, or rather from his Curators, to Rome, who informed, that the Athenians had craved aide of the King, against Philippos; But though they were confederates, both of the Kings, and the Romans, yet would he do nothing that way, nor send shipping, or army thither, or any whither else, for defence or offence of any, without the leave and authority of the people of Rome. That if the Romans would be pleased to undertake their quarrel, the King would be well content, to sit quiet at home: or if it pleased the Romans to sit quiet, He of himself should easily be able to furnish the Athenians with power enough to repell: the force and violence of Philippos. The Senate decreed, That the King should be thanked for his kindness, and to tell him, that the Romans were purposed to defend and maintain their own friends and confederates themselves: If they wanted any thing necessary to this war, they would acquaint the King therewith; and that they knew well enough, that the Kings Forces and Means, as they were very great, for they were also very necessary for the defence of his own State. Then they ordered presents to be sent to the Kings Ambassadors, to every of them 5 thousand pieces of brass money, [Liv. ib.]

In the year 34, for so it is in the Greek Manuscript at Lambeth, nor 32, as in the vulgar edition of the second Period of Calippus, 347. of Nabonnassar, the 16 day of the month Mefor, the 22 of our September, 7 hours after high-noon, there was an Eclipse of the Sun observed at Alexandria, [Cl. Prod. lib. 4. cap. 11.]

3804.

Toward the later end of Autumn, P. Sulpitius Galba, Consul, passed over with an army into Macedonia, against Philippos; and thither came to him Ambassadors from Athens, desiring him to deliver them from the siege, which was then laid unto them; whereupon was dispatched away C. Claudius Cento, with a certain number of ships, fraught with soldiers, to the relief of Athens; for Philippos himself lay not before it; but was then busied then ever, at the siege of Abydus, [Liv. lib. 31.]

They of Abydus, remembering the oath they had made, sought it out to fly thither, that when the night should have parted the fray between them; the king amazed at their courage

b. In the same year, between the two Islands of Theramene (at, Thera) and Therafia, and in the midst of the sea, lying between them, there was an Earthquake, by which there start up a new Island, with hot Springs, or Fountains of hot waters. And in Asia, upon the same day, an Earthquake shook Rhodes, and many other Cities; and overturned sundry houses in them, and some other Cities it swallowed up whole; whereupon their Priests and Soothsayers foretold, that the then rising Roman Empire, would swallow up and devour the kingdoms, both of Macedon, and Asia, [Justin, lib. 30. cap. 4.]

c. In the beginning of the Spring, Flaminius, sending for Attalus to come to him to Elatia, went with him in company to Thebes, there to draw the Bœotians into a society and league with the Romans: where when Attalus made an Oration to them, to that effect, with more vehemency and stretching of his voice than his age would bear, being now grown old, whether by a vertigo taking him in his head, or by a rheum falling upon his throat, he grew suddenly speechless, and fell all along, and then being taken with a dead palsy in all one side of his body, lay sick thereof at Thebes. And Quintius, when he saw that there was no fear of present death, but only a weakness of body, which required time for his recovery, left him there, and returned to Elatia, from whence he came, [Liv. in the beginning of 33 book, printed at Rome, out of the Manuscript of Bamberg, and at Paris, in 1616. with Plutarch in the life of Quint. Flamin.]

At the same time also, Antiochus, sending his two sons, Arduus and Mithridates, before him by land, and willing them to stay for him at Sardes, set sail with an hundred tall fighting ships, and other smaller vessels, purposing by the way to try what he could do, with the Cities of Caria and Cilicia, which were of Ptolemeis possession, and withal, to assist Philippos by sea and land, what he might: and having taken in first Zephyrium, and Soli, and Aphrodisias, and (then doubling the Cape of Anemurium, a Foreland of Cilicia,) Selinus, and other Towns, Cities, and Castles, all along that Coast; which either for fear or favour, rendered themselves without resistance, at last came to Coraceum, which contrary to all expectation, shut gates against him, [Livie, lib. 33.]

Whiles Antiochus lay at the siege of Coraceum, Ambassadors came to him from the Rhodians, to tell him, that if he kept not himself on the other side of Nepheis, a Foreland of Cilicia, they would oppose him, not for any grudge they bare unto his person, but to keep him from joining with Philippos, and that he might not impeach the Romans, who had now undertaken to procure and maintain the liberty of Greece; which when he heard, he tempered his choler, and told them only, that he would send his Ambassadors to Rhodes, to treat about that matter, and with instructions to renew the leagues formerly made between them and him, and his forefathers, and to bid them not to fear his coming to them, for that it should bring no damage to them or any of their friends: for that he was resolved not to infringe his amity with the Romans in any sort, appeared well enough, both by his late Embassy sent unto them, and their honourable decrees and answers made thereupon to him, [Id. ibid.]

The Rhodians challenged to themselves Peræa, which is a Region lying in the Continent of Asia, over against their Isle of Rhodes; and had been always in their use and possession of their ancestors, but was now invaded and possessed by Philippos, and were at this time upon the recovery of it out of his hand. Paulistatus was their General, and he had routed the Macedons which kept it, with Dinocrates their Captain: And had they then marched straight forward to Stratonicea, they might have gotten that also, for the asking: but so far as much as they returned after the battle to their Camp, Dinocrates with those which remained of his army, gat into it, and so fortified it, that the Rhodians coming after to besiege it, could do no good there; which story is more at large described and set forth by [Livie, lib. 33.]

Attalus was carried sick from Thebes to his City Pergamus by sea, and there died, [Id. ibid. Polyb. pag. 820. Plut. in Quin. Flamin.] He lived 72 years, and was King 44, [Liv. ibid. Polyb. in Excerpt. Vales. pag. 102. and in Suidas, in the word Attalus:] though Strabo says, he reigned only 43 years, [lib. 12. pag. 624.] He left behind him, a wife and four children, [Liv. ibid.] His wives name was Apollonis of the City Cyzicum: his children by her, were Eumenes, Attalus, Philaretus, and Athenæus; of which, Eumenes, the eldest of the four, succeeded him in the kingdom, [Strabo, ut. sup. and Plut. in his book μετὰ ἀδελφούς: (i. e.) of brotherly love.] where he telleth us, that the two younger brothers, though all of brave and lusty spirits, yet lived in that awful respect of him, that they were as so many penitents and watch men about him; for the preservation of his Crown and Dignity, [Polyb. in Excerpt. Vales. pag. 169. and Suidas, in the word Attalus.] Whereupon it was, that their mother would often say, that she was a happy woman, not in regard of her wealth, nor for that she was a Queen; but because she saw her 3 younger sons, to be as so many watchmen and keepers, about the eldest:

eldest: and that whereas they ever went with their swords about them, yet he lived in the midst of them, without the least dread or fear of them, [Plut. ut. sup.] and of Apollonis, or Apollonia, their mother; and the filial duty and respect which she 1 bare unto her: you may read more in Polybius, [In Excerpt. Vales. pag. 113, 114.] and in Suidas, in the word Apollonia.

d. Philippos, being overthrown, Horse and Foot, in the battle fought at Cyncephalas, in the Country of Theffalia, of which victory we find mention made, [1 Maccab. c. 8.] Flaminius gave him yet peace, upon conditions; much the rather for that he understood that Antiochus was already marched out of Syria with an army, to come for Europe; and thereupon he made a truce with him for four months, that in them he might send to Rome, and submit all to the will and pleasure of the Senate there, [Polyb. in Legat. 6. pag. 792. Livies lib. 33. editio. Roman. & Paris.]

The Rhodians, hearing of the defeat of Philippos, cast not off the care they had of defending the liberty of such Cities as were confederate with Ptolemei, and which were in present danger of being invaded by Antiochus: but to some of them they sent aide, to others advertisement, and advice, &c. were the means of safety from his attempts, to the Caudians, Myndians, Halicarnassians, and Samians, [Liv. lib. 33.] and yet all would not serve; but Antiochus, in spite of them, surprised Coraceum, Coricos, Andriace, Limyra, Patara, Xanthus, which belonged to Ptolemei, and last of all, the City of Ephesus it took, [Jerom upon Daniel, cap. 11.]

Antiochus, spending his winter at Ephesus, endeavoured to reduce all Asia into the ancient and uniform frame and body of an Empire. And he saw well, that the rest of the Cities, would easily be brought unto it: but finding that Smyrna in Iolia, and Lamplacus in Hellefpont, purposed to stand out, he both advised them to do like the rest; and also used some threats too, in case they would not, fearing least the rest should follow their example, in opposing his designe. And when it would no better be, he sent some companies from Ephesus to besiege Smyrna, and others from Abydus, to do the like to Lamplacus, [Liv. lib. 33.] Whereupon they both, and such other Cities, as thought fit to join with them, sent their Commissioners to Flaminius, to crave his favour and aide against him, [Appian in Syriac, pag. 87.]

When Cl. Marcellus was Consul, immediately upon his entering into his office, came Ambassadors to Rome, to treat of a league to be made with Philip; and thereupon was passed a decree of the Senate to this effect, *That the Grecians every where, as well in Europe as in Asia, should be free, and live after their own laws; That such of them as were under Philippos his dominion, or had any Garrisons of his in them, should before the celebration of the next Isthmian games, deliver them up into the hands of the Romans: That from such as were in Asia, as Ewromius, Pedasus, Baryglia, Iassus, Abydus, Thafus, Myrrina, Perinthus, he should draw away his Garrisons, and leave them free. That he should not renew his war with Eumenes, (for Valerius Antias observeth, that a special heed was taken of him) Attalus his son, the new King. And as concerning the enfranchising of the Cyani, that Ti. Quin. Flaminius should write his letters to Prusias, that the will and pleasure of the Senate was, &c. And to see these things duly put in execution; the Senate sent ten choice Commissioners into Greece, [Polyb. Legat. 7. pag. 793. & Legat. 9. pag. 792. Livie, lib. 33.]*

b. When the Isthmian games were ended, at which the general liberty of Greece was proclaimed, by the publick Crier; then did Ti. Flaminius, and the ten Commissioners which came from Rome, give audience to Hegesianactes and Lylas, which came Ambassadors from Antiochus to Flaminius: and they were bid tell Antiochus, that he must not meddle with any free City in Asia, much less make war upon them; and that he must presently get him out of such places as he now held, which were formerly belonging either to Ptolemei, or Philippos, and to command him from them, not to set foot in Europe himself, nor to send any of his forces thither: and added, that some of themselves would shortly make a journey to Antiochus, [Polyb. Legat. 9. pag. 798, 799. Liv. lib. 33.]

When the assembly was dissolved, the ten Commissioners parted the work; they came about, among them; and every man went to fix his proper quarter to be set at liberty, according to the decree; and of them P. Lenuus went by sea to Baryglia in Asia, and willed that City to be from thence forward free, (i. e.) to live according to their own laws. L. Sestinius, at Hephæstia and Thafus, and the Cities of Thracia, and where ever he came, did the like. P. Villius, and Lu. Terentius, undertook the journey to Antiochus, and Cn. Cornelius, to King Philippos, [Polyb. Legat. 9. pag. 799. Liv. lib. 33. Plut. in Flamin.]

c. At the first of the spring, Antiochus went by sea from Ephesus, and came to Hellefpont; and passing over his land army from Abydus, and joining them with his sea forces, landed in Chersonesus, and there took in such Cities as for fear gave up unto him: from thence he went to Lychnachia, which being utterly destroyed, a little before, by the the Thracians, he began to rebuild and to make it the seat of his son Seleucus his kingdom in those parts, [Liv. lib. 33. Appia, in Syria, pag. 86, 87.]

And when all went on roundly with him, and as heart could wish, L. Cornelius, who was sent by the Senate of Rome to make an atonement between him and Ptolemei, came to Selymbria, P. Lentulus from Bargylia, and L. Terentius, and P. Villius from Thafus, being three of the Commissioners, and from thence went to Lyfimachia; and thither also P. Cornelius came from Selymbria, and a few dayes after Antiochus came thither likewise out of Thracia, and there they met; Hegesifanax also and Lyfias, who had formerly been sent Ambassadors from him to Flamininius, happened to be there at the same time. Where in the conference, P. Cornelius said, That he thought it reason, that Antiochus should restore unto Ptolemei, all such Cities and places of Ptolemei's Dominions, as he had lately taken from him; and should further, draw off his Garrisons from all such places as were belonging to Philippos, because the Romans had now overcome him: and warned him withal, not to meddle with any free State; whereunto the King answered, that he wondered first, by what right the Romans quarrelled with him, about the Cities in Asia any more, then he questioned them of what was by them done in Italy: and then, that he was content the Cities in Asia, should enjoy their liberty, but should thank him, and not the Romans for it. And as for Ptolemei, they two were good friends already, and that he was further, at this instant, about to joyn in affinity with him, [Polyb. pag. 800. 769. and 770. Liv. lib. 3. Appia, in Syria, pag. 87, 88.]

And when P. Cornelius went on, and told him, that reason would, that the Ambassadors of Lamplacus and Smyrna should be called, and suffered to speak for themselves: called they were. Then appeared Parmenion and Pythodorus, for the City of Lamplacus, and one Cceramus for Smyrna: who (speaking boldly and freely in their own cause, Antiochus frowned, to see, that he was there called to yield an account of what he had done in Asia, before the Romans, as if they were his Judges: and bad Parmenion, hold his peace, saying, that the controversies by him then moved, were to be debated before the Rhodian Judges, and not the Roman: and so that conference brake up, nothing done, [Polyb. lib. 17. pag. 770.]

Polycrates, who was Governour of Cyprus, and had withal, the gathering of the Kings revenue there, having given up his charge to his successor, Epiphanus of Megalopolis returned to Alexandria, and delivered up to the King Epiphanus a great mass of monies: for which he was very welcome thither, and much applauded by all there, [Id. pag. 773.]

Presently after, the Etolians began to mutiny, under their Captain Scopas: who having a numerous company of souldiers under him, and had opportunity enough, the King being but a child, to act what he would, while he stood dawdling, was taken short in his undertakings; for when Aristomenes perceived, that his friends repaired to him in his own house, and there used to fit in council together; he sent a company of the Guard, and called him before the Kings Council: But Scopas, upon this surprisal, grew so wild, and void of sense, that he neither went on with what he intended, as he might have done, nor yet would obey the summons of the King, as he should have done: Aristomenes therefore finding what case he was in, sent a company of souldiers, and beset the house round, and caused him to be brought before them, by Ptolemei the son of one Eumenes, [Id. pag. 771.]

Being brought before the Council, and there charged, first by the King, then by Polycrates and Aristomenes, he was self-looses found guilty and condemned, not only by the Kings Council, but also, by all the Ambassadors of foreign Nations, which were there present. For Aristomenes, intending to accuse him, had purposely brought thither, not only sundry other Noble personages of the Greeks, but even the very Etolian Ambassadors themselves, who were at that time, sent thither to entreat a peace, between the King and them: among whom, was one Dorymachus, the son of Nicostratus. Upon the hearing therefore, Scopas with his consorts, were all cast in prison: and the night following, Aristomenes caused both him, and all that were of his kindred, to be poisoned: but as for Dicaarchus, which was a most impious wretch, he caused him to be racked to death. For this was that Dicaarchus, who when he was Admiral of Philippos his Navy, in harassing the Cycladian Isles, erected two altars in a certain Port there; the one to Impiety, the other to Iniquity, and sacrificed to them both as unto two gods. For the rest of the Etolians, as many of them as had a minde to returne the King gave them free leave to be gone, and to take with them, whatever theirs was, [Id. pag. 772.]

When this buisness of the Etolians was settled, and all quiet; then the whole Courts fell to their solemn Revels, which they used to have when any one is first crowned King, which they call, Anacletaria: not that the King was then ripe for Government; but because they thought, that if it were once blown abroad, that the King was come now

now to rule in his own person, things would go better, and grow more quiet in the kingdom than erst they had done; and therefore made all provision they could to perform this solemnity for the honour of the kingdom, [Id. pag. 773.]

Whilst that debate held at Lyfimachia, between Antiochus and the Commissioners from Rome, there grew a report, raised, as it seemeth, from what had beised Sochar at Alexandria, but without any certain author, that Ptolemei was dead: and so that conference came to no issue; for neither party would be known to have had any tidings of it: and L. Cornelius, whose proper errand was to treat with both the kings, desired some time to have speech with Ptolemei: his drift being to come at all hands into Egypt, before any thing could there be resolved on, for the new settling of things there, after the kings supposed death. And Antiochus made no doubt, but that if the king were indeed dead, Egypt would be his: wherefore, having sent away the Commissioners, and leaving his son Seleucus with his land Forces, to go on with the new building of Lyfimachia, he with his whole Fleet sailed to Ephesus, and from thence dispatching away Ambassadors to Flaminius to desire him to persist in the league and amity made between them, took shipping again, and, keeping along by the coast of Asia, came into Lycia, and at Patara, understood for certain, that Ptolemei was living: and thereupon gave off his journey intended for Egypt, [Liv. lib. 33. Appia, in Syria, pag. 88.]

389.

Antiochus, halting away toward Cyprus, which he hoped certainly to get, when he had doubled the Cape of the Chelidonian Foreland, upon a mutiny raised among his Mariners, was faine to stay a while in Pamphylia, at the mouth of the River Euxymedon: and from thence sailing to a place called the Heads of the river Sarus, a foul tempest befel him, which was like to have drowned him and all his Fleet: many of his ships were driven on shoar, many swallowed up in the sea, so that no soul escaped of them. A multitude of men perished in that tempest, not onely of the Mariners, and common souldiers, but also of his Nobles, and Principal men belonging to him: yet having saved what could be gotten out of the wreck, seeing he was in no cate to go on for Cyprus, he sailed to Seleucia in Syria, and there fell to rig up his Navy again; and prepared for the marriages of his children, Antiochus and Laodice, whom he had joyined in Matrimony: and then, putting to sea again, because now the Winter grew on, he failed to Antioch, [Id. ibid.]

The Decemviri, or ten Commissioners, returning to Rome, informed the Senate there concerning Antiochus, and his returne unto Syria, [Liv. 33.] Hannibals enemies at Carthage, informed the Senate of Rome, that he sent messengers, and letters to Antiochus, and daily received the like from him again; which, though false, yet was taken for true, by those who ever lived in fear of him. Whereupon they sent Ambassadors to the Council at Carthage, complaining to them, that Hannibal held correspondence with Antiochus, and advising them by one means or another, to rid him out of the way, [Id. ib. Justin, lib. 31. cap. 12.]

Flaminius his answer to Antiochus his Ambassadors, when they moved for a league, was, That he could do nothing now the ten Commissioners were gone; and that they should do well to go after them, and make their addresses to the Senate at Rome, [Liv. lib. 34.]

Hannibal hereupon, stealing away from Carthage, came safe to Tyrus, and was there received by the founders of Carthage, as in a second country of his own; and having rested himself there a few dayes, failed to Antioch: but finding that Antiochus was removed from thence, he there spake with his son, who was celebrating a solemn Festival in Daphne: and having been courteously entertained and sacrificed a while by him, took ship again, and followed Antiochus, and overtook him at Ephesus, bearing his brains, whether he should, or should not, engage himself in a war against the Romans. But Hannibals coming to him, let him a goe, and now on he would: nor thought he now so much of the war it self, as of what great matters he should acquire, by conquering the Romans, [Liv. in the end of his 33 book, Justin, lib. 31. cap. 12, and Emil. Prob. in Hannib.]

And here it was, that when one Phormio, a Philosopher of the Peripatetic sect, had disputed a long time in his school, concerning the duty and office of a Commander, or General of an army, and of the Art Military, and ordering of a battle, and all very wisely in his presence: Hannibal could not hold, but cried out, and said, That he had heard many a doting fool in his dayes, but a verier dotard than this Phormio was, he never heard, [Cicer. de Oratore, lib. 2.]

T. Quinctius Flaminius, joyning with Eumenes and the Rhodians, fought very successfully against Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedemon, [Liv. lib. 34.]

When M. Porcius (Cato) was Consul, the City of Smyrna began, and built a Temple to the City of Rome, [Tacit. Annal. lib. 4.] and by their example, the Alabandenses, not onely built another Temple to her, but also instituted certain anniversary anniversary plaies and games, in honour of her, as of a proper Goddesse. [Livie, lib. 43.]

3810. Eratosthenes of Cyrene, the son of Aglaus, whom a man may well call, not onely a Grammarian, though that were his chief profession, but also a Poet, and a Philosopher, and a Geometrician, for he excelled in all alike, this year died, [Lucia, in Zancrobis], after whom, in the keeping of the library at Alexandria, succeeded Apollonius Alexandrinus, a scholar of Callimachus, and he which wrote the Argonautica, who because he lived many years at Rhodes, was therefore surnamed Rhodius, [Strabo in Apollonius].

Antiochus perceiving the great affection which the Jews bare unto him, conferred great favours on them again, and by his letters highly commended them therefore. [Euseb. Chron.] These letters of his are extant in Josephus, [lib. 14. Antig. cap. 3.] in one of which, written to Ptolemæus his Governour there, are mentioned many donations of his, and immunities granted both to the City, and also the Temple at Jerusalem, and in another to Zeuxis; he commanded two thousand of the families of the Jews, which lived in the provinces of Babylonia, and Mesopotamia, to be transplanted into the parts of Phrygia and Lydia, to keep them in order there, who were otherwise disposed to innovation.

3811. Antiochus, preparing now to make a war in Greece, and there to begin his war against the Romans, imparted his purpose unto Hannibal; who told him, there was no conquering of the Romans, but in Italy it self: and to effect this, he desired onely to have 100 of his fighting ships, with 16 thousand Foot, and one thousand Horse, to be put into his hand: that with his fleet he would first sail into Africa, that he doubted not, but to stir up the Carthaginians themselves, to a fresh rebellion against them; but if that failed, yet he would land them in some part or other of Italy, and there begin the war a new against them. And when he had perswaded the King to hearken to this motion, he went not presently in person into Africa, (as Emil, Probus, in the life of Hannibal imagineth) but having lighted upon one Aristo, a Tyrian born, at Ephesus, sent him in fallion of a marchant to trade at Carthage, and there to prepare their minds, for a revolt from the Romans. Upon this Aristo Hannibals enemies at Carthage laid hold; and whilst they spent many dayes in consultation what to do with him, and whether to send him to Rome, in justification of their own innocency, he got a shipboard, and came back to Hannibal again. Whereupon they presently dispatch away Ambassadors to the Consuls and Senate at Rome, to let them know what had passed, [Livie, lib. 34. Justin, lib. 31. cap. 3. Appian, in Syriac, pag. 89, 90.]

Mean while Antiochus sent Lysias, Hegesinaetes and Menippus his Ambassadors to Rome, to feel the pulse of the Senate there, for though their pretence was to sollicite for a league and friendship between him and them: yet were they willed to intimate to the Senate, that the King wondered, why they should bid him to get him out of the Cities of Eolia, and Ionia, and to release his tributes due unto him from other places, and not to meddle with matters in Asia, and Countries of his ancient inheritance in Thracia; for that these were not commands to be laid upon friends of theirs, as he was, but enemies, when they were conquered. But they were told, that they should go and attend Flaminius, and the ten Commissioners formerly sent into Greece, for an answer. And when they came, the Commissioners pressed, that Antiochus should either forbear Europe, or suffer the Romans, to maintain what they had already in Asia, and acquire more there if they could. But the Ambassadors told them plainly again, that they neither could nor would make any bargaines, whereby the Kings rights and dominions might any wayes be impaired, lo that matter brake off, and the Ambassadors went away, [Livie, lib. Appian, in Syriac, pag. 89.]

Scantly were the Ambassadors gone, when news came from Carthage, that Antiochus was busie in his preparations for a war against the Romans, and that Hannibal was designed for his General therein: which put them into a fear withall, least a fresh war should be raised again from Carthage, [Livie, lib.]

3812. Antiochus, having given his daughter in marriage to Ptolemæi at Rhapia, in Phenicia, or rather in Palestina, returned to Antioch, [Livie, lib. 35.] for being now resolved to make war against the Romans, he thought fit to legue himself by marriages and affinities, with as many Kings and Princes thereabouts, as possibly he could; and therefore he sent his daughter Cleopatra, surnamed Syria, into Egypt to Ptolemæi: giving him, for a dowrie with her, all Cæloxyria, which he had formerly wrest from him, thereby to pacify the young man, and to keep him from joining with the Romans in this war, [Appian, in Syriac, pag. 88.] Jerom upon Daniel, [cap. 11.] saith, that Antiochus, purposing to get Egypt it self into his dominion, espoused his daughter Cleopatra, in the seventh year of the young mans reign, by one Ecles of Rhodes, and that in the 13 year of the same, according to Eusebius Chronicle, which he follows, or according to our our computation, in the 12 thereof, sent her to him; and gave him for a Dowry all Cæloxyria and Judea, and yet could not get Egypt neither; because Ptolemæi and his Council perceived his drift, and stood the more cautiously on their guard, and Cleopatra her self the Queen, stood more affected to her husbands part, than to her fathers. And Josephus, [12 Antig. cap. 3.] writeth that Antiochus, giving his daughter Cleopatra to wife unto Ptolemæi, gave him also for her Dowry Cæloxyria, all Phenicia, Judea, and Samaria to boot; and that equally dividing the tribute due out of them all, between them, the chief men in every of the said countries gathered it forth, and paid it in unto them.

Another daughter of his, called Antiochi, he proffered in marriage unto Ariarathes, the King of Cappadocia, and sent her to him: and a third unto Eumenes, the King of Pergamus. But Eumenes, seeing him set upon a war against the Romans, and that he was the cause of seeking his affiny, refused the offer. And when his two brothers, Attalus and Philæteus, wondered that he should refuse such an offer made him by to great a neighbouring King as Antiochus was, he told them what, and how great a war was now at hand: wherein, said he, if the Romans get the better, as he verily believed they would, he was then sure to hold his own by them: or if Antiochus happened to overcome them, then his fortune would be, either to be turned out of all by an over-powerful neighbouring Prince, or be but forced to live under him: concerning which, we may see Eumenes his own Oration, [in Polyb. Legat. 25. and Livie, lib. 37.]

Antiochus, having passed the Taurus, marched thorough Cilicia, and in the very end of Winter came to Ephesus, [Livie, lib. 35.]

And from thence, in the first of the Spring, sending back his son Antiochus into Syria, to look to matters there, and in the remote parts of his Dominions Eastward, whilst he was busied in the West, he with all his land Forces, went to invade the Pilsidians, which inhabit about the parts of Selgia, [Id. ibid.]

At that time there came to Elæz, Ambassadors sent from Rome to Antiochus, who, under colour of an Embassy, were to spy out, and inform themselves, of what preparations he had made, and by often conversing with Hannibal, might either abate his rancor toward them, or if not that, yet by their familiarity with him, might perhaps make Antiochus jealous of him: these Ambassadors were, P. Sulpitius, and P. Villius, who among others had met with Antiochus at Lyfimachia, [Livie, lib. 34. and 35. Justin, lib. 31. cap. 4. Fronti, Strabon, lib. 1. cap. 8. Appian, in Syriac, pag. 90, 91.]

The Ambassadors went up from Elæz to Pergamus, where Eumenes his Palace was; because their instructions were, first to confer with Eumenes, before they went to Antiochus: and Eumenes did what possibly he could, by advice or persuasion, to stir them up to a war against Antiochus: Sulpitius staid behind at Pergamus sick; but P. Villius, hearing that Antiochus was busied in war against Pilsidia, went to Ephesus; and during those few dayes of abode which he there made, was careful to converse with Hannibal as frequently as he might, both to sound what was in him, and withal to mitigate his rancor toward the Romans, by assuring him, that they intended him no further harme, [Livie, lib. 35.]

Claudius Quadrigarius, following herein the Greek History of Acilius, saith, that P. Scipio Africanus was in this Embassy, and that he it was that had such speech with Hannibal at Ephesus: mentioning one discourse of theirs in particular, which was, that when Africanus asked him, whom he thought to have been the greatest Captain in the World? Hannibal answered him, Alexander the Great: and whom the second? he answered Pyrrhus; and whom the third? My self, said Hannibal: at which word, Scipio burst out into a great laughter, and said, what would you have done, if you had overcome me? I would then saith Hannibal, have counted my self before Pyrrhus and Alexander both, and all others that ever were: and that this perplexed and intricate answer of his, was but a trick of a Punick wit, and that Scipio was taken therewith, as with a pretty kind of flattery; as if both himself had been thereby made a non-partail above all, and withal, that he had vanquished and overcome, a better man than Alexander, [Id. ibid. with Plutarch in T. C. Flaminius, and Appian, in Syriac, pag. 91, 92.]

Villius went forward from Ephesus to Apamea, and there Antiochus hearing of the coming of the Roman Ambassadors, met them: where they fell upon the same points almost, which were treated of, between Flaminius and the other Commissioners, on the one side, and his Ambassadors on the other at Rome. But the news which came of the death of his son Antiochus, who was but lately before sent into Syria, put off that parley: and Villius, that he might not be seen there up and down in an unreasonable time, and when the King and Court were all in mourning, retired to Pergamus: the King also giving off all preparations for the war which he had begun, went to Ephesus, [Livie, lib. 35.]

And now the Roman Embassadors being sent for to come to Ephesus, had their conference with Minio, a principal Counsellor and Favourite of the Kings: Minio in his discourse blamed the Romans, that under a pretence of setting Greece at liberty, they intended an open war against Antiochus, whereas themselves held for many Nations and famous Countries in their subjection, and made them tributary to Rome, which formerly lived free, and according to their own laws: and when Salpitiis, (for he was now recovered of his sickness) answered for the Romans, and called the Ambassadors of other States there present to witness (as they had been before prompted, and lessened by Eumenes) on the Romans behalf, things between them, fell from a conference to a plain brawle, [Id. ibid.]

Antiochus, having heard the Embasie of the Rhodians, told them all, that as well they, as they of Byzantium and Cyzicum, and other Grecians dwelling in Asia, if he and the Romans came to an agreement, and joynd in a league together, should be free; but as for the Eolians and Ionians, it should not be so with them; for that they had ever lived under the subjection of the Kings of Asia: therefore the Roman Ambassadors, when they could get no reason from the King (for indeed that was the least part of the errand they came in, but only to be as so many spies of his actions) returned to Rome, [Appia, in Syriac, pag. 92.]

3813. After this, came the Etolian Ambassadors to the King, who offered to make him Commander of all the Forces which they could make, and persuaded him by all means to put over into Greece, which said they, is ready to receive you; and not to stay till his armies came down to him out of the remote and inner parts of Asia: which put Antiochus upon such a pin, that he resolved ere long to be going into Greece, [Id. ibid. pag. 92, 93. with Polyb. lib. 3. pag. 159. and Justin, lib. 30. cap. 4. & lib. 32. cap. 1.]

But before he took shipping, he went up to Ilium, and there sacrificed to Minerva; and then returning to his fleet, he set forward with 40 sail of fighting ships, and 60 open boats, and 200 ships of burden, full he laded with all kind of provisions, followed in the reare of them. His whole army consisted of to thousand Foot, and 500 Horse, with six Elephants, scanty enough to have possessed Greece, if none had been there, to have held up a Buckler against him, much less to endure the brunt and burden of a war against the Roman Nation, [Liv. lib. 35.]

Eumenes presently sent his brother Attalus away to Rome, to let them know that Antiochus had put over the Hellepont with his army: and that the Etolians were ready to rise in armes, immediately upon his landing; Thanks were given by the Senate, both to Eumenes then absent, and also to Attalus there present; and he had lodgings provided for him at the publick charge, and presents sent unto him, [Id. ibid.]

b. About the middest of Winter, Antiochus, falling into consultation at Demetrias, how to carry on the war; Hannibal gave right good and sound advice, if it had been followed; as it was not save only in this, that Polyxenidas was sent to bring away the rest of the fleet and army out of Asia, [Liv. lib. 36. Justin, lib. 32. cap. 5, 6. & Appia, pag. 93, 94.]

Antiochus, falling in love with a young Damel of Chalcis, the daughter of Cleopolemus, where he hosted, being himself upward of fifty, laid aside all care of the war, which he had then in hand; and set his mind wholly upon wedding the wench; and called her by the name of Eubrea: and spent all the Winter after, in banqueting and revels; and as he did, so did all his army likewise, and spent all that season, in luxury and pleasure, [Polyb. lib. 20. in Athenaeus, lib. 10. cap. 12. Diador. Sic. and Dio. in Excerpt. Vilei, pag. 296. and 609. Liv. lib. 36. Appia, pag. 96, 98.]

M. Acilius Glabrio, being Consul, upon the 5 day before the Nones, (i.e.) upon the third day of May (which that year, as we may gather out of the Eclipse which was in the year following, fell upon our January) went in his rich coat-armour, out of Rome against Antiochus, [Liv. lib. 36.]

About the same time, came Ambassadors to Rome from two Kings, Philippus of Macedon, and Ptolemei of Egypt; both offering their aid against Antiochus, with money and corn: and from Ptolemei were brought in ready money, a thousand pounds in gold, and 20 thousand pounds in silver: but nothing was received, thanks only was given them, for their good will. And when both of them offered to come in person with their armies into Etolia: the Senate answered, That they would not trouble Ptolemei; as for Philippus, that the Senate and people of Rome, would take it kindly at his hands, if he would assist M. Acilius their Consul, in what he might, [Id. ibid.]

c. Antiochus, having had the worse of it as Thermopyla, in a battle against M. Acilius the Consul, and Cato a Colonel in that army (which battle is described by Livie, lib. 36. by Plut. in Cato, Major, by Appia, in Syriac, and Fron, lib. 2. Stratag.) and forced to flee

3814. flee back into Asia, came to Ephesus, with his new wife, [Liv. Justin, Appia, and Polyb. in Athenaeus lib. 10. cap. 12.] In Tullies book De Senect. Cato is brought in, speaking of himself, and saying, That he fought at Thermopyla, under M. Acilius Glabrio, in the fourth year after himself had been Consul; and both Plutarch in his Life, and Livie [lib. 36.] affirm, that he was sent by the Consul Acilius to Rome, with the news of that victory. Now what Antisthenes the Historian reports to have followed, and been acted by Buplagus the Syrian, and Publius a Roman Captain, after this fight at Thermopyla, is to be learned out of Phlegon of Tralles, in his book De Mirabilibus, [cap. 3.]

Antiochus, being at Ephesus, lay there careless and void of all fear from the Romans, as one supposing that sure they would never offer to put over into Asia. But when Hannibal had routed him up from that vain and idle imagination, he presently sent for his forces out of the in-land Countries, to come down in all haste to the sea side, and rig'd up his navy, making Polyxenidas, a bandito of Rhodes, his Ammiral thereof, and presently put over again into Chersonesus, and fortified that; putting Garrisons into Seltus and Abydus, where he supposed the Romans would endeavour to pass over into Asia, [Liv. lib. 36. and Appia, pag. 99.]

C. Livius Salinator, who was sent to succeed Attalus in the charge of the navie, and Eumenes, sailing into Asia, met with Polyxenidas Antiochus's Ammiral by the way, and put him to flight, sunk ten of his ships, took 30 more, and lost but one of theirs; and that was of Carthage too: but they pursued Polyxenidas as far as Ephesus: and then sent back the Rhodian fleet, consisting of 25 ships, and which came after the fight was done, and Eumenes likewise with his ships, and came to Canas, a Town of Lycia, and there, because the winter came on, drew their ships on land; and fortified the place where they lay, with works for their defence, [Liv. lib. 63. Appia, pag. 99, 100.]

When this battle at sea was fought at Coricus, (for there it was fought) Antiochus was gone to Magnesia, near the mountain of Sipylus, to gather his land forces together: and there bearing of his overthrow at sea, set himself to prepare a new navy, that he might not seem to be beaten out of the sea: and therefore he dispatched away Hannibal into Syria, there to get ships from the Phoenicians, and commanded Polyxenidas with all speed to rig up his ships that were bruised in the fight, and to build new ones, to make up his fleet again, and himself the mean while took up his winter quarters, in the parts of Phrygia, and sent for aides from all parts, even out of Gallogracia itself, [Liv. lib. 36. & 37. Appia, pag. 100.] for what with fear, what with money, he had drawn them all to joy in arms with him, and the rather for that he thought the greatness of their stature and courage, would be a terror to the Romans, [Appia, pag. 89.]

Ambassadors now came to Rome, from Ptolemei and Cleopatra, to congratulate them for their expulsion of Antiochus out of Europe; and persuaded them to pass into Asia: for said they, the fear of the Roman name is already fallen, not only upon all Asia, but even upon Syria also; and shewing, that they were ready to do, what ever the Romans would command them. Thanks were returned to the King and Queen for their good wills, and presents to the Ambassadors, to every of them four thousand pieces of brasse money, [Liv. lib. 37.]

Antiochus left his son Seleucus with the army in Eolia, to keep the sea coast all along in order, for the Romans on the one side and Eumenes on the other were tampering with them every where, and Seleucus spent all that winter, partly in scouring his friends, partly in plundering those, whom he could not draw to his bent, [Id. ibid.]

b. About the deapth of winter, Eumenes, with a company of two thousand Foot, and 100 Horse, came to Canas, where the Roman fleet wintered: there he told them, that if they would, they might get a great spoil out of the Country lying about Thyatira, and never left till he had persuaded Livius the Ammiral, to let him have five thousand men; with which he went, and in a short time brought them back again laden with an excessive great booty, [Id. ibid.]

In this interim, a sedition was raised in Phocaea, for there were some which fought to draw the common people to side it with Antiochus, for that the wintering of the Roman navy there, lay very heavy upon them; in regard they were charged to furnish them with 500 sea gowns, and as many coats: corn also grew very scant among them, inasmuch, that both the ships and Garrison were fain to remove from thence, and quarter elsewhere. Then was the faction, which stood for Antiochus, quit of that fear: but the Aldermen, and chief of the City stood firm for the Romans; as the chief of the faction for Antiochus, were more prevalent with the commons, [Id. ibid.]

The magistrates therefore of Phocæa, fearing the inclination of the multitude, wisely sent their Agents to Seleucus, to pray him not to approach near their City, for that they were resolved to sit still, and to see what the issue of that whole war would be. But he being informed that the multitude was wholly for his father; and that they were in want of corn, made them no answer, but marched straight toward them with his army, [Polyb. Legat. 18.]

At Rome, when both the new Consuls, Lu. Scipio, and Ca. Lælius Nepos, were ambitious, to go into Greece, P. Scipio, in the behalf of his brother Lælius, said, That if their pleasure were to send his brother thither, he himself would go as his Lieutenant, with him. That word of his carried it, for who fit, said they, to go against Hannibal, as Africanus, who had already vanquished him? [Cic. Philip. 11. Liv. lib. 37. Valer. Max. lib. 5. cap. 5. Justin lib. 31. cap. 7.]

In those days, when Lu. Scipio was upon his way 'gainst Antiochus, and whilst the anniversary games, in honour of Apollo, were celebrating, upon the fifth of the Ides, (i. e.) upon the ninth day of June, in a very clear day, it grew suddenly dark, by the coming of the body of the Moon under the sun, [Liv. lib. 37.] And verily, that not long after, to wit, upon the 14 of March, after the Julian Calendar, there fell a horrible eclipse of the sun at Rome, appears by the Astronomical account: to which if 95. Idus Quintiles, (i. e.) the ninth of our July did then answer, it will then follow, that the Calends, or first of January, the year following, must needs fall in with the 29 day of our August, so great a confusion was there of the Roman Calendar, in those days.

About the vernal equinox, Paulstratus with 36 ships of Rhodians, Livius with 30 of the Romans, and Eumenes with seven of his own, went to Hellepont; Livius first stood in, for the port which was called, Portus Achaorum, and from thence went up to Ilium, and having there sacrificed to Minerva, and then gave a favourable audience to the Ambassadors, of certain neighbouring Cities, as Eleus, Dardanus and Rhetæus, all which came and voluntarily rendered themselves unto him; and then again leaving 10 ships in the road, over against Abydus, went with the rest to the other side, and there besieged Sestos, and having taken that in upon surrender, he provided himself to return to Asia side, there to besiege Abydus, [Liv. lib. 37. Appian. pag. 101.]

Whiles these things thus passed at Hellepont, Polyxenidas, the Ammiral of King Antiochus, bare Paulstratus the Ammiral of Rhods in hand, that he would betray all, or the greatest part of, Antiochus his fleet into his hand, and he, giving too easy credence to the others words, thereupon went to Samos, where, not keeping to due a watch as he should have done, he lost his life, and with it 29 sails of ships, which he had under his command; for there escaped of all that fleet of his, five onely ships of Rhodes, and two of the Isle of Cos, [Id. lib.]

At the same time also Seleucus recovered Phocæa, having a gate of the City set open to him, by which he got in with his army. While these things were acting in Eolia, Abydus, having endured the siege some few days, by the valour of the Kings Garrison that kept it, at length all grew weary of the business, and the chief magistrates of the City, with the good leave of the Captain of the Garrison, sent to Livius to treat of conditions for the surrender of the place unto him. But when in that very nick of time news came of the loss of the Rhodian navy, Livius would no longer stay to take in Abydus, and to keep Hellepont, but presently with all his fleet, set sail for Phocæa; but finding that to be held by a strong Garrison of the Kings, and that Seleucus was not far off with his army, he fell a waiving the sea coast, and having taken what spoils he could light upon thereabouts, especially of men, and staying onely till Eumenes could overtake him with his fleet, he purposed to go for Samos; and thither at last, sorely weather-beaten, he came, and there joyed his fleet with the Rhodians, consisting now of twenty sails, under the command of Eudamius their Ammiral, [Livius.]

Livius, having increased his fleet by this accession of the Rhodians, sailed forthwith to Ephesus, and there ranged his ships in order of battle before the very mouth of the port. But when none came forth against him: he divided his fleet in two parts, whereof one lay at anchor in the very haven of the enemy, and the other landed their men; and when they had ranged there far and near, and gotten an exceeding great spoil; and were returning with it to their ships, Andronicus a Macedon, (Appians calls him Nicander) Captain of the Garrison in Ephesus, sallied out upon them, and forced them to their ships, leaving a great part of their booty behind them, and returned forthwith to Samos, and thither came also L. Emilius Regillus the Prætor, who was sent to succeed Livius in the charge of the navy; and as he was coming thither from the Isle of Chios, Livius sent two fair ships of Rhodes, of four tire of oars a piece, and and Eumenes himself in person, with two more of five tire of oars a piece, came to meet him, [Id. and Appian. pag. 102.]

Having late at Samos a while in Council, concerning the ordering of business at sea, Emilius, to terrifie the enemy at his first coming, went with all his fleet to the very mouth of the port of Ephesus, and Livius went to Patara in Lycia, Emilius was driven off from Ephesus, by a storm that rose upon him: and so, nothing done, returned to Samos. The Cities which Livius passed by, Miletus, Myndus, Halicarnassus, Cnidus, and Cos, shewed themselves most ready to receive all his commands: but coming into Lycia, he was ill welcomed there, both by a tempest at sea, and by the enemy at land, and therefore returned into Greece again, that having there spoken first with the two Scipios, who were then at that time in the parts of Thessaly, he might then take his journey for Italy, [Liv.]

At Samos there came letters to Emilius the Prætor, and Eumenes, from the Scipios, by which they understood, both of the Truce that was taken with the Etolians, and of their own marching by land towards Hellepont, and the Etolians signified as much to Antiochus, and to his son Seleucus, [Polyb. Legat. 19.]

Eumenes, sent his Agents into Achaia to make an association with them; which the commons in a general assembly ratified; and sent him a company of tall young men to assist him, [Id. Legat. 20.]

L. Emilius, with all his fleet, passing by Miletus, and the other Cities of that coast, landed in the Bay of Bargilia, and went to Iassus, that City was held by a Garrison of Antiochus his men, and then, sending to the Magistrates and other chief men of the place, to persuade them; and being answered, that they would do nothing; he drew up to the walls, to besiege it: but the banditti of Iassus, which were among the Rhodians, prevailed so far with them, and the rather by Eumenes his mediation, that they drew off, and left the siege, [Liv.]

Those of Heraclea in Pontus, sent Ambassadors to Emilius, and from him received a very kind and favourable answer in writing, purporting, that the Senate of Rome would be their good friend; and that neither their counsel nor care should be wanting, when ever they should have occasion to use them. [Memnon Excerpt. cap. 28.]

Whiles Eumenes was away, busie in making war with the Romans and Rhodians, against the sea Towns of Lycia, Seleucus with his army, brake in upon his lands at home; and first came in hostile manner to Elæa; and, being able to do no good upon the City, waited all the Country about it: and from thence marched with all his power to Pergamus it self, the Capital City of this kingdom. Attalus, Eumenes his brother, drew out, and pitched his Camp before the City walls, and often skirmished with the enemy; but finding himself too weak that way, drew in again, and kept himself close within the walls; and so the siege began, [Idem.]

About the same time, Antiochus himself going from Apamea, encamped first at Sardes, and then not far off from his son Seleucus, near the head of the River Caius, drawing with him a huge army, made up of sundry nations. In which the greatest fear was of a Squadron of Gallogrecians, consisting of 4000 souldiers; and these, with some few others with them, he sent to ravage and waste all the Country about Pergamus, from one end to t'other, [Id.]

Which when Eumenes at Samos heard of, being called away to look to his affairs at home, he took ship, and with all his men came to Elæa, and from thence coming to Pergamus, before the enemy heard of his arrival, he there failed out often, and made some small skirmishes with the enemy; but within some few days after, both the Roman, and the Rhodian fleet came from Samos to Elæa, to help him, [Idem.]

When Antiochus heard that there were so many fleets come together into the lame port, and withall, that the Consul with his army was all ready in Macedonia, and provision making at Hellepont for his transportation into Asia, he thought fit to try for a peace with the Romans, Eumenes, and the Rhodians all at once; wherefore he removed his Camp, and came to Elæa, and there, having taken a little hill over against the City, he there left all his foot, and with his horse (which were upward of six thousand) went down into a plain field close to the walls of the City, and then sent some Commissioners into it, to treat of a peace; whereupon L. Emilius sent for Eumenes from Pergamus to come thither to him; and advised with him, as also with Eudamius and Pampinildas the Commanders of the Rhodian fleet, what was best to be done, And the Rhodians were not against a peace; but Eumenes said, that it was not for their honour to treat of a peace: and however they could not put an end to it at that time; and to that purpose Emilius sent Antiochus word, to wit, that before the coming of the Consul, there could no peace be made; upon which answer he presently fell a waiving of the Country try all about Elaea: and then, leaving Seleucus to continue the siege before Pergamus, he marched away full of fury with the rest of his army, and never staid, till he came into that rich Country, which was called Thebes campus, (i. e.) the plain of Thebes, and there he made all manner of havock, and thoroughly enriched all his army for the present. [Polyb. Legat. 21. Liv. lib. 37.]

At the same time, Diophanes of Megalopolis, came to Elaea, sent from the Achæans to Eumenes, with a supply of 1000 foot, and 100 horse. [Liv. lib. with Polyb. Legat. 20.] all old beaten souldiers, and their Captain, one that was trained up under Philopon, the most renowned Commander of all the Grecians, living in his time. [Liv. lib. Appian. pag. 102. with Polyb. Legat. 20. pag. 810. and in Excerpt. Vales. pag. 110.]

So soon as they were landed, Attalus sent some to shew them the way, and brought them to Pergamus. These Achæans, upon their first arrival, made continual Salutes out upon Seleucus, to draw off, and be gone out of all that Country. [Liv. lib. and Appian. pag. 102. 103.] yet he hovered still about that coast, and annoyed his foes; and was a help to his friend in those parts. [Liv. lib.]

Whiles Antiochus marched in hostile manner to Adramyteum, Emilius and Eumenes came about by sea, to the rescue of it. Whereupon he forbore to set upon the town, but fell a spoiling of the Country about it, and took Peræa, a colonie of the Myrilenians, so did he Cortos, and Corylenus and Aphrodisias, and Crene, at the first assault, and then returned by Thyatira to Sardes. [Liv.]

The Roman fleet, with the Rhodians and Eumenes went first to Mitylene, and from thence returned to Elaea, whence they came: and from thence sailing to Phocæa, they came to an anchor at Bacchius an Island, joining hard upon the City of Phocæa, and then spoiling their temples, and monument which they had spared before, came to the City it self: but when a company of three thousand Foot, sent from Antiochus, had gotten in before their coming, they forbore the siege of it, and returned again to the Isle, where they were before, having only first ravaged the Country thereabout, and from thence the Roman fleet returned to Elaea, and Eumenes, and the Rhodians to Samos. [Id.]

About midsummer, the Rhodian fleet, consisting of 32 ships of fourtire oares, and of four others, of three tire, fought with Antiochus his navy, which was brought out of Syria, by Hannibal, wherein were 37 ships, of an extraordinary size, at a place called Sida, a promontory of Pamphylia; in which the Rhodians put Hannibal to flight, but could not follow the chase upon him by reason their mariners were weak and sickly, for the most part; nevertheless, to hinder him from joining with the old fleet, they sent Charicles with twenty ships to Patara, and the port Megistus, whither also a little after they sent Pamphylidas, with four ships more. [Id.] and so Hannibal was blockt up in Pamphylia. [Appian. pag. 104. see Emil. Prob. in Hannibal.]

Antiochus coming to Sardes, sent Ambassadors with letters besides, to Prusias King of Bythunia, surnamed Cynegus; (i. e.) the Hunter: whereby he dealt earnestly with him to joyn with himself against the Romans. This staggered Prusias for the present; but then came other letters to him from the two brothers, Lu, and Pub. Scipio; these put him out of fear of any great harm from the Romans. Especially, when presently after there followed an Embassage sent unto him from Rome, the fore-man whereof was no meaner a person, then C. Livius, who was lately the Commander of their fleet, for having once spoken with them, he put on a full resolution for the Roman party, and to break off wholly with Antiochus. [Polyb. Legat. 22. pag. 811, 812. Liv. lib. 37. Appian. pag. 101.]

Antiochus, seeing no further hope of Prusias, presently removed from Sardes to Ephesus, there to take a view of his fleet, which had been long time in providing: for seeing no other way left him to hinder the Romans from passing their land army into Asia, but by making himself absolute master at sea, he resolved to try what he could do that way, and to hazard a fight there. [Polyb. and Livie. lib.]

Wherefore he went forthwith to see whether he could take Notium, which was a Town of the Colephonians, not far from Ephesus, where he then lay, that whiles the Romans came to relieve a confederate town of theirs, by land, he might give his Ammiral Polyxenidas, an opportunity to work some fear at sea. Polyxenidas had at that time under his command 89 or 90 good ships, which Emilius and the Rhodians met with, at a place called Myonessus. Emilius had 58 ships, and the Rodians 22, saith Livie; or as Appianus, 25. In which Polyxenidas was worsted, and having a good wind in pour, fled speedily back to Ephesus, having lost 42 of his ships (not 29 only, as Appianus hath it) of which 13 came quick into the enemies hand, with all the men in them: of the Romans there were two only bilged, and some few other bruised; but of the Rhodians, Polyxenidas took one, and carryed that away with him to Ephesus: That this fight was made in December, (as the year went then at Rome) appeareth by Macrobius, [lib. 1. Saturnalium.] where he saith, that 11 Calend. Januarij, 880, upon the 21 of December, was a feast dedicated to their Lares (i. e. their household gods) in which L. Emilius Regillus, Pretor, in the war against Antiochus, vowed a Temple to be built in Campo Martio, which vows, [Liv. lib. 40.] tells us, was by him performed 11 year: after, where is also a Copy, (but most falsely written) of a Table, containing the manner of this victory, hung up by him upon the doors, not only of his new Temple, but also of that of Jupiter's, in the Capitol.

Antiochus, troubled at the news of this overthrow, was so ill advised, as to draw off the Garrison which he had put into Lyfimachia, forthwith, for fear, least they should fall into the Romans hands: and withal raising his siege from before Colophos, retired to Sardes, and from thence dispatched away letters to Ariarathes his son in law, in Cappadocia, to bring him aides from thence; and every where else, that he could to send him to men. [Liv.] Mean while he lay idle at Sardes, trifling away the time there, which might have been better spent in giving order for his affairs elsewhere. [Polyb. Legat. 23.]

Emilius, after this victory gotten at sea, sailed straight to Ephesus, and there cast his ships into the form of a battalion, before the very mouth of the Port: and having thereby by wrung out of Antiochus an open confession, that he had lost the mastery of the sea, he sailed to Chios, and having there new weighted up such ships of his as had been any ways bruised in the fight, he put over from thence to Phocæa, which not long before, was revolted from the Romans: he elapsed at first, to have taken it by assault; but afterward it was surrendered to him: yet do what he could, he could not save it from the plunder of the souldiers: but the City it self, and their lands, and their laws, he restored entire unto them; and so, because the Winter came on, and that place had two Ports, he chose it for his Navy to winter in, for that year. [Livie.]

About the same time Lyfimachia, which was full fraught and furnished with all manner of provisions, as if it had been to bid the Romans welcom, opened their gates to the two Scipioes: and from thence they let forward again, and thorough the Chersonese came to Hellepont, where they found all things ready prepared by Eumenes for their transportation. So they passed over, as into a friends Country, some here, some there, no man appearing to hinder their landing, and without any trouble at all, [Id.]

Antiochus, at his wits end, and not knowing what to do, yet sent Heraclides of Byzantium to treat with the Romans about a peace, with instructions both general to the Council of War there, and in particular to P. Scipio Africanus; But when answer was made him by the Council, that he must presently defray all the charge of the war thitherto, and give up all Asia on this side Taurus into the power of the Romans, he imagining there could no worse befall him, in case he should happen to be quite overthrown, cast away any further thoughts of peace, and prepared all things necessary to try his fortune in a field. [Polyb. Legat. 23. Diodor. Sic. Legat. 6. 7. published by Fulv. Ursinus. Liv. lib. 37. cap. 7. Appian. pag. 105.]

L. Scipio the Consul, removing from his standing, came to Hellepont, at Dardanus and Rhætas, where all the people of both places came out of their gates with joy, to welcome them: from thence he went to Ilium, and pitching his Camp in the plain which lay under the walls there, himself went up into the City and Castles, and sacrificed there to Minerva as President and Protectrix of that place. Then was there great glee, and mutual congratulations between the men of Ilium and the Romans; whiles they recounted how Eneas and the Captains that went heretofore with him, were their Country men, and went from thence; and the Romans no whit less proud, that they were defended of them; and were in all respects as glad to shake hands as parents and children to be so, when after long absence they happen to meet together. [Livie and Justin. lib. 31. cap. 8.] where by the way, Demetrius Scepius saith of himself, That he being then but a boy, happened to come into Ilium at that time, as a traveller, and that he there saw their houses lie so nasty, that they had not so much as roof-tiles to cover them withal. [Strabo. lib. 3. pag. 594.]

Scipio, removing from thence, after six dayes march, came to the head of the River Caius; where Eumenes came to him with his Forces, and here making provision of food to carry with them for many dayes, their purpose was to have set upon Antiochus, and dispatched the business before Winter came: on upon them, [Id.]

P. Scipio Africanus, falling sick there, was carried to Elaea, leaving for his Substitute in his Lieutenant, Gaius, Cn. Domitius. But Antiochus making his rendezvous in a champion near unto Thyatira, not far from the enemy, sent home young P. Scipio, whom he had casually intercepted, to his father, ransom-free: which was not only an ease to his troubled mind, but even part of a cure to his diseased body, [See Polib. Legat.]

Legat. 23. Liv. lib. 37. Justin. lib. 31. cap. 7. Appia pag. 105, 106. Aurel. Viñ. de Vir. Illust. pag. 609.]

The Senate, and people of Heraclea in Pontus sent an Embassie to the Scipios, desiring that they would ratify and confirm that league, which Emilius had formerly made with them; which was granted. They also prayed that Antiochus might be taken into the favour and friendship of the people of Rome; and drawing up a general decree of the people at Heraclea, sent it to Antiochus, advising him thereby to give of all further thoughts of war against the Romans, [Almon. Excerpt. cap. 28.]

Florus, [Histor. Roman. lib. 2. cap. 8.] tells us, That Antiochus fortified his army with Elephants of a huge bignesse, all clad and glittering with gold, and silver, and scarlet, and ivory of their own kind. And in [1 Maccab. cap. 8. v. 6.] we read, that he had 120 Elephant, and indeed, that he had 102 when he fought with Ptolemy, and 150 afterwards, we have shewed before in [An. Min. 3787. and 3799. out of Polyb.] but we have Livie for our author, That in this fight, he had only 54 Elephants: where he also tells us, That he had there 70 thousand Foot, and upward of 12 thousand Horse; though Appianus tells us of 70 thousand that he had in all. But Florus, most hyperbolically, He had, (saith he) 300 thousand Foot, and as many Horse and iron Chariots in the field that day. But Appianus affirmeth, that the Romans had only 30 thousand Foot; of which number it self, there were left, two thousand Macedons, Thracians, and others in the Camp for the defence thereof, as Livie saith.

This battle was fought near to Magnesia, seated at the foot of the Hill Sipylus. Hannibal was not in it, being lockt up in Pamphylia with his Fleet which he brought out of Syria: nor P. Scipio Africanus, who at that time lay sick, in the City of Eliza. The day wherein the fight was, was misty; which caused that Antiochus, in so great an army, could not see both wings of his army at once, and the wet thereof marred the strings of the bowes and things which they threw their Darts withal. Nevertheless they forced the right wing of the Roman army to run, and flee they did to the Camp: but when Emilius, who was left to keep it, saw them coming, he sent out his men to meet them, and they with their naked swords threatened to kill them there-right, unless they were turned into the fight: Whereupon, they finding themselves thus hemmed in, with their fellows before, and the enemies behind, Emilius also offering himself and two thousand of his men to go with them, faced about; and running desperately into the throng of the enemy, made there a vast slaughter of them, and were the beginning of the victory that ensued: of Antiochus his parts, 'tis said, there fell that day, 20 thousand Foot, and 4 thousand Horse. [Liv. Europ. 11] Livie says, there were taken of them, 14000. Justin, 11 thousand. Of the Elephants, some few were killed, 15 taken with their masters. Some few of the Romans were wounded; but there were not slain above 300 Foot, and 24 Horse, and of Eumenes his company, 25.

Antiochus, getting away with some few in his company, increased his number as he went, with others who fell in to him, and so with a reasonable shew of an army, came to Sardes, about midnight following; and hearing that his son Seleucus, and sundry of his Nobles were fled from thence to Celasene, near which there was a new City built, called Apamea. He before day took horse again, went with his wife and daughter, and came thither to him; leaving the keeping of Sardes to Zeno, and the government of the province of Lydia, to Timon. And the next day again, went from thence (leaving some of his Captains there, to gather up such pieces of the wreck as they could light upon) and came into Syria, [Liv. lib. 37. Appia pag. 110. and Zonaras, out of D. C.]

Polyxenidas, Antiochus his Ammiral, hearing of this successe at land, left Ephesus, and coming as far as Patara in Lycia, there, for fear of the Rhodian Fleet, which lay not far off at Megiste, went on shoar, and with some few in his company, passed by land into Syria, [Liv. ibid.]

After this victory, came Ambassadors huddling in from all parts to Scipio; from Thyatira, and Megnesia: first, then from Sardes, Tralles, Magnesia upon the Mæander, and Ephesus, all rendering themselves into his hands: after which, all the Cities of Asia did the like; submitting themselves wholly to his mercy, and sovereignty of the people of Rome, [Id. ibid.]

The Consul then went to Sardes, and thither came to him his brother P. Scipio from Elæa, so soon as he was able to travel. About the same time also Muteus, sent as a Herald from Antiochus, by the mediation of P. Scipio, made suite, and obtained leave for him to send Ambassadors to the Consul, to treat of a total peace. And shortly after, came from him Ambassadors, Zeuxis the Governour of Lydia, and Antipater his brothers son: who having first treated with Eumenes, who by reason of former quarrels between them, they thought would be most averse from a peace with their Master, and finding him more pliable, than either they or their Master thought they should have done; they then made their adreffe to P. Scipio, and by him were brought brought to the presence of the Consul himself; and he at their suit calling together a full Council, gave them audience, and upon a hearing, offered the King the same conditions, which he lent him from Hellepont before the fight at Magnesia. P. Scipio openly professing, that the Romans fashion was, Neither to be quailed, in case they were overcome in a battle, nor to grow insolent upon a victory gotten: the conclusion therefore was, That Antiochus must leave Europe, and part with all Asia, on this side the Taurus; and that for the charges and cost of the war, he must pay 15 thousand talents; of which 500 present, and a 500, when the Senate and people of Rome had ratified and confirmed the peace then made, and 1000 talents more to be staled, and paid in twelve years after, by equal portions, besides 400 talents to Eumenes for his damages, and the surplusage of corn which was owing to his father: also that he must give up into the Consul's hand, Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Thoas the Etrurian, and some others, who had been the first incendiaries of this war: and lastly, 20 hostages for performance of these conditions. And when Antipater and Zeuxis, had accepted of these conditions; it was agreed on all hands, to send away presently Ambassadors to Rome for a confirmation of all, and so they brake up, [Polyb. Legat. 24. Diod. Sic. Legat. 9. Liv. lib. 37. Justin. lib. 31. cap. 8. Appia, pag. 111, 112.]

After this, the Consul brake up his army, and sent them away to their winter quarters, to Magnesia, and to Tralles, and Ephesus. [Polyb. & Liv. ibid.]

The Consul himself went to Ephesus, and shortly after thither came to him a part of the 500 talents from Antiochus, which he was ordered to pay down present, and the hostages which he was to give, [Id. ibid.] among which, one was Antiochus, the Kings youngest son, as Appia, [pag. 112, 113.] says, though Zonaras out of Dion tells us, that Manlius Vullo, who succeeded Scipio, was the first that demanded him in particular for a hostage.

M. Aurelius Cotta was sent by the Consul to Rome, with the Kings Ambassadors, so was Eumenes likewise; and with them went the Ambassadors of Rhodes, of Smyrna, and almost of all the Cities and States, on this side the Taurus. [Id. ibid.]

Manius Acilius Glabrio, made his entry into Rome, in triumph over Antiochus and the Eolians, [Liv. lib. 37.]

Cn. Manlius Vullo, went Consul into Asia, and was appointed to take the army which L. Scipio had, with four thousand Foot more, and 200 Horse out of Rome, and of the Latins eight thousand Foot, and four hundred Horse: and at one and the same time almost, Manlius the Consul landed in Asia, and Q. Fabius Labio, came as Praetor to his charge of the fleet, [Liv. lib. 37.] Now the new Consul arrived at Ephesus, in the beginning of the Spring, and received the army given up to him by L. Scipio; and having taken a view of it, he made an Harang unto them, inciting them thereby to prepare themselves for a war against the Galls, or Gallogracians, [Liv. lib. 37.] But Fabius with the fleet, set sail for Crete, to set at liberty such Romans, and others of the Italian Nations, as were there detained in slavery. And returning thence to Ephesus, sent three ships from thence into Thracia, and commanded Antiochus his garrisons to be withdrawn from Enus and Maronea, and then to be restored to their pristine liberty, [Id. lib. 37. in fi.]

About the beginning of Summer it was, that Eumenes with the Ambassadors came to Rome, of which Cotta made a relation, first in the Senate house, and afterward to the people in General, of what had been done in Asia: and then Eumenes being bid to speak, by the Senate, opened to them, both what he had done in their service, and what his suit unto them was; but all very sparingly, and with great moderation: yet the Rhodians opposed him, as well on their own behalf, as for the liberty of the Grecian Cities and States there. But both parties heard, the Senate decreed, That all the Regions, on this side the Taurus, which belonged to Antiochus, should be assigned and given to Eumenes; excepting only Lycia and Caria, as far as to the River of Mæander, which they ordered should thenceforward be allotted to the Rhodians: and the rest of the Cities in Asia, which had been Stipendiary to Attalus, should hereafter be made tributary likewise to Eumenes; but such as had been tributary to Antiochus, should be free, and pay no tribute at all, [Polyb. Legat. 25. & 36. Diod. Sic. Legat. 10. Liv. lib. 37. & 38. Appia, in Syriae. pag. 116.]

Antipater add Zeuxis, the Ambassadors of Antiochus, having had audience in the Senate, obtained a confirmation of peace for Antiochus upon such conditions as Scipio had given him in Asia, and when a while after, the people also had ratified the same, then was there a solemn league, with sacrifice, made with Antipater, chief of the Embassie for Antiochus in the Capitol, in further confirmation of that agreement, [Polyb. Legat. 25. Liv. lib. 37.] and this league was cut in brass, and solemnly hung up, and dedicated in the Capitol, as other leagues were wont to be, and a Copy thereof sent to Manlius Vullo, the Consul, who succeeded Scipio in Asia. [Appia. pag. 113.]

4525. 189.

We read moreover [1 Maccab. 8. 7.] that among other things, in this treaty, it was agreed, That as well Antiochus himself, as his successors, should pay a great tribute to the Romans, and give hostages for security thereof, and a part of his kingdom, as was said before; and whereas, by this agreement, Antiochus was to pay (as I also mentioned before) 12 thousand talents, in 12 years, by equal portions, that is till to be understood of Euboic talents, not of Attic, (as Livie seems to have misunderstood Polybius) yet of the purest Attic silver; every of which wasts weigh 80 pounds Roman: and 540 thousand bushels of corn, and 20 hostages, as before; with this, That they should be changed every 3 years. But in the rent which was made of his great kingdom, he had yet left entire unto him, not only Comagena, Syria and Judea, as in Excerpt. Memnon, but also all the upper provinces beyond Euphrates, as Babylonia, Assyria, Susiana, and the rest, and in the lower Asia, Cilicia, though he was forbidden to come with his shipping into the strait of Cilicia, to the westward of the river Calycadnus, and the foreland of Sardopolis, to make any war there. [Polyb. Legat. 27, and 35. Liv. lib. 37. and 38. Appian. pag. 112, 113.]

The Senate, having heard the Ambassadors of Smyrna, and other States of Asia, according to the ancient manner, sent ten Commissioners to settle all matters in Asia, and to compose all differences between state and state there. [Polyb. Legat. 25. Diodor. Sic. Legat. 10. Liv. lib. 37.]

Now at what time the peace between the Romans and Antiochus was in agitation at Rome, Cn. Manlius in Asia, did what he could to put all into a new combustion and confusion there, and to have gotten Antiochus into his clutches, if he had come in his way: but he perceiving the Consuls drift, though often solicited to come to a parlee with him, kept himself a loof, and would not come in his fight: and the Consul desirous to get him, came with his army to the parting of the waters, upon the top almost of the Taurus. But not able to pick any quarrel against him, or his, he fell upon the Gallogræcians, under a pretence, That they had formerly assisted Antiochus in his war, and that they were of such a haggard kind, and so fierce of conditions, that it was to no purpose to have sent Antiochus going beyond the Taurus, unless their backs were broken, as well as his. And because Eumenes was then out of the Country at Rome, therefore he sent for Attalus his brother from Pergamus, to come unto him, being now removed from Ephesus to Magnesia, and upon this summons, Attalus came to him, attended with a thousand Foot, and some 200 Horse, and they both proceeding on to the river Harpalus. Athenus, another brother of Eumenes, and Attalus, came to him, accompanied with Leulus of Cretæ and Corragus, a Macedonian born, who between them, brought him a thousand more, of several nations, and 300 Horse. [Livie lib. 38.]

Hither came to him Ambassadors from the state of Alabanda, at whose suit, a certain Castle, which had lately revolted from them, and was again forcibly recovered by them, was restored and confirmed to them. And the Consul, going still right forward, came to Antiochia, upon the Meander, and thither came also Seleucus the son of Antiochus, (as he might lawfully do by the articles with Scipio) to furnish himself with corn for his army, and there the inhabitants of Taba, a City of Cilicia, bordering upon Pisidia, having idly fallen up the army of the Romans, and paid for their pains 25 talents, and ten thousand bushels of wheat, were by him taken to mercy; and the third day after they came to the back of the river Chaus, and removing from thence, came before the City Eriza, and took it at the first assault. [Livie. ibid.]

Moageres the Tyrant, who had under him three Cities, Cybara, Syleum, and Alynice, a cruel man, and subtle withal, could hardly be brought to purchase his peace, at the price of 130 talents, and 20 thousand bushels of wheat. [ib. ib. Livie. Legat. 30.]

When the Consul had passed the River Colobatus, Ambassadors came to him from Ilnida, praying him to come and help them; for that the men of Termeffa, a City in Pisidia, joyning with the inhabitants of Philomelia, had wasted their Country, plundered their City, and now besieged their Castle and all, whither all their Citizens, with their wives and children were fled to save themselves. He taking this occasion by the hair, marched towards Pamphylia, raised the siege from before Ilnida, and pardoned them of Termeffa, upon the payment of 50 talents of silver; so did he them of Apendus, and of the other Cities of Pamphilia. [Polyb. Legat. 32. Livie. ib. sup.]

Then, returning from Pamphylia, to his war intended against Gallogrecia, or Galatia: he took the City Cornia, and therein a great booty, and so left it: and as he proceeded on his way by the fens of that Country, Ambassadors came to him from the City of Lynce, and submitted to him: and having received them to mercy, he came into the plain of Salageffa, in Pisidia; out of which he drove away a rich prey of cattle: but when Ambassadors came to him, and presented him with a Crown of of gold of 50 talents weight, with 20 thousand bushels of barley, and as many of wheat, he made peace with them for the time to come. [Polyb. Legat. 32. Livie. ib. sup.]

And going again from thence to the heads of the River Ooryma, he encamped at a place called the Aporis-town: and thither came to him the next day Seleucus from Apamea; and the Consul having sent away his soldiers that were sick, or otherwise unerviceable to Apamea, and being furnished with guides, of the way by Seleucus, came that day into a Country called the Metropolitan Country, and the next day to Dynias in Phrygia, and from thence again to Synnada; and by the way found the Cities every where abandoned by the inhabitants for fear of his coming: and his army grew so laden with the spoils which they had taken, that they were unable able to march above five mile a day, and after that rate, came to Bendos, the old, and the third day after into the Country of Galatia. [Livie.]

Here he kept a standing Camp for certain days, and in that time sent his Ambassadors Epolognatus, who alone of all the Kings of that Nation, had both kept in still with Eumenes, and would never be brought to lend any aid to Antiochus against the Romans; and Epolognatus thereupon went to the rest of the Kings of that Nation and dealt what he could with them to submit to the Romans, upon fair and reasonable terms. [Id. cum Polyb. Legat. 33.] Now there were at that time, three Kings of these Galls, called still by their old names, of Tolitobogians, Tectofagians, and Trochimians; and their names were, Ortogon, Combolomarus, and Gaulous. [Livie.] Of which three Ortogon, a man of great repute for his bounty, prudence, and martial Valour, was thought at that time to be ambitious of engrossing the whole sovereignty of that Nation into his own hands. [Polyb. in Excerpt. Vales. pag. 114. and Suidas in Ortogon.]

Mean while, Ambassadors came to the Consul as he lay encamped in a certain village called Tylcon, from Oroanda, desiring his friendship, which at length they bought at the rate of 200 talents, ready money. [Livie.]

While the Romans lay before a Castle of the Galatians, called Caballus, the enemies Horse came in fight, and in a tumultuous manner fell upon some of the Roman army and slew them: but the Consul having put them off, and slain some of them in their flight, came on with his army, without staying any where by the way, to the River Sangarius, or Sagaris, which is a River in Galatia, running thorough Phrygia into the Pontic Sea. [Livie.]

And there, making a bridge, because it was no where fordable, and having passed the River, certain Galli, or Eunuchs, of Cybele the mother of the gods, sent by Attis and Battacus, her Priests, from Pessinunte, met him with their ornaments and other trinkets about them, and prophesying in a fanatic way, told him, That the mother of the gods sent them, to offer the Romans the victory and sovereignty of that Country. And when the Consul had answered, That he accepted of the offer, he presently pitched his Camp in the same place. [Livie. and Polyb. in Excerpt. Vales. pag. 209.]

The next day he came to Gordium, a Town forsaken by the inhabitants; but left full of all manner of provisions; and while he was there, news was brought him from Epolognatus, that he had spoken with the Kings of the Galls, but could bring them to no reason; and that they with their wives and children, and their chief wealth, were all drawing to the Mount Olympus, purposing there to defend themselves, trusting in their arms, and situation of the place. [Livie. and Polyb. Legat. 33.] But they of Oroanda, came shortly after with more particular intelligence: that the Tolitobogians had already taken the Mount of Olympus: That the Tectofagians, had taken another Hill, called Magana; and that the Trochimians, leaving their wives and children with the Tectofagians, were gone to join their Forces with the Tolitobogians. [Livie.]

The Camp of these Galls, that were in the Mount of Olympus, was forced and taken by the Consul and Attalus. Claudius Quadrigarius saith, that they fought twice in the Mount of Olympus, and that there were there slain, to the number of 40 thousand men. But Valerius Antias, who useth commonly to over-lash in this kind, yet here speaketh only of 10 thousand slain; nor is there any doubt but the number of them, which were taken, made up the full number of 40 thousand, looting they had drawn with them to that place, all sorts of people, young and old, of either sex, more like a Colony to inhabit by themselves, than an army to fight with an enemy. The Consul, having burnt all their arms in one fire, caused all the spoils of them to be brought in to him; and either sold all that was to be sold, or equally divided it in specie among his soldiers. [Livie.]

Yet remained there still an entire war with the Tectofagians: The Consul therefore marching towards them, came to a place called Ancyra, a great City in those parts: from whence, not above 10 miles, the enemy was encamped. There Chio-maris, Ortogon's wife, was taken prisoner; and when a certain Centurion had ravished her, she found her opportunity, and cut off his head, and sent it to her husband, (who had gotten home from Olympus) for a token, [Liv. Florus, lib. 2, cap. 11, and Plutarch, De Vir. Illustri, cap. 55.] This story is more fully related by Polybius, who saith, that she spake with Chiomaris her self at Sardes; adding, That he wondered at the wisdom of the woman, [Plutarch, De Clor. Mulier, (i. e.) of famous women.]

At Ancyra, while he lay there in Camp, there came to the Consul, certain Ambassadors from the Teutolagians, desiring him to remove his camp further off from thence, before their Kings came to a treatie with him about a peace: but indeed they under pretence of a parlee, laid an ambushment to have surprised a party of the Romans, and being far the more in number, slew many of them, and had done more, had not some, who were abroad a foraging, hearing the cry, come in to their rescue, [Polyb. Legat. 34, Livie, lib. 38.]

The Romans, enraged herewith, the next day marched, and with the whole body of their army, came where they were, and having spent two dayes, in viewing and considering the situation of the hill, where they lay, upon the third, the Consul drew out his army, divided into three brigades. The main strength of the enemy lay in the Teutolagians, and Trochmians, who made between them, 50 thousand Foot, and the horse-men, because they could make no use of their horses, in that craggie ground, joyned on Foot with the rest, to the number of 10 thousand, and the Cappadocians sent from Ariarathes, and others from Morzes, in the left wing, made four thousand more. But when the battle was joyned, the Gauls went to ground, and after a vast slaughter made of them, the rest fled, and killed every man for himself, where he could; yet in the chase, the Romans slew eight thousand more of them, the rest escaped over the river Halys.

On the morrow, the consul took a view, as well of the prisoners, as of the spoile that was taken; where he might see the men gnawing the chains they were tyed in, with their teeth, and offering themselves to be throated each by other. And the prey so great, as a most greedy and rapacious nation, which had had the spoile of all Asia on this side the Taurus for so many years, could be imagined to have raked together. Afterward the Gauls that escaped, coming together, naked and wounded, and having lost all they had; agreed among themselves, to send, and sue to the Romans for a peace. The Consul willed them to follow him to Ephesus; for (mid-autumne being now past) he was desirous to get him gone out of that cold air, occasioned principally by the vicinity of that snowie mountain Taurus, and to draw near the sea side, and there to quarter his army for that winter, [Liv. ibid. with Appian, in Syriac, pag. 115, & Flor. lib. 7, cap. 11.]

At Rome, the first of February, (which as the year there then went, was the 47 of our Septemb.) L. Emilius Regillus triumphed over Antiochus, for the victory which he got of him by sea, [Liv. lib. 37.]

About the time when the ten Commissioners, appointed to go for Asia, in company of those Ambassadors, and others which came out of Asia, set out from Rome upon their journey, and came to Brundisium, L. and P. Scipio happened, coming out of Asia, to land in Italy: and a few dayes after entered Rome triumphantly. [Polyb. Legat. 25.] L. Scipio rode in triumph over Antiochus, upon the last of February, being then Leap year, about the 16 of our November, almost a year after his Consulship was expired, and that he might not come behind his brother Africanus in any point, was by all men termed Africanus, [Liv. lib. 37.]

C. Manlius Vullo, after the time of his Consulship was out, continued in Asia, as Pro-consul there, a year longer, [Id. ib. lib. 38.]

In the fourth year of the 147 Olympiade, came Ambassadors to Manlius, then Pro-consul, wintering at Ephesus, from all Cities, States and Countries, dwelling thoroughout Asia, on this side the Taurus, to congratulate his victory over the Gauls; and presenting him with Crowns of gold: all which he entertained with so much respect and favour, that he sent them away, more glad and joyfull than they came. There came to him all the Ambassadors of the Gauls, as he had appointed them, to know upon what conditions they might have their peace; to whom he answered, That he would hear them about that matter, when Eumenes came, and not before. Ambassador also came from Ariarathes King of Capadocia, to beg his pardon, and to redeem his offence with money, in that he had assisted Antiochus, his father in law, in his war: He was fined at 600 talents of silver, though Livie and Appian say but 200. Mulans also came to him sent from Antiochus; to whom Manlius answered, That he would give him a meeting upon the borders of Pamphilia, and there receive the 2500 talents, and the wheat, which he was to pay, according to the agreement by him made with L. Scipio, [Polyb. Legat. 35, Liv. lib. 38.]

At

At the first of the spring, having taken a view of his army, and Attalus along with him, he set out from Ephesus, and upon the eighth day after, came to Apamea; where having stayed three dayes, in three dayes more, he came with his army into Pamphilia, to the place which he had appointed for his meeting with Antiochus: where he stayed 3 dayes, and there distributed among his army the wheats which Antiochus sent in: and the monies, he assigned to one of the Colonels, to be conveyed to Apamea: from thence he went to Perga; which was the only place in all that Country, which was kept with a Garrison. And when he drew near unto it, the Captain of the Garrison came out to meet him, desiring his patience for 40 dayes, leave one, to advertise Antiochus, and to receive his answer, what to do, aient the surrender of the place unto him: which was granted, and upon the day, the Garrison left the place, [Id. ibid.]

About the same time, which was in the beginning of Summer (season, the ten Commissioners with Eumenes arrived at Ephesus; where staying two dayes only, to settle their stomachs coming off the sea, they set forward and came to Apamea: The Pro-consul hearing of their coming, sent his brother L. Manlius with 4 thousand soldiers to Oroanda, to demand the money, in arreare, of them: and himself, willing the Ambassadors of Antiochus to follow him, returned with his army to Apamea, and finding Eumenes there, with the ten Commissioners, fell presently into consultation of what was to be done. First of all therefore it was agreed on all hands, to ratifie and confirm the peace and league formerly made with Antiochus: for observance whereof, according as it was drawn up and prescribed by the Senate (the forme whereof we find punctually delivered by Polybius and Livie.) Manlius the Pro-consul in the presence of the Kings Ambassadors took a solemn oath, there; and that done, he dispatched away presently Q. Minucius Thermus a Colonel, and his own brother, L. Manlius, (who was then by chance returned from Oroanda, with the monies which he was sent for) to take the like oath of Antiochus, and to ratifie all the conditions thereof, [Id. ibid. with Appian, pag. 113.]

The Pro-consul then wrote his letters, to Q. Fabius Labeo, who commanded the Navy to come away forthwith to Patara, and there let fire on all the Kings ships that there were, or otherwise destroy them, [Polyb. and Liv. in sup.]

Labeo, setting out from Ephesus, came to Patara, and there let fire on, or otherwise destroyed 50 ships of the Kings, as he was commanded: and in the same journey of his, recovered Telmessus, where all were at their wits ends, upon the sudden coming of the Roman Fleet. And then, setting sail out of Lycia; and sending word to Ephesus, for such as were left there to follow him, came thorough the middest of the Islands lying in his way, into Greece: and staying some few dayes at Athens, till his ships came to him from Ephesus, sailed thence with his whole Fleet into Italy, [Livie.]

The Pro-consul, having among other things, which he was, by the Articles, to have from Antiochus, received the Elephants (which were at Apamea, as Polybius saith) and bestowed them all upon Eumenes; And then set himself to hear the differences (as in that confusion of things it could not be, but many must arise) between the several Cities and States. And Ariarathes King of Cappadocia, for Eumenes his sake, to whom he had then newly betrothed his daughter, had half his sue stricken off, [Id.]

At Apamea also, the Pro-consul, and the ten Commissioners, having given audience to all that came, appointed certain indifferent places, by consent of all parties, where the differences between City and City, concerning either their bounds, or money-matters, or the like, should be heard, and ended. The Colophonians which dwelt in Notium, the inhabitants of Cyma, and Mylassa, were for ever acquitted from payment of any tribute, by the Pro-consul and Commissioners: and to them of Clazomenae, over and above their exemption from payment of tribute, they gave also a certain Island called Drynussa, which lay over against their City. And to the Milesians, they restored a place called Sacer Agor: (i. e.) The holy Country, which for fear of enemies, they had relinquished. As for them of Chios, Smyrna, and Erythræ, in regard of their extraordinary zeal and forwardness in their service, they both gave unto them, all such lands and regions, as they particularly desired to have, and had them also in singular recommendation above the rest. They of Phocæa had their laws and liberties restored them to the full, with all the territory which they possessed before the war began, [Polyb. Legat. 36, Liv. lib. 38.]

To those of Ilium, they gave the Cities and Territories of Rhætæus, and Gergithus, not so much for any great service which they had done them, as in regard of the blood which was anciently between them, [Liv. ibid.]

And whereas before, there were but some certain few places, belonging to Pergamus, and the jurisdiction thereof, to wit, only to the sea side, near Elais, and Adramyttium, mytium, as Straboteach us, [lib. 13. pag. 627.] they now gave unto Eumenes; Lyfymachia and the Cheroneofe of Thracin in Europe laid; and in Asia, all Lycanopia, Myllus, Phrygia the greater and the lefser, and all the Countries of Lydia and Ionia have onely the Towyne, which were free, when the battle was fought with Antiochus: and whereas they bestowed on him Thralles, and Ephesus, and Telmedius in Lycia; and whereas he was anciently poffeffed of Myfia, and King Prusias had taken it from him by force, that they caufed to be refired to him: and for Pamphylia, which Eumenes his Ambaffadors laid, lay on this fide the Taurus, and the Ambaffadors of Antiochus, that it lay beyond it, they related that difference wholly to the pleasure and judgement of the Senate is feli. [Polyp. Legat. 36. Liv. lib. 37. 38.]

The two Rhodian Amphibassadors Polyperus and Philophrontis, declaring that they might have Lycia and Caria, according to a former order and decree of the Senate in that behalf made. Hipparchus and Satyrus, the Amphibassadors from Ilium, became then suitors to the Commissioners, desiring them most earnestly, and by the blood that was between them, to pardon the Lycians. The Commissioners endeavoured to satisfy both parties, as much as in them lay; for they laid no burthen at all upon the Lycians, in favour to them of Ilium, and yet assigned the whole nation of the Lycians, to the Rhodians; to gratify them in some sort as they desired; save onely the Citie of Telmessus, and forts belonging thereto, and the Country belonging to Ptolemeus of Telmessus; Caria also, all beyond the Meander, was given to the Rhodians; all save those places, which were free the day before the battle at Magnesia, against Antiochus.

But the Lycians protested openly, That they would run any risk, rather than be in subjection to the Rhodians; alleging for themselves, That they were assigned by the Commissioners, not as subjects, but only as friends and associates to them.

When the Commissioners, according to the articles, among other things demanded Hannibal to be delivered up into their hands by Antiochus, he presently, upon notice thereof from the King, fled from thence, and went to Gortyna in Crete, [Justin lib. 32. cap. 4. and Emili. Prob. in Hannib.] Yet the report goes, That upon the overthrow of Antiochus by the Romans, Hannibal fled first to Artaxata in Armenia; and gave him much other good counsel: but among the rest, to build the Capital City in Armenia, which was from him called Artaxata, [Plin. in Lucullis, Strabo, lib. 11. pag. 528.] for Artaxias, and Thariades, [al. Artaxiafata, Plin. in Lucullis, Strabo, lib. 11. pag. 528.] for Artaxias, and Thariades, [al. Zariades, two Captains in Antiochus his army, by his permission formerly bare the rule, as Sovereigns over all Armenia, the one over the great, the other over the lesser: but after his overthrow, they joined with the Romans, and from them obtained, each the title of a King in his own dominions.] [Strabo Ibid. pag. 531, 532.] And it is most likely, that at the time, when they made friends with the Romans, Hannibal got him away thence also, and fled into Crete.

Antiochus, having thus lost all Asia, said, That he was very much beholding to the Romans, for easing him of so much trouble, by confining him within a more reasonable compasse of his dominions. [Cic. pro Dejotaro. Valer. Maxim. lib. 4.]

3817. ^{cap. 1.} Cn. Manlius, and the ten Commissioners, having now settled all things, went with the whole army towards Hellepont, purposing to order matters in Galatia, as they went, [Polyb. Legat. 36. cap. 1.]

And calling those petty kings to come in to them ; they gave them such conditions of their peace as they thought fit ; the sum whereof was, That they should keep peace with Eumenes, and warned them to give off that lewd custom of theirs, in raging up and down with their arms about them, and to keep themselves within their own confines, [*Liv. l*ib*.id.*] to wit, within that part of Phrygia, and Paphlagonia, and Mysia, where it borders upon the mount Olympus, and Cappadocia, which being heretofore possessed by them, went now by the name of Galatia, [*Zonar. e*l*. Dion.*] We also read [1 Maccab. 8. 2.] that there was a tribute imposed on them, and so the Romans having chastised the Galatians for their insolence used towards them, acquired to themselves the whole, and entire sovereignty of Asia on this side the Taurus, and made that the bound of the Empire Eastward for that present, and freed the inhabitants there from that terror which they were formerly in from those fierce and barbarous Galls. [Polyb. lib. 3. pag. 159. with Manlius his Oration, in Livie lib. 38.]

38.] Manlius gathered all the ships which he could get in all that coast, and Eumenes with his ships came also to him; and in them passed himself with all his army into Europe,

[Liv. lib. 38.]

Antiochus, marching with his army into his upper provinces (or as Jerom upon Daniel cap. 11. speakes, passing thorough the furthestmost Cities of his domions) proclaimed his son Seleucus Philopator to be his successor, as we find, [2 Maccab. 9. 23.]

When

When Antiochus, whether feeling himself over-loaded, with the heavy tribute laid on him by the Romans, or whether it proceeded from a fit of avarice that took him, whereby he thought he might under colour thereof, fall to committing sacrilege upon his gods, and hearing that the Temple of Jupiter Belus in Elemais, abounded with Silver and Gold, and other precious Jewels, of offerings there made, he purposed to seize it all into his hands; coming therefore into Elemais, and pretending that the inhabitants of that place, had raised a war against him, with the power of his army, he entered into the Temple by night, and took thence an infinite mass of wealth; which coming to the peoples ears, the peasants of the Country came in, and set upon his army, and slew both him and them, [Diador. Sic. in Excerpt. Palae. pag. 292, 298. Strabo. lib. 16, pag. 744. Justin. lib. 32, cap. 2.] Jerom upon [Dan. chap. 1.] saith that he was slain in a fight against the inhabitants of Elemais: but [Arch. Vidor. de Vir. Illustri. titulus, that he was slain, by his own pot-companions, for that when he was in a drunkenness, he had beaten, and mistreated at a Feast: but slain he was, and that, as Zonaras rightly averreth out of Dionys in the year when C. Flaminius, and Emilius Lepidus, were Consuls of Rome.

After his death Seleucus, surnamed Philopator, or as Josephus, [lib. 12. cap. 4 p. 13.] Soter (which was indeed the surname of his son Demetrius) succeeded him in his kingdom, and reigned 12 years; a man of a lazy humor, nor of any great power, by reason of his fathers great luste left obtained from the Romans, [Aspica, in Syriac cap. 131. with Porphy. Euseb. and Severus, Sulpicius.] In this very [Place to the kingdom, he had a son, called Demetrius, whose surname was Soter, who as Polybius [L. 18. c. 17 p. 23.] was 23 years old, when his Uncle Antiochus Epiphanes died. And of this Seleucus, is meant that which is said, in the beginning [of the third chapter of the third book of Maccab.] When the Holy City lived in all peace, and the Laws therein excellently well executed, by reason of the piety of Onias the High Priest, and for that he was, an utter enemy to all ungodliness; it came to pass that even King himselfe honoured this Place, and adorned the Temple with many rich offerings: Inomuch, that Seleucus himself, King of Asia, furnished at the cost out of his own coffers, for the publick minifery of the Sacrifices. [Aspica, in Syriac cap. 131. with Porphy. Euseb. and Severus, Sulpicius.]

When Philopemen was Prætor: (i. e.) Chief Magistrate of the Achæans, Demetrius of Athens, came as an Ambassador of Ptolemæus from Alexandria, to renew his league with the Achæans; and they being very glad thereof, sent their Ambassadors in like manner to him: to wit, Lycortas, father to Polybius the Historian, and Theodoridas, and Rhœtoleus of Sicylene, both to take their oath to the King, and also to receive his oath to them. [Polyb. Legat. 37.]

Cn. Manlius Vulso, contrary to the votes of the ten Commissioners, triumphed in Rome over the Gauls in Asia, upon the fifth day of March, [Liv. lib. 38. & 39.] Concerning whose doings in Asia, Hannibal, having now nothing else to do, wrote a book in Greek: which language he had learnt, from one Sofillus, a Macedonian, who dedicated it to the Rhodians, [Emil. Prob. in Hannibale.] Which Sofillus was born at Ilium, and wrote the deeds of Hannibal in 7 volumes, as [Diodor. Sic. lib. 26. Eclog.] affirms.

When Aristoxenus was Prætor, or Chief Magistrate in Achaia, the Ambassadors which were sent from hence to King Ptolemæus, returned home, whiles the general Assembly of that Nation were met, and sitting at Megalopolis : before whom Lycoræus (as declared,) had taken their oath to them : adding further, that they had brought presents from the King to the Commonalty of Achaia; to wit, armes all of brass, to furnish 6000 Targateers, and 200 talents of brasse, ready coined, [Polycæ. lib. 41.]

To that meeting Eumenes also sent his Ambassadors, to renew the league with them which had formerly been between them and his father; promising moreover to bestow on them, 120 talents, to the end, that putting them out to use, the income thereof might serve to defray the charges of such as were to come from time, to time to their embellish; which largesse of his was offered, though their mouths were drawn to great a league, yet with one voice, they all rejoiced, and would none of it, [Id. ibid.]

389. Eumenes his Ambassadors came to Rome, to treat there concerning the possession of two Cities of Thracia, Enus, and Maronea, which they said belonged to him, as appertaining to the Cherstone of Thracia, which the Romans had given him; and that he would be contented with the Cherstone, for that he had seized on them by force, and put Garrisons in them, and had drawn from thence certain inhabitants there, and planted them in Macedonia. For the hearing of which difference between them, the Senate joynt Q. Cæcilius Metellus, and M. Bæbius, and Tib. Sempronius in Commission, and sent them; and they coming to Thessalonica, heard both parties argue the case before them; [Polyb. Legat. 40, 42. Liv. lib. 39.] Wh

3820.

When they returned to Rome, and the Ambassadors on either side, pleaded there nothing but what they had already said before the Commissioners at Thessalonica: the Senate decreed a second commission, whereof the chief man was Ap. Claudius, with instructions, to put out all Garrisons from Enus and Maronæ, and to assolate all the sea coast of Thracia from the power and jurisdiction of Philippus and his Macedonians, [Polyb. Legat. 42, 44, and Liv. lib. 49.]

At the same time also, Arcus and Alcibiades, the two Prime men of Sparta, came to Rome, and in the Senate made a heavy complaint against the Achæans; whereupon the Senate thought fit to refer that cause also to the same Commissioners, [Polyb. Legat. 42. Pausan. in Achæia, pag. 214.]

Lycortas of Megalopolis, Polybius his father, the Prætor of Achæia, called an assembly of the Nation: wherein Arcus and Alcibiades, who went to complain of them at Rome, were condemned to die for it, [Liv. lib. 39. Pausan. ut. sup.]

A while after, the Roman Ambassadors came into Achæia, and the common Council or Assembly of Achæia met before them, at Clitorea in Arcadia, [Liv. ibid. Polyb. Legat. 43.] but their coming in no sort pleased the Achæans, when they saw Arcus and Alcibiades (whom they in a late assembly had condemned to death) in their company; Lycortas like a Magistrate, pleaded and maintained the cause of the Achæans very boldly: But the Commissioners, not regarding much what he said, declared openly and with joint consent, that Arcus and Alcibiades were honest men, and had done the Achæans no wrong at all, and prevailed so far, as to have the sentence given against them to be reversed, [Liv. and Pausan. ut. sup.]

When Hannibal had lived a long time very quietly at Gortyna in Crete, and fell there into the envy of many by reason of his great wealth, he filled certain great chests with lead, and deposited them in the Temple of Diana there, as a treasure for a dead life: and thereupon the people, having such a pledge as that of him, looked the less after him: but he in the mean time stole away to Prusias, surnamed, as I said before, the Hunter, King of Bythinia, having first molten his gold and infused it into certain hollow Statues of brass, which he carried away with him, [Justin. lib. 32, cap. 4. and Emil. Prob. in Hannibale.]

There fell a little after a war in hand, between Prusias and Eumenes, King of Pergamus: which Prusias began, breaking the league that was between them, merely in confidence of Hannibal, whom he had there to manage his war for him, [Justin. ibid.] The war therefore grew hot between them, both by land and sea: but Eumenes by the assistance of the Romans, over-powered him in both: and whereas Prusias was but poor, and weak of himself, Hannibal procured him the assistance of some other Kings and States, and those of very warlike Nations; [Emil. Prob.] and among them, the aid of Philippus King of Macedon, who sent him Philoctes his General, with a considerable army to help him, [Polyb. Legat. 46.]

In the 149 Olymp. when M. Claudius Marcellus, and Q. Fabius Labeo, first entered into their Consulship, came to Rome an Embassy from Eumenes, carried by Athenæus his youngest brother, who brought with him a Crown of Gold of 15000 talents price, to complain of Philippus; both for that he had not withdrawn his Garrisons out of Thracia, as also for that he sent aid to Prusias, King of Bithynia, who had willfully broken his league, and made war upon his brother Eumenes, [Polyb. Legat. 46. Liv. lib. 39.] and among other Ambassadors, from Lacedæmon, came Arcus and Alcibiades to the Senate, [Polyb. ibid.]

When Prusias had received an overthrow from Eumenes by land, and seeking to try his fortune by sea, was too weak for Eumenes: there also Hannibal advised him to tarry whether he could do by policy and fraud, what by plain force he was not able to effect. He put therefore a multitude of all sorts of serpents into earthen vessels, and in the midst of the fight, to be hurled aboard the enemies ships; giving order to the soldiers and sea-men, to set all upon the ship wherein Eumenes himself was, and defend themselves from the rest as well as they could; by this device of the serpents, and that they might the more certainly know, in what ship Eumenes himself was, he sent before-hand a letter to him by a Herald, purporting nothing but a meer flout to Eumenes, and full of abuses to his person. When as therefore Prusias his men, came to it, they fought neither against great nor small, but only against the ship which Eumenes was in: whereupon he was fain to seek his safety by flight; but had perished therein, had he not thrust in upon the next shoar, where he had placed before-hand, for a relief upon all occasions, a company of his own. As for Eumenes his other ships, when they pressed hard upon the enemy, they let fire their earthen pitchers full of Snakes, which falling on the decks, brake, and out flew the Serpents among them; and this at first seemed a ridiculous thing unto them: but when they could stir no where in the ship for Serpents, and found themselves no less annoyed with their stings than with the arrows of their enemy, they gave off the fight, and fled to their sea-camp which was upon upon the Shoare, [Justin lib. 32, cap. 4. Emil. Prob. in Hannibale.]

Thus Hannibal, by this trick, got the better of Eumenes in that fight; nor then only, but also in sundry other encounters and by one stratagem or another, he ever put Eumenes to the worst. And once, when he advised Prusias to fight, and he durst not, because the entrails of the beasts, said he, forbid me: What, said Hannibal, will you rely more upon a little piece of flesh in a Calf, than upon the judgement of an old experienced Captain in the field, [Cic. De Divinat. lib. 2. Plut. in his Transf. De Exilio. Valer. Max. lib. 3, cap. 7.]

Now when news of these doings came to Rome, Ambassadors were out of hand dispatched away by the Senate, to make a peace between the two Kings, and to demand Hannibal out of Prusias his hands, [Polybius Legat. 47.] tells us, That Ti. Qu. Flaminius, was at that time sent Ambassador, both to Prusias, and also to Seleucus, King of Syria, and Livie, [lib. 36. out of Galerius Amian.] these, That Lu. Scipio Asiaticus, and P. Scipio Nasica, were joined in Commission with him to Prusias.

Agæipolis, who in his nonage, was King of Sparta, being sent with others to Rome, from thence were then banished out of Lacedæmon, by the way fell into the hands of Pirates, and was by them slain, [Polyb. Legat. 49.] This Agæipolis was the son of Cleomenes the King of Sparta, who was slain in Alexandria, as before, An. Mun. 3784. and was solemnly taken in for their King, by the Ephori there, but was turned out again, by those usurping Tyrants which succeeded in that State, Lycurgus, Machaniadas and Nabis, as Polybius, [lib. 4, pag. 304.] teaches us. But now, that this lawful King was dead, Arcus, of whom I speak before out of Polybius, Livie, and Paulianus, being a most earnest and violent defender of his Country's liberty against the Achæans, their power being now abated by the Roman's strength, he had acquired to himself the title of a King among them, for Josephus, [12. 2. Antiq. c. 4. & Ensch. in Chron.] both testifies, that Arcus the King of Lacedæmon, sent an Embassy, and wrote his letters to Onias 3, son of Onias, the High Priest at Jerusalem, which letters are extant in Josephus, [cap. 5, 26. & cap. 12. lib. 1. Macabe.] a book exactly translated out of the Hebrew, (for that book was originally written in Hebrew, as from shews) and retained every where the brevity and Hebraisms of it, in which letters, mention is made of the blood and kindred that was between the Jews and Lacedæmonians, which seemeth to have been taken out of the Mythological or fabulous writings of the Greeks; such as was that of Claudius Iolauus, in Stephanus Byzantium in the word Judea, that the name of the Jews came from one Judeus Sporton, a companion or fellow labourer of Bacchus in his wars; though Paulianus in his Corinthians, [pag. 58.] assures us, That the names of Sporton, was altogether unknown to the Spartans or Lacedæmonians of his time.

Eumenes began now to make war with Prusias King of Bythinia and Ortyagon, one of the Kings of the Galls. [Prolog. Troj. lib. 32. with Polyb. lib. 3. lib. 159.]

The death of Hannibal, I conceive, fell in with the Consulship of L. Emilius Paulus, and Cn. Bonus Pamphilus, for so Polybius, and Valerius Max. write; and not in the year before; as Atticus, and Livie, who follow him there, would have it, nor yet in the year next following, as Sulpicius, and in Emil. Prob. in Hannibale. Now the manner of his death, as we find it in Livie, [lib. 39. in Justin lib. 32, cap. 4. in Plut. in the Life of T. Q. Flaminius in Dion. quoted by Zonaras, in Emil. Prob. in Hannibale, and in Sulpicius in his Syriacis, pag. 92.] was in this manner.

Hannibal kept himself close in one place, which was a little Castle, given him by Prusias; to which he had made several doves; some of which were blind, to the end, That if any came to beset the house, they should not let any guard there, because they appeared not to be doors. When therefore he heard, that the Kings soldiers were in the porch, to break in upon him, he went to get out at one of his blind back-doors; but when he found that, contrary to his expectation, beset also with men to take him; and the house beset quite round every where, he took his poison, which he carried ever about him, for that purpose, and so dyed at the age of 70 years old: of whose death it is said, That there was this Oracle long before uttered.

Αἰώνιος ὁπλὴν ἔσται ὁ Ἀντίς Νῦντος, (i. e.)

The hand of Lybia Hannibal's Corps shall cover.

Which word Lybia, or Lybyssa, he ever understood of Lybia in Afric: whereas it was indeed a little Village in Bythinia, near the sea side, called also by the same name, of which Phryg. lib. 5, cap. 22. speaking, saith: There was in those parts, a little Town called Lybyssa, where's now nothing worth the seeing, that Hannibal's tomb is only.

Pharnaces King of Pontus fell suddenly upon the City of Synope and took it; which from thence forward continued in the possession of him and his successors. [Strabo lib. 12. pag. 545, 546.]

In the second year of the 149 Olymp. came Ambassadors to Rome from the two Kings, Eumenes and Pharnaces, who were then in war one against the other, as also from the Rhodians, complaining of the wrong done to them of Synope, by Pharnaces. Whereupon Marius and others in commission with him, were sent Ambassadors to take knowledge of the case of Synope; and to compose all differences between the two Kings, [Polyb. Legat. 52, 53. and Livie lib. 40.]

Hircanus (the son of Josephus, and nephew to Tobias) was sent to Seleucus, to gather up his tributes, on the other side of the river Jordan Eastward: where he built a fair and most fortified Castle, all of white marble, which he called by the name of Tyros, to wit, in the confines of Arabia, and Judea on the other side Jordan, not far from the land of Helibon, and was governor of all that Region, during the last seven years of Seleucus his reign; living all that time in war with the Arabians, and making great slaughters of them, besides many prisoners taken, and made slaves by him. [Joseph. lib. 12. cap. 45.]

Marcus and his fellow Commissioners, who were sent to see how the squares went between Eumenes and Pharnaces, returned; and made their report in the Senate, of what they found; setting out Eumenes his fair dealing, and temperate carriage in all things, blazoning the avarice and high fierce carriage of Pharnaces to the full, [Polyb. Legat. 53.] for indeed he was the most violent and invidious King that ever was before him, [Id. in Excerpt. Vals. pag. 130.]

When Ariarathes King of Cappadocia, joining in with Eumenes of Pergamus, made war upon Pharnaces King of Pontus, all three at once, sent their Ambassadors to Rome, and the Senate having heard them all, answered, That they would send Commissioners once more into those parts, with power to hear and determine all matters between them, [Id. lib. cum lib. 3. pag. 159. Liv. lib. 40.]

Pharnaces, coming thus to dance attendance upon the Romans, burst out again, and sent Leocritus in the midst of winter, with an army of ten thousand men, to harass and ravage all the Country of Galatia, [Polyb. Legat. 55.]

And himself in person, the spring following, mustered all his forces, as if he would have fallen upon Cappadocia, [Id. ib.]

Eumenes fearing to see him thus transgress all bounds of law and honesty as he did, together with his brother Attalus, newly then returned from Rome, marched into Galatia, against Leocritus, but him they found not there: and when Carignatus (or rather Epifognatus, as Fulvius Ursinus thinks it should be) and Gazotus sent their Ambassadors to desire them to forbear doing him any harm, for that they were ready to do what ever they were commanded, but were rejected by him, as men who had formerly falsified and broken their faith and word unto him, and so they went on against Pharnaces, [Ibid.]

At the end of five dayes march, Eumenes with his brother came from Calpito, a City of Bythinia, to the river Halys; and the sixth day after to Amisus, a city in Cappadocia: where when Ariarathes the King of that Country, had joyed his army with them, they all came into the plains of Amisus, where they had scantily pitched Camp, when news came, that Commissioners were come from Rome, to make a peace between them: whereupon Eumenes presently sent away his brother Attalus to welcome them into those parts, and he in the mean time doubled his army, and put them all into the best equi page he could, [Ibid.]

The Commissioners at their first arrival, exhorted both parties to a peace. Eumenes and Ariarathes, answered, With all their hearts; and what ever else they should be pleased to command; and when the Commissioners prayed, That during the treaty, they would draw out their forces from the enemies Country, Eumenes readily assented thereto, and the next morning gave order to send back his forces into Galatia, [Ibid.]

The Commissioners then treating with Pharnaces, could by no means prevail with him, to come to any conference where Eumenes should be present, and much a do they had at last to persuade him to send his Ambassadors to some place by the sea side, with full power there to treat, and to stand to such order as they should think fit to set down between them; and when his Ambassadors came to the place appointed, and the conference was now began, Eumenes was ready to yield to any conditions: but the Ambassadors of Pharnaces shewed themselves in such a fashion as the Commissioners easily perceived, that Pharnaces himself had no mind to come to any agreement, [Ibid.]

So the conference brake off, and no peace concluded between them, and when the Commissioners were gone from Pergamus, and Pharnaces his Ambassadors sent away, the war went on as before, between them two: and Eumenes fell to prepare all things necessary necessary for it on his part; nevertheless, at the earcest instance of the Rhodians who desired his aid against the Lycians, he let Pharnaces alone for that time, and went to help them, [Ibid.]

Leocritus, the General of Pharnaces his Forces, having laid hard siege to Pius (or rather Teios) a Town in Pontus, forced the Garrison which was there, consisting all of mercenary souldiers, to deliver up the Town to him, upon condition, that they themselves, should be conveyed to what place they should name for themselves, in safety: but having afterward received an expresse from Pharnaces to put them all to the sword, because they had formerly offended him, he pursued them upon the way, and slew them every man, [Diodor. Sic. in Excerpt. Vals. pag. 302.]

Seleucus, having gotten together a reasonable army, and going to the aid of Pharnaces, was ready to passe the Taurus: nevertheless, calling to mind that in so doing, he should break the articles accorded between his father and the Romans, upon better advice, he brake off that journey, and returned home again, [Id. ib.]

Yet afterward Pharnaces fell to an agreement with Attalus, and the rest, and they entered into a solemn league between them. Eumenes at that time had taken sick at Pergamus, but was now recovered: and having ratified all that Attalus had done therein, upon his return, sent both him and the rest of his brothers all to Rome, where every man, who knew what service they had done in the wars in Asia, had them heartily welcome; but the Senate, in special, caused lodgings to be provided for them, and large allowance to be made them at the publick charge. And Attalus coming into the Senate-house, complained of the wrong that Pharnaces had done them; and desired them to chastise him according to the measure of his offence: to whom they made a gracious answer, promising to send Commissioners, who should make, a final accord between them, [Polyb. Legat. 56. Diodor. Legat. 14.]

Ptolemus Epiphanes, desirous to make a more strict association with the Achæans, sent his Ambassadors to them, promising them ten ships, each of 50 oars a piece ready furnished to the full. The Achæans, considering that the offer was too good to be refused, as amounting to the value of almost 10 talents, accepted thereof very willingly: And sent him their Ambassadors, Lycortas with his son Polybius, (to wit, the Hellenian) though younger at that time, than by his law Pharnaces should be: and with them, Aratus, the son of Aratus the Sicyonian, with instructions both to thank the King for the armes and monies, which he had formerly sent them by Lycortas; and also to receive from him, then ships now promised, and to bring them, into Ploponese. But this Embassage never went further than Achæa it self, by reason, that newes came of the death of Ptolemie, [Id. Legat. 57.]

For when Ptolemie laid a trap to take Seleucus in, and withal set on foot an army to go against him, and one of his Captains asked him, where he would get money to go through with what he took in hand, his answer was, That his friends were his treasure: which saying of his, flying abroad, and coming to his Friends and Captains cares, and they conceiving that his meaning was, to furnish himself by stripping them of their means, agreed among themselves and poisoned him, [Jerom upon Daniel, chap 11.] This Ptolemie Epiphanes, in Priscian the Grammarian, is said by Cato, to have been a most excellent and bountiful King; and the truth is, that for a long time, he carried himself very nobly and well; but afterward when by the perulvation of some clau-backs of the Court, he had caused Aristomones, whom he had formerly honoured as a father, to take a drench of hemlocks, whereof he died, he grew to a further height of blood and cruelty; and ruled his people more like a Tyrant than a King; whereby he fell into such hatred and detestation among them, that they were ready to depole him, [Diodor. Sic. in Excerpt. Vals. pag. 294, 297.]

At his death, he left two sons, both under age: the eldest was called, Philometor, the younger, Phylcon, [Josephus, lib. 12. cap. 6.] Ptolemus Philometor (whom Epiphanius miscalleth Philopator) reigned after his father 35 years: as [Clau. Ptolemæus, in Can. Reg. Clemens Alexandrinus, Eusebius.] and others tell us: of which we, to make the times even, abate 3 months only.

Pharnaces, finding himself over-laid by this unexpected and violent coming on of the enemy, left his Ambassadors to Eumenes and Ariarathes, and sued for peace: so this war between Eumenes and Ariarathes on the one side, and Pharnaces and Mitridates, Lord of Armenia, on the other, was taken up, and ended upon these conditions; to wit, That Pharnaces should no more set foot in Galatia; and should break off all former agreements and leagues made with the Galatians. That he should likewise get him going out of all Paphlagonia: and such of the Inhabitants thereof as he had carryed from thence, he should send home again, with their armes. That he should restore to Ariarathes, all the places which he had taken from him, with such hostages as he had received of him. That he should restore all the prisoners which he had taken, ransom-free; and deliver up those which had left their King, and fled over to him.

That he should restore to Morzias and Ariarathes the 900 talents, which he had taken from them and 300 more to Eumenes, for his charges in the war: and that Mithridates the Lord of Armenia, should pay 300 talents, for making war upon Ariarathes, contrary to the league which he had made with Eumenes. In this league, were comprised, of the great men of Asia, Artaxias, a petty king of the greater part of all Armenia, and one Acusilochus: and of those in Europe, Gatalus of Sarmatia, and of free States, those of Heraclea, Melambyrus, Cherlonefus, and Cyzicum: for performance whereof, so soon as the hostages sent by Pharnaces were come, the armies brake up, and dispersed themselves, every man to his own home, [Polyb. Legat. 59.]

3826. Teius, a Town in Pontus, which Prusias by the Articles was to restore to Eumenes, Eumenes freely gave back to him again, and had many thanks given him by Prusias for it, [Id. ibid.]

After the death of Philippus, King of Macedon, his son Perseus, or Perseus, succeeded him, in the year when Q. Fulvius, and L. Manlius, were Consuls at Rome: and he reigned 11 years, [Liv. lib. 45.] or rather 10 years, 11 moneths, as Porphyrie more exactly counteth it, [Scal. in Graec. Euseb. pag. 229.]

Here begins the third Periode, of Calippus.

The Lycians sent their Ambassadors to Rome, to complain of the cruelty of the Rhodians, to whom they were assigned, and made subject by L. Cornelius Scipio, saying, that the slavery which they endured under Antiochus, in comparison of this, was an excellent kind of liberty and freedom; and that there was no difference now left between them, and the very slaves they bought in the Market for their money. The Senate moved with this piteous complaint, gave them their letters to carry to the Rhodians; whereby they put the Rhodians in mind, that they indeed put the Lycians into their subjection, and protection withal; yet so, as they ceased not to be free States still, and of the sovereignty of the people of Rome, [Liv. lib. 41.]

3827. Prusias married the sister of Perseus, and Perseus the daughter of Seleucus, called Laodice; and the Rhodians with their Fleet, received and conveyed her into Macedon to her husband, [Liv. lib. 42. Polyb. Legat. 60. Appian. Legat. 25.]

When the Rhodians persisted, and now made an open war upon the poor Lycians, they of Xanthus fled by their Embassies for help to the Achaeans, and to the people of Rome; foreman in which Embassie, was one Nicolltratus, [Polyb. Legat. 60.]

The Lycians were already troden under foot by the Rhodians, before their Ambassadors could get audience of the Senate of Rome; which was not till Tiberius and Claudius the Consuls of that year, were gone out against the Istrians and Agrians: but when they were admitted, they so displayed and laid open before them, the cruelty and oppression of the Rhodians against the poor Lycians, that they prevailed so far with the Senate, as that they sent Ambassadors to Rhodes, to let them know, that having perused the Acts, and Records, which the ten Commissioners drew up, in Asia, they found by the tenor thereof, That the Lycians were by the Romans consigned to the Rhodians, not for a gift, to do with them what they would, but to use them as friends and associates. This message was not so well liked, of by the common sort in Rome, who were grown offended with the Rhodians for their officiousness, in bringing home Perseus his wife unto him, and could have been well contents to have seen them and the Lycians to try it out by the teeth, that the Rhodians might have some occasion to spend their treasure and provisions, with which they so much abounded, [Id. ibid.]

3828. When the Roman Commissioners came to Rhodes, the inhabitants there, began to grow into an uproare, saying, Since all things were now well settled in Lycia, What meant they to give occasion of new trouble there? For indeed the Lycians, hearing what declaration the Senate had made in their behalf, began presently to rise again, protesting openly that they would endure any thing, to recover their just rights and liberty again. But the Rhodians, conceiving that the Senate had been misinformed, and abused by some false suggestions of the Lycians, dispatched away Lycophron their Ambassador to Rome: and the Senate having heard his errand, gave him no present answer, [Id. Legat. 61, 62.]

One Simon, a man of the Tribe of Benjamin, Chief President or Keeper of the Temple, falling into a contention with Onias 3. the High Priest there; when he could not get his will on him, gat himself to Apollonius the Governour of Caelosyria and Phenicia: and informed him, that there was a vast masse of money in the treasury of the Temple, which the Priests made no use of; and therefore would do very well in the Kings coffers: which when Apollonius had acquainted his Master Seleucus with, he presently sent away his L. Treasurer Heliodorus to Jerusalem, to fetch him that money from thence: But when he came, Onias the High Priest told him, That true it was, there were some monies in the Temple; but that they were the monies of Widows and Orphans, there deposited onely as in a place of safety; part of which, were the proper goods goods of Hyrcanus, the Nephew of Tobias, (of whom we spake sup. An. Mus. 3812.) a most honourable person; and that all that there was, amounted not to above 400 talents of Silver, and 200 of Gold, and that such was the Holiness of the place, and of the thing it self, that no man might or ought to lay hand upon it: But when Heliodorus made no reckoning either of Onias his words, or the tumult of the people, lamenting such a profanation of their Temple, he was struck down by the Angels of God in the very place, and carried to his lodging half dead by his own servants that were about him. But being anon after restored to his health, by the intercession and prayers to God made by Onias the High Priest, he returned to Seleucus that sent him; magnifying the Holiness of the Temple, and the Power of God that dwelt therein. This story is recorded in [2 Maccab. chap. 3.] and by Josephus in his book, απὸ ἀποστόλων & λογιστῶν: who yet instead of Heliodorus, here names Apollonius: (and so do the Fassi Siculi too) and shews that this fell out a little before the death of Seleucus: whereas by the articles between Antiochus and the Romans, Antiochus was to change his hostages, and send new ones, instead of the old, every 3 years end; now, in the stead of Antiochus Epiphanes, the younger son of the former Antiochus who was then a hostage at Rome, [1 Maccab. chap. 1. v. 11.] was sent Demetrius the son of Seleucus, now reigning, [Appian. in Syriac. pag. 126.]

Simon the Benjamite, that Traitor of his Country, and discloder of the monies deposited in the Temple, accused Onias the High Priest, a man who had so well deserved of the City and Country of the Jews; as it he had forced Heliodorus, and contrived all the mischief against him, and the King; and when matters proceeded so far, that many murders were acted by Simon and his party in the City, and Apollonius waxed mad withal, and backt him in what he did; Onias took a journey to Seleucus, [2 Maccab. chap. 4. v. 1, 6.] but the abbreviator of Jafon of Cyrenia, seems to say, That Seleucus was dead before he came: though Eusebius in his Chron. saith, That he found him alive, and got this Simon to be banished by the King.

And so have I brought down this our Chronicle of Asia and Egypt, to the beginning of Antiochus Epiphanes, and the History of the Maccabees: The continuation whereof to the utter destruction of Jerusalem, under the Emperor Vespasian, together with the Annals of the New Testament, and a brief of the History of the Church during that time, to the beginning of the fourth Age or Century after Christ, I purpose, if God send life and health, to make hereafter.

Glory be to God on High.

THE Epistle to the Reader.

READER,

You have here the other Part of my Annals, which you will find more full in the History of Rhodes, and the Isles between Asia and Europe. For although formerly, for the alleviating of the Work, I resolv'd to refer them to Græcia: Yet considering, that in the division of the Eastern Empire, the Province of the Isles is attributed to the Asian Dioceſſe; I alſo thought good afterwards to place them with Asia. Thoſe things which I produce concerning Preſages, Spectralls, and Oracles, you have upon the Authority of the Authours who relate them: leaving the judgement of ſuch things to thoſe Learned Men, who make it their buſineſſe to treat of them. In the citing of Cornelius Tacitus, I have obſerved the Edition of Bereggerus, and Freinſhemius, as it is diſtinguiſhed into Chapters. Of thoſe things which in the diſpoſition of Evangelick and Apoſtolick Hiſtory, ſhall not ſeem ſufficiently ſatisfactory, I ſhall (if God Almighty afford me life and ſtrength to finiſh that Work) give you an account in my Sacred Chronology.

A CHRONICLE

The Asiatic and Egyptian Affaires, carried on from the beginning of the times of the M A C C H A B E E S, untill the Destruction of the Jewish Common-wealth under Vespasian.

3829.

Hen Antiochus, son of Antiochus the Great, returning from Rome (where he was hostage) came unto Athens; his brother Seleucus, by the treachery of Heliodorus was taken out of the way.
Howbeit, Eumenes and Attalus expelled Heli-dorus, who aimed at the kingdom of Syria, placing Antiochus in the possession thereof, that by this good turn, they might oblige him to be their friend: for now by reason of some petty injury, even they began to grow jealous of the Romans.
[Appian, in Syriac, pag. 116, 117.]

4539. 175.

Demetrius, son of Seleucus, to whom the kingdom did of right belong, having then entered into the tenth year of his age, remained at that time hostage at Rome. But Apollonius, who was brought up with him, upon the death of Seleucus, whole great favourite he was, departed from Court to Miletum, [Polyb. Legat. 154.] But the Syrians filed their new King Antiochus, Epiphanes, or Illustrious, because upon strangers usurpation of the kingdom, he appeared bravely to his people, in vindication of his ancestors title, [Appia-in Syriac, pag. 177.] who notwithstanding, by reason of his mad conversation, Polybius thought might more justly be called Epimanes, or the Frankick, [*apud Athenaeum lib.
2. cap. 2. lib. 5. cap. 4. & lib. 10. cap. 12.*]

For having obtained the kingdom of Syria, he entered into a new, and, to other Kings, unusual course of life: first going out of his Royall Palace privately, his servants knowing nothing of it, he unadvisedly wandered about the City, taking but one or two affociates with him. Moreover he accounted it an honour to converse and drink with the common people, and with aliens and strangers of the meanest condition. And if perchance, he heard of any young men that had a merry meeting, he presently with his poet and musick, came to the revels: In sum, That most of the company being startled at the strangeness of the thing, upon his coming thither, betook themselves to their heels, or else out of fear sat still and spake not a word. Lastly, laying aside his royall garment, and being clad with a coat, such as he saw used by the Candidates at Rome, he saluted and took hold of every ordinary fellow that he met with, and sometimes sued for a place of the Edilis, sometimes for the Tribuneship of the people. At last having, by the suffrages of the people, obtained the place of a magistrate, fixing, according to the Roman custom, his ivory chair, he gave judgement, and took cognizance of the law suits, and controversies of the Citizens with that induopportunity of his Embassy to his own advantage, by the same devices wherewith Jason circumvented Onias his brother, he also circumvented Jason; and promising unto the King 300 talents of silver above all that was to be performed by Jason, conveyed the High-Priest-hood unto himself, [2 Maccab. 4. 23, 24, 25. Sever. Sulpic. Hist. Sacr. lib. 2.] That this Menelaus was first named Onias, and was brother unto Onias the third, and to Jason himself, and the youngest son of Simon, the second, the High Priest, Josephus affirmeth, [Antiquities lib. 12. cap. 6. cum lib. 15. cap. 3.]

Menelaus, having gotten the Principality by the Kings Mandate, expelled Jason into the Country of the Ammonites; but took no care to pay any of the monies which he had promised to the King, [2 Maccab. 4. 25, 26, 27.]

Cis Popilius Lenas, and Publius Ælius Ligur, being Consuls, Valerius Antias writes, that Attalus brother of Eumenes came to Rome, to lay crimes to the charge of Perseus king of the Macedonians, &c. to discover his provisions for war. The Annals of the most, and such unto whom thou would give the better credit, affirm Eumenes to have come in person himself. Eumenes therefore, as soon as he came to Rome, being entertained with the highest honour, and brought into the Senate; said, That the reason of his coming to Rome, besides the desire of seeing the gods and men, by whose benefit he was in such a fortune, above which he durst not with any higher, was, that he might openly advise the Senate to oppose the proceedings of Perseus, [Liv. lib. 42. Appian. Legat. 25. a Fulv. Ursino. edit.] And there was to great secrecy herein of all men, that before the war was finished and Perseus taken prisoner, it could not be known, what either he spake, or the fathers answered, [Liv. lib. 42. Appian. Legat. 25. a Fulv. Ursino. edit.]

Some certain dayes afterward, Stryrus a principal person among the Ambassadors of the Rhodians, inveighing more liberally in presence of the Senate against Eumenes, because he had stirred up the nation of the Lycians against the Rhodians, and was more vexatious unto Asia than Antiochus, made a plausible, and, to the people of Asia, (for even so far the esteem of Perseus had reached) an acceptable Oration: which notwithstanding procured from amongst the Romans greater respect unto Eumenes; so that all honours were conferred upon, and most ample rewards given unto him, with a Chariot of state, and an Ivory staff, [Liv. ut sup. Diodor. Sicul. 9. Legat. 26. a Fulv. Ursino. edit.]

Eumenes, returning from Rome into his Realme, and going up from Cirra to the Delphic Temple, that he might sacrifice to Apollo, lies in wait, suborned by Perseus, tumbled down two vast stones, with one whereof the head of the King was smitten, with the other his shoulder benumbed; many stones being heaped on him after he fell from a steep place downward. His friends, the next day, being come to himself, brought him to the ship: from thence they pass to Corinth, from Corinth, their ships being conveyed over the neck of the Isthmos to Ægina; where his cure was so private, none being admitted, that the report of his death was carried into Asia, and Rome, [Liv. lib. 42. Appian. Legat. 25.]

Attalus, crediting more hastily than befemed brotherly concord, that Eumenes was dead, did not onely confer with the Governour of the Castle of Pergamus as the unquestioned heir of the Crown, but the Diadem also being assumed, and espousing to himself Stratonice his brothers wife (daughter of Ariarathes King of the Cappadocians) rushed too hotly into her embraces: but not long afterwards, hearing that his brother lived, and was coming to Pergamus, laying his Diadem aside, he with the Guard, according to custom, went to meet him, bearing an halbert; whom Eumenes both friendly embraced, and also honourably, and cheerfully saluted the Queen; whispering nevertheless into his brothers ear,

Μὴ σιωπῇς ἄνθρωπ' ὅστις παντοδαπὸν ἰδὼς.
Until thou seest that I am dead,
Approach not rashly to my bed.

Neither thorough his whole life did he do or speak any thing that might have a shew of dissimulation: but entreated him with the same friendship as before, [Liv. lib. 42. Diodor. Sicul. in Excerpt. Valesii. pag. 306. *Plutarch in Apophthegm. & lib. viii. in *adversus.]

Eumenes, the late wickedness of Perseus, besides the ancient hatred, inviting him thereto, prepared a war with his uttermost strength. Ambassadors came to him from Rome, gratulating unto him his escape from so great a danger, [Liv. lib. 42.]

After that, Ariarathes King of the Cappadocians had born unto him of his wife Antiochis, daughter to Antiochus the Great, two daughters, and one son (first named Mithridates, and then Ariarathes) of the two sons which his wife (supposing that she should have been barren) had before suborned unto him, he sent Ariarathes the elder with with a competent estate to Rome, the young; called Olophernes, or Oroperhernes, into Ionia; least they should contend with his Jenuine son about the kingdom, [Diodor. Sicul. lib. 31. in Photii. Bibliothec. cod. 244.] This year therefore he sent Ariarathes his son to be educated at Rome; that from a child he might be accustomed to the manners and men of Rome: requesting, that they would permit him to be, not under the custody of hosts, after the manner of private persons, but under the charge of public care and tuition. That Embassy of the Kings was very acceptable unto the Senate; and they decreed that Cicnius Scinius the Major, should appoint a furnished house, where the Kings son and his Retinue might inhabit, [Liv. lib. 42.]

The Romans sent Ambassadors to their confederate Kings, Eumenes, Antiochus, Ariarathes, Mafanilla, and Ptolemei King of Egypt; and others also into Greece, Thessaly, Epirus, Acarnania, and the Islands: that they would unite themselves in war against Perseus, [Appian. Legat. 25.] T. Claudius Nervus, and M. Decimus, were sent to make trial of Asia, and the Islands, and commanded also to go into Crete and Rhodes, to renew amity also, and likewise to discover whether the minds of their confederates had been courted by King Perseus, [Liv. lib. 42.]

The Legates that had been sent unto the confederate Kings, returning out of Asia, declared how that they had conferred with Eumenes in Asia, Antiochus in Syria, Ptolemei in Alexandria, That all of them had been followed by the Embassies of Perseus; but had eminently contrived constant in their fidelity, and had promised to perform whatever the people of Rome should command them. That they had also been with the confederate Cities: that the rest continued faithful enough, only that they found the Rhodians wavering and seasoned with the devices of Perseus. The Rhodian Ambassadors came to acquire themselves of those reports, which they knew openly bruited concerning their City; and it was thought fitting, that when the new Consuls entered upon their Magistracy, a Senate should be called for them, [Liv. lib. 42.]

P. Licinius, and C. Cassius, being Consuls, all the Kings and Cities which were in Asia and Europe, left their thoughts on the care of the Macedonian and Roman war: both an ancient hatred did exasperate Eumenes, and also a new anger, because the wickedness of Perseus, he was almost, like a Sacrifice, slain at Delphos. Prusias King of Bithynia, resolved to abstain from arms, and expect the event: for he thought it not equal, to bear arms for the Romans against his wives brothers, and if Perseus should be Conqueror, pardon might easily be procured by his sister. Ariarathes King of the Cappadocians, besides that he promised assistance to the Romans upon his own account; from the time that he became united unto Eumenes by affinity, associated himself unto all Councils both of war and peace. Antiochus sorely had an eye upon the kingdom of Egypt, despising both the youth of the King, and the sloth of his Tutors; and by debating about Cæloxyria, he thought that he should find ground for a war, and manage it, without any impediment, whilst the Romans were employed about the Macedonian war: however, he largely promised all Kings, both by his own Legates to the Senate, and to their Ambassadors himself. Ptolemei by reason of his youth, was even then at the disposing of others: his Governours did both prepare war against Antiochus, whereby they might defend Cæloxyria, and also made liberal promise for the Macedonian war, [Liv. lib. 42.] And thus Ptolemei King of Egypt, Ariarathes of Cappadocia, Eumenes of Asia, and Mafanilla of Numidia, were assistants unto the Romans, [Oros. lib. 4. cap. 20.]

Three Ambassadors, A. Posthumus Albinus, C. Decius, and A. Licinius Nerva, were sent from the Romans to the Grecians: who afforded unto them the assistance of Archers, [Liv. lib. 42.]

Three other Ambassadors, T. Claudius Tiberius, P. Posthumus, and M. Junius were dispatched unto the Islands, and the Cities of Asia. These going about, did exhort their confederates to undertake against Perseus, the war for the Romans; and by how much every City was better stored with wealth, by so much they did their business there the more diligently, because the smaller would follow the greater. The Rhodians were esteemed of greatest reckoning for all payants, because they were able not onely to countenance the war, but to assist it, 40 ships being provided by the authority of Hegesilochos, who was at that time in the chief magistracy, called by them Prytanis. This man even before, as soon as the war to be waged by the Romans with Perseus was known, did with many reasons exhort his Citizens, that they should join their hopes with the Romans. That they would want the same provision of shipping which lately they had seen in the war of Antiochus, and formerly in that of Philip. That the Rhodians would be amazed in the providing a Fleet, at that time when it should be to be sent, unless they began with their Navy-Confederates: That therefore they were to acquire themselves more industriously; That by the truth of things they might conclude the accusations alleged by Eumenes. Hereby being incited, they shewed unto the Ambassadors of Rome, upon their coming, a Fleet of 40 sail of ships, built and rigged, rigg'd, that it might appear that exhortation was not expected: and this Embassy was of great influence to engage the mindes of the Cities of Asia, [Idem, ibid., Polyb. Legat. 64.]

Perseus, after conference had with the Romans, comprized all reason of his cause in the form of one Epistle, and what was alledged on either side: so contrived, that the might seem to have the better in the debate: and unto other Cities he sent letters copied out, by Carriers; but unto Rhodes, he commanded Antenor and Philip to go Embassadors: who being come thither, deliver the letters to the Magistrates; and then after a few dayes come into the Senate, request of the Rhodians, that for the present they should not move any thing, but as from a watch-tower, behold what was done; but if the Romans should undertake against the laws of the league to provoke Perseus and the Macedonians, that they should endeavour to bring them to terms of agreement; for that that should be done, was the common interest of all, and especially behoofull for the Rhodians; for by how much they should be more intent than others, upon the fair dispensation of law and liberty (as such who were not the conservators and assertors of their own liberty only, but of the rest of the Grecians) by so much ought they more diligently to observe and provide, to their uttermost endeavours, for themselves against them, whose mind and counsels were contrarily inclined. When the Ambassadors had spoken these things, and more to the same effect, though their speech gave content unto all; yet because their minds were predisposed with the benevolence of the Romans, and the authority of the better side did prevail; in other points they yielded themselves courteous toward the Ambassadors: but in place of an answer, they requested Perseus, not to demand any thing of that nature whereby they might be thought to do any thing against the will of the Romans: which answer Antenor accepted not, but making use of the rest of the civility and civility of the Rhodians, he returned into Macedonia. [Polyb. Legat. 65, Livie lib. 42.]

Caius Lucretius the Roman Pretor, whilst the navy stayed about Cephalonia, treated by letters with the Romans, requesting the ships to be sent to him; and he delivered that epistle to Socrates the anointer of the wrestlers to be conveyed. This came to Rhodes at the same time, when Strutocles was president of the Council, or Prytanis, for the later half year. When a debate was had of that matter, it seemed meet unto Agathagetus, and Rhodophon and Asymedes, and many more, that the Rhodians without any tergiversation or evasion should send the ships, and that they should even from the beginning of the war joynt themselves with the Romans. But Dino and Polycrates, who did not approve of those things, which had before been decreed in favour of the Romans, cavilled that that Epistle was not sent from the Romans, but from Eumenes the enemy of the Rhodians; who was wholly bent upon this, that he might induce them into a war, and engage the people in unnecessary charges and troubles: for it was brought by one obscure person, an anointer of wrestlers unto Rhodes: whereas the Romans use with great care to pick out men of the choicest rank, for such an employment. When Strutocles, the chief officer, or Prytanis, had buckled himself against these men, and had spoken largely against Perseus; but on the contrary liberally commended the Romans, he prevailed with the Rhodians, that a decree of sending the ships should be established: wherefore six Gallies being immediately built, they sent five under the conduct of Timagoras to Chalcis; one to Tenedos, under the government of the other Timagoras. This man could not take Diophanes himself, whom he found at Tenedos, being sent from Perseus to Tenedos, but he took the ship with all her furniture. [Polyb. Legat. 67.]

The Romans, having heard the Embassies that came from Asia, the state of the Rhodian, and the rest of the Cities being understood, indicted a Senate for the Ambassadors of Perseus. [Id. Legat. 68.] At that time therefore, Solon and Hippas endeavoured to discourse of all affairs, and to deprecate the anger of the fathers. But yet the crime of the treachery contrived against Eumenes was detested with especial industry; howbeit, (for the matter was evident) without any probability at all. When they had finished their speech, the Senate, who had before decreed the war, denounced unto them, that both themselves, and whosoever else had happily then come from the nation of the Macedonians to Rome, should immediately depart out of the walls of the Roman City, and within thirty dayes out of Italy. [Id. ibid., Diodor. Sicul. Legat. 17, Liv. lib. 42.]

When notice was given unto Eumenes, that he should with his uttermost strength assist the war against Perseus (as we read in Justin, lib. 33. cap. 1.) he came to Chalcis in Boeotia, by sea, with Attalus and Athenus his brethren; his brother Philaretus, being left at Pergamus for the safeguard of the kingdom: from thence with Attalus and four thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse, he came into Thessalia, unto Licinius the Consul. Athenus was left at Chalcis with two thousand Foot: which Marius Lucetius, who, coming thither with an army of sea souldiers, consisting of ten thousand, took along with him to the siege of Holiartus. [Liv. lib. 42.]

About the same time almost, there came to Chalcis, ships from their other confederates, two Punick Gallies, of five orders of oars, and two from Heracles out of Pontus of three orders of oars, four from Chalcedon, and as many from Samos; and moreover five Rhodian Gallies, of four orders of oars. [Id. lib. 42.] But thele C. Lenturius, the Pretor Brother of Marcus, upon his approach, there being no sea-war re-did ver'd unto the confederates. [Id. lib. cum Polyb. Legat. 67, sup.] But the Pretor himself, together with his brother assaulting Haliartus, when he had taken it by storm, level'd it the foundation, and without any opposition took Thebes. [Liv. ut. sup.]

Whilst these affairs were transacted in Boeotia, Licinius the Consul, Eumenes and Attalus in Thessalia, encountered with Perseus; the first conflict between them was ended without knowledge who had the better therein: about 38 men were slain of Eumenes his side, amongst whom fell Cassignatus Captain of the Galles: but in the second dispute Perseus got the victory. [Id. ib.] Who notwithstanding, being conqueror, upon his request to Licinius for peace, could not procure it. [Id. lib. Polyb. Legat. 69, Appian. Legat. 25.]

Perseus the conqueror, sent Antenor to Rhodes for the redemption of the Captives that failed with Diophanes: in which business, there was a long demurre made by them, which governed the Common-wealth, what ought to be done, for it seemed meet unto Philophon and Theocritus, that the Rhodians should by no means engage themselves in the affairs of Perseus; but Dinon, and Polyaratus liked it; and at last they came to an agreement with Perseus, touching the redemption of the captives. [Polyb. Legat. 70.]

Antiochus, seeing now clearly the Alexandrians preparing themselves to a war for Cœlœsyrta, sent Meleager Ambassador to Rome: who by his command might declare it to the Senate, and alleaguing their confederacy, might say, that against all right he was invaded by Ptolemei. [Id. Legat. 71.]

When now the war was began by Antiochus and Ptolemei, upon the account of Cœlœsyrta; and the Ambassadors of both Kings came to Rome: of Antiochus, Meleager, Soliphanes, and Heracles; of Ptolemei, Timotheus and Damon. Meleager came, that he might declare unto the Senate, that Ptolemei did first provoke Antiochus against all justice; and that he would justify him out of the possession of that Country, whereof he was Lord; but Timotheus, to renew friendship; howbeit, especially to observe Meleager his transgressions with the Romans. When therefore he had renewed friendship, and received answers agreeable to his demands, he returned to Alexandria, But unto Meleager the Senate answered, That they would employ Quintus Marcus, to write unto Ptolemei about those matters, as he should see expedient for the interest of the people of Rome, and his own trust. [Id. Legat. 72, Diodorus, Sicul. Legat. 18.]

Antiochus, engaging in a fight, between Ptoleusium and the mountain Casius, with Ptolemei Commanders, overcame them; but (sparing the King a youth, and pretending friendship, he went up to Memphis; and there, according to custom, entering upon the kingdom, and saying, That he would be careful of the affairs of the land, with a small company of people, he brought all Egypt into subjection unto himself. [Porphyrus, ex Callinico futuro, apud Hieronym. in Daniel, cap. 11.] At what time also Ptolemei Macro, son of Dorymenes, to whom Philometor had committed the government of Cyprus, seemeth to have gone over to Antiochus side, and delivered unto him the Island, as we read in the [2 of Maccab. 10. 13.] whereupon the care of Cyprus being committed unto Crates, [2 Maccab. 4. 29.] he made Ptolemei Governour of Cœlœsyrta and Phœnicia, [Id. 8. 8.] and admitted him into the number of his principal friends. [1 Maccab. 3. 38.]

Perseus, being put to flight by Lycinius the consul, Eumenes, Attalus and Milagene Duke of the Numidians, when he came to Pella, sent his army into their winter quarters. The Consul, returning to Larissa, having from thence sent home Eumenes and Attalus, disposed Milagene with his Numidians, and the rest of his army in their winter quarters through Thessaly. [Liv. lib. 42.]

When Sosistratus Governour of the Castle of Jerusalem, to whom the exaction of such things as were collected, as customs out of mens estates, belonged, did request and demand the money, promised unto Antiochus by Menelaus, both of them were summoned by the King to Antioch; and Menelaus left Deputy in the administration of the High Priest-hood, Lyfimachus his brother; but Sosistratus in his place, Crates, who was Governour of the Cypriotes, [2 Maccab. 4. 27, 28, 29.]

In Cilicia, they of Tarsus and Mallos, moving sedition because Antiochus had given the Revenue of their Cities to Antiochis his Concubine: The King in all haste came to appeale it; leaving at Antioch Andronicus for his Deputy, [2 Maccab. 4. 30, 31.]

Menelaus, taking the opportunity of the Kings absence, (by the assistance of Lysimachus, his Deputy) stole certain vessels of Gold out of the Temple at Jerusalem: whereof some he gave to Andronicus, and some he sold into Tyrus, and the Cities round about: which Onias 3, the Legal High Priest well knowing, he impeached him for sacrilege, and withdrew himself into a sanctuary at Daphne, that lieth by Antioch, [Ibid. 32, 33.] for there was in the middle of the wood a sanctuary, and a place dedicated to Apollo, [Strabo lib. 16. pag. 750.] which most ample Church of Daphneus Apollon, that wrathful and raging King Antiochus erected, [Ammian. Marcellin. lib. 22.]

Andronicus, at the suite of Menelaus, having cunningly drawn forth Onias out of the sanctuary, against his faith pledged and sworn unto him, perfidiously put him to death, [2 Maccab. 4. 34.]

King Antiochus, being returned out of Cilicia into Antioch, the Jews which were in the City, and many of other Nations, made complaint unto him of the unworthy murder of the most holy old man; who being afflicted at it, and testifying his grief by shedding of tears, he commanded Andronicus, being disrobed of his purple, to be lead about the City, and to be slain in the same place where himself had slain Onias, [Ib. 35, 38.]

Now when many Sacrileges had been committed at Jerusalem by Lysimachus, with the consent of Menelaus; the multitude gathered themselves together against Lysimachus, many golden vessels being carried away: in resistance of whom, he drew forth about three thousand armed men, appointing one Tyrannus for their Leader, a person far gone in years, and no less in folly; but of the Rout, some caught stones, some great clubs, some filling their hands with the dust that lay before them, cast them altogether upon Lysimachus and his souldiers: in that tumult many were wounded, some fell to the ground, the rest put to flight; but the Church-robber himself Lysimachus, was slain near the Treasury, [Ib. 39, 42.]

When Antiochus the King came to Tyre, three men being sent from the Senate at Jerusalem against Menelaus, as a pertaker of the sacrileges and wickednesses of Lysimachus, framed an accusation before him. Howbeit Menelaus being convicted, upon large summes of monies promised to Ptolemei, son of Dorymenes for the pacification of the Kings, thorough his assistance prevailed, not only that himself being acquitted, should continue in the High-Priest-hood, but also, that those three innocent persons, who pleaded for the City, and people, and holy vessels, should be condemned to die: Whole condition the Tyrians themselves commiserating, took care that they should be magnificently interred, [Ib. 44. 50.]

About that time, Antiochus prepared his second expedition into Egypt: and it fell out at Jerusalem, that for 40 dayes space together, strange apparitions of armed Horfemen, and of Foot-Companies, encountering one another, were seen in the aire, prefiges of ensuing evils, [2 Maccab. 5. 1, 4.]

Antiochus, coveting to joyn the kingdom of Egypt to his own, entered it with a numerous company, with Chariots, with Elephants with Horfemen, and a great Navy, and made war against Ptolemei King of Egypt: who turning himself from his presence, fled away, and many fell down wounded to death. Afterwards the seized upon the fenced Cities in the land, and Antiochus took the spoiles of Egypt, [2 Maccab. 5. 16, 19.]

The false rumor of Antiochus his death being spread abroad, Jason taking with him no less than a thousand men, made a sudden assault upon the City of Jerusalem: the City being surprized, Menelaus fled into the Castle; but Jason made slaughter of his own Citizen; not considering, that successe against his own alliances was the greatest infelicity. Nevertheless he could not recover the Principality; but fleeing away with shame, he returned back into the Country of the Ammonites: where being accused before Artaxerxes, the King of the Arabians, and not daring to make his appearance there, he was forced to flee from one City to another; being hated of all men as a forsaker of the laws, and a publick enemy of his own Country, [2 Maccab. 5. 5, 8.]

Antiochus hearing in Egypt, that upon the spreading of the rumor of his death, the people of Jerusalem were exceeding joyful, and suspecting by the sedition stirred up by Jason, that Judea would revolt, was much enraged in mind, [2 Maccab. 5. 10, Joseph. in libello de Macabeis.] And returning after that he had smitten Egypt in the 143 year of the Greeks, or Seleucus, he went up against Israel, and Jerusalem, with a great multitude, [1 Maccab. 1. 21, 22.]

Josephus in his 12 book of Antiquities, seventh Chapter, writeth, That in the 143

year of the Seleucians he took the City: but αμαρτι, without stroke; the men of his own faction opening the Gates unto him: but in the [2 of Maccab. 7.] the City is said to have been δουλωθεα, that is, taken by force of armes: and Josephus himself, in his first book, first Chap. of the wars of the Jews, doth not only say την πόλιν αμαρτι κειρασε: that he took the City by force; but also addeth, κατοικησαν δε αμαρτι τινες αλλοτριαι: that he was enraged with the remembrance of those things which he had endured in the siege. Moreover, that they of Jerusalem, whilst Antiochus besieged the City, made a rally out in arme, and were slain in the dispute; as the same Josephus affirmeth, in the sixth book of the same Works, [pag. 929.]

The City then being taken, and the souldier commanded to put all that they met to the sword, they cruelly raged against all sorts, of whatsoever Sex or Age: so that in the space of three dayes, there were 80 thousand men missing: whereof 40 thousand were slain, and as many others sold, [2 Maccab. 5. 11, 14.]

Antiochus, not contented herewith, presumed also to go into the Temple, having Menelaus that Traytor to the Laws and his own Country, for his guide; and with wicked hands, to seize upon the holy vessels, and whatsoever else was dedicated by other Kings to the glory and honour of the place, [Ib. 15, 16.] as the golden altar, the candlesticks of light, with all the vessels thereof; the table of the shew-bread, and the pouring vessels and the vials, and the centers of gold, and the vail, and the crowns, and the golden ornaments that were fastned to the Temple doors: he pulled o the gold from every thing that was covered with gold; and likewise took the silver, and lovely vessel, and all the hidden treasures which he found, [1 Maccab. 23, 24.]

Polybius Megapolitanus, Strabo Cappadox, Nicolaus Damaicenus, Timagenes Carior Chronographus; and Apollodorus, have written, that Antiochus being indigent of monies, brak his league, and assaulted the Jews his confederates and friends, and spoiled the Temple that was full of gold and silver, and found nothing there worthy of decision, [Joseph. contr. Apion. lib. 2.] For paying a great stipend to the Romans, he was almost necessarily compelled himself with great expences to gather monies by pillaging, and to omit no opportunity of spoiling. [Sever. Sulpic. Sac. Hist. lib. 2.] (Such notwithstanding as are enemies of the Jews) affirm, that many other things were here done by him in hatred of the Nation, and contempt of Religion; in the 34 book of Diodorus his Bibliotheca, and from thence in Photi. Bibliotheca. cod. 244.) thus repeated, Antiochus Epiphanes, having overcome the Jews, entered into the holy Oracle of God, whither the Priests only might lawfully have access: there he found a stone Statue of a man, with a long beard, holding a book in his hand, and sitting upon an Ass: which he thought to have been Moses, who built Jerusalem, and founded the Nation, and established those laws that are hateful unto all Nations. But he desiring to take away the odium of the Nations, endeavored to abrogate the laws. Therefore he sacrificed a great Sow to the Statue of the Founder (Moses) and the Altar of God, that stood in the open aire, and poured blood upon them: and seeing the flesh, commanded the holy bookes that contained their laws, to be marred and obliterated with the broth: but the immortal paper, as they term it, which always burned in the Temple, he commanded to be put out: and compelled (Menelaus) the Chief Priest, and other Jews, to eat swines flesh. Howbeit we oppose unto all the Calumnies of adversaries, that evident testimony of Strabo the Cappadocian, in the 16 book of his Geographie, where he commendeth the Jews, as just and religious persons. [Πρωτογενεσις η διαδοχικη ης ελαιοειδους βορρ, pag. 761.]

But that Antiochus, upon the taking of the City, did sacrifice (wine upon the Altar, and with the pottage made of their flesh, did sprinkle the Temple, even Josephus witnesseth, [Ib. 13. cap. 16.]

Antiochus carrying 1800 talents out of the Temple, speedily repaired to Antioch; leaving Governours to afflict the Nation; at Jerusalem, Philip, by birth a Phrygian, by manners a Barbarian: at Garizim in Samaria, Andronicus. Besides whom, Menelaus more proudly than all the rest, insulted over the Citizens; carrying a most malicious mind against the Jews, [2 Maccab. 5. 21, 23.]

The Embassadors of Asia, were heard in a Senate at Rome: the Milesians remembering that they had done nothing, promised that they were in a readinesse to perform whatsoever the Senate should command them in furthering the war against Persus. The Alabandenses remembred that they had erected the Temple of the City of Rome, and instituted anniversary Games unto that Godesse: that they brought a golden Crown of 50 pound weight, as a gift unto Jupiter, which they might place in the Capitol, and 300 shields for Horfemen, which they would deliver to whom they would command them. The same also the Lamplaceni, bringing a Crown of 80 pound weight, requested: declaring, how that they departed from Persus, after the Roman army came into Macedonia, whereas they were under the jurisdiction of Persus, and before of Philip: in request whereof, and for that they had yielded all things to the Roman Commanders, they requested, this only, that they might be received into the friendship of the Roman people; and if a peace should

Should be concluded with Perseus, that they might be excepted from being reduced into the power of the King. There was a civil answer returned unto the rest of the Legates. Quintus Mucienus the Pretor, was commanded to enroll the Lamproeci after the form of associates. Rewards were given to them all, amounting to the value of two thousand pieces of coin unto each. The Alabandenses were commanded to carry back the shields unto A. Hostilius the Consul, into Macedonia; [Liv. lib. 43.]

When it was appointed by the common consent of the Achæans, that all the honours of Eumenes which were misbecoming, and repugnant unto the laws, should be taken away; Sofigenes, and Diopithes, Rhodians, who about that time decided the suites of Law, being upon private cavies, offended with Eumenes, destroyed all his honours in the City of Peloponnesus, [Polyb. Legat. 74.]

Whist A. Hofilius the Proconul with his forces, had his winter quarters in Thellala, Attalus (who wintered at that time at Elatia) being certainly informed that his brother Eumenes took it most grievously, that by a public Decree, they had taken away his most splendid honours: after communication of the common Council of the Nation, the Prætor of the Achei, he sent Embassadors to the common Council of the Nation, who might negotiate with them touching the restoring of the honours unto the King again. Where, upon the petition of Polybius (the Historian) a Decree was made; wherein the Magistrates were commanded to renew all things that pertained unto the honour of Eumenes: useless there were somewhat amongst them, that did not well suite with the common interefle of the Acheans, or else were repugnant unto the Laws. Thus therefore Attalus at that time rectified those miscarriages which were rashly committed at Peloponnesus in the buisnes of his brother Eumenes his honour, [14.16. & in Excerpt. Valer. pag. 130, 131.]

At the beginning of the Spring, Q. Marcius Philippus, the Consul, was sent against Perseus. [Liv. lib. 44. init.]

A Decree was published by the Acheans, touching the dispatch of auxiliaries, to their power, unto Marcus the Consul, which was brought unto him by Polybius. There was sent also Theocritus an Embassador, from them unto Attalus, who might bring unto him that Decree, wherein the honours of Eumenes were restored unto him. At the same time when the news was brought unto the Acheans that the Anacleteria had been celebrated in honour of Ptolemy the King, as it is customary for the Kings of Egypt, when they come to the Legal age of their reign, offering it their duty to give intimations of their joy for what was done; they determined to send Embassadors, for the renewing of that friendship which was between the Nation of the Acheans, and the Kings of Egypt: Whereupon, immediately Alcibiades and Perdides were chosen. about, [Id. Legat. 78.]

Cholus: That time there was a wicked prank, and most abhorring from the institutions of the Greeks committed in the Island of Crete: for there being between the Cydonians and Apollonians, not only society, but the common right of friendship, when all the Laws and Rights of society which are esteemed Sacred amongst men, were common to them both: and when the Tables of that league ratified on each side by oath, being fastned upon the Image of Jupiter Idæus, were visibly to be looked upon: the Cydonians notwithstanding, in the time of peace, being received by the Apollonians as friends, trampling upon the Sacred bond of the league, surprized their City; and having put all the men to the sword, and spoiled their goods, they divided amongst themselves their wives, and children, and all their land, [Polyb. & Diodor. Sicul. in Excerpt. N. Aulicis, c. lvi. pag. 133. & 310.]

The Cydonians, being afraid of the Gortynians (by whom formerly their City was in great danger of being taken, when Nithoraxas endeavoured to surprize it) sent Embassadors upon Eumenes, requiring upon the score of their league, assistance from him. The King chiefe Leon Captaine, whom he dispatched speedily thither with a Band of 500 foouldiers. When thiose forces came, the Cydonians delivered the keys of the gates unto Leon, and committed the whole City to his charges, [Id. Legat. 79.]

When by the intigitation of Eula'us the Eunuch, there was a new war undertaken by Ptolemei for the recovery of Cæleſyria; Antiochus taking his third Expedition into Egypt, reduced it into his power, (Polyp. Ligar. 80, 81, 82.) for the Egyptians being dispersed, and driven away, when he could have put them all to the sword, riding about on horseback, he forbade them to be slain, and gave command, that they should be taken alive: for which humanity chiefly, he gained both Pelscum, and a little while afterward all Egypt. (Dioid. Sicul. in Excerptis, Valsci. pag. 320.)

Whilest the contrary factions at Rhodes increased dayly more and more, after that they had heard that at Rome it was decreed by the Senate, That from thenceforth those things were to be performed, not which their own Magistrates, but the Senate should command; by the perswasion of Philophon, and Theareus, at the beginning

Marcus Figulus the Admiral of the fleet Agelipolis, Arifton, and Pancrates ; all theſe were commanded to renew amity with the Roman people, and to anfwer unto the accuſations wherewith ſome endeavour to lead the City. But Hegelochus was moreover enjoined to requeſt liberty of carrying forth corn. Agelipolis overtook Q. Marcus ſcamping at Heraclea in Macedonia. To whom when he had delivered his commands, the Conſul did not only ſay that he gave no credit unto ſuch that were detractors of the Rhodians, but alſo exhorted the Ambaſſadors not to endure any of thoſe that ſhould dare to taſſle any thing of the Romans, and abundantly performed many offices of humanity unto them : he wrote alſo of the ſame affairs unto the Roman people. But when Agelipolis was wondrously taken with the courteſie of the Conſul, Marcus taking him aſide unto private conference, ſaid, That he admired that the Rhodians did not endeavour to reconcile the Kings that fought for Cæſariſia, for it was chiefly conducing unto themſelves. Afterwards Agelipolis went unto Caius, the Admiral of the fleet, and being kindly entertained by him, yea, and far more ſweetly than he was by Marcus the Conſul, he in a ſhort time returned unto Rhodes : where, after that he had given an account of his Ambaſſage, when as both the Roman Commanders ſeemed to contend equally in declaring their courteſie, and humanity with words, and ſignifying their favour in their anfwer, all the Rhodians began to be lifted up in their minds, and to be ſwollen with vain hope ; but not all in the ſame manner : for the more ſolid party were exceeding joyfull, for the benignity of the Romans : but ſuch as affected novelty, and were ill diſpoſed unto the preſent ſtate, they concluded in their thoughts, That this wonderful great and exceſſive civility of the Romans, was a ſigne, That they were terrified with the imminent danger, and that affairs did not ſucceed according unto their mind. But after that it had fallen out, moreover, That Agelipolis had ſpoken out amongſt ſome, That he was privately commanded by Marcus, to make a propoſition in the Senate of the Rhodians, of compounding an agreement between the Kings : then aſſuredly Dino made no queſtion but the affairs of the Romans were in a moſt evil condition : therefore there were even Ambaſſadors ſent to Alexandria, to conclude the war that was commenced between Antiochus, and Ptolemei. [Polye. Legat. Ro.]

Towards the end of the summer, Hegelochus and other Ambassadors of the Rhodians, returning to Rome, were entertained with all kind of humanity, and courtship. But it was most manifestly known, that the Rhodians were divided with civill differences: Whilſt Agathagetus, Philophron, Rhodophon, and Theretus, placed all their hopes in the Romans; on the contrary, Dindo, and Polyaratus in Perſeus, and the Macedonians: from whence it came frequently to paſſe, that the matters that came to bedebated, being diſputed apoſtrophely on either ſide, & with different judgements, ſuch as had a mind to diſparage the City, took from thence an occaſion. Howbeit, the Senators pretended that no ſuch matters were known unto them; who notwithstanding well underſtood all the matters that: were tranſacted by them; however, they granted licence unto them for the exportation of an hundred thouſand bullocks of bread-corn out of Sicillie, [Id. Legat. 64, 73. & 80.]

After that Egypt was possessed by Antiochus, upon the debates of Comanus, and Cineas with King Ptolemei, touching the main matters, it seemed expedient to conclude, That there should a Council be enrolled out of the most principal Captains, by whose sentence all things from thence forward should be dispatched. Unto that Council it seemed behoofull in the first place, That such forreigners of the Greeks, who should happily be found there, should go Ambassadors to Antiochus, to negotiate with him, concerning a peace, [Id. Legat. 81.]

...mily concerning a party, to place two Abassadors sent from the nation of the Achai: one for the renewing of friendship with the King, which was committed unto Alcithus, son to Xenoph^{us} of Agge, and Psafidas: another concerning the contention of the Antagonists: there was sent also from the Athenians an Embassage, touching a certain donation, the principal person wherein was Demaratus. Moreover there were two sacred Embassages from the same men; one touching the feast of Minerva, called Panathena^e, the chief whereof was Callias the Pancratiaff or conquerour at the games, the other touching mystics, which was discharged by Cleofthras, who upon that argument spake an oration unto the King; there were present from Miletum Eudemus and Icticius, from Clazomene, Apollonides, and Apollonius, [ib.]

Together with these, Ptolemei the King sent his own Ambassadors, Tiepolemus, and Ptolemei the Rhetorician : who laying against stream, came unto Antiochus. He receiving them courteously invited them the first day unto a sumptuous feast; & the next day gave them the liberty of a personall conference, and commanded them to publish their commissions : in the first place therefore, spake the Ambassadors of the Achæans

		which, they had broken off against their wills, not upon any provocation of his against themselves, but because it pleased the Romans to draw them into the society of the war: That now the third year, they felt many inconveniences of that war; That upon the blocking up of the sea, their Island was pressed with poverty, their revenues that came by sea, and their victuals being lost: when they could no longer endure this, That they had sent other Embassadors unto Macedonia unto Perseus, who might declare unto him, That the Rhodians were contented that he should make up a peace with the Romans, and that themselves were sent, to signify so much to Rome, That the Rhodians should consider, what ought to be done against them, in whom the fault should be found of not concluding the war. Claudius Quadrigarius saith, That there was no answer given unto these persons: only there was recited a decree of the Senate, wherein the Roman people denounced, That the Carians and Lycians were free, and that letters should immediately be dispatched unto both nations, that they might understand so much. Which thing being heard, That the principal person of the Embassadors, whose high language the Senate a little before had scarce received, fell down astonished: Others say, that it was answered, That the Roman people even in the beginning of the war, had been assured by no vain authors, That the Rhodians had entertained secret debates with Perseus the King against their Common-wealth; and if it had been doubtful formerly, yet the Legates words a little before, had made it certain; and that fraud for the most part, though it be more wary at the beginnings, discovereth it self, that they would consider what was to be done by them; what the Rhodians were about to consider, themselves knew, That assuredly the people of Rome, when Perseus should be overcome, (which they hoped would shortly be) would take care to make condign requital according to the merits of each City in that war: howbeit, a reward of two thousand pieces of coin was sent unto each of the Embassadors, which they accepted not. [Id. ibid.] But Dion giveth this account of the business. King Perseus requested peace from the Romans, and had obtained the same, except the Rhodians, fearing lest the Romans should have wanted an adversary, had joyntly their Embassadors with the Embassadors of Perseus, for by them (the Legates of the Rhodians) nothing that was moderate, and such as became those to speak as requested a peace, was propounded; and so as it they had not so much requested a peace for Perseus, as given it unto him, they both proudly spoke other things, and also at last threatened, That they would, with the rest, assault them by war, by whole fault the peace should not be made. Whereby it came to passe, that, whereas they were not unsuspected by the Romans before, they rendered themselves more hateful, and hindered Perseus from obtaining a peace. [Dion. Legat. 19. et. 20.] About the beginning of the Consulship of L. Emilius Paulus, and C. Licinius, the Alexandrian Embassadors from Ptolemei and Cleopatra, Princesses, were called into the Senate: being clad with white apparel, and having both long beards and hair, when they had entered into the Senate with Olive-branches, they prostrated themselves: and making lamentation, they entreated the Senate, That they would give their assistance unto a kingdom, and Princesses that were in amity with them. [Liv. lib. 44.] When the Senate had understood by them, That Antiochus, having seized upon the rest of Egypt, did still remain there, that he might be matter of Alexandria also; supposing that the greatness of this King did somewhat concern them, they decreed an Embassy, both for the making of a peace, and also for the viewing in general, what the face of affairs was in that place. [Polyb. Legat. 90.] Immediately therefore, the fathers sent C. Popillius Lenas, C. Decimius, and C. Hostilius, Embassadors, to conclude the war between the Kings, they were commanded to go first to Antiochus, then to Ptolemei, and declare, if they obtained not from war, which of them should be the cause thereof, they should not esteem him for a friend or a confederate. [Liv. lib. 44.] These with the Embassadors from Alexandria, having taken their journey within three dayes, there came Embassadors from Macedonia on the last of the Quinquatria, that is, of the feast of Minerva's birth day: who among other things, related, That Eumenes and his fleet, as ships brought with a tempest, without any cause, both came and departed, neither did the mind of that King seem sufficiently constant, and as they said all things doubtful, of Eumenes, to they declared the extraordinary constant fidelity of Attalus. [Id. ib.] The time when the Embassadors, sent into Egypt, departed from Rome in an ancient Diary of this year (which Pighius hath inserted into the second Tome of his Annals in the 585 year of the City) is found thus expressed, The third day before the Nones of April, C. Popillius Lenas, C. Decimius, C. Hostilius are sent Ambassadors to the Kings

		of Syria and Egypt, for the taking up the war between them: the Embassadors early in the morning with a troop of their Client and kindred, sacrificed in the Temple of Castor, unto the household gods of P. R. they offered a Bull, and so concluded their sacrifice. Howbeit, the third day, before the Nones of April, as the year at Rome then stood, answered unto the twenty third of our January, according the Julian account: as we gather from the Edicple of the Moon, which tell our five months afterwards. After that Antiochus with his army had returned into Syria, Ptolemei Philometor, prudently considering the danger that hung over his head, by reason of him, left not off sending to Alexandria, unto Cleopatra his sister first, and then to Evergetes his brother, and his friends, until he had confirmed a peace with them; his sister extraordinarily assisting him, not only by advice, but also by entreaties. A peace therefore being made with common consent, returning from Memphis, and being received into Alexandria, he reigned together with his brother, not so much as the multitude opposing themselves: which in the war, not only by the siege, but also after it was raised from their walls, had been brought low through the want of all things, because no supply had been brought to them out of Egypt. [Liv. lib. 45. cum Polyb. Legat. 89.] Whereas it was meet that Antiochus should have rejoiced hereupon, if he had brought his army into Egypt for his restaurations sake, he was so offended, that he more eagerly and maliciously prepared war against them both, than formerly he had against the one of them: and thereupon presently sent his fleet unto Cyprus, which in a fight overthrew the Egyptian ships there, and the Captains of Ptolemei. [Liv. lib. 45. Polyb. Legat. 92.] Both Ptolemei's brethren, having at that time the Crown and Kingly power, forasmuch as they were destitute of all kind of aid, sent Eumenes, and Dionysiodorus, Embassadors, unto the nation of the Achaeans, to request 1000 foot men, and 400 horsemen, and that Lycortas might be Captain of all the auxiliary forces, and his son Polybius of the horse men, they wrote also to Theodoridas the Sicyonian, to hire a thousand mercenary fouldiers. [Polyb. Legat. 89. et. 91.] Perseus King of the Macedonians, and Gennus King of the Slavonians, being united in league together, by giving pledges on either side, decreed, That Embassadors should be sent to Rhodes, hoping that the City, in whose only power the glory of shipping then was, might by the authority of two Kings be incited unto the war against the Romans. The Embassadors were sent unto Thessalonica, &c. commanded to be in a readiness to take ship: at that place was Metrodorus, who came lately from Rhodes, and affirmed that by the authority of Dion, and Polyaratus, principal men of the City, the Rhodians were prepared for war; for as amongst the the Coans, Hippocritus and Diomedon brethren, so amongst the Romans, Dino and Polyaratus have been bold to speak for the Macedonians, and accuse the Romans, and publicly advise a conjunction with Perseus. This Metrodorus was made the chief person of this confederate Embassy with the Slavonians. [Polyb. Legat. 85. et in Excerptis Valefii, pag. 137. Liv. lib. 44.] Perseus, having sent Teternastus the Cretian, Ambassador to Antiochus, advised him not to let slip the present opportunity, nor to think that the pride and indolent injunctious of the Romans pertained unto him alone, but rather that he should be assisted to run the same hazard of fortune himself also within a short time, except he now afforded his assistance unto him, in the chief place by composing the difference, and settling a peace, or at least, if that might not be by contributing his help. [Polyb. Legat. 85. Liv. lib. 44.] At the same time also, Perseus sent Cryphonter (for so the Collections of Polybius name him, whom the printed Copies of Livie call Eropontes) Ambassador unto Eumenes, who had formerly discharged two Embassies unto the same person. [Id. ibid.] surely by the proffer of money he solicited Eumenes, That he should either take his part, or reconcile him unto the people of Rome, or assist neither side; hoping that he should obtain one of these things, or at least by that sollicitation procure (which indeed he attained) that Eumenes should become suspected unto the Romans. But Eumenes despised the friendship of Perseus, &c. for the making of a peace demanded 1500 talents, and to remain neutral to both, 1000, Perseus promised to give the sum required for the procurement of a peace, but not before hand; howbeit, he would depose it in the Temple at Samothrace, until the peace were concluded. [Appian, Macedonic. in Excerptis Valefii, p. 562.] But such that Island was within his own jurisdiction, Eumenes saw that it signified no more than if the money had been at Pella, and insisted hereupon, That he should bring part of the money for the present, which not obtaining, Cryphon, their secret debates being unknown, returned home: that the negotiation had been concerning the redemption of captives, both themselves noised abroad and Eumenes, for the avoiding ing of suspicion, informed the Consul to the same purpose. [Livie, lib. 44.]

The Rhodians disagreeing between themselves, and that party prevailing in their assemblies which was inclined to Perseus, it seemed good that Embassadors should be sent to compound the war between Perseus and the Romans: the chief presidents therefore of their Councils immediately dispatched Embassadors unto Rome, Agelipolis and Cleombrotus, but to the Consul and Perseus, Damon, Nicoftratus, Agelochus, and Telephus; they sent also Embassadors unto Crete, to renew friendship with all the Cretians: and to advise them to have an eye to the condition of the times, and the imminent danger, and that agreeing with the people of Rhodes, they should esteem the same as foe and friend, which they should do: there were sent also unto each City, who might entreat with them touching the same affairs. [Polyb. Legat. 86.]

The Embassadors of the Ptolemeis, the Kings, whilst it was yet Winter, coming into Peloponnesus, after that in an Assembly of the Achæans celebrated at Corinth they had renewed their ancient friendship, which they signified by many arguments one towards another; and had presented unto their view the afflicted condition of the Kings, requesting aide: the multitude were in a readinesse to give their assistance, not with a part of their Forces, but if need should require, with all their strength. Howbeit, Calliocrates, and Diphaneus, and Hyperebatonius, opposed this judgement: against whom, Lycortas and Polybius discounting, exhorted the Achæans, that being mindful of their engagements and courtesies received, but especially of their oath, they should keep the laws of Confederacy. But when the multitude had again joyntly agreed that assistance should be given; Calliocrates frustrated that debate, terrifying the Magistrates, because the laws gave no liberty in such like assemblies, to deliberate of auxiliaries. [Polyb. Legat. 89.]

A little while afterwards, a Council being called in the City of the Sicyonians, in the which, not only the Magistrates were present, but all that were above 30 years of age; after many debates had passed, a carrier was brought by Calliocrates immediately after his arrival directly into the Theatre, bringing forged letters from Q. Marcus the Proconsul; wherein he was feigned to exhort the Achæans, that complying with the desire of the Romans, they would endeavour to reconcile the Kings together: and thereupon Embassadors were sent from the Achæans, Archon of Egira, Arcellus and Aristot Megapolitanes, to make a peace between Ptolemeis, the Kings, and Antiochus: at which King Polybius being incensed with indignation, withdrew himself from the care, and administration of affairs: and the Embassadors from Alexandria having lost the hope of assistance, returned home. [Id. ibid. & Legat. 91.]

Perseus, having his winter quarters at Bila, drew his Forces into Ionia, whereby he might intercept the bread-corn that was conveyed from thence unto the Romans, [Appian, ut. sup. pag. 565.] Antenor and Callippus the Admirals of the Navy, with 40 small boats and five larger vessels called Prisies (from the likeness of the ships named, which they do resemble) he sent unto Tenedos: that being from thence dispersed by the Cycladas, Islands, they might secure the ships that came with bread-corn into Macedonia: the ships being brought to Cassandrea, after that they had first arrived at the havens which lie under the Mountain Athos; and from thence with a calme sea, at Tenedos; sent away the Rodians open vessels, and Eudemus their President without violation, nay even civilly entreated. But being afterwards informed that 50 burden-vessels of their friends were shut in by the beaked ships of Eumenes under the conduct of Damius, at the very mouth of the haven at Mount Athos, having dispersed their enemies, they brought them forth and sent them with the conduct of ten small vessels into Macedonia. [Liv. lib. 44.]

Those small vessels on the ninth day afterwards, returned unto the Fleet lying at Sigæum: which from thence sailed to Subota (an Island lying between Elea, and Athos) howbeit the next day after that they came thither, 35 ships which they call Hippagogi, or vessels for the conveyance of horses, Ferry-boats coming from Elea with French Horsemen, and horses (sent from Eumenes to Attalus) were bound for Phæne, a Promontory of the Chians, from whence they might put over into Macedonia. Antenor, having loosed from Subota, between the Promontory of Erythra; and that of Chios where the sea is most straight, suddenly light upon these: and when there was no hope of resisting, part of them which were near unto the shoar of the Continent swum into Erythra: part, hoying up sail, threw their ships upon Chios, and leaving their horses behind them, posted a main unto the City. But when the small vessels had disembarked their armed men nearer unto the City, and at a more convenient place of landing, the Macedonians having gotten the Frenchmen into their power, slew some of them as they fled in the way, and others being intercepted before the gate. There were slain of the Galls well nigh 800 (or 700 as Gruters edition hath it) and 200 taken alive. The horses were partly (the ships being broken) consumed in the sea,

sea, and partly houghed by the Macedonians on the shoar. Antenor commanded the same ten vessels which he had sent before, to convoy 20 of the starcled horses with the captives unto Thessalonica, and as soon as they possibly could, to return to the Fleet; he would expect them at Phæne. The Navy lay almost three dayes before the City, from thence they went unto Phæne; and being carried over in the 10 vessels (returned before they were expected) they passed thorough the Ægean Sea unto Delos, [Id. ibid.]

Whilst these things were doing, the Roman Embassadors, C. Popilius, C. Decimus, and C. Hostilius, having come from Chalcis, after that they had arrived at Delos with three Gallies of five ranks of oars; found there 40 ships of the Macedonians; and five Gallies of King Eumenes with five ranks of oars. The faculty of the Temple, and the Island, gave security unto all persons. The Romans therefore and the Macedonians being mingled together, and the sea-confederates of Eumenes, the religion of that place making a Truce, were conversant in the Temple, [Id. ibid.]

Antenor, Perseus his Admiral, when there was intimation from the watch-towers, that ships of carriage were discovered at sea; pursuing himself with part of the shipping, the other part being disposed about the Cyclades, either sunk or spoiled all the ships, except such as were bound for Macedonia. Popilius, or the Navy of Eumenes, succoured as many as they could; and being conveyed by night in two or three vessels for the most part, deceived the Macedonians, [Id. ibid.]

About that time, the Embassadors of Gentius, King of the Slavonians, Parmenio and Morcus, and together with these, Metrodorus (Embassador) of Perseus, came to Rhodes: whole authority was encircled, not only by the approach of the Frigots which passed up and down by the Cyclades, and the Ægean Sea, and by the multitude of the Horsemen which were slain; but also by the very conjunction of Perseus and Gentius, and the rumor of the Galatians, Horle and Foot, coming with a great number. These things indeed gave courage unto Dinon and Polyaratus, who were for Perseus his intercess; but, on the contrary, dejected Thæteus. It was decreed therefore by the Rhodians, to give a friendly answer unto both the Kings; and to signify unto them: That they had resolved by the interposition of their authority, to put a period to the war; and consequently to admonish them, to be inclinable to a peace. Moreover the Embassadors of Gentius were entreated with much civility in their public place of Assembly, [Id. ibid. Polyb. Legat. 9.]

At the beginning of the Spring, Antiochus: with his army, marching for Egypt, came into Crete, about Rhinocolura; unto the Embassadors of Ptolemei, Philometor rendering thanks unto him, for that by his means he had received his paternal kingdom, and requesting, That he would maintain his own right, and rather speak what he would have done, than changing from a confederate to an enemy, proceed by violence, and armes; he gave this answer: That he would upon no other terms revoke his Fleet, and reduce his army, unless he would surrender unto him all Cyprus, and Pelusium, and the field that was adjacent unto that mouth of the Nile, called Pelusiack; and he fixed a day within which he might receive an answer, [Livie, lib. 45.]

Antiochus dispatched Apollonius Overseer for the Collection of his Tribute (called by Josephus μυσιταγης in the 12 book of his Antiquities, cap. 7, μυσταγης in the 2 of the Maccab. 5, 24.) with an army of 22 thousand into the Cities of Judea; two compleat years after that he had spoiled the Temple at Jerusalem, commanding them to put to death all the young men that were come to years of maturity and in full strength, but to sell the women and younger lots, [1 Maccab. 1, 30. 2 Maccab. 5, 24.]

After that Apollonius was come to Hierusalem, without any shew of hostility, he restrained himself unto the Sabbath Day; on which he destroyed all that came to discharge religious duties, and marching with his Forces about the City, he put to death a great multitude: and taking the spoiles of the City, he set it on fire, and pulled down the houses, and the walls round about: They led away also captive the women and children, and seized on the cattle, [1 Maccab. 1, 31, 34. 2 Maccab. 5, 25, 26.] Josephus, [in the 12 book of his Antiquities and the seventh chap.] ascribing unto Antiochus himself, those things that were done by his ministers, affirmeth him; After the sacking of the whole City, partly to have slain the inhabitants, and partly to have led them away captive, together with their children and wives, to the number of ten thousand.

Judas Maccabeus also, departing with nine others, spent his life in the mountains after the manner of wild beasts together with his companions, who continued to feed on herbs, lest they should be partakers of the pollution, [1 Maccab. 5, 27.] or of the prohibited meates, or of the idolatry, or of the contamination also, and the defolation of the Sanctuary which ensued thereupon; [1 Maccab. 1, 39, 41.] which was three years and six months before the restitution and purification thereof, made afterwards by the same Judas Maccabæus, [1 Maccab. 4. 43, 54.] For which space of time Josephus intimates the City of Jerusalem to have been oppressed by Antiochus in the Preface of his books concerning the Jewish war, and the service of the daily sacrifice to have ceased in the first book, and first chap. and the Sanctuary to have been desolate in the sixth book of the same Work (pag. 929.) the same author sheweth; who declareth also that last point, touching the time of the desolation of the Sanctuary, as Hippolytus affirmeth, [Caten. Græc. in Danieli, chap. 8.]

Afterwards they built in the City of David, or Sion, a great wall, fenced with strong Towers, which was unto them in the place of a Citadel; and a Garrison of wicked persons being placed therein, they reposed there the spoils of Jerusalem: and forasmuch as there were plots there contrived against such as frequented the Temple, and innocent blood was shed and the Sanctuary defiled; the inhabitants of Jerusalem fled and the City became an habitation of strangers; and strange to her own Natives, her children forsaking her, [1 Maccab. 1. 35, 40.]

The Embassadors of the Rhodians came into the Camp of the Romans, with the same instructions, touching peace, which at Rome highly incensed the fathers, they were heard with much more discontent by the Council of war: Howbeit, when some would have had them violently forced out of the Camp, the Council declared, That it would give them answer after fifteen days: in the mean time, that it might appear at what rate the authority of the Rhodians interceding for peace was esteemed, they began to debate of the means how to manage the war, [Livie lib. 44.]

The day before Perseus was overcome, C. Sulpicius Gallus tribune of the soldiers of the second Legion, by the permission of L. Emilius Paulus the Consul, calling the soldiers together, declared unto them, that the ensuing night, left any should be astonished at the strangeness thereof, the Moon should suffer an eclipse from two of the clock in the night, until four; which being a thing that by the course of nature comes to pass at set times, it might be known before, he said, and likewise foretold; and therefore ought not to be lookt upon as a prodigy, [Id. lib. 44.] which a while afterward, as Pliny writes, he taught in a treatise composed thereupon, [lib. 2. cap. 12.] where he reporteth this man to be the first of the Roman nation, who published unto the world, the reason of the Sun and Moon's Eclipses; of whom Cato in Cicero's books of old age, thus speaketh: We did behold Scipio, Gallus, the intimate acquaintance of your father (Emilius Paulus) even to macerate himself unto death in his endeavours of measuring almost the Heavens and the Earth: how oft did the morning surprise him, when he began to delineate any thing at night? and how oft did the night come upon him, when he began in the morning? how was he delighted when he foretold unto us the Eclipse of the Sun and Moon, a great while before they came to pass?

The night which did precede the day before the Nones of September, when the Moon was eclipsed at the appointed hour, it seemed unto the Roman soldiers to be almost a divine thing: but it affected the Macedonians as a bad Omen portending the fall of their kingdom, and the mischief of their nation, [Livie lib. 44. cum Justin. lib. 33. cap. 1. Valer. Maxim. lib. 8. cap. 11. Jul. Frontin. Strategemata, lib. 1. cap. 12.] The Astronomical account sheweth, That the total darknes of the Moon, fell out upon the 1 day of June, according to the Julian account, the eighth hour after noon, this year, in Macedonia: when the soldiers would have given their bodies unto sleep, and rest in the night, as Plutarch hath it in his Paulus Emilius. Whence it is inferred, That the Ides of March, on this year, whereon Paulus entered upon his second Consulship, fell out upon the fourth day of January, according to the Julian reckoning.

The day following, Perseus being overthrown, [1 Maccabees 8. 5.] the kingdom of the Macedonians determined: when from Caranus it had stood for the space of 626 years. Howbeit, the reliques of the Macedonian Empire, while the Roman was rising, did yet survive in the Seleucus of Syria, and the Ptolemei of Egypt.

The third day after the fight, Perseus, with about five hundred Cretians, came by flight unto Amphipolis in Thracia; but, being not admitted by the Amphipolitans, when their money, both gold and silver, was brought unto the ships which abode in Strymon, he also himself came unto the river. Unto the Cretians, that were drawn the hope of money, out of his peculiar treasury, he delivered Cups, and goblets, with other gold and silver vessels, amounting to the value of 50 talents, which, being placed on the bank, he left to be caught up by them, from this scrambling, whilst they tumultuously went a ship-board, they sank one of the vessels, laden with a multitude of people, in the very mouth of the river. On that day he came unto Galipus, or Alepus, on the morrow unto the Island Samothrace, with two thousand talents; and humbly beset himself unto the Temple of Castor and Pollux, [Livie, lib. 44. cum Pintarcho, in Paulo Emilio.]

When

When the fame of the Roman victory had come into Asia, Antenor, who with a Fleet of Frigates waited at the Phanæ, sailed from thence into Cassandria, [Livie lib. 45.]

C. Popilius, who lay at Delos for a safeguard unto the ships that were bound for Macedonia: after that he had heard of the success in Macedonia, and the removal of the enemies Frigates out of their Station, he also himself, having dismissed the Attick ships, proceeded to sail for Egypt, that he might discharge the Embassy: which he had undertaken: to the end that he might first meet with Antiochus, before he came to the walls of Alexandria. After that the Embassadors had passed Asia, and were come into Loryma, which is an Haven above 20 miles distant from Rhodus, directly opposite against the City, the principal persons of the Rhodians (for even thither also had the rumour of the victory been brought) met them, entreating them to put in at Rhodus; for they said, That it concerned the honour, and safety of the City, that they should understand all things which had before been transacted and were then in agitation at Rhodus; and declare at Rome, what was known to themselves, not what was bruited by fame: though they refused a great while, yet at length they forced them to suffer a short interruption of their voyage for the safety of a confederate City: and after they were arrived at Rhodus, the same persons by their entreaties drew them into their public Assembly, [Id. lib. 46.]

The coming of the Legates rather encreased than diminished the fear of the Citizens; for Popilius repeated all things, which all and every of them had spoken, or done in a hostile manner, during the time of the war; and being a man of a loose disposition, he aggravated the grievousness of the things that had been spoken with a stern countenance and criminating voice; so that, whereas there was no ground of his private displeasure against the City, they might grieve by the bitterness of one single Roman Senator, how the whole Senate stood affected toward them: The speech of C. Decimius more mild, who in most of the things alleged by Popilius, said, That the fault was not the peoples, but such sticking men that stirred them up: that those kind of persons, setting their tongue to sale, had framed decrees full of Court-flattery, and had dispatched such Embassages, whereof the Rhodians were no little ashamed, than penitent for: all which, had the people power in their own hands, would fall upon the heads of the guilty. He was heard with great approbation, no less because he charged the fault upon the authors, than that he extenuated the crime of the people. When therefore the principal persons replied unto the Romans, their speech was in no wise acceptable, who endeavoured to purge the crimes objected by Popilius, as theirs, who agreed with Popilius in exposing the authors unto punishment for the expiation of the crime: and thereupon those Rhodians, who before carried such high minds, as if they had conquered, as well Philip, as Antiochus, and were Superior in strength to the Romans themselves, were brought into such terror, that even in the presence of the Embassadors, there was a Decree suddenly made, That whosoever should be convinced to have spoken or done any thing in the behalf of Perseus, against the Romans, should be condemned to death. Some upon the approach of the Romans withdrew themselves out of the City, others laid violent hands upon themselves: the Embassadors staying not above five days at Rhodus, went unto Alexandria. Neither were the judgements grounded upon the Decree made before them, lest slowly put in execution; which resolution in performing that business, the Clemency of Decimius did procure, [Id. ibid. cum Dion. Legat. 20. al. 21.]

After that the news of Perseus his flight had been brought unto Rome, it seemed good unto the Senate that the Rhodian Embassadors, who came to make up a peace with Perseus, should be called before their Assembly: the Embassadors, of whom Agelipolis was the chief, having entered into the Senate, said, That they were sent to make an end of the war, which would be grievous and inconvenient unto all Greece, costly and hurtful unto the Romans themselves. Now, seeing it was concluded, in such sort as the Rhodians always desired; they did congratulate it unto them. When Agelipolis had briefly (spoken these words) he departed out of the Assembly. The Senate, making use of that occasion, seeing that they purposed to disgrace openly the Rhodians, and make them an example, made this reply. That the Rhodians dispatched that Embassy, neither in regard of the advantages of Greece, nor of the experience of the Roman people, but in the behalf of Perseus; for if their care had been such as was pretended, Embassadors would then have been sent, when Perseus having drawn his army into Thessaly, for the space of two years, partly besieged, and partly, by denouncing war, terrified the Cities of Greece. At that time there was no mention of peace made by the Rhodians: but after that they had heard, that the Woodes were got over, and that the Romans had passed into Macedonia, and that Perseus was closely environed, the Rhodians sent their Embassy: to no other end, but that they might deliver Perseus out of his imminent danger: wherefore the fathers judgement was,

I i 2

That

That they ought not to bestow the accustomed rewards, or any benefit no nor a courteous answer unto the Embassadors, [Polyb. Legat. 88. Liv. lib. 45.]

Those, who being sent from Rhodes by Dinon to Perseus as an interuncio, had often failed into Macedonia; affairs now being turned, fled for fear into Cnidus. And when the Cnidians had secured him in safe custody, upon the vindication of the Rhodians, he was returned into Rhodes again; where, upon examination, having confessed all, he fully consented unto all the notes of the letters which had been intercepted, and to the Epistles sent to and again, both from Dinon, and also from Perseus: where-with Dinon being convinced (for an example to others,) he was executed, [Polyb. in Excerpt. Valesii, pag. 137, 138.]

Cn. Octavius, who together with Paulus Æmilius, managed the Macedonian war, upon the arrival of his Fleet at Samothrace, being touched with the reverence of Caesar and Pollux, left Perseus unassaulted, but yet he debarr'd him from the sea, and secured him from escaping, [Plutarch in P. Æmilio.] And whilst he endeavoured to draw him to a surrender, sometimes by threatenings, sometimes by hopes; a business whether accidental or contrived by deliberation, assisted him therein. L. Attilius an illustrious young man, when he saw the people of Samothrace assembled together, by the permission of the Magistrate, complained that the supposed sanctity of the Island was violated by the presence of Euander the Creian: who having almost compassed the death of King Eumenes at Delphos, did now together with Perseus, defend himself by the refuge of the Temple. Hereupon Theonides, who was the chief Magistrate amongst them (whom they call King) seeing himself, and the whole Island in the power of the Romans, demanded of Perseus, that Euander should be given up unto trial: which when Perseus disliked, because he saw that the crime being discovered, would be devolved upon himself, he procured that Euander should be slain: and corrupted Theonides with money, to declare unto the people, that Euander had made away himself with his own hands. Howbeit by so wicked a prank against his only friend that remained, and had been known to him in so many enterprizes, he alienated the affections of all that were with him; and when every one for his own security betook himself to the Romans, he was forced to bethink himself how to make his escape, [Liv. lib. 45.]

Wherefore Perseus secretly dealt with Oroandes the Creian, to whom the coast of Thrace was well known, because he had used traffick in that Country, that receiving him into a Frigate (which did ride at the Promontory Demetrias) he should convey him to Corys the King of the Thracians. About the time of Sun-set there was as much money brought to the Frigate, as could be secretly conveyed: which being received, Oroandes, making use of a Creian feat, as soon as it was dark, looting from the hoar, bent thorough the Main unto Crete: afterwards about midnight wretched Perseus let down himself, his children, and his wife, not acquainted with travels and wandering, out of a straight window by a wall; and when the ship was not found in the Haven, after that he had awhile walked on the hoar, at length fearing the light, now approaching, he betook himself to a darke corner in the side of the Temple, [Liv. & Plutarch, ut supra.]

After that, by the command of Octavius the Prætor, it was published, by the Cryer, That the royal Youth (the children of Princes that were chosen to attend upon the King) and other Macedonians, who were of Samothrace, if they would come over to the Romans, should preserve their safety, and liberty, and all that they had, which was either about them, or which they had left behind in Macedonia; they all came over, and gave up their names to C. Posthumus the Tribune of the soldiers. Ion also the Thessalonian surrendered up the young children of the King, which had been committed to his trust, unto Octavius; neither was any of the children left with the King, except Philippus the eldest. Thereupon he surrendered himself and his son to Octavius: fondly accusing fortune, and the gods, in whose Temple he was, because they afforded their supplicant no assistance. He was commanded to be put aboard in the Prætorian ship, where also the money that remained was carried; and forthwith the Fleet went back unto Amphipolis, [ibid.]

Antiochus, coming to possess Pelusium, when he had passed over the River Leufines (which place is four miles distant from Alexandria) met with the Roman Embassadors: whom when upon their approach, he had saluted, and reached forth his right hand unto Popilius, he delivered unto him the Tables which he held in his hands, concerning that Decree of the Senate, whereby he was commanded immediately to conclude the war against Ptolemei; and enjoyed him, that before he did any thing else, he should read it. When he had read over the Tables, and said, That he would consult with his friends, what he ought to do; Popilius with a vine-twig which he had in his hand, encircled the King, and commanded him before he went out of the ring, which he had described, to return his answer to the Tables. The King being astonished with that that, unusual and imperious action, after that he had demurred a while, saith, I will do what the Romans command. Whereupon at length Popilius reached forth his right hand unto the King, as to a confederate and friend. Thereupon, the space of a few dayes and those prefixedly numbered, being granted, Antiochus full bore against his mind, and not without sighing, however, yet withdrew his forces into Syria (for instead of Antiochus, in Polybius we suppose Antiochus ought to be substituted out of Livie) seeming it expedient to give place unto the times for the present. [*Polyb. Legat. 92. & Liv. lib. 45. cum Cicero in Philippica 8^a. Velleio Paterculo lib. 1. cap. 10. Valer. Maximo, lib. 6. cap. 4. Justin. lib. 34. cap. 3. Appiano in Syriac. pag. 131. The Samaritans, seeing the Jews most miserably oppressed by Antiochus, professed themselves to be by descent Sidonians, and thereupon obtained letters from Antiochus to Apollonius his President, and Nicanor the Kings Steward, that they should not be involved jointly into the common condition of the Jews; and that the Garizitine Temple, as yet not honoured with the title of any god should from thenceforth be called by the name Antiochus, or of the Grecian Jupiter: there is extant touching this business a supplicatory Epistle of the Samaritans in Josephus his 12th book of Antiquities; the seventh Chapter, with the answer of Antiochus, dated year the 46, (but I know not from what Epoch the account is drawn) the 18 day of the month Hecatombeon.

After that Antiochus had departed out of Egypt, the Roman Embassadors by their authority confirmed the union between the two brethren, who were scarce yet well agreed, [Liv. lib. 45.] C. Popilius requested as a boone from the King, the enlargement of Menalcidus, the Lacedemonian, who had actively made such of the pressing and necessitous times of the Kings to the encreasing of his own private estate; but he commanded them to send Polyaratus, who had been a chief favourer of Perseus his party at Rhodes, to Rome: and Menalcidus was indeed dismissed; but there was a demur made concerning Polyaratus: for Ptolemei reverencing as well Polyaratus as his Country, did by no means determine to send him to Rome, but rather unto Rhodes; which Polyaratus himself also requested. Being embarked therefore in a small vessel, and delivered to the custody of one of his friends, named Demetrius, he designed him unto Rhodes, writing letters also unto the Rhodians touching his transportation. Howbeit Polyaratus arriving at Phaselides, I know not upon what thoughts, taking with him hearts for the throwing of the Altar, and strictly ornaments, fled unto the common tutelary God of the City. [Polyb. Legat. 92. & 95. & in Excerptis Valesii, pag. 138.]

Popilius, having settled affairs at Alexandria, sailed unto Cyprus, and from thence dismissed the Fleet and army of Antiochus into Syria, which had lately vanquished in that place, the Egyptians. [Polyb. Legat. 92. Liv. lib. 45.]

The Kings of Egypt being delivered from the war against Antiochus, before all things dispatched Numenius, one of their friends, Embassador unto Rome; to return thanks for the favours which they had received from them. [Polyb. Legat. 95.]

When the Phaselites had sent unto Rhodes, requesting them to receive and carry along with them Polyaratus; the Rhodians did indeed send a ship, but forbade Epichares the Master of the ship, to admit him aboard the vessel, because the Alexandrians were enjoined to set the man ashore at Rhodes: the ship therefore being brought unto the Phaselides. When Epichares refused to receive Polyaratus into his vessel, and on the other side Demetrius, unto whose custody he was recommended by the King, commanded the man to get up and be gone; and the inhabitants of Phaselides more-over urged it, fearing lest it might render them obnoxious to the Romans. Polyaratus being afflicted with the sadnell of his care, went aboard Demetrius his ship again. Howbeit, having gotten an opportunity at his landings, he fled directly with speed unto Caunus: and in like manner complaining of his sad condition, implored the assistance of the Caunians: from whom receiving a repulse, because they were tributaries unto the Rhodians; he privily sent unto the Cibyrites, requesting that he might be received into their City, and some might be sent unto him, who might safely conduct him; for he was known unto the Cibyrites, because the children of Pancrates the Tyrant had been educated with him: and when the Cibyrites had consented and yielded unto his requests, Polyaratus was brought unto Cibra. [Id. in Excerptis Valesii, pag. 138, 141.]

Popilius and the Embassie which was sent unto Antiochus, returning unto Rome, made report of the controversies taken up and composed between the Kings, and of the army withdrawn out of Egypt into Syria; afterwards the Embassadors of the Kings themselves came, the Legates of Antiochus declared, That the peace which was approved by the Senate, seemed more approved unto the King than any victory; and, That he obeyed the commands of the Roman Embassadors no otherwise, than if they

they had been the injunction of the Gods : they congratulated afterwards unto them the conquest over Perſeus ; to the which, if any thing had been commanded unto him, the King to his utmoſt endeavours would have been aſſiſtance. The Legats of Ptolemy, joyntly in the name of the King, and Cleopatra returned thanks, That they were more indebted unto the Senate, and the Roman people, than their parents, than unto the immortal Gods, by whom they had been delivered from a moſt inferable ſig-nified their paternal kingdom, almoſt loſt; the Senate replied, That Antiochus had rightly and duly done, in that he had obeyed the Embaſſadors; and that it was accetable unto the Senate, and the Roman people, and unto the Princes of Egypt, Ptolemy and Cleopatra, (they laid) if any benefit and advantage befall them by their means, that the Senate did much rejoyce at it, and ſhould endeavour, That they might ſeem the chiefſt ſafeguard of their kingdom to conſiſt in the fidelity of the Roman people. C. Papius the Pretor was commanded, That he ſhould take care, that the rewards ſhould be ſent unto the Embaſſadors, according to apportionment and cuſtom.
[Liv. lib. 45.]

[Liv. lib. 45.] There was a joynt Embassage came both from Eumenes, and from Attalus, and from Athenaus, brethren to Rome, to congratulate the overthrow of Perſeus. [Id. lib.]

3837. King Antiochus by a publick edict, commanded all nations that were subject unto him, to observe the same way of divine worship, and, laying aside their peculiar customs, to profess the same religion with the Greeks; the punishment of death being proposed unto such as should be disobedient; and he appointed over-seers over every people and nation, who should compell them herunto. [1 Maccab. 1. 43. 52. 33.]

52, 33.] Of these he lent an ancient man of Athens into Judea and Samaria, that he might force the Jews to depart from the observation of the divine law; and defile the Temple at Jerusalem, saying thereupon the name of Διὸς Ὀυρανίου, Jupiter Olympici, upon the Temple at Garizim, Διὸς Ἰσχυρός, Jupiter Hespioris, or Protector of strangers: for upon better considerations, he seems to have thought that a more suitable name, than Εὐολύης Grecian, unto the condition of the Samaritans; because they were peregrines and strangers in the land of the Jews. [3 Abacab. 4. 1. 2.]

4. 3, 2, 2.] The King sent also proclamations by Embassadors to Jerufalem, and the Cities of Judah, that they should follow the rites of the Gentiles, take away the sacrificers out of the Temple, prohibit the sabbaths and festival days, pollute the sanctuary, and the Ministries thereof, erect Altars and Groves, and Temples of Idols, that they should sacrifice Swine, and other unclean beasts, that they should suffer their children to remain uncircumcised, and defile themselves with every impure thing, to the end, That they might forget the law, and change all the Ordinances of their God, [1 Maccab. 1. 46, 51.] and that it might wholly be a crime to professe the Jewish religion. [2 Maccab. 4. 6.]

A decree also came forth into the neighbour Cities of the Greeks, upon the suggestion of Ptolemei (son of Donymenes 2 Maccab. 4.45.) that they should proceed in like manner against the Jews, and compell them to partake of the sacrificer, but as for such as would not come over to the Greek customs, they should put them to death, [2 Maccab. 17.8, 9.]

17:8, 9.] And truly other nations embraced the word of the King, and of the Israelites also many confessed to his religion, and sacrificed unto Idols, and prophand the Sabbath, [1 Maccab. 1:44, 45, 51, 52.] for many of the people that forsook the law were gathered together unto them, and they made the Israelites hide themselves in dens, and in their refuge, [1 Maccab. 1:55, 56.] others were brought by bitter constraint on the Kings birth-day every month to eat of the sacrifices; and when the feast of Bacchus was kept, they were compelled to go in procession to Bacchus, carrying ivy, [2 Maccab. 6:7.]

But the Temple was filled with riot and revelling by the Gentiles, who loosely spent their lives with harlots, and in the holy circuit of the Temple defiled themselves with women, and moreover brought in things that were not lawful, the altar also was filled with prophane things, which the law forbiddeth. [2 Maccab. 6, 4, 5.]

6. 4. 5.] And on the 15 day of the moneth Caslew (which answereth partly our moneth November, and partly December) in the 145 year of the kingdom of the Greeks, they erected the abomination of delolation (the detestible idol of Jupiter Olympius) upon the Altar, and built idol-altars throughout the Cities of Judah, on every side, and burnt incense at the doors of their houses, and in the streets. [1 Maccab. 5. 54. 55.]

[illegible]

On the 25 day of the month Caelor sacrifices were offered upon the idolatrical altar, which was erected upon the Altar of God, [1. Maccab. ii. 90] the 25 year of the Secularis regni Olympiadæ 493. [Josephus lib. xii. cap. 7. & c.]

At the same time, two women which had circumcised their children, were accused, to whose breasts the children being hung, after that they had bin publicly led through the City, they threw them down headlong from a wall, and destroyed their families, and those that had circumcised the infants. [1. Maccab. 4, 61, 2 Maccab. 4, 10.]

The Galatians, Advertis being their leader, inflicted the kingdom of Eumenes with a very great commotion; but, a truce being made for the space of winter, both the Gauls went home again, and the King withdrew himself to Pergamus into his winter quarters; where he fell sick of a sharp dysentery. [Livy lib 45, cum Post. Legat

91. Antiochus, when he saw that his edicts were despised by the people, forced every one with torments by fasting of impure meats to abjure judaism. [Joseph. libell. de Macceab.] However, many of the Israelites were fully resolved and confirmed in themselves; not to eat any unclean thing, and they chose to dye, that they might not be defiled with those meats, and that they might not profane the Holy Covenant. [1 Maccab. 1. 62-63.]

62, 63.] Therefore the Tyrant Antiochus, sitting in an eminent place, as President with his affairs, his army with their weapons environing them, commanded every one of the Hebrews to be inacht away; and to be to eat Swines flesh, and such things as had been offered unto idols: and if any should refuse the prophane meats, that being racked on wheels, they should be put to death. [Ioseph, ut sup.]

And many being led away, a principal person, Eleazar by name, of the priestly family, one, as being an eminent Scribe, most expert in the knowledge of the Law, of 90 years of age; and therefore well known unto many of the followers of Antiochus, was brought before them: who neither yielding to eat swine's flesh, nor to pretend to have eaten it, chose rather to undergoe the most cruell torments, than to violate the Law, [Id. ibid., 2 Maccab. 4, 18—31]; and to Aid him, every young man that were brethren, together with their most courageous mothers, were brought before Antiochus; who refusing to cast Swines flesh, after this they had been cruelly with new invented torments cruelly handled, rendered the use of conquerable souls unto God. The most noble Martyrdom of these persons is found described in the seventh chapter of the second book of the Maccabees, and in the final Treatise of Josephus, touching the Maccabees, intitled the Jewish Wars, lib. 2, c. 10. Of the martyrdom of Josephus, in the Latin Paraphrase wherof, set forth by Rufinus, these persons are reported to be brought from their Castle named Saladrund, into Antioch unto the King, and their names were express Maccabeus, Abner, Machir, Judas, Ahas, Arses, and Jacob, and the mothers name is said to be Solomona: which notwithstanding, the later Hebrew Historians call Haman.

Historians call Hamah.
In Judah, about this time, Rhazia a Senator of Jerusalem gave a notable example unto others, exposing his body and soul for the defence of the Jewish religion; for his friendly affection unto his Country he was termed, The father of the Jews. [2 Maccab.
14. 37, 38.]

14. 37. 38.] The Kings Officers, who in Judea forced men to Apostacy, came unto the Town called Modin that they might there compell the Israelites to sacrifice, [1 Maccab. 2. 15.] Modin was a Village near Dispolis, as Eusebius relateth in his book de vita et moribus Iosephi. Marathias son of Jonathan, which was the son of Simeon, dwelt there at that time a Priest of Jerusalem, of the family of Joab (who was the first among the 24 courses: 1 Chron. 24. 7.) together with his five sons: John called Caddis, or Avagades, Simon called Thasi, Judas called Maccabeus, Eleazar called Abaron, or Avagades, and Jonathan called Apphus. [1 Maccab. 2. 1, 5.] And as those seven Marryrs, who at Antioch discharged their combat received from the elder brother Maccabeus the common name of the Maccabean brethren, so custom prevailed that from Judas Maccabeus, if not the first of Maccathias his five sons in age (as Josephus thinks in his first book of the war, first Chapter,) yet surely in the account of Prowell, and glory thereby procured, [1 Maccab. 2, 66. 3, 49, 4, 26.] they should obtain the common name of Maccabees. Howbeit, their father Maccathias, or Mathias is called by Josephus, lib. 1, Belli cap. 1, (as also in the Chronicle of Eusebius, and the lesser Seder Olam of the Hebrews) the son of Asamoneus; but in the 12 book of Antiquities, cap. 8, more expressly: ὁ υἱὸς Ἰσάκ τοῦ Ἰουδαίου, ὁ Ἀσμονίδης, the son of John, the son of Symeon, the son of Asamoneus, the common sort of Hebrews will have Maccathias himself to have been called Asamoneus, and that from him that Sir-name descended unto the posterity; of which R. David Kimchi is to be perused upon the 68 Psalm, v. 32, where he denoteth the word מַכְבִּי Princes.

Antiochus his officers did earnestly exhort Maccathias, being brought unto them, That, sofar as much as he was a Prince, and an illustrious person, and a great man in the City Modin, and fortified with sons and brethren, he should lead others by his example to yield obedience to the Kings command: which he did not openly constantly deny, but also put to death a certain Jew whom he beheld sacrificing upon the hearth altar, at the very altar, and at the same time slew also the Kings Commissioner, (called by Joseph, lib. 12, cap. 8, Apelles) who forced men to sacrifice, and threw down the altar: after that, exhorting all who were guided with a zeal of the Law to follow him, together with his sons, he fled into the mountains, leaving all their goods in the City, [1 Maccab. 2, 16, 28.]

Then many that sought after justice and judgement, went down into secret places, and together with their children and wives, and cattle, lived in Caves: which when it was discovered unto Philip (that Phrygian whom Antiochus had left Governor at Jerusalem, 2 Maccab. 5, 22,) the Kings Commissioners, taking with them the Garrison of the Castle of Jerusalem, pursued them: and when they could not persuade them to be obedient to the Kings commandment, throwing fire into the Cave on the Sabbath day, they consumed them, with their wives, children, and cattle, to the number of a thousand persons; those that were included for the honour that they bore unto the Sabbath making no resistance; no, not for as stopping the entrances of the Caves, [1 Maccab. 2, 39, 38. 2 Maccab. 6, 11. Joseph, lib. 12, cap. 8.]

When Maccathias and his friends were informed hereof, they much lamented their case, and decreed, That if from thence forward they should be assaulted by their enemies, they would repel them with arms, [1 Maccab. 2, 39, 40, 41. Joseph, in supra.]

Unto these the company of Afideans joined themselves, religious men who voluntarily offered themselves for the defence of the Law by arms, and all which were compelled to flee from the wicked: and having settled an army, they partly slew the impious men, and partly forced them to forsake themselves by flight unto the Nations. Howbeit, Maccathias and his friends, marching up and down, threw down altars, circumcised all children whom they found uncircumcised in the coasts of Israel, and pursued the sons of pride, and the work prosperously succeeded in their hands, [1 Maccab. 2, 42, 48.]

When the Cibyrate neither durst, for fear of the Romans, detain Polyaratus the Rhodian amongst them, nor yet were able to convey him to Rome, by reason of their unskillfulness in Sea-affairs (for they were altogether mid-land-men) they were compelled to dispatch an Embassy to Rhodes, and also into Macedonia unto L. Emilius Paulus the Proconful, entreating them to receive the man. And the Proconful wrote to the Cibyrate, That they should keep Polyaratus in straight custody, and bring him to Rhodes; but to the Rhodians, That they should take care that he should safely be brought unto Rome by Sea, and so the business being discharged by both of them according to command, Polyaratus was at last brought to Rome, [Polyb. in Excerptis Valesii, pag. 141.]

King Eumenes sent his brother Attalus to Rome, for the suppressing of the commotion of the Galatians; as also to congratulate unto the Senate, the conquest procured over Perseus. Which Embassy Attalus undertook so much the more cheerfully, that, because he had assisted the Romans in that war, and exposed himself unto all dangers as a willing and ready confederate, he might, by some testimony of favour and benevolence, try how acceptable that service was unto the fathers: by which hopes, least he should be tempted also to procure the kingdom, Eumenes sent after his brother unto Rome: Stratus the Physician, a person of great trust and authority with him, as a faithful Elype of the things that were done by his brother, and a trusty Monitor, if he should see him depart from his fidelity, [Polyb. Legat. 93. Liv. lib. 45.]

When all men benignly received Attalus, coming unto Rome; partly by reason of their former commerce with him, because they had served in the same war; partly because cause they believed him to be their friend; and when they came to meet him with a greater train than he hoped for: he began to be twine up with vain hope, being ignorant of the true cause for which he was so kindly entertained: for seeing the minds of most of the Romans were alienated from Eumenes, and believed that he had carried himself deceitfully in this war, entertaining conferences with Perseus, and watching advantages upon the fraights of the Romans; some persons of especial rank were eager to draw Attalus into private debates and encourage him to lay aside that Embassy: which he had undertaken for his brother, and treat for himself: for the Senate, they said, was dissatisfied unto his brother, and desirous to censure upon him that Dominion and Power which pertained unto him. Whence it came to pass, that Attalus his mind was lifted up, inasmuch that he engaged himself unto some of the Governors to come into the Senate, and to debate with the fathers of that business. However Stratus the Physician, a person of singular prudence, and powerful eloquence, took him off from that intention; for he set before his eyes, That even for the present, he did reign no less than his brother, and for the future, he would be left the undoubted successor of the kingdom: and that that hope could not be far distant; sofar as much as Eumenes by reason of the infirmity of his body, did daily and hourly expect the end of his life. Moreover, he saied, That a new combustion came now upon the kingdom from the insurrection and tumult of the Galis, whereunto resistance could scarce be made by the consent and concord of the Kings: How much less should they be able to deal with them, if a home-bred edition should be added unto a foreign war? Wherefore Attalus being brought into the Senate, in the first place professed his joy for the overthrow of Perseus: and afterwards discoursed of his fidelity and readiness of mind which he brought unto that war: then he largely entreated of sending Embassadors to the Galatians, who by their authority might draw them from arms, and reduce them to their former estate: he proceeded also to speak of the Enions, and Maronites, which he requested might be bestowed upon him: but as for the accusation of his brother, and the division of the kingdom, he wholly omitted to propound any thing, [14. ibid.]

The Senate supposing that Attalus would come unto them again, and discourse of those affairs apart, promised him to send Embassadors; and expressed notable magnificence in sending those gifts, which customarily in such cases used to be given: moreover they promised to bestow upon him those Cities. But when after all these offices of humanity and courtship had been performed unto him, Attalus departed the City, neither did any of those things which the Senate hoped for; the fathers being frustrated of their expectation, whilst he was yet in Italy, declared Ænum and Maronea to be free, revoking the promise which they had made unto Attalus. Yet the Embassy, whereof Publius Licinius was the principal Person, they dispatched unto the Galatians, [Polyb. Legat. 93.]

Amongst many Embassies of Asia, and Greece, next to this of Attalus, the Embassadors of the Rhodians drew the eyes and minds of all men unto them: they had at this time a twofold Embassy, the first whereof Philocrates discharged, the later Philophon, and Astymedes, [14. ib. Liv. lib. 45.] for the Rhodians upon the return of that answer, which was given unto Agelipolis, presently after the battle fought with Perseus, knowing the anger of the fathers against them, and hearing their threats, immediately dispatched those Embassies, [Polyb. ibid.]

When the Legates had first made their appearance in white raiment (as it became such as rejoiced; for if they had been clad in fordid apparel, they might have looked like mourners for the misfortune of Perseus) after that the fathers had been consulted with by Marcus Junius the Consul (whilst the Embassadors stood in the place of the publick assembly) whether they would give unto them place, rewards, and a Senate, they judged fit that no Rite of hospitality should be observed towards them: the Consul being gone forth out of the assembly, after that the Rhodians, affirming that they came to congratulate their victory, and purge the accusations of their City, had requested that a Senate might be granted unto them, declared, That the Romans were wont to give unto confederates and friends both other things benignly, and liberally for their entertainment, and also a Senate; but as for the Rhodians, they had not deserved in that war to be reckoned in the number of confederate friends. Upon the hearing of which word, they all prostrated themselves upon the ground, beseeching the Consul, and all that were present, that they would not more look upon new and false criminalities to their hurt, than upon their ancient deserts, whereof they were witnesses themselves, and immediately taking unto them fordid raiment, they went up and down with prayers and tears to the houses of chief persons, entreating them that they would first understand their cause, before they were condemned, [14. ib. 45.]

Marcus Juventius Tullius the Prætor, whose intermeddling it was to intermeddle in the affairs between the Citizens and strangers, stirred up the people against the Rhodians, and by a new and bad example, not advising first with the Senate, nor acquainting the Consuls, made a proposition upon his own head. Whether they did approve, and would command war to be denounced against the Rhodians, and one to be chosen out of the Magistrates of that year, who should be sent with a fleet to manage the war, hoping that himself should have been the person, M. Antonius, and Marcus Pomponius Tribunes of the people opposed this enterprize: and from thence there arose a contention between the Prætor and the Tribunes of carrying on all things disorderly. The Tribunes by their intercession before the time, perceived that the half of the Prætor should be put off until the coming of Æmilius the General, [Id. Ibid.] The Prætor was violently, by Antonius pulled from the Desk: and the Embassadors of the Rhodians, being by him brought unto the Senate, made their speeches: first Philophron, and afterwards also Asymedes, [Polyb. Legat. 93. cum Diodor. Siculo, Legat. 19. & in Photii Bibliotheca, cod. 244.] by the latter of whom that Oration seems to have been made, which is found in Livie without a beginning: for Polybius witnesseth, That Asymedes having inserted his speech amongst his letters, exposed it unto publick view: which notwithstanding, the same author observeth upon that account to have been misliked by the more prudent Persons, because (peradventure in the former part of it which is wanting in Livie) he undertook the defence of his own Country in such a manner, that it was interwoven with an altogether unnecessary accusation of the rest of the Greeks.

The speech being ended, they all fell down upon their faces, and in humble manner casting down branches of Olive: at length being raised up again, they went out of the assembly: then the votes began to be demanded: such as bearing the office of Consuls, or Pretors, or Embassadors in Macedonia, had been engaged in the war, were most enraged against the Rhodians. Howbeit, Marcus Porcius Cato much advantaged their cause, who being of rigid disposition, at that time shewed himself a gentle and meek Senator: the speech which he spake for them in the Senate, was by himself inserted into his fifth Book of his Origines, or Derivations, [Liv.] The fathers at length, sharply into his fifth Book of his Origines, or Derivations, [Liv.] The fathers at length, sharply and severely upbraiding the Rhodians with many things particularly, laid, That the Senate well understood, had it not been for some few that were friends to the Roman people, and especially for the Embassadors themselves, in what sort the Rhodians ought to be handled, and answer was given unto them in such manner, that they were neither declared enemies, nor continued friends, [Polyb. Diodor. Sicul. and Livie in supra.]

The answer being given, Philocrates immediately went to Rhodes: Asymedes remained Lierger at Rome, that he might know what things were transacted and give notice of them to his Country-men: the Rhodians, inasmuch as they seemed quit from an exceeding great fear of a war to be brought upon them from the Romans, bore the other passages, though very doleful, with a contented mind. [Polyb. and Livie.]

P. Licinius, and the rest of the Embassadors who were sent with Attalus end the war between the Galls and King Eumenes came unto Synnas: at what time Eumenes (who after the recovery of his health, the Spring first invited abroad out of his house) had gathered his army from several places unto Sardes. At Synnas, the Roman Legats conferred with Soloverius, Captain of the Galls, and Attalus went along with them, but he would not enter into the Camp of the Galls, lest their mind should be incensed by the debate. P. Licinius, discoursing with the Duke of the Galls, found him more fierce upon his intercession: inasmuch that it might seem strange, that the words of the Roman Legats should prevail so much amongst those little Kings, Antiochus and Ptolemei, That they should presently make peace, and be of no reckoning with the Galls, [Liv. lib. 45.]

Upon the approach of the Summer, the Rhodians sent Theætetus (the Copies of Livie have Theodotus) the Admiral of the fleet, with a Crown to the value of 10, or as we read it in Livie, 20 thousand pieces of gold, at the rate of 16 pound the piece, that they might by all means endeavour to contract friendship with the Romans: but they desired that amity might to be requested from the Romans, that no vote of the Rhodian people should be made concerning it, or that it should be committed unto writing: lest, if they should not obtain it, besides the frustration of their Embassy, they should be more disgraced upon a repulse, & repent them of the Decree. When therefore, according to their Laws, the Admiral of the Fleet alone had power of concluding friendship, without any expresse ordinance procured; they decreed by him to send their intentions, and the truth is, That although before this, they had assisted the most noble and comely victories of the Romans, yet for the space of 40 years, they continued in their friendship, that they never bound themselves unto them by a league of amity: left left being engaged in the religion of an oath, they should cut off all hopes from other Kings and Porenates, waging wars with the Romans of obtaining assistance if need required from: but now with most earnest desire they endeavoured to procure this honour, not that they were in love with new confederates, or stood in fear of any but the Romans themselves: but that they might render themselves less suspected unto the Romans, [Polyb. Legat. 93. Liv. lib. 45. Dio, Legat. 21. vel. 22.]

Theætetus had scarce arrived at Rome, when the Caudians revolted from them: and the Mylasenses possessed the Towns of the Eumenes, the Rhodians therefore dispatching Lycus suddenly with an army, forced the Caudians, though they had procured the assistance of the Cibyrites, to submit to their government, and in a fight near Orthesia, overthrew the Mylasians, and the Alabandians, who having taken away the Province of the Eumenes, came with united forces against them, [Polyb. & Liv. Ibid.]

About the same time there was a decree published by the Senate, whereby liberty was granted unto the Carians and Lycians in general, whom after the dispatch of the war with Antiochus, the Romans had allotted unto the Rhodians: upon the receiving of which news, the minds of the Rhodians were shaken with fear, whilst they much doubted, lest they had given the Crown unto purpose, and in vain expected an amity: and thus at last the Rhodians lost Lycia and Caria, after that they had been forced to endure their wars to procure them, [Polyb. Legat. 93. & 140. Liv. lib. 45. Appian. Syriac. pag. 116.]

When a Senate was granted unto Theætetus, he entreated concerning the entrance into a league with the Rhodians; but whilst the fathers made delays, he departed this life, being above 80 years of age. Afterwards the Caudians and Stratoniceans, that were in exile, came unto Rome, who after that they had been heard in the Senate, there was a Decree made, whereby the Rhodians were commanded to withdraw their Garrisons from Canus and Stratonicea. That answer being received, Philophron and Asymedes with all speed halted into their Country, lest if the Rhodians should neglect to call forth their Garrisons, the beginning of other calamities should again arise unto their City, [Polyb. Legat. 99.]

About the same time, the Cnossians and Gortynians waged war with the Raucians, having made a league amongst themselves, which they confirmed by an oath; that they would not make an end of the war before that they had taken Raucus by force. [Id. Legat. 100.]

The Rhodians upon notice of the Embassy of the Caudians, when they perceived that the wrath of the Romans was nothing allwaged, were in all things obedient unto their pleasure, [Id. ibi.] And thus they lost Canus, which they had redeemed from the Commanders of Ptolemei with 200 talents: and Stratonicea, which they had received, as a great benefit from Antiochus, and Seleucus: either of which Cities paid 120 talents yearly unto their City, [Id. Legat. 104.]

The Rhodians sent an Embassy to Rome, the principal Person whereof was Aristotele. These had in their commission instructions to propound the friendship again; and to be earnest in that behalf: But when about mid-summer the Embassadors made their appearance, and upon the grant of a Senate unto them, after the declaration of the Rhodians their obedience in all things that were enjoined unto them, had exhorted the fathers with many and sundry reasons unto an amity: the Senate returned such an answer, wherein no mention of society being made, the fathers denied it to be proper for them to vouchsafe amity unto the Rhodians, [Id. Legat. 100.]

At the beginning of Autumn, L. Æmilius Paulus, C. Sulpitius Gallus, being appointed overleer of the army, went with no great Retinue to view Greece; Scipio his son, and Athenæus brother of Eumenes the King, waiting upon him; he bestowed liberty upon Macedonia, and enacted laws meet for confederates. After the dispatch of his serious affairs, he instituted at Amphipolis a sport, which he had long before prepared, having sent messengers, both into the Cities of Asia, and to the Kings to give notice of it; howbeit as he compassed the Cities of Greece, he gave intimations thereof unto the Governours himself, and in that great convention of Europe, and Asia, a multitude being from every quarter, partly for congratulation, partly for to see the sight, gathered together, such vast armies of both land and sea Forces, there was observed, such abundance of provisions, and such cheapness of victuals, that there were gifts given of that kind for the most part, by the General, as well unto private persons, as to Cities and Countries; not onely for present occasion, but to carry unto their houses, [Livie lib. 45.]

Labeco was sent by the Romans to destroy Antifla, in the Island Lesbos, and for the transplanting of the Larytians unto Methymna, because at what time Antenor, (Perseus his Admiral) coasted about Lesbos, they receiving him, furnished him with victuals, [Id. ibid.]

Prusias (Venator) King of Bithynia, with his son Nicomedes, came unto Rome: the Senate sent L. Cornelius Scipio the Treasurer, to meet him at Capua: and decreed that a most excellent house should be hired for him at Rome, and provisions made upon the publick account, not onely for himself, but also his Retinue; and in the entertainment of him, the whole City had the vilage and countenance of one courteous friend. [Liv. lib. 45. Valer. Maxim. lib. 5. cap. 1.]

Having entered into the City with a great traine, he went from the Gate, and the judgement-seat of Q. Cuspius the Maior, and unto the market-place: a concourse of people being made on every side, he said, That he came to salute the gods which dwell at Rome, as also the Senate and Roman people; and to congratulate unto them, their conquest over Perſeus, and Gentius the King; and that having reduced the Macedonians, and Scavonians to their jurisdiction, they had encreased their Empire. When the Maior had told him, That if he pleased, he would grant a Senate unto him that day; he requested two dayes space, wherein he might visit the Temples of the gods and the City, as likewise both strangers and friends. L. Cornelius Scipio the Treasurer was appointed unto him for a guide to conduct him up and down. The third day, he came into the Senate, congratulated the victory unto them, mentioned his own merits in that war; requested that he might have liberty to perform his vow, by offering to greater sacrifices in the Captole at Rome, and one at Preneste unto Fortune: that these were his vows for the conquest of the people of Rome, and that amity might be renewed with him afresh: and that the land taken from King Antiochus, which the Galls, albeit the people of Rome had conferred it on no man, did possess, might be given unto him. Last of all, he recommended his son Nicomedes unto the Senate: he was assisted with the favour of all those that had been Commanders in Macedonia. Wherefore the rest of his demands were granted; as for the land, it was answered, That they would send Embassadors to enquire, whether it belonged unto the Roman people, and were given unto no body. That they accepted willingly the recommendation of Nicomedes. That Ptolemy King of Egypt (unto whom of late the Roman people had preserved his kingdom from Antiochus invading it) did sufficiently declare with what care the Roman people did defend the children of their confederate Kings. Moreover it was commanded, that beasts and other things that appertained unto sacrificing, whether he would offer them at Rome, or at Preneste, should be given unto the King, as to the Roman Magistrates at the publick charges; and that twenty long ships should be assigned unto him out of the Fleet which lay at Brundisium, which he might employ, until the King came unto the Fleet assigned unto him; that L. Cornelius Scipio should not depart from him, and should defray the expences both of himself, and company, till they should take ship. It is reported, That the King was wonderfully affected with joy, by that kindnesse of the Roman people: That he refused the rewards that were given unto him, but commanded his son to accept of the gift of the Roman people. These things the Roman Writers relate of Prusias. [Liv. ibid.]

Polybius and other Greek Authors write, That when he came into the Senate, he did low obsequy, and killed the threshold of the Senate, and called the Senators, his Tutary gods, and used other speech not to honourable to the hearers, as misbecoming unto himself: and that for this extraordinary debatement of himself, he received a more courteous answer from the Senate, [Id. ibid. Polyb. Legat. 97. Diodorus, Sicul. Legat. 22. vel 23.] Howbeit having stayed about the City not above 30 dayes, he departed into his kingdom, [Liv. fin. lib. 45.]

About the transaction of these things newscame, That Eumenes was upon his journey to Rome: who, because he had carried himself a neutral in the Macedonian war; least that he should seem to be judged an enemy, if he were excluded; or discharged from all crime, if he were admitted; there was a general law made, That no King should be permitted to come to Rome, [Polyb. Legat. 97. Liv. 46.] Afterwards being certified that Eumenes had arrived at Brundisium in Italy; they sent unto him the Treasurer, to bring this Decree unto him, and to command him to speak, whether he had occasion to make use of the Senate in any thing: if he had no request to make unto the fathers, That he should give intimations unto him, with all speed to depart out of Italy. The King, upon conference with the Treasurers understanding the pleasure of the Senate, exchanged not a word of business with him; assuring him that he stood in want of nothing. By this means, the Romans did not onely effect an hindrance of Eumenes his coming to Rome, but procured somewhat else also which was of great concernment unto them: for the kingdom of Pergamus being in great danger by reason of the Galatians; there was no doubt, but by reason of this disgracefull rejection of Eumenes, the courage of all his friends would be abated; and the Galatians be twice more courageous in the prosecution of the war. Now these things came to passe upon the beginning of Winter, [Polyb. ibid.]

Marrathias

Marrathias, having exhorted his sons unto the study of piety, and unto fortitude in the constant defence of the Law of God, commended Simon unto them, as a Counsellor and Father, but Judas Maccabeus, as the Commander of their war; as one that was excellent in valour from his youth: afterwards, blessing them, he dyed in the 145 year of the kingdom of the Greeks, when he had governed the miserable and banished company one year, and his sons buried him in the sepulchres of their fathers at Modin, and all the Israelites bewailed him with great lamentation. [1 Maccab. 2. 49.—70. Joseph. lib. 12. cap. 8. 9.]

Judas Maccabeus his brethren, and all who adhered unto his father, assisted him, succeeding into his fathers place, [1 Maccab. 3. 1, 2.] who privately going into the Villages, exhorted their kinsmen, taking with them such as continued in the Jewish Religion, they gathered together six thousand men, and called upon the Lord, That he would pity his Temple prophaned by ungodly men, as likewise the City ruined, and hear the blood that cried unto him; and that remembering the unjust destruction of innocent infants, and the blasphemies that were committed against his name, he would declare his hatred against the wicked, [1 Maccab. 8. 1, 4.]

In the mean time Antiochus Epimanes, when he heard of the sports set forth by E. milius Paulus in Macedonia, and had a mind to exceed Paulus in the magnificence of his expence; he dispatched Legates, and Observers into the Cities, who might declare, That at Daphne near Antioch, sports should be exhibited by him: to the intent, That out of all Greece (as Polybius) or out of all parts of the World (as Diodorus declareth) famous men might eagerly make recourse unto that show. Howbeit, Polybius in the 31 Book of his Historie, thus describeth the order of the Pomp.

There went in the first place, five thousand men in the flower of their age, in garb like Roman souldiers, with mayled brigantines: there followed immediately as many Mysians: Next to these, three thousand Cilicians, lightly armed, and ready harnessed with Golden Crowns. After this as many Thracians, five thousand of the Galatians; and moreover some with silver Shields. After this company, 240 couple of Gladiators: Upon the back of these came a thousand riding on Pisanas, or rather Nisæan Horses, (as the most learned Calaubon hath corrected the place) and 3000 riding on such as were of vulgar use; and of these most had Trappings, and golden Crowns, some silver. Unto these succeeded of their confederates and friends about a thousand Horsemen, all furnished with golden Trappings. With these was joined a wing of their associat friends, agreeable unto them in number, and accoutrement. Besides these marched 1000 choice men; whom the most excellent order of Horse-men, to the number of about 1000, did follow, called by the Greeks Agema or the Company: 1500 Horsemen in compleat armour from head to foot, called by the Greeks Cataphraets, because both men and horses were covered with arms, did close the company: all the forementioned persons had purple coats, some of them inter-woven with gold, and portrayed with the images of live beasts: after these marched an hundred Chariots, with six horses abreast, and 42 Wagons with four. Moreover there was a Chariot drawn with coupled Elephants, and another with two Horses: and after these followed 36 single Elephants, without any order.

Next went about 800 Youths with golden Coronets, fat Oxen near 5000, Tables for Holy uses about 300, Elephants teeth 800: then were carried whatevver by man was believed or said to be gods or Genii: as also the images of their Heroes: some of them gilded over, others arrayed in golden robes, each one gallantly adorned with his Elogy and Motto, futable to the Legend written of him. To these were added the Images of the night, of the day, the Earth, of the Heavens, of the morning and of the noon: 1000 Pages belonging to Dionysius the Kings Secretary, went in this pompous train, bearing silver vessels, none whereof weighed lesse than a thousand Drachmas. These were preceded by 600 others of the Kings Pages, carrying vessels of gold: and next to those followed about two hundred women, whose office was out of golden Chalcies to sprinkle the spectators with their sweet oynments. In the close, 80 women gloriously decked and adorned with costly rayment, were carried in litters, having legs of gold, and 500 more in others, whose legs were of silver: These things were most remarkable in the Pageantry.

After this, a great solemnity of sports, fencings, huntings, was kept for 30 dayes together: all which time variety of oynments was provided by the King: for all which played any prize. For the same purpose 15 golden jars were brought full of oynments of saffron, and as many of cinnamon and spikenard: those sorts of oynments were bestowed the five first dayes, and with no lesse freedom the dayes following, oynments of oyl-olive, marjoram, and lillies. As to the treatments of the guests, sometimes 1000, otherwhiles 1500 tables were most richly spread: all which things to exact and magnificent were performed, partly out of what in Egypt he had cheated King Philometor of being but then in his minority, herein perfidiously transgressing the tenour of his his league, partly out of friends contributions, and partly out of the spoyle of those many Temples, which he had rifled, [Polyb. in Atheniens. lib. 5. cap. 4. & lib. 10. cap. 12.]

But the glory of this preparation was eclipsed and debased by those unworthy offices the King supplied in his own person; for he rising up and down on a little palfrey, commanded these to passe on, these to stand, others he ordered as best pleased his own fancy; in such manner, that if his Diadem had been of none would have deemed him to be King, who scarce represented a servitor of tolerable quality and repute. All the times of the feast, standing at the doors of the rooms where the feast was kept; some he conducted in, others he placed at the Tables: he ushered in the servants that brought in the dishes, sometimes walked to and fro, sometimes (at down, other whiles lay along the floor, at times hopping and skipping about to remove a dish or a cup from the Table: in his viewing round the guests, he now and then pledged those that drank to him; sporting and jesting with such of the company as were merrily disposed: moreover, after many had taken their leave, in regard the feast continued a long time: he was in a disguise brought in by the Atticks and layed along upon the ground, as if he had been one of their company; at last roused by a noise of mulick, he started up, and fell to dancing, acting his part with ridiculous gestures: so that all, ashamed of the Kings demeanour, forsook the feast, [Polyb. ibid. & cum sententia Diodorus Siculus, in Excerpt. Valef. pag. 321.]

The Shew thus at length concluded: Tiberius Gracchus, Embassadors immediately came to Antiochus, sent by the Senate to make discovery of the counsels of the Kings, and to spy how affairs went there: who was by the King entertained with such cheerfulness and alacrity, that he did not only not suspect a plot, or discover the least token of alienation in him for what had happened at Alexandria, but also opposed himself against all those, that went about to impeach him: And which is more, Antiochus resigned his Palace Royal to the Embassadors of Rome, and as good as his very Diadem: when as notwithstanding all this ceremony, his will and affection was most irreconcilably estranged from the Romans, [Polyb. Legat. 101. & 109. Diod. Sicul. in Excerpt. Valef. pag. 322.]

Whilst Antiochus was at leisure to sport it at Daphne, Judas Maccabeus seriously played his business in Judea: For being stoutly assisted by his brothers, he drove out the enemy, slew his revolted Country-men, and purged the Land from its former prophanations, [Joseph. lib. 12. cap. 9.] Fired Cities and Villages, being upon him unawares, got into his hand the most convenient places; put to flight no small number of his enemies, most commonly taking advantage of the night for such private attempts: in somuch, that the bruit of his valour spread it self forth into all quarters, [1 Maccab. 3. 8. 9. 2 Maccab. 8. 6. 7.]

To the Embassadors which were sent from the Galatians in Asia unto Rome, the Senate indulged the enjoyment of their own constitutions, but with this proviso, That they keep home, and passe not beyond their own borders in armes, [Polyb. Legat. 102.]

Pytho, dispatched upon an Embasie from Prusias King of Bithynia to Rome, complained to the Senate of King Eumenes, how he had pillaged his territories, and seized certain places to his own use; charging upon him also, that he would not forbear his encroachment upon Galatia, nor submit to the Decrees of the Senate; but that he did cherish, and by all means possible advance those of his own faction: on the contrary he did discountenance and keep under whosoever seemed inclinable to the Romans, and desired that the Common-wealth should be governed by the precepts of the Senate. Others likewise came from the Asiatick Cities with fresh accusations, intimating a combination betwixt him and Antiochus against the Romans. The Senate after audience, neither slighted the accusations, nor yet revealed their own sense, but kept all close within their own breasts: having an eye upon Eumenes and Antiochus, as jealous of them. In the mean time, they always gratified the Galatians in some thing or other, and were assistants in vindicating their liberties, [Id. Legat. 104. Livie lib. 46.]

Aflymedes the Rhodian Legat, pleading his Countries cause at Rome before the Senate, was now more moderate, and not so hot in his speech, as in his former Embassage. Omitting all recriminations, he made it his only business at present to shew, That his Country-men had smarted sufficiently, and far beyond the demerit of the offence: when he came to inform particularly the damages which the Rhodians sustained, he said, Their chief grievance was, That they had now lost the revenue of their Haven: in regard that the Romans had both discharged Delos from paying custom, and had also taken from the people, the liberty which they formerly enjoyed, of determining the impost, and other matters of publick concernment: So that the custom which in former times was farmed for ten hundred thousand drachma's, scarce now

surmounts

surmounts to a hundred and fifty thousand: And seeing, that they themselves knew full well, that only a few had been engaged in the crime charged upon them, and those also had been all sufficiently punished by the people, he requested that they would not prove inexorable in their displeasure against those which were no whit involved in the guilt, but vouchsafe to receive them into their grace and favour, as formerly: for this it was, that his Country at this instant stood more in need of, than an allocation for war. And indeed this his speech seemed suitable to the present condition of the Rhodians so much, that after Tiberius Gracchus (who was newly returned from Asia, whither he had been Legate) had first declared, That the Rhodians had submitted themselves to the Decrees of the Senate; then, That all those were put to death which had any hand in bringing the people into disrepute of the Romans; he stopped the mouth of the adversaries, and prevailed with the Romans, That they would take the Rhodians into their alliance, [Polyb. Legat. 104.]

Neither could Tiberius signify any thing more to the Senate concerning the designs of Eumenes and Antiochus, than that they knew before his setting forth from Rome: so mightily had these Kings obliged him unto them by their civility, [Id. Legat. 105.]

Apollonius, Governour of Samaria, having raised a great army amongst the Gentils and Samaritans, fell upon the Jews; but Judas Maccab, smote him and slew him, and many tell down slain, and the rest fled: and Judas took the spoile, and amongst them Apollonius his own sword, which ever after he used in the wars, [1 Maccab. 3. 10. 11. 12. Joseph. lib. 12. cap. 10.]

When Seron who had the command of Cæloxyria heard, how that Judas was well provided of an army, multitudes from all parts resorting unto him: had mustered up all the Forces under his command, taking also the runagado Jews unto him, and encamped near the going up to Bethoron: where he with his whole army was routed by Judas Maccab, and 800 of them being slain on the place, the residue fled into the land of the Philistines, near the sea coast, [1 Maccab. 3. 13. 24. Joseph. lib. 12. cap. 10.]

As soon as the news of this overthrow came to Antiochus his care, it put him into such a heat, that forthwith he levied all the strength of his kingdom, and giving them a years pay, commanded them to be ready upon all service. This Salary being paid, he saw his Treasuries quite exhausted; for by reason of the Jews their revolt from him, who paid him yearly above 300 talents of silver, and the vehement persecution raging in the Grecian Cities, and many Regions, (for heaped not the very Gentiles, whilst he endeavoured to make them abjure their ancient superstitions, and to bring them to a conformity of worship) his revenues were very much impaired. In somuch, that fearing he should not find enough whereby to defray his charges and gratuities (wherein he was exceeding generous, and surpassing the Kings that went before him) he determined to go into Persia, to glean some tributes in those parts, and levy a considerable stock from thence, [1 Maccab. 3. 27. 31. Joseph. lib. 12. cap. 11. Sever. Sulpic. Sacri. Histor. lib. 2.]

Upon his going thither, he left Lysias of the Blood-Royal in Syria, Governour over all the Regions, from the River Euphrates, to the borders of Egypt, and entrusted him with the care of his son Antiochus (Eupator) committing unto him also the half of all his Forces, and his Elephants, with expresse charge, utterly to root out the name of the Jews, and to give their Country to be inhabited by strangers: with the rest of his sons, himself leaving Antioch (near Daphne) in the 147 year of the kingdom of Greeks, having passed over Euphrates, marched into the high Countries, [1 Maccab. 3. 12. 37.]

Philip (whom Antiochus had appointed over Jerusalem, 2 Maccab. 5. 22.) observing how that Judas Maccab, grew stronger and stronger every day, wrote unto Ptolemei (son of Dorymenes) Governour of Cæloxyria, to lend his helping hand to the Kings affairs: who forthwith, choosing Nicanor son of Patroclus, a most intimate friend, sent him with no less than 20000 souldiers of all Nations under his command, purposing to root out the whole stock of the Jews: And to him also he joynted Gorgias, a Captain notably experienced in Military affairs, [2 Maccab. 8. 8. 9.]

Lysias also dispatched away Ptolemei himself as a reserve to them: so that under these three Commanders, Ptolemei, Nicanor, Gorgias, were mustered 40000 Foot, and 7000 Horse: who marching with their entire army, pitched by Emmaus in the plain Country, [1 Maccab. 3. 38. 39. 40.]

And seeing that Antiochus was in arreare to the Romans in a tribute of 2000 talents, Nicanor resolved to wipe off that score, out of the sale of the captive Jews; and to that end, invited out of the Cities near the sea coast 2000 Merchants, promising That he would allow 90 slaves for one talent, [2 Maccab. 8. 10. 11. 14. 34. 36.] which was no sooner divulged, but the Merchants of the Country, with their attendants repair to the Campo purchase the Jews for slaves; great companies also flocked out of Syria, and and of the land of strangers or Philistins, to barter for the same commodities, [1 Maccab. 3. 41.]

Jerusalem being now quitted of inhabitants, and the Temple prophaned: Judas Maccabeus in this great extremity, removed with his army to Malpha, or Mizpa, for there before the building of the Temple, was the Israelites place of worship, [Jud. 11. 2. 20. 1. 21. 5. 8. 1 Sam. 7. 5. 6. 10. 17.] where he proclaimed a fast, and with most fervent prayers implored the Lords protection of his small army (for he had with him but six, or (as the Latin edition rendereth it, but seven) thousand against the vast power of the enemy. After this, such as had betrothed wives, or were planting vineyards, or were timorous, he dismissed home according to the Law, [Deut. 20. 6. 7. 8.] and then divided his army into four squadrons, and appointing his brothers Commanders, committed to each 1500 soldiers; to the army removed, and pitched on the fourth side of Emmaus, opposite to the enemy. Where Judas earnestly exhorting them to behave themselves valiantly, even to the death, for their Country, and the Laws of their God, he gave orders to be in readiness for the battle on the morrow. [1 Maccab. 3. 42. — 60. 2 Maccab. 8. 12. — 22.]

That night Gorgias had a design to surprize them unawares, and to that end took along with him 500 Foot, and 1000 choice Horse, and came toward the Jews Camp, having the Garrison soldiers of Syon Fort for his convoy. When Judas had got intelligence thereof, wisely making use of this present opportunity of setting upon the enemy, whilst thus divided, he marched his brother's way to Emmaus against Nicanor, whilst Gorgias their expert Commander was from them. Who when by night he had arrived at the Jews Camp, and found no body there, supposing they were fled, hunted them about in the mountains: but by break of day Judas discovered himself in the plains of Emmaus with 3000 men, who notwithstanding, were neither provided of armour or swords to their mind. [1 Maccab. 4. 1. — 6.]

Judas, after he had encouraged his soldiers to the battle, and given the word, In the help of God, himself being in the front, encountered with Nicanor, and, Almighty God assisting, slew the enemy above 9000, wounded and maimed the greater part of Nicanor's army, and put them all to flight: the chase was so large, that the Jews pursued some of them from Emmaus as far as Gazara (as the Greek Copy of the Maccabees, in the end of Arundels Library reads it) or Gadara (as Josephus) others unto the plains of Idumea, others as far as Palestine, Azous, and Jammia, all the hindmost of them were slain, near 3000 in number. [1 Maccab. 4. 15. 2 Maccab. 8. 23. 24.]

Among those that were thus put to flight, were the Merchants, who (nothing doubting of the victory, followed the Kings army, in hopes of getting a good bargain of the Captives) became a prey also themselves: for the Jews seized on their money which came to buy them: and when they had had a long pursuit of them, being prevented by time, they founded a retreat. For the evening, on which the sabbath began, drawing on, after that they had gathered up the arms of the vanquished Host, and taken the spoiles from them, they compelled themselves for the observation of the Sabbath, magnifying the mercy of God for this so marvelous a deliverance. [2 Maccab. 8. 25. 26. 27.]

Judas takes off the Jews, eager upon the spoiles, for fear of an encounter with Gorgias, who was now returned from his fruitless expedition: whose forces discovering themselves from the mountain, as soon as they perceived by the smoke of the Tents, (or on fire, that other division of their army to be routed, and saw Judas on the plain, standing in batalia ready to receive them, they all shifted for themselves into the land of strangers. The coast thus cleared, Judas returned to the spoil, where he found plenty of gold, blew silk, purple of the sea (which the Phenician Merchants had left behind them) and much wealth. [1 Maccab. 4. 16. — 23.] All which the soldiers shared amongst themselves, having first deducted a portion for the maim'd, widows, and orphans: then with joyful supplication they beseeched the Lord that he would vouchsafe to continue to be gracious and favourable to his servants. [2 Maccab. 8. 28. 29.]

The Jews after this coped with Timotheus and Bacchides, and slew in that fight above 20000 of the enemy, made themselves Masters of the Forts, and divided amongst themselves much spoyle: allways admitting the maim'd, orphans, widows, and aged persons into equal portions with themselves: and when they had gathered up the arms, and disposed of them into the most convenient places, the remainder of the spoyle they carried to Jerusalem: they slew also Philarches, one of Timotheus side, a most wretched fellow, and a notorious afflictor of the Jews: and in the midst of their solemn festival, which they had instituted for their late obtained victory, they burnt Callisthenes alive (having taken sanctuary in a little house) because he it was that had fired the holy gates. As for that pestilent Nicanor, he, having striped himself of all all his glorious attire (that thereby less notice might be taken of him) came like a solitary fugitive thorough the mid-land Country, unto Antioch: where he professed, the Jews to be utterly unvanquishable, in regard they had God for their Protector, [1 Maccab. 8. 30. 36.]

Lyfias receivings by those that escaped, intelligence of the overthrow of his party, was confounded thereat: both because, neither those things which he would, happened to Israel: nor what the King commanded were accomplished, [1 Maccab. 4. 26. 27.]

Therefore the year following (being the 148. of the kingdom of the Greeks, he halt's into Judea thorough Idumea, with 60000 chief Fox, and 5000 Horse: Judas Maccab. marched up toward him as he lay encamped at Bethlura, on the borders of Judea. And having first implored publicly the assistance of God, gives the enemy battle. Lyfias observing how the Jews like to many mad men, contemning death, brake thorough their enemies body, and that his men turned their backs, 5000 being killed on the place: returned to Antioch, purposing a new expedition after he had with a greater army well re-inforced himself, [1 Maccab. 4. 28. 35.]

Antiochus Epiphane's, having undertaken an Expedition: against Artaxias King of the Armenians, who marched from the Eastern parts, flew most of his army, and took Artaxias himself, [Appian, Syriac, pag. 117. & 131. Porphy. apud Hieronym. in Daniel, cap. 11.]

When Prusias, King of Bithynia, had not onely himself most vehemently accused Eumenes King of Pergamus, already suspected of the Romans by letters intercepted intimating a combination with Perseus against the Romans: but also, had prevailed with the Galatians, Selgenfes, and many other people of Asia, to do the same. Attalus and Athenus were dispatched away to Rome by their brother Eumenes: who not onely in the audience of the Senate, cleared all crimes, which were laid to their charge, but also returned back into their Country, with high honours conferred upon them: Yet for all this, the Senate abated nothing of their jealousies conceived against Eumenes and Antiochus: but sent C. Sulpitius Gallus, and Marius Sergius, Ambassadors, with instruction, to make a most strict enquiry into Antiochus and Eumenes their counsels, whether or no, they had made any provision for war, or were confederate with any against the Romans, [Polyb. Legat. 106. Diad. Sicul. Legat. 21.]

C. Sulpitius Gallus, as soon as entered Asia, undeviledly makes proclamation thorough the chief Cities there: commanding whosoever had, whereof to accuse King Eumenes, he should at the appointed time, repair to Sardes: where, when he himself was arrived, he sat upon the Bench, (erected for that very purpose in the place of exercise) ten dayes together, to receive accusations: gladly admitting all manner of reproaches, and obloquies against the King, and catching at the least hint of an impeachment: for he was a person naturally vain, and such an one, who hoped some honour might redound to himself from the difference with Eumenes: [Polyb. lib. 31. in Excerpt. Valer. pag. 145.]

Judas Maccab. and his brethren (as soon as they perceived that they had got respite from their enemies) with all their Forces came up to Jerusalem: and they recovered the Temple and the City, except Sion Fort. But the Altars and Chappels which the Gentiles had built in the open street, they demolished: And Judas commanded certain men to assault those which were in the Fortresse of Sion, whilst in the mean time he was busied in cleansing the Temple: the sad desolations whereof being beheld, stirred up most vehement lamentation to all that were present, [1 Maccab. 4. 36. 41. 2 Maccab. 10. 1. 2.]

The Priests well experienced in the Law, assigned by Judas himself to that business, cleared the Sanctuary, removed the defiled stones into an unclean place: pulled down the Altar for burnt-offerings, which was prophaned by the Gentiles, (laying up the stones thereof in the Mount of the Temple, until such time, a Prophet came which might inform them what ought to be done with them) built another of whole stones, upon which no iron tools had been lifted according to the renour of the Law, [Deut. 27. 5. 6.] Repaired the Holy, and the Holy of Holies: hallowed the Courts, made new holy Vessels, brought into the Temple the Candlestick, the Altar of incense, and the Table: So they burnt incense upon the Altar, lighted the Lamps which were on the Candlestick; placed the Shew-bread upon the Table, spread the vails, and finished whatsoever they had taken in hand, [1 Maccab. 4. 42. 51. 2 Maccab. 10. 3.]

Then on the 25 day of the ninth month, (called Cisleu, or Chasteu) in the 148 year of the kingdom of the Greeks: they rose up betimes in the morning, and, having furnished themselves with fire by striking stones one against the other, they offered sacrifice according to the Law, upon their new Altar of burnt-offering, [1 Maccab. 4. 52. 53. & 2 Maccab. 10. 3.] Two years after Judas succeeded his father Mattathias in in the government; but three years compleat, since the Gentiles first sacrificed in that place: for on that very same day of the same month, on which they prophaned the old Altar, Judas consecrated this new one. [1 Maccab. 4. 54. 2 Maccab. 10. 35. Joseph. lib. 12. cap. 11.]

This Dedication was celebrated with Songs, Hymns, Citherns, Harps, and Cymbals, very joyfully, and all the people fell prostrate on the ground and worshipped, and blessed the God of Heaven, who had given them good successe; beseeching him that he would not suffer them to fall any more in such calamities: but if at any time they provoked him, that he himself would chasten them in mercy, and that they might not be delivered up to the blasphemous and barbarous Gentiles: they kept the Dedication for eight days, and offered burnt offerings with gladness, and the sacrifices of deliverances (or peace offerings) and of praise: they deckt the fore-front of the Temple with golden Crowns and Targets, repaired the Gates and Chambers, being on the sides of the Temple, and made doots for them. [1 Maccab. 4. 54.—58. 2 Maccab. 10. 4. 6.]

Then Judas and his Brethren, and all the Congregation of Israel, ordained, That through the whole nation of the Jews, the days of the Dedication of the Altar should be observed, yearly for the space of eight days, from the 25 day of the month Casleu, with mirth and gladness. [1 Maccab. 4. 59. 2 Maccab. 10. 8.] After they had kept these eight days in manner as the feast of Tabernacles, calling to mind, how not long since, when they should have kept that feast in its course, they lurked about the Mountains and Caves like wild beasts. Wherefore now bearing green boughs, and fayre branches, and palms, they sang praises unto him, who had brought the purification of his holy place, to such an happy issue. [2 Maccab. 10. 6. 7.] Hence it was, that in the letters which the Council at Jerusalem, wrote to the Jews in Egypt, these days are called the days of Tents, or Tabernacles of the month Casleu. [2 Maccab. 1. 9. 18.] in the Gospel of St. John, 10. 22, they are called the feast of Dedication: and of the Jews, the feast of Lamps, either in regard of so great exultation of their religion and liberties, which thus brake forth upon them, beyond all expectation: [as Josephus intimates in lib. 12. Antiq. cap. 2.] or from the lighting of the Lamps, because both at that time the lighting of the Lamps in the Temple was restored, [1 Maccab. 4. 49. 50. & 2 Maccab. 10. 3.] and also, because to this very day, the Jews in their Synagogue still continue their custom of celebrating this feast with a more peculiar provision of Lamps.

At what time they repaired the Temple, at the same they fortified Mount Syon with high walls, and strong Towers, to keep in the enemy; those especially that were garrisoned in that Fort, for fear they should at any time by their sallies forth annoy the Temple: They fortified also Bethsura, distant thence not above five furlongs. [2 Maccab. 10. 5.] That the people might have a Garrison of defence against Idumea, [1 Maccab. 4. 60. 51. cum. 4. 7.—26.]

When the nations round about, heard of the building of the Altar, and the Dedication of the Sanctuary, they were much displeased thereat: hereupon, contriving how they might destroy the whole stock of Israel, they began to massacre all those that lived in any of their quarters. [1 Maccab. 5. 13. 4.]

Antiochus Epiphanes, traversing the high Country (beyond Euphrates) heard say, That the City of Elymais in Persia, (called by the writer of the second book of the Maccabees, Persepolis) was a City every where cryed up for wealth, and in it a Temple, (which Appian reports to be dedicated to Venus, Elymais in Syriac, pag. 131.) but Polybius and Diodor to Diana, in Elymais, [in Josephus, lib. 12. cap. 13. & Hieronym. in Daniel, cap. 11. cum Excerptis Valesii, pag. 141.] well provided, having in it Coverings of gold, breast-plates and arms, left there by Alexander the Great, Philips son. But when he, out of a ravenous appetite to the far booty, attempted the plunder of the City: the Citizens incontinently brook themselves to their arms, worsted him, and forced him to retreat with much dishonour. [1 Maccab. 4. 1.—4. 2 Maccab. 10. 12. 2.]

But as soon as he came to Ecbarata, tidings were brought him of the ill successe of Nicanor, and Timotheus in Judea, and removing thence toward Babylon, about the borders of Persia, he heard also of the great defeat given to Lyfias his army, how the image of Jupiter Olympius, was cast out of the Temple at Jerusalem, and the Sanctuary and Bethsura fortified: Therefore being enraged with Iurie, he thought to be avenged upon the Jews for the disgrace he lately received by those that made him fly; and to that end, commanded his Chariots with all speed to dispatch the journey, proudly vaunting, how that as soon as ever he arrived at Jerusalem, he would make that City a common burying place for the Jews. [1 Maccab. 4. 47. 2 Maccab. 9. 34.] And to this relates that passage of Tacitus (impiously asserting that holy nation), [lib. 5. Hist. for.] King Antiochus endeavouring to reform their superstition, and to bring in the cities of the Greeks was hindered by the Parthian war in his design of redressing that most base nation.

Scarce were these proud words bolted out of the mouth of Antiochus, but he was struck with an incurable plague in the bowels, and violent torments in his inward parts: yet being not by the fickleness of his body made more found in his mind, but still breathing out his menaces against the Jews, he calls up on his Chariot-man to mend his pace: But it happened upon this his furious career, that he fell out of his Chariot, and the fall proved to desperate, that his whole body was much bruised, and his limbs put out of their joynts: And after that he was lifted up from the ground, and carried to and fro in an horse-litter, worms bred to fast in his body, that whole fleas of flesh sometimes dropped from him; yet alive in such pitiful plight, that by reason of the noisomeness of the stench, none could endure to carry him; thereby also he became offensive to his whole army, [2 Macc. 9. 5, 10.] Hecurp he was forced to break off his journey to Babylon, and to put in at Tabis, a Town of Persia, as is conceived, out of Polybius, [in Excerptis, his Valesii, pag. 144.] and Jerom, [in cap. 11. Dan.] where he continued bed-ridden many dayes, [1 Macc. 6. 8, 9.] pining, and consuming away, [Appian, in Syriac, pag. 131.]

From the entrance of the Spring, began the 149 year of the kingdom of the Grecians, made use of in the first book of the Macc. Epiphanes: despairing of his recovery, summoned together all his friends, and openly acknowledged all those miseries to have fallen upon him, for the injuries he had done unto the Jews; and he must now, to his great grief, die in a strange land, [1 Macc. 6. 10, 13.] And when he could no longer endure his own smell, he laid, It is meet to submit to God, and for man which is mortal, not to set himself in competition with God. And in this prayer to God, he vowed, That he would allow to those of Jerusalem, and all other Jews elsewhere, Autocrators, or the free exercise of their own constitutions (that for the future, they should enjoy the liberty of their own Laws and Manners: That he would beautify the Temple with most rare gifts, restore all the holy vessels, and that with advantage; defray the charges of the sacrifices out of his own Exchequer, and that he himself also would turn Jew, and go thorough the whole habitable World, declaring the power of God: But when he perceived no intermission of his pains: he wrote most courteous letters to the Jews, earnestly intreating them, That they would remain loyal to him, and to his son, whom in his life (following the example of his father) he had designed to be their King, [2 Macc. 9. 11, 27.]

Then calling unto him Philip, his intimate friend, who was brought up with him (as is styled in 2 Maccab. 9. 29.) he appointed him over the whole kingdom: committing unto him his Crown, his Robe, and his Signer; to the intent, that after he had fetched back his son Antiochus from Antioch (where he had left him with Lyfias) he should train him up, (for as yet he was but nine years of age: as hath been formerly hinted out of Appian,) to be Governour of the kingdom. Thus Antiochus deceased the 149 year of the kingdom of the Grecians, dying a miserable death in a strange land, on the mountains [2 Maccab. 9. 28.] of Parata, near Babylon: where Grotius on the place out of the fifth book of Curtius, layes, the Town Tabis was situated. Polybius [in Excerptis, Valesii, pag. 144.] relates, how that he died Tabis in Persia: It is Tabasus the Macedonians call it, but the Syrians call it Tabis, and the Jews call it Tabasus. and indeed Jerom upon 11 of Daniel, recites (out of Polybius and Diodorus) how Antiochus frightened by certain phantoms and visions, run mad, and at last, fell into a disease which ended his dayes: attributing his calamity to his sacrilegious design upon Diana's Temple. Howbeit he himself, wretched creature, professed in the presence of all his friends, the ground of all his miseries to be, His robbing the Temple at Jerusalem, and sending forces to destroy the Jews without cause. [1 Maccab. 6. 12, 13.]

The dead corps was carryed forth by Philip; who being jealous of Antiochus his son, withdrew himself into Egypt unto Ptolemei Philometor. [2 Maccab. 9. 29.] upon design of levying forces against Lyfias, who hearing of Epiphanes's decease, set up his son Antiochus in his room on the Throne (who was under his tuition during his minority) calling him Eupator, [1 Maccab. 6. 17.] Appian reports, how that the Syrians gave him that surname, in honour of his fathers virtue, confirming also, that Lyfias was his Guardian in his pupillage. [in Syriac, pag. 117.]

Antiochus Eupator, now in actual possession of the Crown, prefers Lyfias to the managing of the Realme; but more especially he installs him in the sovereignty of Celolyria, and Phoenice: for Ptolemei Macron, Dorymenes's son, who had that honour formerly under Antiochus Epiphanes, [2 Maccab. 8. 8. cum 1 Maccab. 3. 38.] poisoned himself upon discontent, that he was accused to Eupator as inclining to the Jews: because he, observing the great injuries that were done unto them, endeavoured that right might be done them, and their affairs might be managed in a peaceable manner:

manner : and also because he had been called Traitor, for delivering up Cyprus (which was committed to his trust by Philometor) unto Antiochus Epiphanes, [2 Maccab. 10, 11, 12, 13.] Polybius gives him this commendation, [in Excerpt. Valep., pag. 126.] Πτολεμαῖος ὁ κυβερνήτης καὶ τῆς Κίπρου ἀποστολῆς ἡγεμὼν, ἀλλὰ πρὸς τὴν ἐξουσίαν καὶ συνεπιδόξας. Ptolemy the Governour of Cyprus behaved himself like an Egyptian in nothing, but was prudent and valiant among the first.

But Gorgias, who had the command of all parts about Judea, hired souldiers, and continually fomented the war against the Jews : the Idumeans also who were joyed in affociation with him, having gotten into their hands the most commodious fort, and entertaining the Jerusalem-runnagadoes, infested the Jews, and did what they could to keep the war on foot, [2 Maccab. 10, 14, 15.]

Hereupon Judas Maccabaeus at Acrababates, a Region of Idumea, falls upon the sons of Eliau, who had begirt the Jews round : and storming their Garrison, became master thereof, slew no lesse than 20000, and seized upon all their spoiles, [1 Mac. 5, 3, 2 Macc. 10, 16, 17.]

And now he calls to mind the shrewd turne of the children of Bzan, who had spread themselves in privy ambushes along the way sides, by which the Jewish army was to passe. These Bzanites upon the last rout had elaped with 9000 unto two very strong Castles, provided with all things necessary to endure a siege. Therefore Judas Maccab. left his brother Simon, with Joseph, and Zacheus, to besiege them, whilst he himself marched away to relieve some other places which stood in more need of his present assistance. But those that were with Simon, out of a greedinesse of money, upon contract with the besieged for 70000 drachmes, suffered some to escape : as loon as Maccab. had notice hereof, he summoned together the Governours of the people, and in their presence, executed as many of them as upon conviction were found to have any hand in the treachery : and having with little adoe reduced both the Garrisons, he burnt them to the ground, and utterly destroyed above 20000 of them, [1 Mac. 5, 4, 5, 2 Mac. 10, 16, 17.]

From thence he passed over to the Ammonites, where he found a very great power got together, and much people, under Timotheus his command : but he often fought them, and discomfited them, and having taken Jazer, and the Towns belonging thereunto, returned into Judea, [1 Mac. 5, 6, 7, 8.]

Timotheus having, since his last overthrow, well recruited himself with multitudes of foreign Forces, and horses collected out of Asia, not a few, returned confident of the conquest of Judea. But Maccab. and those that were with him, after a serious humiliation and supplication unto God, marched out of Jerusalem, and joyned in battle with the enemy, a great distance from the City : and being encouraged by apparitions of certain horsemen in the heavens, fighting for them, slew of the enemy 20500 Foot, and 600 Horse : As for Timotheus himself, he elaped to a very strong Garrison, Gazara by name, whereof his brother Cheræas was Governour : but at last, the Garrison was taken, and he and his brother, with Apollonius, being found hid together in a pit, were all three put to the sword, [2 Mac. 10, 34, 38.]

The Trogmians, a people of Galatia, having made some vain attempts upon Cappadocia, and seeing they could get no footing there, posted to the Romans, endeavouring to render King Ariarathes odious unto them. The Romans presently dispatched an Embassie, of which M. Janius had the chief managing, [Polyb. Legat. 108.]

From Autumn began the year, of the account of the contracts, or Dilkarnain, observed by the Collector of the second book of the Maccabees, CXLIX : but of the Chaldee account used in the Kings Edicts, [Ibid. cap. 11.] and in Ptolemy's great Syntaxis, [lib. 9, cap. 7. & lib. 11, cap. 8.] CXLVIII, which also was the Sabatical year.

The Heathen about the Region of Galaad assembled themselves together against the Jews, which were near their borders, with an intent utterly to destroy them : who slew of the Jews inhabiting the land of Tob, [Judic. 11, 3.] about a 1000 men : led away their wives and children captives, and took their very goods and household-stuff : and for those Jews of Galaad, which betook themselves to the Garrison in Datheima, for their security : Timotheus (not he which even now was said to be slain with his brother Cheræas, but another of the same name) halted with an army to lay siege unto them : and at the same instant, others from Ptolemais, Tyre, and Sidon, and all Galilee of the Gentiles, held a Rendezvous upon a design of cutting of the Galileans, [1 Mac. 5, 9, 15.]

The Galaadites and Galileans, dispatched letters to Judas and his brethren, earnestly soliciting them to hasten their assistance in their extremities : Hereupon Judas (after a consultation first had with those at Jerusalem) divides his whole army into 5 Brigades : 3000 he designs to his brother Simon, for the relief of the Galileans : himself and his brother Jonathan, take along with them 8000 for the delivery of the

Galaadites,

Galaadites, and the residue of the army he leaves with Joseph, son of Zacharias, and with Azarias, for the security of Judea, strictly charging them, That they should not upon any terms ingage with the heathens in battel, till such time as they were returned back again, [Ibid. 16, 20.]

No looner was Simon entred Galilee, but he fell upon the heathens, and chased them to the very gates of Ptolemais, and there fell of them 3000 men, whose spoils they took. Having thus rescued the Galileans, and those of Arbatitis, (Ἀρβατίτις, i. e. the plain and Champion Countries) with their wives, children, and whatsoever they had, they brought them into Judea with great joy, [Ibid. 21, 22, 23.]

But before Judas could get to the Galaadites, many of them were shut in Bosfora, Bozor, Alems, Casphier, Maced, Carnain, and other Cities in Galaad, [Ibid. 16, 27.]

By that time Judas and his brother, having passed over Jordan, had got three dayes march through Arabia Deserta ; though Nabathæis, mer very friendly, and acquainted him with all that happened to the Galaadites : Moreover, how that on the morrow following the enemy, had designed to fall upon the Garrisons, and as fast as they took them to put all to the sword in one day. Upon this intimation, Judas with his army, turned aside by the way of the wilderness unto Bozor ; and having won the City, put all the males to death, pillaged the City, and after burnt it to the ground. Departing thence by night, he marched toward the Fortels, where he found the enemy about break of day, placing their Engines for battery, and the cry of them within the City, went up to Heaven : Those that were with Judas, marching in three divisions on the rear of the enemy, founded with their Trumpets, and lifted up their voyce in prayer. Timotheus his Camp, knowing that it was Maccabæus, who was so near them, fled from him, and got themselves out of his sight : but in the pursuit, he had to great execution of them, that there fell in that day near 8000 of them. This done, he stept aside to Mapha, took it by storm, slew all the males, and after the plunder, set it on fire. From thence he went and took Casphor, Maced, Bozor, and the other Cities of the Country of Galaad, [Ibid. 24, 26.]

Whilst Judas and Jonathan were in Galaad, and Simon in Galilee, over against Ptolemais, Joseph, son of Zacharias, and Azarias, who were left behind, to secure Judea, hearing of their gallant achievements, and ambitious to get themselves a name as great as the other, contrary to command, drave down their army as far as Jamnia, with intentions to fight the heathens. But Gorgias drew out all his forces out of the City against them, and beat them back to the very borders of Judea, and there fell that day of the Jews, near upon 2000 men, [Ibid. 55, 62.]

Lyfias, the young King Eupator's Protectour and kinsman, and the sole manager of the affaires of the kingdom, being much displeased at what had happened, mustered together almost 80 thousand men ; all his own Horse, and 80 Elephants, and marched against the Jews : resolving within himself, to render Jerusalem an habitation for the Grecians, The Temple tributary, and to set the High Priesthood to sale every year. Hereupon, being entred Judea, he claps close siege to Bethsua, a strong place, distant from Jerusalem about five furlongs. But Maccabæus his army, having an Angel for their convoy, slew 10000 of the enemies Foot, and 1000 Horse. All the rest, with Lyfias himself, were put to flight, whereof many were fore wounded, others threw away their arms, and shuted for themselves, [2 Maccab. 11, 1, 2, 12.]

Lyfias, casting up with himself what losse he had sustained, and considering that God fought the battles of the Jews, sent Ambassadors to them, to intreat concerning a piece, avowing, That he would subscribe to all reasonable propositions ; and moreover, be a means of ingratiating them into the Kings favour. Judas Maccabæus, supposing this might be conducive to the publick behoof, embraced the motion, and signified in writing, (which was sent by the hands of John and Abalom, what he should mediate for unto the King, on the behalf of the Jews : The King granted every Article, [Ibid. 13, 14, 15.] concerning this particular, there are extant letters, both from King Antiochus to Lyfias, [Ibid. 22, 26.] as also from Lyfias to the Jews, dated in the year (of the Chaldee account) 148, the 24 day of the month Dycorimbis : as it is in the Greek Copies ; but in the Latin Dycoribus, [Ibid. 16, 21.] This month in the Caldee year, seems to be intercalated betwixt Dyfiter and Xanthicus (in which are written, the following letters of the King, and the Romans to the Jews, concerning the foreaid peace) which is therefore called in the Greek edition of the book of Esther, (now to be seen in the noble Earle of Arundels Library) the month Adar-nisan, and Dyfiter-xanthicus, and by the modern Jews Vadar, or the other Adar : although our Syriac Interpreter of the second book of the Maccabees, hath substituted in its name the Syriac letter Tifir.

In the same 148 year, (of the Chaldee account) the 15 day of the month Xanthicus according also to the Chaldee reckoning) there are letters directed to the Jews, both both from King Antiochus, [2 Maccab. 11. 27.—31.] and also from Quintus Memmius, and Titus Manlius (otherwise called Manius or Mamilius) Ambassadors from Rome, who at that time came to the King residing at Antioch: [Ibid. 34.—38.] thither also followed Lysias after the covenants were drawn up. [1 Maccabees 12. 1.]

About the beginning of the Spring, began the C^L year of the kingdom of the Grecians, which the writer of the first book of the Maccabees makes use of.

Demetrius, son of Seleucus Philopator, having been detained many years hostage at home, and now entered the 23 year of his age, requested the Senate, That by the assistance of the people of Rome, he might be restored into his own kingdom, now unjustly usurped by the son of Antiochus Epiphanes his Uncle, protesting that he should always look upon Rome as his native Country and nursery, repute the Senators sons, as to many brothers, and the Senators themselves as fathers. Norwithstanding, as in this complement, the Senate esteeming more expedient, as to their affairs, if Syria were Governed by a child rather than a man, with joynt consent voted, that Demetrius should be kept at Rome, and the kingdom be confirmed to the child which Antiochus left behind him. But withall, they presently dispatched away Cn. Octavius Spurius, and Lucretius, and Lucius Aurelius, as Legats to weld that kingdom at the pleasure of the Senate, supposing that none would be against it: the King being but yet a child, and the Princes of the Court accounting they were extremely favoured, in that the Romans would not deliver up the kingdom to Demetrius, which was a thing they much feared would ensue. And when they were informed, how Antiochus had provided himself of Elephants in Syria, and ships above the number which they allowed him; they gave in charge to the Legats, that they should fire the ships, hough the Elephants, in a word, That they should do what they could to bankrupt the Kings Exchequer, [Polyb. Legat. 107, Appian Syriae pag. 117. Zonar. ex Dione. Justin. lib. 34. cap. 3.]

The Legats also received instructions to visit the Macedonians, who, in regard that a popular state seem'd strange to them, had made no use of a Common Council and were up in factions and seditions amongst themselves. They were ordered also to make diligent enquiry into the affairs of the Galatians, and the kingdom of Aria rather; [Polyb. Ibid.] Notwithstanding, Ariarathes by his great civility in a conference with Junius and the former Legats, dismissed them, highly commending him. [Id. Legat. 108.]

The peace betwixt Eupator and the Jews, was no sooner made, than broken off again: for those that had command in the places adjacent; Timotheus Apollonius, son of Genneus, Hieronymus, Demophon, and Nicanor, Governour of Cyprus, would not suffer the Jews to be quiet. And the Citizens of Joppa likewise, having by fair speeches enticed 200 Jews, which dwelt amongst them, into their ships, put from shore, and threw them all over-board. [2 Maccab. 12. 2, 3, 4.]

When Judas Maccabeus heard of this piece of villany, he came by night to Joppa, fired their port, and navy, and slew all those that had fled thither; and understanding that the Jamnites had some such deligne against those Jews that lived with them, he did the same by night to their port and fleet, so that the flame of the fire appeared as far as Jerusalem, which lay 240 furlongs distant. [Ibid. 5, 9.]

By that time, Judas his army had gone nine furlongs thence, upon their march against Timotheus, the Nomades of Arabia (set upon them, not fewer in number than 5000 Foot, and 500 Horse, where after a hot dispute, the Arabians were worsted, and upon an engagement, to supply them with Cattel, and to pleasure them some other ways, obtained a peace from Judas. [Ibid. 10, 11, 12.]

Judas his souldiers stormed the City Caphis, and took it: the City was fortified with a bridge, and fenced with walls, and inhabited by people of several nations: the slaughter of the Citizens was so great, that an adjacent lake of two furlongs broad was coloured with blood. [Ibid. 13, 16.]

They removed from thence 750 furlongs, and came to Characa unto the Jews which were called Tabieni (because they inhabited the land of Tob.) Timotheus was drawn off from that place, although he had not done the business he went about, leaving behind him a very strong Garrison: which Dositheus and Sosipater, two of Judas his Captains ventured upon, and killed about 10000 of the men which Timotheus had left to keep it. [Ibid. 17, 18, 19.]

Upon this miscarriage, Timotheus leaves a new army of 120000 Foot, and 2500 Horse, of all nations round about him, and mercenary Arabians; sent away the women and children, and other baggage to Carnion, or Carnaim, a place hardly to be besieged, and difficult to come unto, by reason of the streightness of the passage, he encamped against Raphon, on the other side the brook. Judas with all his forces, (putting himself in the van) crossed the brook toward the enemy, and gave that Gentile-army such such a total rout, that some flew this way, others that way, in such great disorder, that they were often hurt by their own men, and wounded by the points of their own swords: So that Judas pursued them with that eagerness, that he flew near thirty thousand men. [1 Mac. 5. 37, 43. 2 Mac. 12. 20, 23.]

But Timotheus himself falling into the hand of Dositheus and Sosipater, very subtilly brought them, that he might escape with his life, because he had in his power many of the Jews parents and brothers, who, if they put him to death, he would be served in the same kind: upon his engagement to see them safe returned, they dismissed him for their brethren sake. [2 Mac. 12. 24, 25.]

Judas marched forward to the City Carnaim, and to the Temple of Atargata which was therein, whither many of the enemy had fled: the Temple he fired and all the men in it, demolished the City, and put to the sword 25 thousand men. [1 Mac. 5. 43, 44. 2 Mac. 12. 26, 27.]

Then Judas brought back all the Israelites which were in Galaad, with their wives and children, and all their baggage, with an intent to bring them into Judea: And they were come as far as Ephron, which was a very great City, and well fortified, and stood in the way thorough which they were to passe; it was peopled by nations of all sorts, the walls well manned, and had in it good store of engines and ammunition. But so it was, when Judas and his army were necessarily to passe thorough it, that the Citizens clapped their gates against them, and baracado'd them up with the stones; yet they forced their way thorough, after a day and a nights battery, and demolished the City to the ground; took all the spoile, killed all the males, near 25000 in number, and marched over the dead bodies thorough in. [1 Mac. 5. 45, 51. 2 Mac. 12. 27, 28.]

After this, they passed over Jordan, into a great plaine before Bethsan, [1 Mac. 5. 52.] which the Greeks called Scythopolis, [Joseph. lib. 12. cap. 12.] distant 600 furlongs from Hierusalem. As soon as they were entered into the town, the Jews (which lived amongst them, met them) and acquainted them, how friendly the Scythopolitans had always dealt with them, and how kindly they had treated them in their adversities: whereupon they returned them thanks, and requested the continuance of their affections to their Nation for the future. [2 Mac. 12. 29, 30, 31.]

Judas bringing up the rear of his army, encouraged them all the way, until he came to Judea, [1 Mac. 5. 53.] They arrived at Jerusalem, about the Feast of Pentecost, [2 Mac. 12. 32.] and went up unto Mount Sion with joy and gladness, and offered burnt-offerings, because they had not lost a man, but were all returned home in peace, [1 Mac. 5. 54.]

After Pentecost, Judas and his brethren with 3000 Foot, and 400 Horse, marched against Gorgias, who had the command of Idumea, with intent to give him battle, [2 Mac. 12. 32, 33. cum 1 Mac. 5. 65.]

In that fight few of the Jews were slain: yet when Dositheus, one of the Bacenors troupe, a stout man, had taken Gorgias prisoner, and apprehending him by his coat of male, led him away, a Thracian trouper made up toward him, and cut off his shoulder, and rescued Gorgias, that accursed miscreant, who made his escape into into Marissa: but when they that followed Eldris (one of Judas his Captains) were wearied with long fighting; Judas, after he had called upon the Lord, and sang Psalms and Hymns in his mother-tongue, set upon Gorgias his forces unawares, and made them flee, [2 Mac. 12. 33, 37.]

Then having after the victory called together his army, he withdrew to the City Odullam: and when the seventh day was come, they purified themselves, and kept the Sabbath. The day following, when Judas his souldiers had gathered up the bodies of those that fell in the battle, with an intent to bury them, they found under every ones coat, things consecrated to the Idols of the Jamnites; which was prohibited the Jews by their Law, [Dent. 7. 25, 26.] So that it was clear and evident to all, that this was the cause of their miscarriage. Hereupon they betook themselves unto prayer, εὐχαριστοῦντες τῷ κυρίῳ ἀναψήματα πάντας ἐξ αὐτοῦ θύειν; beseeching God, That sin might be utterly rooted out; or, (as the Arundel book, and the Aldin edition reads it) εὐχόμενοι μὴ διὰ τὴν ἡμετέραν ἀμαρτίαν πάντας ἐξ αὐτοῦ θύειν; They beseeched God, that they might not be utterly razed out for that sin: moreover, they made a contribution of two, or three, (as the Greek Arundel, and my own Syriac book, or twelve, as the Latine copies have it) thousand drachms of silver and sent to Jerusalem, to provide a sin-offering, [Ibid. 38, 43.]

Then Judas with his brethren went against the sons of Esau, and discomfited them in the South (of Judea,) and smote Hebron, with the villages thereof, dismanted the fortification; and fired the towers round about. From thence he removed, purposing to go into the land of the Philistins, and passed throw Sagarria. At that time certain Priests desirous to shew their valour, and not going very widely to work, were slain in a skirmish.

skirmish. Then Judas declined toward Azotus, into the land of strangers or Philistines, and when he had overturned their altars; burnt their graven images, and taken away the spoils of the Cities, he returned into Judea, [1 Macc. 5. 65, 68.]

When Antiochus his souldiers which were garrisoned in the Tower at Jerusalem, had blocked up the Jews round the Sanctuary, always studying which way they could annoy them, and strengthen the heathen: Judas and all the people besieged them in the 150 year of the Greeks, having planted their battery — and engines; howbeit some of the besieged got forth (to whom also certain wicked-Israelites joyned themselves) and prevailed with Antiochus Eupator the King, speedily to oppose himself against that swelling power of the Jews, [1 Macc. 6. 18, 27.]

Hereupon the King summoned together all his friends, and the Commanders of his army, and Masters of his house: and to these repaired forces from other kingdoms, and from the Islands or sea coasts: So that his whole power consisted of 100000 Foot, and 20 thousand Horse, and 32 Elephants, trained up for war, [1 ibid. 28, 29, 30.] But in the second book of the Maccab. we read, how that in the 149 year (of the account, viz. of the Contrasts) that tidings was brought to Judas Maccabeus, that Antiochus Eupator was gone against Judea provided with Greek forces, to the number of 100000 Foot, and 5300 Horse, 22 Elephants, and 300 Chariots with hooks, [2 Maccab. 13. 1, 2.]

Menelaus the Usurping High Priest sided with this power, feeding himself with fond hopes of obtaining from Eupator that honour which hitherto he had but the empty title of, [2 Macc. 13. 3.]

King Eupator came with a mind highly enraged, resolving to bring far greater mischief upon the Jews, than ever his father had done: which when Judas heard of, he commanded the people, That they should call upon God night and day, that he would vouchsafe them his wonted assistance: and then having called a Council of war, he resolved to march against the King, and encamp about Modin, [2 Macc. 13. 9, 14.]

The Kings army having marched thorough Idumea, assaulted Bethsura, with their engines: but the Bethsurans sallied forth, and fired them, and fought with them valiantly. As for Judas, he pitched in Bethzachariah, over against the Kings Camp, [1 Macc. 6. 31, 32.] and when he had given the watch-word to his men, Victories are from God, taking along with him some of his choicest men, he attempted by night the enemies Camp, and pierced as far as the Kings own pavilion: he slew at this bout, near 4000 men, and their prime Elephant, with all that were upon him: upon the dawn of the morning, he drew off, and departed with good success, having thereby transfused a dread and a horror clean thorough the enemies Camp, [2 Maccab. 13. 15, 16, 17.]

Then the King early in the morning, marched apace with his army, and pitched near Bethzachariah: where he drew up his men into battalia, and ordered that the juice of grapes and mulberries should be set before the Elephants, supposing thereby to render them more fierce upon the fight. These beasts were disposed through the army, and to each beast, was assigned 1000 Foot well appointed, and 500 Horse: in their wooden castles which every one of them carried on his back, were 32 souldiers, besides the Indian which guided him: Their armour made such a glorious shew, that the neighbouring hills glittered by reason of the reflexion of the Sun-beams upon their shields of gold and brass, [1 Macc. 6. 33, 42.]

Judas and his army engaged the enemy, and killed of the Kings Party 600 men. At which time, Eleazar, surnamed Savaran, (or Avaran rather, Judas his brother [1 Macc. 2. 5.] observing an Elephant in royal harness, and taller than any of his fellows, and supposing the King was upon his back, made up toward him, slaughtering his enemies on both hands, and crept under his belly, and slew him; but he himself was pressed to death with the fall of the beast upon him: But the Jews perceiving the valiant power of the King, and the strength of his Forces, turned away from them, [1 Maccab. 6. 42, 47.]

The King upon his return to the siege of Bethsura, was sometimes put to flight (by Judas) other whiles in skirmishes, he retreated with loss. But Judas neglected not to relieve the besieged, and to send them such things as they stood in need of. Rhodius, one of the Jewish army, sent intimation hereof to the enemy: hereupon inquiry being made, he was seized on, put upon the rack, and kept in prison. Then the King parleyed the second time with the Bethsurans, and inclined them to resign unto him, [2 Macc. 13. 19, 22.] After the peace thus concluded, betwixt them, they all marched out of the City, being forced to surrender for want of provision to sustain the siege; for that year was the Sabbatical year, in which it was not lawful to sow their land. But the King after he had taken Bethsura, placed a Garrison therein to keep it, [1 Maccab. 6. 49, 50.]

Thence

Thence the Kings army went up to Jerusalem, and encamped against Mount Sion, and the Sanctuary many dayes together, and planted his Artillery with Engines, and instruments to cast fire and stone, and pieces to hurl darts, and slings: whereupon the besieged counter-made these Engines, with others of their own, and held them play a long while; but victuals began to grow scant with them both, in regard that this was the seventh year, and also because they in Judea which were delivered from the Gentiles, had eaten up the residue of their store: very few were left in the Sanctuary, because the famine prevailed to mightily amongst them, that they were forced to disperse themselves into several places, [1 Maccab. 6. 51, 54. Ios. phus. lib. 11. cap. 14.]

In the mean time, Philip, whom Antiochus Epiphanes had by his last Testament nominated Tutor to his son Eupator, and under him appointed over the affairs of that whole kingdom, (being returned out of Egypt) came out of Media and Persia, with the forces which Epiphanes had left there, [1 Maccab. 3. 37.] purposely to recover by force his right which Lyfias had usurped. [1 Maccab. 4. 55, 56. 2 Maccab. 13. 23.]

When Lyfias heard hereof, he perswaded the King and the Commanders of the army, to make peace with the whole nation of the Jews, and to permit them to enjoy their own constitutions, as in former times: in regard, that their army lessened every day, the provision for the Camp failed, the place which they besieged was well fortified, and the affairs of their own kingdom were urgent and important. [1 Maccab. 6. 57, 58, 59.]

The Kings and his great ones, assenting to what Lyfias had moved, sent in to the besieged, about articles of peace: the conditions were accepted of, and the Covenant confirmed with an oath. Whereupon the besieged marched out of the Garrison, and the King entered Mount Sion, offered sacrifice, honoured the Temple, and dealt kindly with the place: But in a while after, when he had well considered the strength of the place, he brake his oath, and gave order to pull down the wall round about. [1 ibid. 60, 61, 62. cum 2 Maccab. 13. 23.]

The King appointed Maccabeus, or (as the Greek context bears it, and my Syriack Interpreter hath it) Higeonides rather, General of his army from Ptolemais to the Gerrenians, [2 Maccab. 13. 24.] or as far as Egypt; whose boundary is the mountain Gerur, by Ptolemies assignment.

While the King was come to Ptolemais, the Ptolemaians (who allwayes bare a deadly hatred to the Jews, as appears by the History, 1 Maccab. 12. 48.) were heartily vexed at the peace made with Judas, and in a rage, would needs have nullified the Covenant. But Lyfias went up to the judgement-seat, where he to well defended the matter, that he appeased the tumult, and pacified the Citizens. [2 Maccab. 13. 25, 26.] Josephus, at the close of the 14 book of his Antiquities, says, That the Sovereignty of the Hasmoneans lasted 26 years, to the taking of Jerusalem by Herod, and the slaying of Antigonus, or (as Hero hath it in the same Author, lib. 17, and the same work, cap. 8.) one year lesser. But that fell out the 126 year from this time, so that the investiture of the commanding power in the Hasmoneans took its rise from the time of the peace, agreed on betwixt Antiochus and Maccabeus.

From the Autumn began the year of accounts of the contracts, CL. which the Collector of the second book of the Maccabees, makes use of.

Antiochus Eupator, with Lyfias his Guardian, hastening to Antioch, [1 Maccab. 6. 63, 2 Maccab. 13. 26.] brought along with him as prisoner, Menelaus the High Priest, [1 Ios. phus. lib. 12. cap. 15.] whom Lyfias had accused as the sole incendiary of the whole Jewish war, and the first promoter of all their evils. Whereupon, by expresse from the King, he was sent to Berthea in Syria, where he was let down into a Tower filled with ashes, and so dyed a death worthy of his life. [2 Maccab. 13. 48.]

This wretched Menelaus thus taken out of the way (the tenth year after his first usurping the Priesthood) at Berthea, (as it is truly written in Josephus, pa. 421, and not as in pag. 700, erroneously at Berytenc.) the King substituted another in his room, every whit as bad as the former: Alcimus or Jacinus by name: Priest indeed he was of Aarons progeny, but not of the High Priests blood. Lyfias, having perswaded the King to transfer that dignity into another family, [1 Ios. phus. Antiq. lib. 12. cap. 15, & lib. 20. cap. 8.]
